"There's a certain segment of the population that's going to write checks," Bradford said. "You probably get stuck behind them in the check-out aisle."

Like millions of other Americans, Richard Kesterson of Omaha, Nebraska, prefers using his debit card because it is easier than writing checks.

Texas lawmaker wants HPV vaccine order overturned

BY LIZ AUSTIN PETERSON
ASSOCIATED PRESS

AUSTIN, Texas — A lawmaker and key ally of Gov. Rick Perry urged him Monday to rescind his executive order making Texas the first state to require girls to be vaccinated against the sexually transmitted virus that causes cervical cancer.

Lawmakers should have been allowed to hear from doctors, scientists and patients before the state implemented such a sweeping mandate, said state Sen. Jane Nelson, chairwoman of the health and human services committee.

"This is not an emergency," said Nelson, who routinely works closely with the governor, also a Republican. She said she plans to ask Attorney General Greg Abbott for an opinion on the legality of Perry's order. "It needs to be discussed and debated."

Perry ordered the Texas Health and Human Services Commission to adopt rules requiring Merck & Co.'s new Gardasil vaccine for girls entering the sixth grade as of September 2008. The vaccine protects girls against strains of the human papillomavirus that cause most cases of cervical cancer.

Some conservatives have said they fear the vaccine requirement would condone premarital sex. Texas allows parents to opt out of inoculations by filing an affidavit objecting to the vaccine on religious or philosophical reasons, but critics say the order still interferes with parental rights.

"Providing the HPV vaccine doesn't promote sexual promiscuity any more than providing the Hepatitis B vaccine promotes drug use," Perry responded in a statement.

Perry also directed state health authorities to make the vaccine available free to girls ages 9 to 18 who are uninsured or whose insurance does not cover vaccines. And he ordered Medicaid to offer Gardasil to women ages 19 to 21.

Sen. Jane Nelson, right, asks that Texas Gov. Rick Perry rescind his executive order that all girls be vaccinated for HPV before entering the sixth grade.

HAMPSHIRE FITNESS club
90 Gatehouse Rd. (At Echo Hill)
Amherst • 256-6446
Off Rte. 9, two miles east of Amherst College
OPEN 6AM-10AM MON-FRI
8AM-9PM SAT & SUN
★Swimming ★Tennis
★Basketball ★Fitness
COMPETITIVE BASKETBALL GAMES w/JERRY Mon/Thurs 6-8pm
OVER 30 FREE CLASSES WEEKLY
HAMPFIT.COM for Rates & Info
Join Now
Winter Special
$188/ 15 Weeks
Student Rate
EFT available

China tightens controls on own media

BY AUDRA AND
ASSOCIATED PRESS

BEIJING — At a time when China's government has granted the foreign media greater freedom, it is tightening controls on Chinese who write about politically sensitive or embarrassing topics, human rights activists and journalists say.

International PEN, a writer's organization that calls itself the world's oldest human rights group, said Monday that local police prevented 20 Chinese writers from attending its international conference in Hong Kong over the weekend.

Some were warned not to go, while others who had permits to travel to Hong Kong, a Chinese territory under separate administration, had their documents seized at the border.

The travel restrictions came after China's recent ban of eight books, most of them works of history, including one about the outbreak of severe acute respiratory syndrome, or SARS, in 2003. The Chinese government was criticized for being too slow in confronting the deadly new virus.

The crackdown came just weeks after the government relaxed decades-old restrictions on foreign media, giving them greater freedom to report the 2008 Beijing Olympics — a move that it hoped would burnish its international image.

But Chinese writers said the tolerance granted foreigners does not extend to those who write for a Chinese audience.

"It's all for show," said Yu Jie, a writer who has been blacklisted and unable to publish under his own name for more than two years. "They're actually tightening their grip on China's writers."

Liu Xiaobo, a prolific Internet essayist and political critic, said authorities rejected his application for a permit to attend the International PEN event in Hong Kong.

"They have different regulations for the outside and for us on the inside," Liu said. "The new openness that they talk about is all about the Olympics. Nothing has changed for the people within the country. ... It's barbaric."

Fifteen Chinese writers did attend but the 20 who didn't either could not obtain travel documents or were told not to go, said Zhang Yu, general secretary of the Independent Chinese PEN Center.

Zhang Yihe, whose book on the repression of classical Chinese opera stars in the 1960s was among eight recently banned, decided not to attend the conference after being warned by authorities. Zan Aizong, a former journalist, and Zhao Dagong, another dissident writer, had travel papers but were blocked from leaving, PEN said.

While the Chinese leadership has sought to create the appearance of a more open society in advance of the Olympics, critics say it has actually grown less tolerant of dissent under President Hu Jintao — whose government has imposed new restrictions on religion, the media, political activism and the Internet.

"China did itself a PR favor" by loosening restrictions on foreign journalists, said Kristin Jones of the Committee to Protect Journalists. The move, however, "doesn't address the more serious risks faced by Chinese journalists," she said.

Jones, who is a senior research associate for Asia, said not only do domestic journalists face greater restrictions on their work, but they are also more likely to be threatened or physically attacked by local authorities than foreigners are.

Authorities continue to use vaguely worded state secrecy and subversion charges to suppress criticism of the ruling Communist Party.

"It's a double standard because the Chinese government knows that if these people are allowed to travel, to move, to speak freely, they will reach new audiences," said Vincent Brossel, a spokesman for Reporters Without Borders, a Paris-based advocacy group.

"They know the impact will increase if these people ... especially human rights defenders, become an icon for the fight for democracy," he said. "It will be much more difficult for authorities to crack down on them."

The crackdown has hit China's whistleblowers as well as its journalists.

An elderly doctor who embarrassed Chinese leaders by exposing blood-selling schemes that infected thousands with HIV was detained by authorities at her home, apparently to prevent her from applying for a U.S. visa, fellow AIDS activists said Monday.

Gao Yaojie — who is in her 80s — was to be honored next month in Washington by Vital Voices Global Partnership, an international group that provides aid and training to women who serve as community leaders. But Gao was warned last week not go, said Hu Jia, a fellow campaigner and friend.

Police detained Gao at her home in central Henan province before she could leave for a planned trip to Beijing on Sunday to arrange her visa, Hu said.

It was at least the second time authorities have tried to stop her from traveling abroad. In 2001, Gao was refused a passport to go to Washington to accept an award from a U.S. group.

She gained recognition in the late 1990s for her efforts to alert people in Henan to an AIDS outbreak being spread by tainted blood transfusions. Her warning came at a time when the government was still tightlipped about its problem with the disease.

Gao spoke openly to the press and distributed brochures about the spread of AIDS among poor farmers through commercial blood banks. She has distributed medicine, cared for AIDS orphans and hosted AIDS sufferers in her modest apartment.

Chinese AIDS campaigner Dr. Gao Yaojie has been placed under house arrest by Chinese officials to stop her from attending a gathering for AIDS in the U.S.

China's government has restricted the country's media to control writing on politically sensitive topics, such as AIDS. Activists and journalists have been detained in China to prohibit their reporting such topics.

Missouri suspect charged with sodomy

BY CHRISTOPHER LEONARD
ASSOCIATED PRESS

CLAYTON, Mo. — A Missouri man accused of kidnapping two boys and holding one for more than four years was charged Monday with molesting them nearly 70 times.

The charges were the first time authorities have openly accused Michael Devlin of molesting the children.

Devlin, a 41-year-old pizzeria manager, was charged with 69 counts of forcible sodomy, all felonies and each punishable by up to life in prison.

St. Louis County prosecutor Robert McCulloch said 17 of the counts related to 13-year-old Ben Ownby, who disappeared Jan. 8, and the remaining counts were related to Shawn Hornbeck, now 15, who was abducted in 2002.

McCulloch said the evidence includes interviews with all of the people involved. "Devlin acknowledged committing these acts," McCulloch said.

Both boys were found inside Devlin's apartment in the St. Louis suburb of Kirkwood on Jan. 12.

The charges allege that Devlin forced Ben to have "deviate sexual intercourse" four times each day for the four days he was held.

The charges also allege that after kidnapping Hornbeck in October 2002, Devlin kept Shawn isolated in Devlin's apartment for the first month.

The boy was forced to have intercourse with Devlin throughout that month and at least once a month until Shawn and Ben were found in January.

Authorities refused to discuss other details of the allegations beyond what was described in the charges.

Less than a week after the boys were found, Shawn's parents appeared on Oprah Winfrey's talk show, saying they believed he had been sexually abused during the ordeal.

Devlin has pleaded not guilty to the kidnapping charges.

Authorities have said Devlin used a gun to threaten Shawn when he was abducted in 2002.

Scott Sherman, a lawyer representing Shawn and his family, said Shawn is willing to testify if the case goes to trial.

"I think he's committed to justice, as painful as it might be," Sherman said.

Shawn was 11 when he vanished while riding his bike near his home in Richwoods. Ben disappeared after he got off the school bus in Beaufort. A white pickup seen speeding away led police to Devlin, authorities said.

Michael Devlin, 41, is accused of kidnapping two Missouri boys and holding one for over four years. He faces charges of molestation and sodomy.

Antidepressants may be cause of suicides

SUICIDE from page 1

ing black box warnings. The agency ordered the warnings in October 2004 and they began to appear on drug labels about six months later.

Psychologist David Shern, president of Mental Health America, called the new data "a disturbing reversal of progress."

Other research has linked certain antidepressants with decreasing suicide rates, Shern said, adding, "We must therefore wonder if the FDA's actions and the subsequent decrease in access to these antidepressants in fact have caused an increase in youth suicide."

Antidepressant use among children decreased during the same time period. Data from Verispan show 3 million antidepressant prescriptions were written for kids through age 12 in 2004, down 6.8 percent from 2003. Among 13- to 19-year-olds, the number dropped less than 1 percent to 8.11 million in 2004. Steeper declines in both age groups occurred in 2005, according to the prescription tracking firm.

The suicide data are preliminary and don't show whether suicides might have been concentrated in one region or among one gender or ethnic group, said the CDC's Dr. Alexander Crosby.

FRUSTRATED?
PUZZLED?
DO YOU HAVE
A grade dispute?
Teacher, roomate or job concerns?
Billing problems?
...or any other University related problems?
THE OMBUDS OFFICE CAN HELP
(confidentially, of course)
Serving the students, faculty, and staff of the Umass Community
823 Campus Center
Office Hours: 8:00 a.m. - 5:00 p.m.
Telephone: 413 - 545 - 0867
fax: 413 - 545 - 9720
e-mail: ombuds@ombuds.umass.edu

Local bar, students donate to charity

DELANOS from page 1

because it's a great charity with a UMass connection."

"It's a good youth organization that helps raise money for little kids to get involved in sports," said UMass senior Greg Lardley, a member of the winning team. "It was just a good opportunity to do something worthwhile, while also having a good time."

The UMass men's rugby team received the second largest donation, amounting in $500. The remaining $750 was divided into three different charities, including the Amherst Regional High School band, Hitchcock Center for the Environment, and the Dakin Pioneer Valley Humane Society.

Due to its financial success and the fun had by many of those involved, Power — who also owns the Harp — is planning on running the same event again for this semester, starting next Monday.

"We've been doing this at the Harp for about five years, and we've raised about $10,000 per year for charity," he said. "This is the very first semester we did it at Delano's, and we're going to start it again on Monday at 8 p.m. The more teams we get, the bigger the prize pool we'll be able to have."

"It was fun coming here each week," said senior Leanna Toy, "I really liked the trivia aspect of it, and it's really good to be able to donate all that money. It helped me get away from school every Monday night, and it was for a good cause."

For Power and many of the students, it was important to show that the student body at UMass can benefit the community.

"This is all supposed to be for fun," said Power. "The idea is that there are ways for college students that get the short end of the press coverage, to show that they are actually doing a lot of good. They can have fun, enjoy themselves and raise money for charity."

"It feels good, especially because of the press UMass has been getting because of the riots and everything," Lardley said. "With this, people get to see there's something good going on campus."

Eli Rosenswaike can be reached at erosenwa@student.umass.edu

Kids turn to elastic band to lose weight

WEIGHT from page 1

frame after having the band installed at age 17.

"I'm a totally different person," she said.

Before the procedure, Kasprowicz said she took medication for a rapid heartbeat and was showing signs of developing diabetes. Every effort she made to stop getting bigger failed. Dieting didn't work, she said. Her heart problems made it hard to exercise. Even walking up stairs was a challenge.

Now, she's off the heart drugs. Her blood-sugar levels are in check. She also feels better about herself.

Similar studies are under way at the University of Illinois Medical Center in Chicago and at the Morgan Stanley Children's Hospital of New York-Presbyterian, which recently opened a weight-loss surgery center for teens. Doctors there expect to conduct about 50 operations this year.

Children are only considered candidates for surgery after they have spent six months trying to lose weight through conventional methods under hospital supervision. But so far, not a single one has slimmed down enough to take surgery off the table, said Dr. Jeffrey Zitsman, associate attending surgeon at Morgan Stanley Children's Hospital.

The studies have followed a huge surge in the popularity of obesity surgeries among adults. The American Society for Bariatric Surgery estimates that more than 177,000 Americans had weight-loss surgery last year, up from 47,000 in 2001.

Not everyone is pleased that kids might be next.

"I don't think altering the human digestive tract is a solution to the problem of excess weight," said Joanne Beda, a nutritionist emeritus at the University of California, Berkeley. "It's one of these quick-fixes that isn't a fix at all."

Doctors, she said, still know relatively little about the long-term effects of such operations on the very young.

The federal Agency for Healthcare Research and Quality released a study in July that said four in 10 weight-loss surgery patients develop complications within six months. Among adults, mortality rates among gastric bypass patients remain at between 1 in 100 and 1 in 200 patients.

Laparoscopic gastric banding has been shown to have a much smaller death rate — about 1 in 1000 patients — but complications do occur.

Of the patients who participated in the NYU study, two needed a second operation to adjust a slipping band, two developed hernias, five got an infection; five suffered mild hair loss and four had iron deficiencies related to their new diet. After the study was complete, one patient asked to have her band removed because of discomfort, said Evan Nadler, a pediatric surgeon and co-author of the study.

Nadler said those complications were minor compared to the chronic diabetes and cardiovascular disease teens would face if they remained that heavy into adulthood.

"These are people who have tried everything they could possibly try," he said, noting that their mean weight at the study's start was 297 pounds. "Once they reach this level of morbid obesity, the vast majority go on to be obese adults," he said.

But he also advised caution.

"When we ask them, 'What have you done so far to lose weight?' the patients say, 'Nothing.'" Wadden said. "They're going right to a $25,000 operation for which they are ill-prepared."

It would be tragic, he said, to see the same phenomenon repeated among children.

OPEN WEDNESDAY,
VALENTINE'S DAY 5PM–10PM
Goten
OF JAPAN STEAKHOUSE
FAMOUS FOR CAPTIVATING CUISINE PREPARED AT YOUR TABLE
RT. 116, SUNDERLAND 413-665-3628

Cut out this ad receive your FREE $10 gift card!
BEACH CLUB TANNING STUDIOS
$10 Gift Card
•Limit one• coupon per customer
•Offer• Expires 02/28/07

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

EDITORIAL OPINION

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 6, 2007

"I may not agree with what you say, but I will defend to the death your right to say it." Voltaire

EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Ready, set, slow down

Debbie Friedman

Attention graduating seniors: if you haven't figured out what you want to do with the rest of your life, you're totally screwed. After all, four months is all that separates us from the real world. So you'd better identify the right career for you and start applying for entry-level positions with potential for growth. You should also start thinking about opening a savings account so you can put aside some money for your future family and house in the suburbs. Accept that the fun of life is over, and it's time to join the machine. We are adults starting May 26, 2007.

But wait, it doesn't have to be that way! It's just what "they" want us to think they being all the unhappy adults who can often be heard saying "enjoy your time now, 'cus after college it's all downhill." The next era in our life has no boundaries or definition. So, why not live out your dreams instead of settling for whatever falls into your lap?

Of course we all want our college degree to translate into prosperity and financial success, but graduation is not the shotgun start into the rat race of life. After graduation, take a minute and do something you will never have the opportunity to do again. When else in your life are you going to have the freedom to move around and do something adventurous? Never.

Most adults I've talked to tell me their biggest regret was jumping right into the career they've been doing their entire lives.

In her book "Delaying the Real World: A Twentysomething's Guide to Seeking Adventure", Colleen Kinder lists a whole bunch of ideas on how to make your twenties a time to remember, instead of a monotonous period that you wish you could forget. As Kinder says, "don't be in such a rush to become boring! Let the early years be more unconventional and experimental… a thousand fleeting opportunities are waiting for you, and there is nothing holding you back from taking your pick."

To those of you in a hurry to make tons of money, this suggestion might not sound appealing. But remember, you have decades ahead of you to get your PHD, become a CEO or run for governor.

Most adults I've talked to tell me their biggest regret was jumping right into the career they've been doing their entire lives. You don't have to make the same mistake.

One of the biggest suggestions Kinder offers up is travel, and not the vacation kind of trip. Moving to another country for some span of time and picking up a work visa is something you most likely won't ever get to do again. Whether you decide to bartend in Ireland, work at a resort in New Zealand, join the Peace Corps or teach English in Spain, it's all good experience that is sure to broaden your horizons and give you insight into what you want to shoot for in life.

Of course with travel, money is a necessity. But as Kinder says, "don't let money be your excuse to be lame; take it as a challenge."

Within this country there are tons of great, unique opportunities waiting as well. Teach for America and AmeriCorps are two great ways to help others and help yourself at the same time, since they both look great on a resume. You could also look for a cool job at a nonprofit organization or anywhere that would help explore your hobbies and passions, even if they don't relate to your career objective. There are many appealing options out there, and now is the time to start researching which ones fit you.

In the past few years I've seen an art history major go abroad to volunteer in a preschool, only to realize in one month that she wanted to be a teacher. I've also seen a business major volunteer for Hurricane Katrina relief and realize he wanted to work for a disaster relief foundation instead of being an accountant. I've also seen far too many people go straight into a cubicle where they become destitute and regretful because they settled and lost sight of their dreams.

This doesn't mean you have to be a humanitarian for a year before you can start your life, or that joining the corporate world is a terrible mistake. It just means taking a trip off the beaten path to try and find your own way in this world is something worth doing.

In a couple months when you graduate, don't settle for something you aren't happy with just because you think your life has to look a certain way. Remember that no matter your career ambitions, a unique opportunity straight out of college is going to help you define yourself and identify what makes you happy. In doing so, you will be much better off in the future.

Contrary to popular belief, graduating from college is not the entry into this so called "real world," because we all live in a very real world and have for all our lives. So try not to greet this approaching change with anxiety and fear.

Instead, enjoy the ride and pursue something that beats your heart instead of settling for something that has you counting down the seconds on your watch—and your life.

Debbie Friedman can be reached at dfriedm@student.umass.edu.

To cigarettes, with love

Kenny Mulligan

On January 23, I broke up with someone very important to me. My main regret is that I never took the chance to really say goodbye. I am truly sorry for that, and the least I can do is write a proper Dear John letter. Sorry, Cigarettes.

It's not you. It's me.

I'll start off with saying why I was into you for so long. Being with you was a breath of fresh air. I think it's because you were so reliable. After a meal, walking to and from class, at work, before bed, after brushing my teeth; I could always immediately turn to you to be my cherry on top. You went with literally anything. Like a more cancerous version of milk.

Being without you has admittedly left an emptiness in my soul. You were like a tiny little support beam; when the soul-crushing drudgery of life became too much of a burden. You were like a torch burning in front of me to guide me through my darker patches.

You were a key that opened the door to a community of folks on the sidewalks outside every bar I've ever been to. This reminds me; we don't have to divvy up our friends, do we? I hope we can be civil about this.

Still, as good as you were to me, the short-term pleasure of being with you didn't stack up against the long-term risks. I know your history with previous partners, and I know it didn't turn out well for them. Being with you was like dating a girl with herpes.

That reminds me of something. You weren't exactly faithful. Half the time, you were on the mouths of others, and people just couldn't stop asking to share you with me, only because you invited it so. You got passed around like a joint, Cigarettes.

I recall leaving you alone in my room, coming back an hour later, and seeing up to five of my friends leaving as I entered. And then I would see you. Lying in the ashtray, in a pile of your own filth, burnt out, and too bent out of shape to illicit any response. You looked like some dirty little crack whore, and it made me sick to even see you that way.

I can't say all my friends shared those guys' sentiments. I have other friends who just plain didn't like you. They simply tolerated you for my sake, which is more than I deserved. Sometimes, they would even avoid me, just so they didn't have to be around you.

But you didn't even notice this. No, it was always about you, Cigarettes. You always had to be included. I never got any 'Me' time. It was the clingiest relationship I've ever been in.

And how about all that money I dumped on you? Look, I'm not a cheap person and I don't mind spending money on the ones I love, but you could have contributed more than you did. I spent thousands of dollars on you, and your only contribution was that petty Camel Cash. Wow, $100-thousand of your imaginary money got me a fing mesh baseball cap. Thanks. Your reciprocations weren't just half-assed; they were quarter-assed.

I have other friends who just plain didn't like you. They simply tolerated you for my sake, which is more than I deserved.

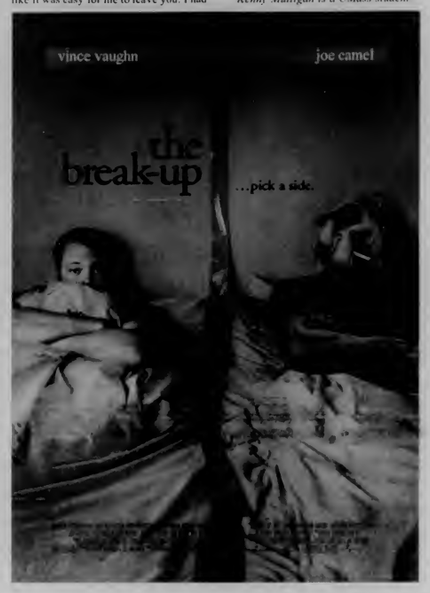
Don't feel so bad, Cigarettes. It's not like it was easy for me to leave you. I had to clean everything in my room, just to get your familiar smell out.

Look, it's not like we didn't have a good run. And let's be honest: Did you really think this was going to last forever? I specifically told you we definitely weren't going to be able to make this work after I graduated.

Don't think for one second that this isn't harder for me than it is for you. You probably found someone else a minute after I left you. But in my life, you're entirely irreplaceable.

This brings me to my final statement. We're breaking this off entirely. I don't want to be friends. I don't even want to just take a little time away from you. We tried that already, and not even two weeks later, we were back to the same old habits. It's over, Cigarettes. I never want to see you again. Don't try and contact me. Trust me, it's better this way.

Kenny Mulligan is a UMass student



Get your money's worth

Domenic Poli

According to the University of Massachusetts Undergraduate Admissions Web site, the total cost of tuition and fees for an in-state student is $9,883.

As we all know, money does not grow on trees.

Those hard-earned dollars that we annually fork over to the administration help to pay for a free transit bus system, four Dining Commons, a library, two gymnasiums (Boyden, Totman) and even the occasional professional entertainer.

Yet, for some reason, some students fail to fully exploit the many utilities that our campus offers. Numerous pupils choose to spend the money they have in their wallets (many of whom have worked diligently for it at a campus job) to order Wings or Domino's on a weeknight — or, even worse, just snack on a little something that they brought from home instead of grabbing the pre-paid dinner at any one of the four DCs scattered across university grounds.

Rather than eating with a group of friends amongst a plentiful array of food, they elect to use their cash to order out and watch Mind of Mencia alone in their rooms. Nevertheless, a lot of the peers sitting near you right now would rather eat delivery than get some grub at the Dining Commons.

Don't get me wrong, I've ordered from Wings, Domino's and D.P. Dough plenty of times. But, I can't tell you the number of instances I've asked my friends if they'd like to go to dinner and they would decline, saying they would rather just eat some of the graham crackers that they keep in their suitcase.

Now, I know the Dining Common food is not quite like mom's home cooking, but when it comes to campus chow, it's about the best you'll find at any college. It's silly to resort to the munchies you store in your dorm room when your meal plan (no matter which one you have) gets you all the food you want. After all, you're already paying for it.

The PVTA buses can be frustrating to wait for, especially when you're running late for something. But come on, we have our own bus system. Still, many students would rather pay for a UMass parking permit and the ridiculously high price of gas to get into town. Have you ever tried to find a parking spot near North Pleasant Street? It's next to impossible. Not to mention significantly more dangerous after partying the night away at the Amherst Brewing Company. Countless students, however, don't take advantage of the new bus system.

We have our bus system. Still, many students would rather pay for a UMass parking permit and the ridiculously-high price of gas to get into town.

If you've missed the W.E.B. DuBois Library on campus, you're blind. Standing at 297 feet (26 stories), it's the tallest college library in the country and has over 5 million books, periodicals and government documents. Yet there are kids who (for whatever reason) say they never step foot in the gargantuan structure — and that's a shame. There is a Writing Center, lots of computers and plenty of space to sit quietly and pound out that paper due tomorrow. Mountains of work can get done in DuBois, but still some choose not to make use of it. Even if you already go to the library, go more often.

Then, for those of us who were athletically active in high school but, quite frankly, aren't cut out for collegiate varsity sports, we can still work up a sweat at Boyden or Totman gym. Boyden is comprised of six basketball courts, four badminton courts, four volleyball courts as well as handball, squash paddleball and wallyball courts. Plus, Boyden includes a swimming pool and full weightroom fitness center. Totman has more or less the same accessories with its own pool, basketball, badminton and volleyball courts, in addition to its own workout facility. You can find out what hours the pool is open on the UMass recreation facilities Web site. A simple swipe of your UCard by the attendant on duty and you're in.

Lastly, what about all the free entertainment? Last September, Bob Saget put on a comedy show and the tickets to go see the filthy comic were free of charge. It's true that the show sold out and more people wanted to go that couldn't — but I wonder how many weren't able to attend because they didn't run down to the ticket office as soon as they heard the words, "Free Tickets." And it wasn't just Mr. Danny Tanner, either. In 2005, Mo Rocca also gave a show gratis. And the year before him it was Lewis Black.

We students, if we try hard enough, can get a lot for our money. I know it doesn't look like it at first, but it's true. I'm somewhat guilty of not utilizing all of my options as well — and I'm going to change that. I'm not trying to tell you what to do. I just want you to make good use of your tuition dollars. You should take full advantage of everything on campus. If you don't want to, that's fine. But, hey, it's your dime you already spent.

Domenic Poli can be reached at dpoli@student.umass.edu

SUSPECTED DRUG SMUGGLER SHOT BY BORDER AGENTS MAY SUE U.S. FOR $ 5 MILLION WAIT!! DON'T SHOOT... IF WE HIT THE GUY'S LAWYER WE'LL REALLY BE IN TROUBLE!
← U.S.
MEXICO →
STAYSKAL TRIBUNE MEDIA SERVICES '07

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

ARTS & LIVING

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 6, 2007

ARTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Disney presents the opportunity of a lifetime

Intern recruiters come to campus

By Stephanie McPherson
Collegian Correspondent

Walt Disney, the creator of animated classics such as Snow White and the Seven Dwarfs, The Little Mermaid and the theme park Disneyworld located in Florida, is known for taking the magic of the movies and turning it into real life.

It is in this world that college students can work for months at a time through the Disney College Program. It's a unique internship that can only be experienced at the wonderful world of Disney, open to anyone and everyone who loves Disney World and is willing to work hard. Getting a position in the program does not require a specific major, "it has more to do with your energy and personality," said Jen Parsons, a recent graduate of the University of Massachusetts, and a participant in the Disney College Program four years ago.

The application process is much the same as any other job, starting with a paper application, followed by a viewing of a mandatory presentation either live or via the internet. After the presentation is viewed, the applicant must have an interview, in person or over the phone.

"Most of the questions they ask are pretty standard questions they throw in a couple very… Disney-esque questions though, like what we would do if a child asked if Mickey was real, or what we would do to make a child's dream vacation come true," said Jen of the interviewing process. After the application process is over, the applicant must wait a few weeks for their official invitation into the program.

An applicant can choose from a variety of programs, each one lasting a different amount of time; the Culinary Program, the Spring and Fall semester Programs, the Quarter School Spring and Fall Programs, and the Spring and Fall Advantage Programs. During these times, there are a myriad of jobs a participant can apply for, including hospitality, life guarding, transportation, and vacation planner.

Each job places a participant in a different area of Disney World, whether it is a park, one of the resorts or a mix with the participant traveling from one place to another. The working hours are specific to the park or resort in which the program participant works, and after a long day of work, they return home to one of three residential areas: Vista Way, the Commons, or Chatham Square. Apartment buildings are split according to age, and each apartment is unique and supplied with amenities, including a fully furnished apartment, high speed internet, cable TV, swimming pools and hot tubs. The rent, which varies depending on the living area, is taken out of the participant's paycheck each week, so there is no need to worry about paying your rent on time.

The benefits of this program are countless. A participant's employee badge will get them into any of the parks for free, which allows the participants to fully appreciate the world in which they work. There are also many classes offered that can be used for college credit. The Web site provides a list of majors that are commonly seen as part of the Disney College Program and some aspects of the program that specifically benefit those majors.

Also, after a participant finishes their first term as part of the Disney College Program, they can return to the program in another position, or apply for professional internships, which are only available to those who have completed the Disney College Program.

"This experiential-learning opportunity will provide an unparalleled enhancement to a participant's academic and professional career," claims the program's Web site.

There are other, more personal benefits to the participants.

"When you are a guest [at Disney], you're there on a schedule — you know what you want to see, you see it, and you have to leave" said Jen. "As a cast member, you get to learn and see and do everything there is to do, because you have so much time and unlimited access to the parks all the time."

The Web site boasts that their participants develop many different skills in areas such as guest services, problem solving, communication, teamwork, time management, responsibility and cultural sensitivity, all of which are important skills and knowledge for today's young adults to have. Participants also learn valuable lessons about money management and breaking up personal relationships and having children; all of which has helped each individual grow in maturity.

This is why "Blood Stained Love Story," falls short of what

See DISNEY on page 6

The Disney corporation offers many internships and jobs for college students. Unlike most internships, the Disney program offers credit, pay and a apartment to house students.

Nu metal band Saliva returns with 'Blood Stained Love Story,' their first album in nearly three years.

New Music Tuesday

By Matthew Broderick
Contributing Arts Writer

Fans of the band Saliva will find that their new album, "Blood Stained Love Story," tastes a little but different than their previous four.

Compared to their blaring tunes and spit in your face lyrics of past recordings, this album is overwhelmed by various genres and songs that sound more like emo than heavy-metal. Although the band does not walk upon the same melodic path that it can usually be seen strolling upon, the softer side of Saliva is not completely bad.

After a three-year hiatus returning members include lead singer Josey Scott, guitarist Wayne Skinny, bassist Chris Novotny, and drummer Paul Crosby. Guitarist Chris D'abaldo, who decided to leave the group after an extensive break, was replaced by a former member of the band Full Devil Jacket, guitarist Jon Montoya. Between albums much has come about in the lives of each band member. Scott has quit the excessive partying that led to his battle with substance abuse and is now focused on his career in acting.

Prior to "Blood Stained Love Story," Scott was working on the television show "Wanted," and preparing for his first child with his wife Kendra. Other members of the band also went through life changing events, such as forming many fans expected, because the members of Saliva are not the same as they were a couple years ago.

Tied to their maturity is the changing face of their music, straying from heavy-metal to a variety of different genres. The inexperience of the band in making these different types of music really brought down the album. With such a large mixture within the 10 tracks, there is really no room for a listener to connect with the music. True fans will also be disappointed that the once tamed rage of Saliva is slowly fading away in to no rage at all.

People will find that the few satisfying tracks on the album are those that contain a heavy-metal soul. Saliva is best at making music that contains an amount of adrenaline equivalent to that of drinking 10 Red Bulls. "Ladies and Gentlemen," the album's first tune and single, has fury writhing in its veins. The song can be categorized as a great tribute to Saliva's past music, and also as a window of light to a new era of heavy rock. The combination of lyrics and chorus within this song invite and prepare you to experience the remainder of the album.

To some, after listening to this track, it would appear that Saliva has made another album destined for heavy-metal heaven.

Yet after "Ladies and Gentlemen," the album starts to sink into a black hole of mystery. What comes next is "Broken Sundays," which is more like a sad love story ballad with a rock background and sounds far from anything Saliva has ever done before. Following this is even more drastic with "Never Gonna Change," which is the lightest of all tracks and composes itself like a member of the band battling the loss of a one night stand.

Not all the tracks fall short of respect. Another hard hitting heavy metal song is "Black Sheep." The song derives itself from lyrics that have come directly from the mind of someone lost in a very dark place. Saliva is at its best when it dares to pour the music straight from the souls of each member. The goal of tweaking their hard-rock images to incorporate a new type of sound is accomplished in songs like "King of the Stereo," and "Starting Over."

Matthew Broderick can be reached at MBrodi@student.umass.edu.

Art exhibit inspired by local crime reports

By Anthony David Ruelli
Collegian Correspondent

Two local women will be unveiling their unique artwork in the Student Union Gallery at University of Massachusetts on Tuesday. Abbey Hendrickson and Laticia Scutella's exhibition is titled "Suspicious Activity: Drawings Based on Excerpts from the Amherst Bulletin Police Report."

Both Hendrickson and Scutella hail from Western New York, although they did not meet until they moved to the area around two years ago. They came to the area because both of their husbands are graduate students at UMass (in the art department, coincidentally). Both Hendrickson and Scutella are currently employed at the Eric Carle Museum of Picture Book Art in Amherst, located near Hampshire College.

Hendrickson and Scutella read the police log religiously. They are constantly on the hunt for any interesting, strange-shocking or just plain amusing entries to adapt. They have both been fascinated with reading the police logs since their childhoods.

Hendrickson began collecting lists of her favorite entries and drawing sketches of them as a hobby. Over dinner one evening, she and Scutella discovered each other's love of the police log. They began discussing one entry in particular that they both very much enjoyed reading. In the entry, people had mistaken a trash bag blowing in the wind for an animal prowling in the night. They decided to illustrate it, and the rest is history.

Not long after, Hendrickson

See SUSPICIOUS on page 6

Pan's Labyrinth: not your average fairy tale

By Christina Fong
Collegian Staff

Don't expect any elegant gardens filled with dainty fairies and fluttering butterflies to grace the introduction of Pan's Labyrinth, which is teeming with much more gothic beings. Fantastically imaginative and deliciously fresh, this film unlocks a world so dark and intriguing it twists the mind.

Set during the Franco-era of Spain, young bookish Ofelia (Ivana Baquero Fragiles) and her pregnant mother Carmen played by (Ariadna Gil Una Estrella x dos cafes) are brought to live with her new stepfather, Captain Vidal (Sergi Lopez Peindre en faire l'amour) in the country side. Ofelia is pulled into a world only dreamt of in fairy tales and folklore while forcibly pushed into the dark and sinister world of Vidal's malice. When Ofelia learns she is in fact the long lost Princess Moanna, she must complete three tasks in order to return to the underworld from which she came from.

The acting in the film is superb. Ivana Baquero does a

See PAN'S LABYRINTH on page 6

Pan's Labyrinth is the story of a girl, Ofelia (Ivana Baquero Fragiles), who wanders into the woods to follow a butterfly, once there, Ofelia leaves reality and enters a new world full of fantasy and magic.

Toro returns with one of year's best films

PAN'S LABYRINTH from page 5

wonderful job in bringing innocence and maturity to the role of Ofelia that made her so magnetic. Sergi Lopez is amazing as the villain of the film, a man of absolute evil who shows no pity towards anyone, not even Ofelia. Maribel Verdu (Y tu mama tambien), who plays Mercedes, is great in making herself a strong yet subtle supporting figure to Ofelia in the beginning. She later transforms into her own character.

Frightening and exciting at the same time, Pan's Labyrinth is a ride unlike any other film this year. Guillermo del Toro (Hellboy), who wrote and directed the film, drew from the inner most demons and imaginative creations of his mind to create a world simultaneously beautiful and horrific. He redefined beauty by presenting it in such distorted forms.

PAN'S LABYRINTH

DIRECTED BY GUILLERMO DEL TORO

STARRING IVANA BAQUERO

A-

The creatures of the underworld that come to reveal themselves to Ofelia are some of the most fascinating creations seen on the big screen. The make-up and costume team truly outdid themselves in bringing these creations to life. They had a certain amount of splendor and grotesqueness. The faun, or Pan (Doug Jones, Doom), is by far the most remarkable of them all. A curious looking being with a rough wooden appearance and peculiar face, he came off as being wicked at times and warm other times.

Jones also played The Pale Man, a truly terrifying and gangly creature with eyes in the palm of his hands. He did a magnificent job in giving the two creatures distinct personalities in their gestures and voices, or lack thereof. The giant toad living in the roots of an old tree is nothing short of repulsive. Even the fairies lack refinement found in their more popular variations.

Although there were two separate worlds represented in the film, they were similar in bleakness and severity. The monsters of Ofelia's reality didn't appear too different from those of the underworld. Because of their likeness, it seemed as though Ofelia was trying to understand the brutality of the adult world through her fantasies and fairy tales rather than trying to escape it. The film doesn't delve too far into this fantastical world to the point where the audience grows disenchanted. It reveals just enough to balance both worlds and keep Ofelia the focal point and link between them.

Pan's Labyrinth is the most original and imaginative film thus far. Every single cast and staff member unveiled their talents in producing this film and did an outstanding job in bringing depth and vision to it. It's easy to depict obvious beauty but this film does the opposite by revealing beauty through a discolored lens. This ranks among the top must-see films of the year.

Christina Fong can be reached at CFong@student.umass.edu

Dreams can come true

DISNEY from page 5

and living on his or her own. Jen says she would recommend this program to everyone who, "loves kids and is willing to live 'la vie boheme' for a few months – the money gets tight."

Not only do participants take away valuable life experiences, but they make lifelong memories and friends.

"I loved working there," says Jen. "It was the best decision I ever made. You can learn to appreciate and see the parks through the eyes of the children you see every day. You have the power to make someone's vacation just by showing them a character they've always dreamed of – it's a different kind of magic, but its better."

Stephanie McPherson can be reached at SMcPerson@student.edu

The Disney internship program is available to students of all majors and universities.

This way up.

Start at Ernst & Young, and your career is headed in the right direction. With our award-winning training programs, you'll have the resources you need to enhance your skills. It's an environment that promotes your personal and professional growth and success. So there's only one way to go—up. Visit us on campus or at ey.com/us/careers.

FORTUNE 100 BEST COMPANIES TO WORK FOR 2006

Audit • Tax • Transaction Advisory Services

ERNST & YOUNG

Quality In Everything We Do

© 2007 ERNST & YOUNG

Crime inspires artists

SUSPICIOUS from page 5

heard that the Student Union Gallery would be accepting submissions of artwork. Although she and Scutella do their own separate drawings, they decided to put together a packet of their combined favorites to submit to the Student Union Gallery.

Their exhibit at the Student Union Gallery consists of around 25 pieces thus far. This is the first time that their artwork will be shown publicly. Hendrickson is very interested in continuing her drawing partnership with Scutella although she is not exactly sure where it will take them next.

The Amherst Bulletin Police Log was first created in the early 1990s by Bulletin writer Scott Merzbach, who compiles the log to this day. The log entries are taken from emergency dispatchers in Amherst and many other surrounding towns, including Hadley, Pelham and Sunderland. Many are also taken from the UMass Police Department. The incidents are divided into categories such as motor vehicle accidents, larceny, disturbances and suspicious activity.

Uniquely enough, Hendrickson and Scutella are not the first artists in recent history to tackle this odd subject. Just last year, Ruth West, a computer graphics expert and student at Springfield College, introduced her series of artwork entitled "Just Part of the Story." West's work is currently on display in the nearby town of Leverett.

The women think of what they are doing as a harmless way to give people a laugh and create art at the same time. The Amherst Police Department, however, has dissenting opinions regarding the topic. While some police officers find it amusing, Amherst Police Chief Charles Scherpa believes that it "makes a mockery" out of the police department's difficult and dangerous duty.

While Hendrickson is very excited about the premiere, she is also just a little bit worried.

"Leticia and I don't want people to take [the drawings] the wrong way and mistake our exhibition for mocking anyone in any way," Hendrickson said. She went on to clarify that the artwork is not meant to offend people in any way, but rather to serve as a "light hearted look at communities" that many will understand and appreciate.

"Suspicious Activity" will be on display in the Student Union Gallery at UMass from Feb. 5 to Feb. 16. The opening reception will take place on Tuesday from 5 p.m. to 7 p.m. Hendrickson and Scutella will be in attendance, refreshments will be served and any and all are welcome to come view the exhibit.

Anthony David Ruelas can be reached at ARuelas@student.umass.edu

Student Special

4 MONTHS $149

· Aerobics · Mixed Martial Arts
· Free wts

www.amherstathletic.com

AMHERST ATHLETIC CLUB 256-0050 90 AMHERST

Minutewomen earn third conference win

W. BASKETBALL from page 10

Four missed free throws in the last 20 seconds gave SBU two chances to steal a victory on a night they found no semblance of offensive rhythm.

"We played man-to-man defense the whole game," Dacko said. "I was surprised at how well we did because we've played more zone [recently]. I think we pressed a little bit and that got them rattled."

Indicative of their inability to put the ball in the basket, the Bonnies leading scorer, junior guard Priscilla Edwards, tallied 13 points, on a 2-for-14 shooting night.

With :46 seconds remaining in regulation, a pair of free throws by starting point guard Sakera Young put the Minutewomen up by six. After SBU cut the lead to four, they fouled junior forward Kate Mills on the ensuing UMass possession.

Mills sank one of two free throws, pushing the lead to five. That was until Young's fifth foul of the game put her on the bench and gave junior guard Priscilla Edwards three attempts to cut the lead. Edwards capitalized on the mistake by Young, making all three free throws.

On the next possession, freshman point guard Kim Benton, just off the bench, missed both of her free throws. Following a potential game-tying jump shot by the Bonnies, senior center Tamara Tatham failed to convert either of her free-throw attempts, leaving the score at 51-49.

A steal by Mills on the ensuing SBU possession and an immediate foul earned her a trip to the stripe, and the Minutewomen's best free-throw shooter (fourth in the A-10) converted on both attempts to seal the victory with 3.8 seconds remaining.

Young got the nod over Benton after she was ejected from Friday's game at Saint Joseph's for a flagrant foul with 1:38 remaining in regulation.

Despite hitting almost 42 percent of their shots and out shooting the Bonnies by a wide margin, the Minutewomen barely escaped with a win.

A consistent strength for the Minutewomen has been their ability to take high-percentage shots, and keep their opponents shooting in check. In UMass' last three losses, all of them within the conference, they held the edge in shooting percentage. Testament to their consistency in this area, the Minutewomen are tied with Temple atop the conference leaderboard in shooting percentage, connecting at a 44 percent clip this season. They are a respectable fourth in field-goal percentage defense, holding opponents to just under 38 percent from the floor.

The Minutewomen are second-to-last in the conference in turnover margin, only ahead of Fordham, a team with a 3-20 record.

UMass' poor free-throw shooting in the final minutes has been a nagging problem. On the season, the Maroon and White have hit 69 percent of their free-throw attempts.

Despite its shaky finish, Dacko was pleased with her team's performance.

"I thought we got off to a good start and we managed to move the ball and play good defense," Dacko said. "A lot of kids that don't usually get a lot of playtime got a great deal and were very successful."

Tatham, recovering from an ankle sprain, did not start but ended with 12 points and seven rebounds in 28 minutes. Her coach thinks that the injury is behind her.

"She's doing fine," Dacko said. "I'm trying to get more out of her production, more points and less turnovers. I want her to get mad and be able to really carry this team on her back."

Tatham and the Minutewomen should have no trouble getting mad at their next opponent, as they look to avenge a 71-69 overtime loss when conference rival Rhode Island comes to the Mullins Center Sunday afternoon.

Josh Friedman can be reached at jmfriedm@student.umass.edu

Junior Whitney McDonald scored three points in Sunday's win over the Bonnies. She is eighth on the team in scoring with 2.5 points per game. Following Sunday's game, she and the Minutewomen are now 3-6 in A-10 play.

Junior Allison Volpe (above) swam the third leg of the Minutewomen's victorious 200-yard freestyle relay team against the Fordham Rams this weekend. Other members of the team included Elizabeth Walsh, Kathryne Chalikis and Liz Lovejoy.

UMass finishes strong, ready for A-10s

SWIMMING from page 10

this weekend with a time of 53.50. Ziegler is a great addition to the team this season, but will need to prepare himself both mentally and physically over the next 16 days to consider his rookie campaign a success. Freshman Andrew Willbrant took second place in the event, netting four points for UMass.

Junior Derek Castellana posted his best time of the season in winning the 200-yard butterfly with a 1:56.79 mark. Priest recorded a second-place finish with a time of 1:58.60, scoring four points for the Minutemen.

Junior R.J. Rappe won both diving events – he tallied 296.33 points on the one-meter board and 288.09 in the three-meter event. Rappe is the favorite to capture A-10 Championship in the one-meter event for the third straight season.

In typical fashion, senior Ivan Swisher won the 200-yard backstroke with a time of 1:53.63. Although his time wasn't as fast as in recent weeks, he still won the race by more than four full seconds. Defeating Fordham's top backstroke specialists pretty much assures that Swisher's only real competition in race at the A-10 Championships will be David Zenk.

The 200-yard breaststroke resulted in one of the day's more exciting races. Senior Jake Hogue recorded the fastest time in the race at 2:10.98. The only problem is that Fordham's Niko Felix touched the wall at the exact same time as Hogue. The two tied for first place in the race and judges awarded both teams 6.5 points for their swimmer's efforts.

The day's final race, the 200-yard freestyle relay, produced another winner for UMass. Swisher, freshman Juan Moliere, sophomore Nate Bromage and Howard combined for a victory in the race. Their time of 1:26.76 bested Fordham's A-squad and its 1:28.34 finish. Howard produced the best split for the Minutemen – finishing his leg in 21.38 seconds.

The Minutewomen took a little longer to get on the scoreboard. Their first win came in the day's 15th event when sophomore Karen Upperco won the one-meter diving event. She scored 264.38 points in capturing nine team points for the Maroon and White. Upperco won the three-meter dive as well, outscoring teammate Melissa Pond by more than 26 points. Upperco posted 279.90 points in the event.

UMass got its second win a little faster than the first when freshman Elizabeth Walsh won the 100-yard freestyle event in 53.99. Senior Liz Lovejoy scored two points in the event with her fourth-place finish.

Junior Samantha Denty won the 200-yard individual medley by more than three full seconds with her time of 2:12.24. Freshman Kathryne Chalikis took second place in the event. Her time of 2:15.41 scored four points for the Minutewomen.

The Minutewomen did lose by a considerable margin, but the late surge is something that women's coach Bob Newcomb loves about his team. Earlier in the season, the Minutewomen fell behind early to Central Connecticut State – only to win late races and lose by just five points, 152-147.

The coaches of the A-10 predicted the Minutewomen to finish third in the conference this season. After defeating Rhode Island, George Washington and La Salle at the Rhode Island Invitational, a conference championship became a realistic goal. Many picked Fordham as the league's most improved team and considering the Minutewomen were admittedly exhausted heading into this meet, UMass could still finish ahead of the Rams at 9-10, after the extended rest period.

Joe Mellyn can be reached at mellyn@student.umass.edu

Student Special

4 MONTHS $149

· Aerobics · Mixed Martial Arts
· Free wts

www.amherstathletic.com

AMHERST ATHLETIC CLUB 256-0050 90 AMHERST

UM runners make up for short roster

TRACK AND FIELD from page 10

will be participating in the Valentine Invitational in Boston this Friday. It is the last meet for both the men and women before the Atlantic 10 Championships, which is scheduled for Feb. 17 in Kingston, R.I.

Despite not having any participants in the triple jump, weight throw, shot put or pole vault, the Minutemen compensated for their non-presence in the majority of the field events by holding their own on the track.

UMass' long-distance runners may have been the story of the day. Friday, freshman Andrew McLaine made his debut in the 3,000-meter run and didn't disappoint, finishing in first place out of three runners with a time of 9:02.18.

Sophomore Jonathan Pierce contributed eight points for the Minutemen with a second-place finish in the 5,000-meter run, clocking in at 15:27.14 in his debut run in that event.

The long-jump competition has been a strong event for UMass all season, and Friday was no exception. Steve Gerome picked up where he left off in Boston last Friday, finishing in second place with a leap of 22 feet, five inches.

Seasonal best performances were put in by junior James Bentley and sophomore Kevin Ianetta. Bentley placed fifth in the 500-meter run with a time of 1:08.99. Ianetta, who finished sixth in the 500-meter run, had his best performance of the year in the 55-meter hurdles, clocking in at 8.18 seconds, good for third place.

The Minutewomen's strong event of the day came in the distance medley. Juniors Ashley Davidson, Britt Canfield, and Christina DeRosa, along with freshman Stephanie Mattar took first place with a time of 12:47.85. The win marked the first time this season that UMass finished in first place in the distance medley.

Other notable performances of the day came in the 200-meter run, where Dionise Miranda and freshman Holly Hemricher contributed seven points combined by finishing in fifth and sixth place, respectively.

Kevin Dooley can be reached at kdooley@student.umass.edu

Junior distance-runner Matthew Klypka placed eighth in the one-mile event at the Rhode Island Mega Meet this past weekend.

Attention First-Year Students:

Have you completed MyStudentBody? It's easy, interesting ... and required for all first-year students. To avoid a registration hold, you must take and pass the course no later than Monday, March 12th. For instructions, go to the University Health Services website,

www.umass.edu/uhs

Center for Alcohol and Other Drug Abuse Prevention

Minutemen climb polls despite bad ice, clock

HOCKEY from page 10

year into a team that understands who they are playing every night and pushes that little bit extra when it has to.

"Part of that, I think, is a maturity on the team's part – growing into becoming a better club for 60 minutes," Cahoon said. "The other part of that is out of great respect to BC and knowing their capabilities."

That level of respect may have yielded three losses to the ninth- and tenth-place teams in Hockey East – UMass Lowell and Merrimack, respectively – but it has certainly shown what type of team the Minutemen can be when they faces a true challenge.

Consider the number of "quality" wins the Minutemen have: the two aforementioned wins over the No. 3 Wildcats (one in Durham), two over No. 15 BC, and a 6-2 defeat of No. 18 Niagara. UMass was also a penalty shot from winning that second tie against BU.

The Minutemen are 5-4-2 against ranked opponents and have five more games against ranked Hockey East rivals (two each against Vermont and Maine, and Friday night's matchup with BU), which gives them plenty of ammunition for a possible NCAA Tournament push, and a very strong chance to bring the Hockey East playoffs to the Mullins Center.

Junior Mike Kostka is ninth on the team with 11 points on one goal and 10 assist. The defenseman scored his lone goal of the year in the Minutemen's 6-3 victory over the UMass Lowell River Hawks.

Moving on up, again

The Minutemen are starting to impress the hockey gods once again. After a brief hiatus from the USCHO.com CSTV Top 20, the Mass Attack grabbed the 19th slot last week.

After a 5-3 win in Chestnut Hill, the Maroon and White climbed to No. 17, two behind the Eagles, who fell to No. 15.

UMass first broke into the rankings on Nov. 13, after beating Northeastern 2-1, and improving its record to 5-1-1 to start the season. The Minutemen made it all the way to the 14th spot a week later after beating up on Connecticut, 8-1, but then began to fall back and eventually out of the Top 20 before their resurgence this month.

The highest raking UMass has ever received was No. 7, during the 2003-04 season, in which the Minutemen reach the Hockey East finals.

Bad timing on bad ice

Saturday night's loss to UMass Lowell could be blamed on a lot of things – a let down after a big win over BC, underestimating a struggling opponent, even a shaky ice surface after UMass basketball hosted Richmond the same afternoon, forcing the Mullins Center staff to work on overdrive.

But Cahoon had a different beef with conditions after losing to the River Hawks – the game clock.

Cahoon certainly didn't blame the loss on the fact that the game clock malfunctioned three different times during the course of the game, interrupting play and the flow of both offenses, but it definitely influenced the game and the coach was not happy.

Asked about the ice surface after the game, Cahoon said he was more concerned with the fact that a momentum-swinging power play was halted before it began by the buzzer sounding.

"[Mullins Center operations] do the best job they can, I'll say that," Cahoon said. "The clock is more of an issue for me. I've got a real issue with that clock."

The River Hawks' Jason Bergeron was called for roughing at 13:03 in the second when he threw forward Kevin Jarman down to the ice in front of UML's net after the whistle had sounded.

Just as the two squads lined up for a faceoff to the left of UMass Lowell netminder Nevin Hamilton, the buzzer went off, and confusion set in as the clock read 20:00 in the first period. It was the second time in the game the clock malfunctioned, and it occurred a third time before the game was over.

Senior captain Matt Anderson scored the opening goal Friday against BC. He also assisted on Justin Braun's second goal of the season.

"This is a few games in a row now that we've had issues with that clock, and that needs to be addressed," Cahoon added. "It's a sad scenario that they can't get that taken care of."

Davis out of action

One of the Minutemen's top scorers, Chris Davis, has been missing in action since suffering an undisclosed injury late against BU on Jan. 27. He missed both games this past weekend and it is unclear whether he will play Friday night when the Terriers return to Amherst.

"[Davis] is just dinged up and he'll be out for a while, day-to-day," Cahoon said. "I couldn't tell you whether he's going to play next week or not right now. It's too early to tell."

His line-mates Chris Capraro and Cory Quirk, have not been the same without him, as they combined for just two points — Capraro's goal against UML, which Quirk assisted on — Struggling team captain Matt Anderson turned in an inspired performance Friday against BC. He scored a goal and an assist in the first period as the Minutemen jumped out to a 3-0 lead. Anderson was in the face of Eagles players until the final buzzer sounded, protecting his goalie and leading the team with his intensity on the ice.

Jeremy Rice can be reached at jeremyr@student.umass.edu

A-10 not what it once was

VIEW from page 10

But now, the Minutemen can't pack the arena like they used to and all that's left is a hockey arena that hosts a Division I basketball team.

Chris Lowe scored a season-high 19 points in the win over Richmond, moving UMass to second in the Atlantic 10 behind Rhode Island. Forbes notched the second double-double of his career with the 16 points and 16 boards, and looked like the man that Ford thought he was getting when Forbes signed on last year.

The athletic department handed out UMass towels around the arena before the game in an effort to garner fan support. They're hoping for a good turnout on Thursday night for a rematch with URI. They're calling it "Blackout Night." You know that the basketball program is in trouble when it's playing off the hockey team's promotional ideas.

When I was sitting up in the nosebleed section, I noticed that the banner from the 1995 Final Four appearance hasn't been taken down yet, even though the season was officially removed from the record books after the Marcus Camby scandal. Don't you think it's time to take that down? If they really want to move on and start something new, then honoring that team isn't exactly the right path to take. Outside Ford's office in the Mullins Center, there's a giant picture of Camby that's painted into the wall. Yikes.

By the way, the Atlantic 10 conference isn't what it used to be for basketball. All of the teams are beating up on each other right now, with no team emerging from the pack as the obvious No. 1 contender. There will be only one team selected for the NCAA Tournament, and that will be the winner of the conference tournament. Rhode Island, Xavier, Temple, Saint Joseph's, Charlotte and UMass all used to receive automatic bids about six or seven years ago. Charlotte was in Conference USA at that time, but it was still an annual NCAA Tournament team.

Now, it's a little different. Xavier is the only team in the conference that has come close to returning to its prior excellence, and the rest have fallen miserably downward in the last five years. UMass hasn't been to the NCAA Tournament since 1998. Xavier used to flirt with the Top 5 once in a while when David West and James Posey donned the uniform, and Rhode Island teased the Top 25 annually before it plummeted into mediocrity. The same goes for Dayton. And remember when St. Joe's had Jameer Nelson and Delonte West? Seems like a long time ago.

All of that went through my head as I saw the banners in the rafters. And I'm thinking, 'UMass and Xavier should run away with this conference if they were any good.' I don't know what it is about the Atlantic 10 though. The road games always seem to be tough for the better teams. Xavier has three losses in conference this year, and there's no way that the Musketeers should lose more than a couple in this watered down league.

Anyway, that was my game from up in the stands with the common folk. Maybe I'll see you up there sometime. The Mullins Center is that big building with the green roof down by the athletic fields. I know it's been a while since you've been there.

Rob Greenfield can be reached at rgreenfi@student.umass.edu

Junior transfer Gary Forbes scored 16 points and grabbed 16 rebounds in Saturday's 72-56 defeat of Richmond. The win marked Forbes' first double-double since joining the Minutemen at the start of this season.

Senior captain Rashaun Freeman leads all Minutemen with 17 points per contest. The center/forward is shooting a team-best 53.2 percent in field goals this season, and averages almost nine rebounds a game.

PREMIER MASSACHUSETTS NIGHT CLUB
Are you interested in dancing?
Earn $$$$ for school or fun
Wanted:
Bartenders
Shotgirls
Entertainers
Earn average $400 a night!
No Experience Necessary
Flexible hours
Big $$$ Potential
Positions open immediately...
Call for more details!
Anthony's Strip Club
(413)246-0299

Seven O's
♦KARAOKE♦
EVERY WEDNESDAY
♦OPEN MIC♦
EVERY THURSDAY
PLEASE JOIN US ON THURSDAY'S ROCK, PAPER & SCISSORS TOURNAMENT
FEBRUARY 8, 2007
WIN THE BIG PRIZE
"TO LAS VEGAS"
♦STUDENT BAND WANTED♦
ROUTE 116, 330 AMHERST RD SUNDERLAND, MA 01375 (413) 665-8788
3 PM TO 1 AM M-F
1 PM TO 1 AM SAT&SUN
NEXT TO CLIFFSIDE APTS.

Free Delivery to UMass
Menu Online @ andiamo.cc

8		3	7		5
								6
						8	1	7
		2	9	1		6
		8	2		3	9
		1		4	8	2
7	3	9
1
			4		1	3		5

Find all of today's puzzle solutions online!
WWW.DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

ACROSS
1 David's poetry
7 Porker's pad
10 Padlock holder
14 Luanda's land
15 Color gradation
16 Large intl. show
17 Disappear
18 West Indies islands
20 ___ out (barely manages)
21 Acquisition
23 Do needlework
24 Spoiled kids
25 Examines
26 Raucous noise
27 NY opera house
28 Jeweled headband
31 Heaver's vocalization
33 Not turned on 36 As a group
38 Remains
40 At least one
41 One-tenth donation
43 Dancing Castle
44 Specs
45 Pointed arch
47 Babushka
50 Without help
51 "JAG" network
54 No longer being published
56 Old pronoun
57 Burr TV series
58 Slick fast
60 Checkout delay
61 Distress letters
62 Discontinued
63 Understands
64 Comic Carney
65 Ironic endings

DOWN
1 Lays asphalt
2 Slithering hisser
3 Resignee of '73
4 His mate
5 Sm. liquid measures
6 Most of Mali
7 Break into pieces
8 Albacore and bluefin
9 Abominable snowman
10 Biker's safety equipment
11 Bars between wheels
12 Exhausted
13 Emily and Wiley
19 Word with farming or care
22 Firing-range object
24 Rocket launches
26 Bikini part
27 Actress Irving
28 Afternoon affair
29 Traveler's rest
30 Actress Irving
32 Beaver State
33 Lyrical tribute
34 Playfulness
35 Payment for services
37 Pose for shots
39 Anger
42 Height of sanctity
44 Beaus of the queen bee
46 Whose
47 Makes dirty
48 Radioactivity unit
49 Make amends
50 Fervor
51 Fischer's game
52 French hall
53 Surpise buy
55 Leaning Tower city
56 Bangkok native
59 Morning condensation

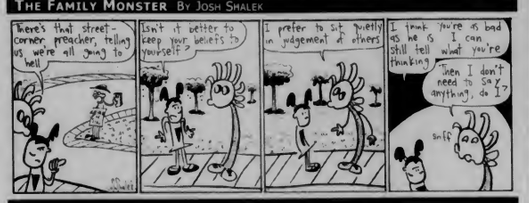
THE HARP
SPECIALS!
Honey Brown, Molson
$2.00 a pint / $6.50 a pitcher
WED • Open Mic
THURS • On the Rocks
SAT • Thumbhead
Pizza 'til midnight 7 days a week
Voted best Neighborhood bar East of the River 2005 & 2006 Valley Advocate Readers Poll
OCMPX All Credit Cards accepted
163 Sunderland Rd • N. Amherst
Just north of the apartments
413-548-6001 www.theharp.net

Quote of the Day

"I am the Fred Astaire of karate."

-Jean-Claude Van Damme

The Family Monster By Josh Shalek



There's that street-corner preacher, telling us we're all going to hell
Isn't it better to keep your beliefs to yourself?
I prefer to sit quietly in judgement of others
I think you're as bad as he is. I can still tell what you're thinking
Then I don't need to say anything, do I?
sniff

Wombat By Neil Bryer

SEE MY COMICS ARE LISTED IN ALPHABETICAL ORDER BY TITLE THEN NUMBER ORDER BY ISSUE THEN I CONSIDER THE CONDITION OF EACH BOOK AND REFER TO MY PRICE GUIDE TO LIST THEIR VALUES
WOW! NEIL, YOU REALLY DO HAVE A LOT OF FREE TIME ON YOUR HANDS, DON'T YOU?
THIS IS WHAT HAPPENS WHEN YOU DON'T HAVE A GIRLFRIEND

Two Dudes By Aaron Warner

AFTER DINNER, HOW WOULD YOU LIKE TO TRY SOMETHING NEW, DUDE?
INSTEAD OF YOU WASHING THE DISHES WHILE I WATCH T.V., HOW ABOUT I WATCH A DVD AND YOU WASH THE DISHES?
DO I LOOK THAT DUMB, DUDE? WE DON'T HAVE ANY DVDS.

Welcome To Falling Rock National Park By Josh Shalek

Horoscopes

aquarius Jan. 20-Feb. 18
Its ok to skip the gym today, as long as you don't eat anything.

pisces Feb. 19-Mar. 20
Once upon a time, people kept lobsters as pets. Now, we eat them.

aries Mar. 21-Apr. 19
Have a pillow fight tonight in high heels, a loincloth and a cowboy hat. Oh Joy.

taurus Apr. 20-May 20
Drop out of school and spend all your money on a blingin' monster truck.

gemini May 21-Jun. 21
If you go running tonight, wear an orange reflective vest. Mega style points.

cancer Jun. 22-Jul. 22
Tonight for dinner you should eat ten packages of gummy sharks. JAWSOME!

leo Jul. 23-Aug. 22
Why do you even bother to read this, your days are always stupendous.

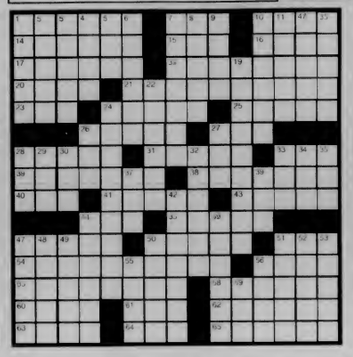
virgo Aug. 23-Sept. 22
Bea Arthur from the television classic Golden Girls. That's all I'm gonna say.

libra Sept. 23-Oct. 22
The movie "Click" is a terrible choice for today. It will only make you cry.

scorpio Oct. 23-Nov. 21
If you want to feel truly inspired, read Val Kilmer's biography.

sagittarius Nov. 22-Dec. 21
Looks like somebody needs a Q-tip. No, I do not mean the rapper.

capricorn Dec. 22-Jan. 19
Skip the backpack, roll with the classic neon fanny pack.



UMass YOGA
In Boyden 10
Mon/Wed
2:00-3:15 pm Power Yoga
3:30-4:45 pm Yoga Basics
Tues/Thurs
3:00-3:15 pm Yoga Basics
3:30-3:45 pm Intermediate
4:00-5:15 pm Yoga Basics
Spring 2007
Sign Up Now!
Semester Packages:
1 class per week $80
2 classes per week $150
Campus Recreation
Boyden 215 413-545-0022
umassyoga.com

Comics... come on?
COLLEGIANCOMICS@YAHOO.COM

Massachusetts Daily Collegian Marketplace

Activities

Global Express Tours Spring Break Montreal Party Weekends from $99 Complete bus, hotels, & clubs. Montrealexpress.net 781-979-9001

Leave Massachusetts, Stay in the Country! Still time to apply for a Domestic Exchange! Deadline for fall 2007 and spring 2008 is March 1, 2007 Information Sessions Tuesdays and Wednesdays @ 4:45 in Goodell 614 through February 21 or call 545-5351.

Apartment for Rent

Hobart Condos 3 bedroom, hardwood floors, study area in basement. Cable telephone Internet access) in all bedrooms and study. NOW SHOWING for JUNE and SEPTEMBER. NO FEES. www.amherstlincolnrealty.com 253-7879

Employment

Winter/ Spring positions available. Earn up to $150 per day Exp not required. Undercover shoppers needed To Judge Retail and Dining Establishments. Call 800-722-4791

Employment

Become a summer orientation counselor and make a difference in the lives of over 4000 new students. Additional information and applications can be found at www.umass.edu/newstudent/contact/student-jobs/counselor The application deadline is February 16, 2007

Moving: Local Moving company looking for self motivated individuals, part time positions available immediately. Weekday availability a plus. Raises commensurate with performance. Potential for tips. Good attitudes are a must. Call (413) 584-4746

Employment

Raft Guide Training Zoar Outdoor is seeking applicants for full and part-time summer jobs for raft guides, rock climbing instructors and kayak instructors. Raft Guide training runs weekends in March. Applicants should have customer service experience and a positive attitude toward learning new skills. Application deadline:Feb. 15th. For more information call Zoar Outdoor at 800-532-7483 or www.zoaroutdoor.com/jobs.htm EOE.

Cape Cod Summer Near Hyannis. $150/week. 508-428-3456 CapePhotoArt@aol.com

Employment

Rent us your ears! Listening Experiments $10/hr English must be your first language. Email: phonetics_lab@linguist.umass.edu voicemail: 545-6837

Bartending $300/day potential. No experience necs. Training provided. 1-800-965-6520 ext.162

Services

Pregnancy Testing, HIV Testing, Birth Control, and Emergency Contraception. STI Screening and Treatment. Affordable and confidential. Tapestry Health, 27 Pray Street, Amherst. 548-9992. www.tapestryhealth.com

Room for Rent

Room for rent in house minutes away from area colleges. $450 + Electric, Washer/Dryer. Call Ali 413-253-4929.

Travel

Global Express Tours Spring Break Montreal Party Weekends from $99 Complete bus, hotels, & clubs. Montrealexpress.net 781-979-9001

Submit your classified online at www.daily collegian.com

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

SPORTS TUESDAY

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 6, 2007 SPORTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

UM takes down Bonnies

Minutewomen solve road woes, end streak

BY J.M. FRIEDMAN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

While Peyton Manning left Dolphin Stadium with his first championship, and Adam Vinatieri his fourth, the Massachusetts women's basketball team just barely walked away from the Reilly Center in St. Bonaventure, N.Y. with a win, 53-49.

The Bonnies (13-10, 3-5 Atlantic 10) shot a dismal 29 percent from the floor on Super Sunday, including a 2-for-13 mark from behind the arc, but still managed to give the Minutewomen (13-11, 3-6 A-10) a late scare.

UMass	53
SBU	49

Heading into their game with SBU, the Minutewomen had been fighting losing battles away from Amherst.

Looking to avoid their sixth straight road loss, and fifth straight conference-road loss, the Bonnies presented a particularly high hurdle for the Minutewomen to leap. The last four trips to St. Bonaventure had all resulted in losses for the Maroon and White.

UMass coach Marnie Dacko was happy her team could break the streak.

"[St. Bonaventure] was a place that, at my tenure at UMass, there was a [negative] trickle-down effect for the kids that they never played well at St. Bonnies," said Dacko. "It was nice to get out of there with a win."

Mental lapses, and an inability to finish, almost made the Minutewomen's bus ride home a somber one.

"We were up by nine, and in a five-possession stretch we turned the ball over three times and missed two layups," Dacko said. "We've got to eliminate those stretches of mismanaging the ball."

See W. BASKETBALL on page 7

Senior Tamara Tatham scored 12 points in the 53-49 win over St. Bonaventure Sunday. She also chipped in with seven rebounds and one assist. Tatham is second on the team in scoring.

Maroon and White split with Fordham

BY JOE MELONI
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Massachusetts men's swimming and diving team continued its dominance this weekend, routing the Fordham Rams 192.5-104.5. The women's team, however, lost to the Rams 170-128 – this was only the second loss to Fordham in program history.

UMass got off to its characteristically hot start in the men's races. The Minutemen captured the first and second posts in the 200-yard medley relay – scoring 15 points. The team of freshman Trevor Ziegler, junior John Weaver, junior Zack Priest and freshman Chris Howard came into the race listed as the C-unit but defeated both UMass' A-team and Fordham's A-team who finished and second and third place, respectively.

The Minutemen are understandably tired at this juncture of the season, due to the relentless training schedule put together by coach Russ Yarworth in preparation for the looming Atlantic 10 Championships.

Freshmen typically suffer the most from the rigors of the team's practices. Freshman Justin Brooks has been one of the team's most successful distance-freestyle swimmers, but struggled against a talented Fordham duo.

Justin Coombs and Lucien Monson finished in first and second place for the Rams – adding 13 points to the team's score.

Ryan Coombs, brother of Justin, added nine points for the Rams – he won the 200-yard freestyle. He defeated UMass junior A.J. Vozella. Yarworth believed an illness put Vozella out of action for the remainder of the season, but he mended faster than originally thought and should be ready for the A-10 Championships.

One freshman that hasn't faltered from exhaustion is Trevor Ziegler. He won the 100-yard backstroke

See SWIMMING on page 7

Junior R.J. Rappe won both the one- and three-meter events this weekend against Fordham.

UMass shines at Mega Meet

Men's team finishes third, women second

BY KEVIN DOOLEY
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Massachusetts indoor track and field teams were in the Ocean State this past weekend, looking to build upon strong performances from individual athletes at the Reebok Boston Indoor Games.

The men's team competed in the URI Mega Meet Indoor Classic on Friday, finishing in third place out of nine teams, while the women's team participated in the Rhode Island Invitational the following day, finishing in second place out of nine teams. The second-place finish earned UMass its best overall finish of the season to this point. Both events were hosted by Rhode Island.

URI finished both events in first place overall. The Rhode Island men's team took first place in 10 of the 18 events held, while the Rhode Island women were just as dominant as the men, coming out on top in nine of the 17 events held Saturday.

Both the men's and women's teams from UMass

See TRACK AND FIELD on page 7

Senior Dawn Cheri Soares – pictured here competing in the long jump event – finished in sixth place in the 55-meter dash at this weekend's Rhode Island Invitational.

The view from the stands

Rob Greenfield

I watched the Massachusetts men's basketball game against Richmond from the stands on Saturday.

It's a different game from up there. You can't hear Travis Ford swearing at his players and you can't hear James Life complaining to the referees after playing his "Olé!" defense that everyone's so accustomed to seeing.

For a 12 p.m. Saturday game, 5,221 fans wasn't that bad. Especially with completely complacent UMass students who would rather watch the inside of their eyelids than a UMass basketball game.

The Minutemen went 33-for-43 from the free-throw line on Saturday, an unusually high number for a team that views the charity stripe as the please-don't-foul-me-because-I-can't-make-a-free-throw line.

When junior Gary Forbes (16 points, 16 rebounds) went to the line at the end of the first half with the Minutemen down a basket, one fan shouted, "Make a free throw, please!" The frustration is understandable. UMass is last in the Atlantic 10 in free-throw percentage, coming in just above a lowly 60 percent. (You know, Travis Ford is second all-time in free-throw percentage for Kentucky basketball. Just thought I'd throw that out there.)

I sat up top in Section K of the Mullins Center, and I've come to realize how poorly designed the place really is. It seats about 9,500 – not that much for A-10 arenas (the Dayton Flyers average over 12,500 fans per game) – and the atmosphere is really dreadful during the games. The place is empty for most of the Minutemen's home games, and the seating design doesn't help the home crowd get the noise level up.

In the better basketball arenas, the stands on the sides and behind the hoops branch up at a steep angle so the fans have a better view and are closer to the court. The Boston Garden was famous for its bleacher seats that hovered over the court. It was, of course, the hardest road game in the NBA for Celtic opponents.

The Mullins Center is more suited for hockey because the ice extends further around the arena. And it's funny that it ended up that way, because the Mullins Center opened in 1994 in anticipation of the men's basketball team's success on the national stage.

See VIEW on page 8

Senior James Life, the Minutemen's third-leading scorer, is shooting 45 percent on field goals this season, also good for third best on the team.

Sophomore Jon Quick gave up five goals last weekend in defeating BC and falling to UMass Lowell. He has a record of 12-8-4 on the the season with a 2.24 goals-against average and a .927 save percentage.

Mass Attack has upper hand

Minutemen grab first season series from Boston College

BY JEREMY RICE
COLLEGIAN STAFF

It's been a very different year for the Massachusetts hockey team so far this season. The Minutemen have struggled with lesser foes, while making a habit of upsetting perennial powerhouses.

However, when all the chips have fallen, UMass has put together an impressive resume over the regular season. Two wins over first-place New Hampshire, a pair of ties over Boston University, and now, the Mass Attack has taken two against another conference rival, Boston College.

The first-ever season-series victory over the Eagles has placed the No. 17 Minutemen just one conference point out of having home-ice advantage in the first round of the playoffs.

Historically, UMass has been relegated to the role of whipping boy for its cross-state rival, with only six wins all-time over the Eagles, and a 1-10-1 record over the last 12 meetings entering this season.

UMass coach Don Cahoon, believes his squad has developed this

See HOCKEY on page 8

SECOND-HALF PACE BOOSTS UM | PAGE 12

PINK FLOYD EXPERIENCE COMING TO NOHO | PAGE 6

THE MASSACHUSETTS
DAILY COLLEGIAN

NEW ENGLAND'S LARGEST COLLEGE DAILY EST 1890

CLOUDY : HI: 24 LO: 9 WWW.DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 7, 2007

Student files lawsuit against UMass

UMass student Brian C. Marquis has filed a lawsuit against the university after receiving a grade he deemed "unfair."

Student claims he received unjust grade

BY ERIC ATHAS
COLLEGIAN STAFF

University of Massachusetts student Brian C. Marquis felt a grade he received last semester was unfair.

In early January, he expressed this concern to university officials, but his grade remained unchanged.

Now Marquis is taking his complaint to a new level. He's suing UMass.

In an attempt to raise questions about the school's grading policies, Marquis filed a lawsuit against the university and its respective staff members last month, which lists 15 counts, including violation of the first amendment and breach of contract.

"It's a tragic incident," said Marquis, a 50-year-old legal studies and sociology double-major who is a registered paralegal and had a firm before enrolling at UMass. "Perhaps this is one of the ways that they'll listen to me, they'll take my claim seriously."

Marquis will represent himself in the case. After he serves the university with the complaint, a conference hearing will take place.

The dispute is over the final grade Marquis received in Philosophy 161: Problems in Social Thought, a course he took during the Fall 2006 semester. Marquis' final numerical grade for the class was an 84, which translated into a C for the semester.

Marquis alleges his exams, papers and participation grades for the semester equal 92.1, not 84. He said he deserves an A- in the course. Before filing a complaint with the district attorney's office on Jan. 31, Marquis exchanged e-mails with Jeremy Cushing, the TA who taught the course and gave Marquis the f

"To make the grades more representative of student performance, I set a curve (or, more accurately, I drew up a new grade scale)," reads an e-mail from Cushing to Marquis dated Jan. 10, 2007. At the end of the e-mail, Cushing stated, "I thought your grade was a good reflection of your work."

Phillip Bricker, Philosophy Department Chair, and Cushing would not comment on this case because of the university's confidentiality rules regarding students.

"I'm afraid all I can really say is that I did everything in my power to see that Brian was treated fairly during the class and during every step of his appeal process," wrote Cushing in an e-mail to The Daily Collegian yesterday.

Last month, Marquis also received an e-mail from Catharine Porter, the UMass Ombudsperson. Porter's Jan. 12, 2007 e-mail states she met with Cushing and discussed the final grade scale that resulted in a C.

According to her e-mail, professors at UMass can develop their own grading scale. "For example, 84 points could range anywhere from a 'C' to possibly

See GRADE on page 3

29 arrested during semester's first weekend

Police arrest UMass football wide receiver

BY ERIC ATHAS
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The first weekend of the semester resulted in the arrest of 29 people on the University of Massachusetts campus, including a wide receiver on the football team, according to police.

Six people were arrested on Friday, 16 on Saturday and seven on Sunday, according to the UMass Police Department. The first weekend of the semester is usually a busy one for police, said Deputy Chief Patrick Archbald.

"It's typically a weekend where we keep our staffing levels elevated, with the expectation that a lot of students will stay this weekend and reconnect with their friends, and that may involve alcohol," said Archbald.

The UMPD had additional patrols for underage possession of alcohol this weekend. Archbald said some of the police officers patrolling were in uniform and some were wearing plain clothes.

Of the 29 arrests between Friday and Sunday night, 21 were alcohol-related. On Saturday at around 4:12 p.m., 20-year-old Michael A. Omar, of 5029 Crest Park Circle in Antioch, Calif. was arrested for underage possession of liquor. Omar is a junior at UMass and a wide receiver on the football team.

"The Athletic Department is aware of the situation and we have no comment at this time," said UMass spokesman Jason Yellin.

UMass football wide receiver, Mike Omar.

Omar played sparingly during UMass' NCAA Division I Championship run last season, which ended in a loss to Appalachian State in Chattanooga, Tenn. on Dec. 15, 2006. He played in 10 games, recording seven catches for 140 yards and scoring one touchdown.

While the UMPD increased its staff on Sunday in preparation for Super Bowl celebrations, Archbald said the campus was quiet during and after the game.

"It was very quiet," he said. "It was pretty clear to us early-on in the game that Southwest was quiet and quite a few people had left campus to enjoy the game elsewhere. We didn't think we'd have issues and it was very quiet after the game."

Collegian editor Rob Greenfield contributed to this report

Graduate Lounge BeerFest

Mike DiMarzio and Will Morgan, two UMass graduates, celebrate the Graduate Lounge Spring semester opening Monday night. DiMarzio and Morgan were the lounge's first customers of the semester.

Students turning to YouTube for news

Chad Hurley is one of the co-founders of the popular video sharing Web site YouTube.

BY WILL MCGUINNESS
COLLEGIAN STAFF

A picture may be worth a thousand words, but news organizations are learning that free, online streaming video has a much larger vocabulary.

Nearly 100 million videos are viewed on the popular video sharing Web site YouTube.com, by individuals between the ages of 18 and 49 worldwide every day.

Viewers are given the opportunity to choose from 70 million different videos in categories such as sports, music and pets and animals.

However, college students are also frequenting the site's "news" category to receive information from independent news sources not connected to the major networks, editorial boards or worldwide scrutiny.

Many students agree that they feel distrust towards the established media. They feel uneasy that news personalities like Bill O'Reilly and Larry King may hold too much power in deciding what's newsworthy and what is not.

"I think all news is going to be biased in some way or another, but the material we are given is really our only link to what's going on in the rest of the world," said University of Massachusetts student Jaturai Rugel. "So, I think you have to take everything with a grain of salt and

See YOUTUBE on page 3

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN
CXVII
ISSUE 78

113 Campus Center University of Massachusetts Amherst, MA 01003
• 413-545-3500 •
• Fax 413-545-3699 •
www.dailycollegian.com

EDITOR IN CHIEF Eric Athas
MANAGING EDITOR Rob Greenfield
BUSINESS MANAGER Dan Conti
PRODUCTION MANAGER Amanda Allen
NIGHT SUPERVISOR Sherel Wolnik
ADVERTISING MANAGER Jaimeson Porter
ADVERTISING PRODUCTION Molly Eggleston
ARTS & LIVING EDITOR Morgan Rousseau
COPIES EDITOR Adam Staggen
EDITORIAL EDITOR Tucker Merrick
NEWS EDITOR Matt Belliveau
SPORTS EDITOR Danny Picard
SPORTS EDITOR Jon Pelland
CIRCULATION MANAGER Jeff Pentz
ASST. BUSINESS David Valade
ASSISTANT OPERATIONS Linda Wallack
ASSISTANT ADVERTISING Nicole Paddester
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Tim McCall
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Sydney Towne
ASSISTANT NEWS Anna Dolianitis
ASSISTANT NEWS Nicole Boonjakuakul
ASSISTANT EDITORIAL Brendan Hall
WEB EDITOR James Hale
PHOTO EDITOR Toan Trinh

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN IS PUBLISHED MONDAY THROUGH FRIDAY DURING THE UNIVERSITY OF MASSACHUSETTS CALENDAR SEMESTER. THE COLLEGIAN IS INDEPENDENTLY FUNDED, OPERATING ON ADVERTISING REVENUE. FOUNDED IN 1890, THE PAPER BEGAN AS AGGIE LIFE, BECAME THE COLLEGE SCENE IN 1901, THE WEEKLY COLLEGIAN IN 1914 AND THE TRI-WEEKLY COLLEGIAN IN 1956. PUBLISHED DAILY SINCE 1967, THE COLLEGIAN HAS BEEN BROADSHEET SINCE JANUARY 1994. FOR ADVERTISING RATES AND INFORMATION, CALL WEEKDAYS BETWEEN 8:30 A.M. AND 3:30 P.M.

PRODUCTION CREW
On staff today

NIGHT EDITOR
Eric Athas

COPY EDITOR
Callie Williams

PRODUCTION SUPERVISOR
Amanda Allen

Astronaut charged with attempted kidnap, murder

By Barbara Liston
Associated Press

NASA Astronaut Lisa Nowak was accused of trying to kidnap and kill a rival for the affections of a fellow astronaut yesterday.

ORLANDO—A married U.S. astronaut was accused on Tuesday of trying to kidnap and kill a rival for the affections of a male astronaut after she drove 950 miles wearing adult diapers to confront the woman.

U.S. Navy Capt. Lisa Nowak, who has three children, was released from jail in Florida after posting bail.

Nowak was initially arrested on attempted kidnapping charges on Monday in Orlando after assaulting Colleen Shipman, a U.S. Air Force captain, police said.

She was granted freedom on $15,500 bail on Tuesday morning on the kidnapping charge but her release was delayed when police filed a new charge of attempted first-degree murder — rocking the elite world of NASA astronauts.

The murder charge could mean a life sentence in prison if she were convicted.

Police said Nowak, 43, a flight engineer who made her first trip into space in July to the International Space Station aboard shuttle Discovery, sped from Houston to Orlando wearing diapers so she would not have to stop at a bathroom.

Astronauts wear diapers during launches and landings.

Nowak, disguised herself in a dark wig, glasses and trench coat to confront Shipman at Orlando International Airport but told police she "only wanted to scare" the woman into talking to her.

In two separate appearances in court, wearing a jail uniform, shackled at the waist and with her head bowed, Nowak said nothing about the charges of attempted murder and kidnapping, attempted burglary of a vehicle and battery.

"I would submit the police department is seeking a second bite of the same apple today," said Nowak's attorney, Donald Lykkebak, complaining to Orange County Circuit Judge Mike Murphy about the new charge.

After Nowak's second appearance in court, Murphy granted her release on bail totaling $25,500.

NASA's astronaut corps, featured in Tom Wolfe's 1979 book "The Right Stuff," is considered the elite of aerospace and science, populated by top pilots and space researchers from the United States and other nations.

Lykkebak said his client's commitment to her career and her service to the United States should be taken into account in determining bail.

Hackers attack key Net traffic

By Ted Bridis
Associated Press

Hackers briefly overwhelmed at least three of the 13 computers that help manage global computer traffic Tuesday in one of the most significant attacks against the Internet since 2002.

Experts said the unusually powerful attacks lasted as long as 12 hours but passed largely unnoticed by most computer users, a testament to the resiliency of the Internet. Behind the scenes, computer scientists worldwide raced to cope with enormous volumes of data that threatened to saturate some of the Internet's most vital pipelines.

The Homeland Security Department confirmed it was monitoring what it called "anomalous" Internet traffic.

"There is no credible intelligence to suggest an imminent threat to the homeland or our computing systems at this time," the department said in a statement.

The motive for the attacks was unclear, said Duane Wessels, a researcher at the Cooperative Association for Internet Data Analysis at the San Diego Supercomputing Center. "Maybe to show off or just be disruptive; it doesn't seem to be extortion or anything like that," Wessels said.

Other experts said the hackers appeared to disguise their origin, but vast amounts of rogue data in the attacks were traced to South Korea.

The attacks appeared to target UltraDNS, the company that operates servers managing traffic for Web sites ending in ".org" and some other suffixes, experts said. Officials with NeuStar Inc., which owns UltraDNS, confirmed only that it had observed an unusual increase in traffic.

Among the targeted "root" servers that manage global Internet traffic were ones operated by the Defense Department and the Internet's primary oversight body.

"There was what appears to be some form of attack during the night hours here in California and into the morning," said John Crain, chief technical officer for the Internet Corporation for Assigned Names and Numbers. He said the attack was continuing and so was the hunt for its origin.

"I don't think anybody has the full picture," Crain said. "We're looking at the data."

Eternal embrace? Couple still hugging 5,000 years after death

ROME (AP)—Call it the eternal embrace.

Archaeologists in Italy have discovered a couple buried 5,000 to 6,000 years ago, hugging each other.

"It's an extraordinary case," said Elena Menotti, who led the team on their dig near the northern city of Mantova.

"There has not been a double burial found in the Neolithic period, much less two people hugging -- and they really are hugging."

Menotti said she believed the two, almost certainly a man and a woman although that needs to be confirmed, died young because their teeth were mostly intact and not worn down.

"I must say that when we discovered it, we all became very excited. I've been doing this job for 25 years. I've done digs at Pompeii, all the famous sites," she told Reuters.

"But I've never been so moved because this is the discovery of something special."

A laboratory will now try to determine the couple's age at the time of death and how long they had been buried.

A pair of human skeletons lie in an eternal embrace at a Neolithic archaeological dig site near Mantova, Italy, in this photo released yesterday.

Love is in the jeans

NEW YORK—For most women, the choice between sex and a new wardrobe is simple—they go for the clothes.

Women on average say they would be willing to give up sex for 15 months for a closet full of new apparel, with 2 percent ready to abstain from sex for three years in exchange for new duds, according to a new survey of about 1,000 women in 10 U.S. cities.

Sixty-one percent of women polled said it would be worse to lose their favorite article of clothing than give up sex for a month.

"Some people say clothes make the man, but the right clothes can even replace him," fashion designer, stylist and TV personality Carson Kressley from the reality TV show "Queer Eye for the Straight Guy" said in a statement accompanying the poll.

The study also suggested that clothes often wear better than relationships.

The average woman between 18 and 54 years of age has hung on to her favorite article of clothing for 12 and a half years, a year longer than she's held on to her longest relationship.

Almost three-quarters of respondents, or 70 percent, also said they believed in love at first sight when it came to finding the perfect article of clothing, while only 54 percent of women were as confident in spotting the right man.

Students turning to YouTube for news

YOUTUBE from page 1

hope that they are reporting as much of the truth as possible. I don't tend to trust YouTube only because anyone can post something on it. I would rather watch regular news because I feel that it is more trustworthy."

The YouTube.com videos are rated by a star system, and many viewers take this into consideration when deciding on what to watch. Often, the funnier clips are rated higher, adding to their online following. The most popular of these come from satirical independent video bloggers and broadcasters, many of the most popular clips are from shows like "The Daily Show," and "The Colbert Report."

UMass Journalism Professor David Perkins warns against entertainment's attack on truth.

"We may get fresh perspective on the news from Jon Stewart, but where does he get his 'facts' from?" said Perkins. "And how can we tell, not that he isn't spinning us, because of course he is, but how he's spinning us?"

Some agree that while news segments featuring humorous editorials from amateur broadcasters on YouTube.com are entertaining, it's not usually the full story.

"YouTube is a great supplement to the day's news as it is presented on the Web sites of major papers, but it's not adequate to the task of informing its viewers on what's happening in their world on any given day," said UMass Journalism program director Karen List. "Main-stream media reporters generally have some sense of how to report fairly and accurately, ethically and on the right side of the law. I've talked to many bloggers and YouTubers who don't have a clue about any of that."

UMass freshman Roxy Archibald disclosed a certain distrust towards mainstream media's idea that each program needs to make a profit to be successful.

Archibald says she understands people's need for an unbiased media, "because it bypasses editorial boards and is less affected by outside pressure."

"Why should my primary source of news be the same Web site where people watch girl fights and skateboard wipe outs?" said Archibald.

The videos may be entertaining, but Perkins asked if the videos on YouTube.com report on the hard-hitting stories in depth.

"Does any of this really address social issues that need exploring [or] investigating in depth?" asked Perkins. "Is there a YouTube video that exposes the shortcoming of our juvenile justice system? Or prison conditions? How many hits would that get if one were to appear? Video and photo images get an instant emotional reaction, so that's what they're best for. They're good at 'gotcha,' but what about a complex story?"

Will McGuinness can be reached at wmcguinn@student.umass.edu.

UM student files lawsuit against university an 'A-' at the extreme end," wrote Porter.

GRADE from page 1

Porter concluded the e-mail by urging Marquis "to accept this grade and continue on with your course work as there were no grounds for an academic grievance." Marquis described this statement as "highly dangerous."

"I didn't earn a C. I earned an A- and I should be entitled to what I earned," said Marquis. "All I want is what I earned. I earned it and I don't want to lose it."

Marquis is charging the university with 15 counts, including Violation of First Amendment, Breach of Contract and Intentional Infliction of Emotional Distress. According to the complaint's "Entitlement To Relief," Marquis is seeking monetary, retroactive, and prospective relief. He is also trying to get his grade changed to an A-, along with seven other objectives.

He is also hoping this case will raise awareness about the university's grading policy. He said there needs to be rules in place when professors and teaching assistants change a grading scale.

"My complaint is not an indictment on the highly educated and highly motivated and student oriented faculty," said Marquis. "I'm doing this to set up a structure. This type of action can never happen again. It can't happen and it shouldn't happen to anyone."

Marquis said he would rather not have filed a lawsuit, but feels this is one of the ways his concerns will be taken seriously. A commuter student, Marquis travels about an hour to and from Lanesborough, Mass. everyday. He said he has aspirations to go to law school after he graduates, and a C on his transcript could hinder that goal.

According to the complaint, two other students in the class earned grades of 83.5 and 84.5 and also received a mark of C. Because of this, Marquis requested class action certification on his complaint, in case the other two students come forward.

"The other two students also motivated me," said Marquis. "I don't know who they are, I don't know what their future plans are, but they deserve what they earned. They earned Bs, and they should have Bs."

Eric Athas can be reached at editor@dailycollegian.com

COUNT IT

Below are the 15 counts that Marquis is charging against the University of Massachusetts.

I. Violation of First Amendment.
II. Violation of Fifth Amendment.
III. Violation of Fourteenth Amendment.
IV. Violation of 42 U.S.C. 1981. Equal Rights Under the Law.
V. Violation of 42 U.S.C. 1982. Property Rights of Citizens.
VI. Violation of 42 U.S.C. 1983. Civil Action for Deprivation of Rights.
VII. Violation of 42 U.S.C. 1985. Conspiracy to Interfere with Civil Rights.
VIII. Violation of 42 U.S.C. 1986. Action for Neglect to prevent.
IX. Violation of Massachusetts General Law, chapter 93A.
X. Violation of 18 U.S.C. 241. Conspiracy Against Rights.
XI. Promissory Estoppel.
XII. Breach of Special Relationship.
XIII. Breach of Contract.
XIV. Intentional Infliction of Emotional Distress.
XV. Tortious Interference with Economic Advantage.

Snickers ad pulled

HACKETTSTOWN, N.J.—A commercial for Snickers candy bars launched in the Super Bowl broadcast was benched after its maker got complaints that it was homophobic.

The ad showed two auto mechanics accidentally kissing while eating the same candy bar and then ripping out some chest hair to do something "manly." One of the alternate endings on the Snickers Web site showed the men attacking each other.

The Human Rights Campaign and the Gay and Lesbian Alliance Against Defamation complained to the maker of Snickers, Hackettstown-based Masterfoods USA, a division of Mars Inc., which also makes M&M's and other candies.

The Web site also featured video of players from the Super Bowl teams reacting to the kiss.

"This type of jeering from professional sports figures at the sight of two men kissing fuels the kind of antigay bullying that haunts countless gay and lesbian school children on playgrounds all across the country," Human Rights Campaign president Joe Solmonese said in a statement.

GLAAD spokesman Marc McCarthy said Tuesday the group believed "this kind of prejudice was inexcusable."

Masterfoods spokeswoman Alice Nathanson issued a statement in which she said the company would stop running the ad on television and the Web site.

"As with all of our Snickers advertising, our goal was to capture the attention of our core Snickers consumer," Nathanson wrote.

Associated Press

N.D. issues nation's first hemp permits

By Blake Nicholson
Associated Press

North Dakota issued the nation's first licenses to grow industrial hemp Tuesday to two farmers who still must meet federal requirements before they can plant the crop.

The farmers must get approval from the Drug Enforcement Administration, which treats hemp much the way it does marijuana and has not allowed commercial hemp production but has said it would consider applications to grow it.

Hemp is a cousin of marijuana that contains trace amounts of the chemical that causes a marijuana high, though hemp does not produce the same effects. The sturdy, fibrous plant is used to make an assortment of products including paper, rope, clothing and cosmetics.

Industrial hemp cultivation is legal in Canada and other countries but is banned in the United States. Law enforcement officials worry that industrial hemp can shield the growing of marijuana, although hemp supporters say that fear is unfounded.

The North Dakota Agriculture Department approved rules late last year for hemp production with the DEA's concerns in mind, State Agriculture Commissioner Roger Johnson has said.

The state issued permits Tuesday to Wayne Hauge and Dave Monson, who is also a legislator. The state Agriculture Department is processing 16 other hemp applications, Johnson said.

"It's taken us a lot longer than (expected) to get here, and I'm thinking we still have a ways to go," said Monson, the House assistant Republican majority leader.

Joseph Rannazzisi, an administrator with the DEA, said federal law does not allow the agency to delegate its ability to regulate hemp to state officials. Although the DEA may waive registration requirements, it has done so only for law enforcement officers and other officials, he said.

Johnson asked the DEA in December to waive its $2,293 registration fee, but federal officials rejected that request. Johnson said he will hand-deliver Hauge's and Monson's applications when he meets with DEA officials in Washington early next week to try again to persuade them to relax the annual fee requirement.

North Dakota is one of seven states that have authorized industrial hemp farming. The others are Hawaii, Kentucky, Maine, Maryland, Montana and West Virginia, according to Vote Hemp, an industrial hemp advocacy organization based in Bedford, Mass.

HOFSTRA UNIVERSITY
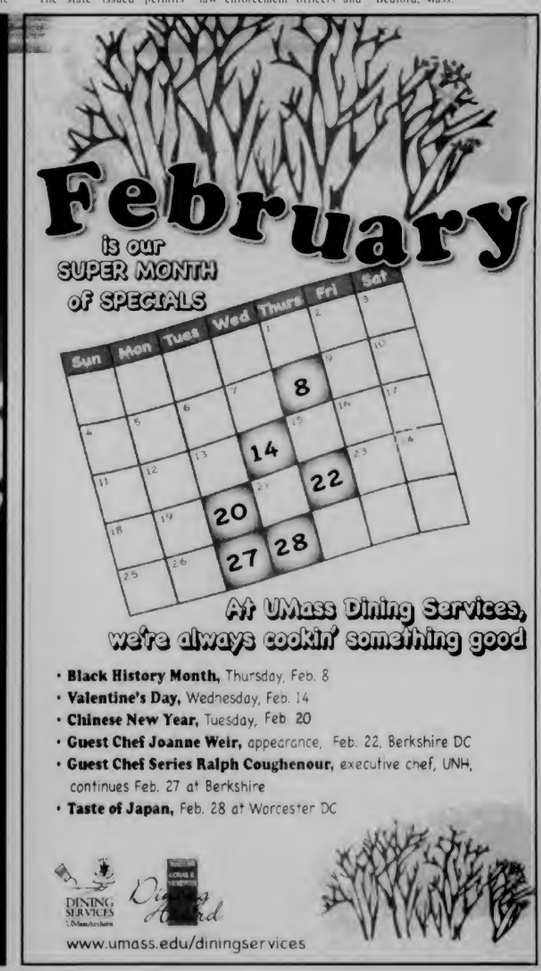
get a graduate degree that earns you more
More respect. Status. Salary. Opportunity. Whatever your goals, Hofstra University can help you reach them with more than 150 graduate degrees. Outstanding faculty. Dynamic environment, just outside Manhattan. Everything you need to advance your career. And find your edge.
Find Out More
1-800-HOFSTRA, ext. 5518
hofstra.edu

Is your room more unique than this?
Do you have the BEST room?
Here's your chance to strut your stuff in the "Collegian Cribs" Contest for a chance to win a grand prize!
Submit up to three pictures online at
TheCollegian@gmail.com
Deadline Feb.14 Voting begining Feb.15



February
is our SUPER MONTH of SPECIALS
Sun Mon Tues Wed Thurs Fri Sat
At UMass Dining Services, we're always cookin' something good
• Black History Month, Thursday, Feb. 8
• Valentine's Day, Wednesday, Feb. 14
• Chinese New Year, Tuesday, Feb. 20
• Guest Chef Joanne Weir, appearance, Feb. 22, Berkshire DC
• Guest Chef Series Ralph Coughenour, executive chef, UNH, continues Feb. 27 at Berkshire
• Taste of Japan, Feb. 28 at Worcester DC
DINING SERVICES
www.umass.edu/diningservices

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

EDITORIAL OPINION

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 7, 2007

"I may not agree with what you say but I will defend to the death your right to say it." Voltaire

EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

The demise of open debate

Ben Duffy

Much like you, I used to believe that nothing could be more boring than The Weather Channel (TWC). In light of a recent controversy that has arisen over at TWC, I must admit that I was wrong.

Dr. Heidi Cullen, climate expert and host of TWC's "The Climate Code" recently advocated that meteorologists who have their doubts about global warming (man-made or otherwise) should be stripped of their American Meteorological Society (AMS) certification.

Cullen was responding to the comments of meteorologist Brian van de Graaff who made the following heretical statement: "I try to read up on [global warming] to have a better understanding, but it is complex. Often, it is so politicized and those on both sides don't always appear to have their facts straight. History has taught us that weather patterns are cyclical and although we have noticed a warming pattern in recent time, I don't know what generalizations can be made from this with the lack of long-term scientific data."

Cullen points out that this statement is at odds with official statements of the American Meteorological Society (AMS). She concludes that because van de Graaff is AMS-certified, the next logical step is to strip van de Graaff and similar-minded meteorologists of their certifications.

According to Cullen, "If a meteorologist has an AMS seal of approval, which is used to confer legitimacy to TV meteorologists, then meteorologists have a responsibility to truly educate themselves on the science of global warming... Meteorologists are among the few people trained in the sciences who are permitted regular access to our living rooms. And in that sense, they owe it to their audience to distinguish between solid peer-reviewed science and junk political controversy. If a meteorologist can't speak to the fundamental science of climate change, then maybe the AMS shouldn't give them a Seal of Approval."

In one paragraph, Dr. Cullen demonstrated exactly what is wrong with many scientists today; namely, that they've become distinctly unscientific. Dissenting voices and pleas for further study are so dangerous that they need to be shut out and systematically decertified.

It's circular logic. How do we know that climate change is real? – Because there is a consensus of scientists on the subject. But, what about the scientists who aren't convinced? Well, they aren't real scientists, because they don't subscribe to the consensus. If you accept the theory of man-made global warming, then you get your certification. If you dissent, then you are advocating "junk science".

If you look outside of our little New England world, you will see that freakish weather of another variety has been striking much of the country.

Such an approach to pertinent questions is not scientific. It's dogmatic.

I know that this winter has been the warmest any of us can remember. Our campus pond still has geese on it, a quizzical occurrence without a doubt. But if you look outside of our little New England world, you will see that freakish weather of another variety has been striking much of the country. Multiple blizzards smashed Denver. Ice storms killed 55 people in nine states including Oklahoma and Texas, freezing rain made roads slick as far south as San Antonio, and President Bush declared Oklahoma and parts of Missouri national disaster areas. Southern California was hit with a cold snap so severe that it froze crops of citrus fruits, avocadoes and berries, causing their prices to triple. Snow was even reported around tropical Malibu.

So it's a big world out there, and the question of global warming is debatable. Or is it? For some "experts" like Cullen, you can only join her exclusive club of experts if you agree with her. Ergo, no debate, just blind submission. Not exactly the scientific method.

At least Cullen isn't as harsh as David Roberts of Grist magazine, a self-styled "eco-journal". Roberts actually advocated putting global warming "deniers" on trial for their beliefs. "When we've gotten serious about global warming... we should have war crimes trials for these bastards [the skeptics]; some sort of climate Nuremberg," said Roberts.

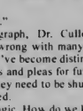
Having dissenting opinions on global warming puts you in the same boat as Nazi war criminals. Well, that sounds like open debate. Sure, once all the skeptics are standing trial in Nuremberg, there will truly be consensus in the scientific community. No one will dare contradict prevailing wisdom.

The pattern repeats itself again and again. The theory is simply postulated with a degree of certainty with which all "reasonable" people agree. Those who express doubts become unreasonable by definition. People scramble to be on the "reasonable" side of the debate, and all others are accused of being "flat-earthers". Scientific "facts" are determined by a consensus of scientists who dare not disagree lest they be deemed unscientific. Pretty soon, "everyone knows" that the original theory is as undisputed as the spherical earth, and no one asks further questions.

Call that science if you want. I call it intellectual bullying. Reasoned debate does not threaten science, it is the very essence of science. When scientists jettison that very principle of their craft, they abandon their own principles and cease to be trustworthy. We shouldn't put dissenting scientific voices into war crimes tribunals, we should listen to them. Sadly, that is not the state of science today.

Ben Duffy writes on Wednesdays. He can be reached at bduffy a student.umass.edu.

Practicing Title IX



James Mathews

"As far as playing," Celtics great and current Indiana Pacers bigwig Larry Bird said in a 2004 interview with ESPN, "I didn't care who guarded me – red, yellow, black. I just didn't want a white guy guarding me, because it's disrespect to my game." Although accusations flew that the big man was trafficking in some strange sort of white bred, self-hating racism, his comments went to illustrate an unavoidable truism of competitive sporting: good athletes like stiff competition, and sometimes that competition comes along the kind of lines we try so hard to ignore in our so-called "progressive" world.

From here, we flash forward to the present. In the world of College Sports, yet another controversy flares up on account of that infamous piece of legislation, Title IX. In a Dec. 11 press release, the NCAA Committee on Women's Athletics condemned the customary use of all-male scrimmage squads at women's team practices. "Any inclusion of male practice players" the Committee said, "results in diminished participation opportunities for female student-athletes, contrary to the Association's principles of gender equity, nondiscrimination, competitive equity and student-athlete well-being." Yet many female athletes take a different stance, and you mustn't go far to find them.

Here at UMass, members of the women's basketball team have expressed a view quite common to their sport: that the competition offered by quicker, stronger males is an invaluable preparation for game days. In the greater athletic picture, this approach is not restricted to the male/female dichotomy: distance runners train in higher altitudes before running races at sea level, baseball players swing weighted bats before stepping up to the plate and so on and so forth. In third grade, they tell you that "practice makes perfect." By the time you're a college athlete, you've probably realized what follows: harder practice makes perfect even better.

In the same release, the NCAA committee replied to this common position. "While there is no way to measure the true validity of that argument," they wrote, echoing the sentiments of feminists everywhere, "it still leads to the question – what cost in participation opportunity for women is the Association willing to pay for such improvement?" Again, we find differing opinions from the locker room. Members of the practice squad used by the UMass program have commented that their presence does not in any way affect participation by members of the women's team. Players tend to agree.

Notions of male preeminence in athletics are hardly "archaic." Ask any anthropology teacher, and they'll tell you that the male of the species is on average taller and stronger.

So what, really, is the NCAA's goal in all of this? If women players all have a chance to practice, enjoy practicing against male squads and get a competitive edge out of it, where is the injustice? Here, the committee falls back on its first, more feminist stance, arguing against "an archaic notion of male preeminence that continues to impede progress towards gender equality and inclusion." This is hardly a grey area, and notions of male preeminence in athletics are hardly "archaic."

Ask any anthropology teacher, and they'll tell you that the male of the species is on average taller and stronger. He may not be able to verify the Bird-man's comments on race, but when it comes down to brass tacks and genetics, he can. The sentiment, however, is the same: good athletes want good competition, and they generally know where to find it.

This is not the first controversy for Title IX, and certainly not the first in the recent past. In January, in upstate New York, the mother of a female basketball player filed a complaint, and soon enough cheerleaders were being forced to attend both boys and girls events in equal ratio. Many of them quit, and those who remained were left with a much more strenuous schedule, cheering on baffled girls teams to unenthusiastic crowds. When Title IX is invoked, such nonsense is often what follows.

Most of all, this kind of affirmative athletic action only goes to show the fundamental flaws in the approach that many of our parent's generation take towards feminism and general gender issues. Long ago, in a world where the traditional role of stay-at-home wife and mother was forced upon young women, there was rebellion, and women earned the right to choose what to make of their lives.

Now, we seem to be at the cusp of a century-long game of "opposite day," in which the new traditional role of independent, feminist working girl will be forced upon young women, regardless of what they would like. This is the NCAA's stance. The Committee on Women's Athletics would rather have a seemingly progressive system than one in which athletes are free to challenge themselves with whatever opponents they choose. It is no act of discrimination if the opponents they choose are men.

In this modern world, one would think that we'd be able to accept the sight of a few young men volunteering to help out a women's varsity team as a happy, equitable arrangement, but for some sad reason this is not the case. The NCAA should have a talk with its athletes. They might find that the women who play in their league aren't in it to fight for gender equality or to prove that we're all the same deep down. They might find that their athletes are in it for the joy of the game, for the thrill of victory and every now and then, for the fight against a strong opponent. I think Larry Bird would agree.

James Mathews can be reached at jwmathew a student umass edu.

Knowing your 'enemy'

Jackie Hai

Resident Assistant recruitment season is in full swing, if the posters all over campus are any indication. You yourself may have thought about applying for the position. After all, the compensation from UMass is pretty cushy: fee waivers for housing, OIT and wellness centers, your own single in a double-sized room and a yearly stipend of about $2,400. You might be friends with your RA, or have friends who are RAs and heard stories that make the job sound fun, challenging or interesting.

If there is one thing holding you back from sending in an application, chances are it's the stigma attached to being an RA. Those two letters might as well stand for Law Enforcement Lite, dredging up imagery of megalomaniacal hall monitors patrolling the dorms with clipboards in hand, waiting to pounce on unsuspecting partiers just trying to have a good time. Picture an RA on rounds inducing doors to slam faster than a showdown at high noon in a Western, and you have the popular misconception of what this job is all about.

Let me attempt to dispel these impressions. When I signed on to become an RA a year ago, I was attracted by the community-building aspect of the position, not the administrative and policy-enforcing parts. I've found this to be true among all of my friends on staff. Speaking for myself, I'm in it for the positive interactions I am able to have with residents and for the great friendships with my coworkers.

I hate writing people up, and so do most RAs. Thankfully, it's just a small part of our job.

I hate writing people up, and so do most RAs. Thankfully, it's just a small part of our job and usually only done under extreme circumstances. Are you endangering yourself and others by lighting candles in a closet, covering smoke detectors or dropping things out a window? Are you hosting a rowdy round robin with the door wide open? Are you making so much noise after quiet hours that the student next door can't sleep? Are you destroying property in a drug or alcohol-induced frenzy? If the answer to these questions is no, then believe me, most RAs will not be all up in your business. It is not fun, and we don't want to do it, end of story.

I'll be honest; I do think you have to be a little crazy to want this job. As one of my fellow RAs described it once, sometimes it feels like our time is not our own. By day three of training, the words "bulletin board," "paper cutouts" and "area office" are enough to send us running for the hills. Overnight duty and two-hour staff meetings, both regularly occurring during the semester, can effectively eat up an entire evening. And when finals are ending and the halls are emptying, we will stay behind to the bitter end to close everything up.

If you were on the fence about becoming an RA, now might be the time that you're putting this down and starting to back away slowly. But wait, don't go yet. The challenges of this job are, in my opinion, far outweighed by the rewards.

By rewards, I don't just mean the material compensations mentioned above. I'm talking about the chance to build a community from the ground up. A good RA can be the difference between a great college experience, full of warmth, laughs and fun memories, and living a drab, institutionalized existence. A good RA can be a friend, resource, confidante, mentor and party host all in one.

As an RA, you will practice critical life skills on a daily basis: communication, handling crises, time management, planning, group organization, conflict resolution and making interpersonal connections. These are skills you will carry for the rest of your life, to great benefit for yourself and those you come in contact with.

I had the good fortune this year of landing with a fantastic bunch of residents and the privilege of watching a core group develop into a tight-knit family. I also made some of my best friends since coming to college with those on our cluster's staff. Being a part of all this is beyond words.

If you've ever wanted to make an impact on campus, or to instigate change, one of the most direct routes to that end is through Residence Life. To be frank, there is definitely a lot of bureaucracy and red tape to deal with here, but this too can be overcome.

In the end, although RAs are commonly seen as threats and killjoys, this isn't why we signed up for the job. After all, we're Resident Assistants, not Resident Gestapo.

Jackie Hai can be reached at jhai a student.umass.edu.

"I DIDN'T CARE IF I WAS HUNGOVER FOR HISTORY."
#1 WORST GRADE ON THE FINAL EXAM ON DECEMBER 15, 2006.

UMASS
AMHERST

To the undergraduate student body of Southwest,

I owe my fellow students of Southwest a sincere apology for my inaction on the night of Dec. 15, 2006. Before the conclusion of the football game, I exhibited an extreme lack of judgment in my assumption that I could out-drink my buddy Russo. I wouldn't have done so if I had known that what I thought was a simple gathering of students was gonna bust into an all-out brawl. If I had known that, I would have traded Vanitek himself to be out there. I wish I had never blacked out that night. How did the game end? Ah, who cares, the important thing is what happened afterward, and what I will regret missing forever. I mean, I could have made some history!

Shortly after that night, while I was trying to get all the Sharpie off of myself, this kid Sully totally chewed me out for missing it. I felt like a bitch. He was down there breaking windows and yelling "Yankees Suck", while I think I was puking somewhere. The thing is, I too think the Yankees suck, and I wish I could have let the world know on that crazy night. Now, with over a month to recover from the most intense hangover, I have thought about what happened, and learned a bunch. I have learned that my buddy Russo, despite that he doesn't bench as much as me, can drink more than my cousin Murph. I have also learned that if you black out, you can't take advantage of getting f*d up and breaking st, which I hear was awesome.

When I got accepted here, I already knew about all the crazy crap that went down. I couldn't wait for the Thirsty Thursdays and the trips down Frat Row (I just pounded my chest twice and pointed up). My parents told me I betrayed them when I went on academic probation after my first semester as a freshman. Yeah it sucked living at home, but you know what? I'm back here now, and I'm passing now and still having fun. Lesson learned. If we aren't here to party, then what's the point of going? When I get out of college, I'll have plenty of time to become a Psychiatrist, but I just don't care about that now.

OVER ▶

(Continued)

Seriously though man, I cannot express how messed up I was that night. If I could have been outside, I would have. Seriously, I was critical on that night – I mean, they shoulda hooked me up to the Defib (That's slang for Defibrillator) and gave me some Epinephr...rine. But that is my bad, and totally my bad. I know I deserved my shaming as the shoes were on, but I just wish I had another chance to stand up and not fall down while throwing up.

But life goes on. I mean, there is some good stuff that came outta this. For one, I guess I stripped down to my boxers at one point, went into a random room and broke some girl's table. Though I can never brag to my friends about being in a riot, I can at least add that to my bragging list. People say this hurt the reputation, but whatever, it's fun.

Life is all about experiences, so don't be afraid to live man. Remember those words, and remember who said 'em. If you ever have the chance to do something crazy like riot, then do it. It doesn't matter why, and if you need a reason I'll give you one. It's the school's fault. They have some problem with us having fun. I mean, so many of my buddies have gotten busted for drinking. Man, screw this law I'm mature enough to handle my booze. In conclusion, all you need to know is that it's our right to fight against this tyranny. The kids who got expelled need to get a lawyer and fight it. Their case is legit. Read the Constitution if you don't believe me, it's there.

Sincerely,

Vinny Rosen
Regretful I wasn't there

Vinny Rosen drunk dialed Collegian editor Tucker Merrick at 3 a.m., demanding the return of Bop-It Extreme and that Tucker write this ranting down.

OFTEN WHEN DRINKING, EVENINGS AREN'T REMEMBERED.

Point-Counter-Point

Not funny

Andrew Freeman

Six years ago in Boston, my boring high school chemistry class was interrupted. The teacher was taken aside by a colleague, and then told us "Someone flew a plane into the World Trade Center in New York." Our first reaction was that he was making some kind of joke. He denied this – "thousands of people are dead."

Last Wednesday, Boston was thrown into a panic by ads for "Aqua Teen Hunger Force," a Cartoon Network series. The ads – devices arranged with lights in the shape of a cartoon character – were found in bridges and train stations, and mistaken for bombs. Police reacted promptly, closing bridges over the Charles River and calling in bomb squads to handle the devices.

By the afternoon, it was clear that there was no threat from the devices. Nevertheless, the event was declared a "hoax," and the two men responsible for placing the devices were arrested. Peter Berdovsky and Sean Stevens, who had installed the ads on behalf of marketing firm Interference Inc, were jailed. The city also sought compensation for its expenses from Turner Broadcasting, owner of Cartoon Network.

Shortly afterwards, national mockery began. The incident has become fodder for writers in print, television and even the Internet. One of the top videos on YouTube.com the past week has been Zebro Sketch Comedy's reaction to the events, which skewered the mayor, media, police and adults in general.

In hindsight, we know that the devices were not bombs. However, they could have been.

The mood surrounding the ads even spread to participants in the incident. Berdovsky and Stevens, after being released from prison, joked with the media about hairstyles, refusing to answer anything other than a "hair question."

The events certainly have the makings of great comedy – hyperbole and misunderstanding on the part of all-too-serious people. But I have to agree with Deval Patrick and the other officials who say "It's not funny."

In hindsight, we know that the devices were not bombs. However, they could have been. Just because there was a cartoon character displayed on the devices does not make them safe. After receiving suspicious phone calls, the police did their jobs, assuming there was a threat and acting to contain it.

The ad was not a "hoax," which implies the intention of inspiring fear.

It was a marketing ploy, one that has generated more publicity for the show than anyone could have imagined.

One factor in the city's reaction was the location of the devices. They were installed on bridges and by subway stations – places where a bomb would kill a large number of people. In most of the other cities of the marketing campaign, the ads were not placed in transportation hubs, according to an article in The Boston Globe. In Atlanta, for example, they were mostly in trendy neighborhoods, nearby bars. Only in Chicago and Philadelphia were the ads found near train stations.

The fears that caused the authorities' reaction are justified. Islamic terrorism is occurring in Western countries, and it may again strike the United States. Canadian terrorists plotted to attack its government; British terrorists have attacked the London Underground, and planned to blow up transatlantic aircrafts. More recently, a plot to kidnap and behead a British Muslim soldier was uncovered.

For those who refuse to see the gravity of this, I have a few more jokes for you. A man on a plane has a lighter, and he reaches down to light his shoes. A stewardess sees him trying to light his shoes, is suspicious, and the other passengers restrain him, foiling Richard Reid's attempt to blow up the aircraft.

A substance is placed in envelopes and mailed to media outlets and two Democratic senators. Five people die from the anthrax bacteria. The suspect is never caught.

Hijackers seize several aircraft and fly them into the World Trade Center and the Pentagon. The fourth plane crashes in Pennsylvania as the passengers retake it.

In a world in which shoes disguise explosives, where aircraft become missiles, and where envelopes carry death, what object could not potentially pose a danger? Is it unreasonable to think that a device installed covertly on a bridge might be a bomb? Boston and state officials will suffer criticism for their response. It is nothing compared to what would ensue if subway stations had exploded, or motorists plunged into the Charles River because police had heard of suspicious devices and not acted.

Within a week this story will probably fade from the news. Turner Broadcasting has promised $2 million to pay for the expenses the incident generated. Hopefully the charges against Berdovsky and Stevens will be dropped, since there seems to be no criminal intent. Nevertheless, the lesson to take from this episode is not that we are too alert, or that we should take terrorism less seriously. Terrorism is not a joke, and we treat it that way at our own peril.

Andrew Freeman writes on Wednesdays. He can be reached at adfreema a student.umass.edu.

Fun, not fundamentalists

Michael Dennis

Jan. 31, 2007. Mark it down as one for the history books.

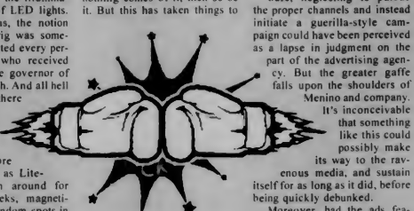
On that fateful day, a call was placed to authorities in Boston to report a supposedly suspicious device, comprised of four D-batteries wired up to a capacitor and photoresister. When activated, the result was simply the illumination of a series of LED lights. Like a nasty virus, the notion that this simple rig was somehow a threat infected every person and official who received it, right up to the governor of the Commonwealth. And all hell broke loose from there on out.

Most of these supposedly "sinister" devices (heretofore to be referred to as Lite-Brites) had been around for two to three weeks, magnetically affixed to random spots in Boston, as well as in nine other major U.S. cities. Depicting a character known as a Mooninite from the cartoon "Aqua Teen Hunger Force," they were distributed as part of a guerilla marketing campaign for the upcoming film adaptation of the series.

A firestorm erupted only in one city, causing the temporary paralysis of an entire metropolis while wasting at least a million dollars of taxpayer money. If these Lite-Brites warranted even a fraction of the hysteria they wrought in Boston, the odds are pretty high something would have already arisen elsewhere. Could hundreds of explosive devices distributed guerilla-style throughout 10 major metropolitan areas really sit around for two to three weeks without incident?

It cannot be understated that, contrary to what the media or government officials may tell you, the events that unfolded in Boston were absolutely, positively hilarious. Governor Deval Patrick called the placement of the advertisements a "hoax," and "not funny." No, Deval, it's beyond funny. It transcends everything any of us could have expected of this hallucinogenic society that we live in. Yesterday, "the terrorists" were out to get us and destroy our way of life. Today, it's a lit-up tiny green man from the moon who stars in a cartoon. My, how we have fallen.

There's a line of reasoning that for every actual catastrophe, there are thousands, even millions, of false alarms. Count me in as someone who agrees that officials should certainly exert their due diligence if anything legitimately fishy arises, and if nothing comes of it, then so be it. But this has taken things to an entirely new level. It's plain to see to most that the Lite-Brite ads in no way resemble a bomb. Also, it's clear the advertisers and the men who posted the ads did not intend to strike fear into anyone with their actions, or else they would have made a half-hearted pass at trying to make the ads resemble bombs.



Contrary to what the media or government officials may tell you, the events that unfolded in Boston were absolutely, positively hilarious.

In the wake of this debauchery, the obvious thing city officials should have done was throw their hands up and admit they overreacted. Instead, on dubious grounds they jailed the two individuals responsible for physically distributing the ads, declaring their intentions to hold them accountable. Rightfully so, these men made a mockery of the entire process, laughing through their arraignment and testing the patience of reporters by refusing to answer any questions unrelated to 1970s hairstyles. In the wake of the embarrassment, Boston Mayor Tom Menino even went so far as to say of the Aqua Teen film, "I would like to ban it [in Boston] but I can't." Right back at you, buddy.

Sure, neglecting to pursue the proper channels and instead initiate a guerilla-style campaign could have been perceived as a lapse in judgment on the part of the advertising agency. But the greater gaffe falls upon the shoulders of Menino and company.

It's inconceivable that something like this could possibly make its way to the ravenous media, and sustain itself for as long as it did, before being quickly debunked.

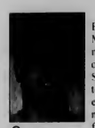
Moreover, had the ads featured a more recognizable logo, would any of this have happened at all? As Boston Globe TV critic Matthew Gilbert asked recently, "What if those same boxes had McDonald's ads on them, instead of 'Aqua Teen Hunger Force?'" By that sound line of logic, the entire incident becomes not a question of public safety, but of brand recognition.

The fact that those in charge reacted in such a way simply because they were oblivious to the message of the ad plays into the hands of the oft-propagated fear of the unknown. We've become a society where, increasingly, we're encouraged to act first, and think later. Forget common sense, pure instinct is the wave of the future.

The only "hoax" that took place on Jan. 31, 2007 was carried out by Boston city and state officials and the media. There's no denying it – hysteria has been the name of the game for far too long in today's America. Who knew it would have taken a fierce little Mooninite to wake us all up to the fact?

Michael Dennis can be reached at mdennis a student umass edu

A man often unknown



Greg Collins

In honor of Black History Month, economist and sociologist Thomas Sowell deserves to be highlighted as one of the most thoughtful and truthful intellectuals of our time. Respected, universally known people like Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. are rightfully celebrated as embodying and promoting the values of Black History Month. However, Dr. Sowell has been consistently overlooked as being perhaps the greatest contributor to the advancement of the study of black America, and of all races and ethnicities in general, within the past 20 years.

Dr. Sowell's work has encompassed a variety of fields. He has shown how governmental policies are more often considered by their stated intentions rather than by their actual empirical results. These results consistently do not fulfill the expectations of the policies. For instance, Dr. Sowell's research revealed that President Lyndon Johnson's Great Society initiative, intended to eradicate poverty in the United States, actually stunted the social mobility of Americans.

We frequently hear about considering the values of different cultures and peoples before passing arbitrary judgments on their lifestyles, it is sometimes called taking a multiculturalist viewpoint. What makes Dr. Sowell so unique among contemporary scholars is that he actually has studied governmental programs implemented in different countries with similar goals and intentions. Affirmative action programs in Malaysia, Nigeria and India, as well as in the U.S., were all developed with the aspiration of compelling a government-designated group of people to further their socioeconomic status through these programs.

In all cases, Dr. Sowell discovered that the actual outcomes of these policies did not result in the advancement, be it socioeconomic or educational status, of the preferred ethnic or racial group. If you are someone who holds strong opinions about one of the most racially divisive public policies in America within the past fifty years, Dr. Sowell's work on race-based and ethnic-based affirmative action programs is a must read.

Dr. Sowell's work on race-based and ethnic-based affirmative action programs is a must read.

Perhaps most importantly, Dr. Sowell's studies on socialist and capitalist economies in general have emphasized the importance of the allocation of coveted resources and commodities with different uses. His work reveals that competitive capitalist economies are most responsive to the needs and preferences of individuals, while the results of socialist economies rarely correspond with the personal choices of people.

Additionally, he has written that those capitalist economies most free from government intervention and who still maintain healthy competition are more effective in alleviating poverty than capitalist economies which provide social programs. This is important to remember when we hear political commentators, professors and college students talk about combating poverty and helping the poor by enhancing government services.

Moreover, through empirical evidence, Dr. Sowell has shown that differences in the socioeconomic status among different racial and ethnic groups in capitalist economies, today and throughout history, is overwhelmingly due to the cultural practices and behavioral patterns of those groups rather than as the result of systematic discrimination from governments or businesses.

The unfortunate effect of Dr. Sowell's work is that he is not embraced as much as other intellectuals and figureheads like Dr King or Harvard professor Henry Louis Gates. This is because many of Dr Sowell's conclusions about government programs, race and ethnicity are contrary to the assumptions of politically correct individuals and mainstream politicians and scholars.

For instance, one way of thinking holds that lingering and institutional racism is a salient factor impeding blacks from making further strides in America, a view Professor Gates supports. In contrast, Dr. Sowell maintains that in contemporary American society, this element has little or no real-world effect on the status of blacks, or of any other racial or ethnic group claiming that discrimination inhibits their money-making ability in a free market economy.

Dr. Sowell's work has direct relevance to college students. We are confronted daily by professors, news media or pop culture with sweeping pronouncements about celebrating diversity, embracing people who look different than you and helping the poor. However, rarely are these issues confronted as truthfully and intelligently as Dr. Sowell once did. In order to grasp what I think are the true realities and complexities of these ideals, I urge you to read his work.

And perhaps most importantly, Dr. Sowell's work reveals that all human beings behave in similar ways when confronted with similar options. As we celebrate Black History Month, now is the perfect time to embrace Dr. Sowell and his studies. In an era when many people blindly highlight racial divisiveness, his work provides refreshing evidence of the eternal commonality of the human race rather than its temporal differences.

Greg Collins can be reached at gcollins a student.umass.edu.

NUKES PLAYING PART IN TV STORY LINES THIS SEASON
THAT DOES IT! IT'S BACK TO LITTLE HOUSE ON THE PRAIRIE' RERUNS FOR ME!
STAYSKAL 2007

LETTER TO THE EDITOR

SOME FINAL THOUGHTS

I write this letter as a staff member, a member of the faculty, a US citizen, but first and foremost, as an alumnus of the University of Massachusetts Amherst.

I want to thank The Collegian for their coverage of the "riots" of Dec. 15. I also want to thank Brendan Hall for a well written and well thought opinion piece. I am greatly appreciative when the majority voice of the student body is so eloquently stated. I also want to thank the 16,000 plus undergraduate students who did not participate in this event in any way.

Yet, I am deeply saddened and frustrated by this event. I certainly know that it can be great fun to be in a large group celebrating, partying and so forth. But that isn't what happened on Dec. 15. It was a premeditated riot. A relatively small group of people planned to cause mayhem, and a larger number planned to watch and cheer them on. Cheer them on?!

Instead of chanting "Yankees suck," perhaps they should have chanted "Devalue my degree" because that's what was really being accomplished, not to mention injury to numerous people and massive destruction to property. This smaller group of people essentially terrorized the area. Yes, I use that word deliberately. And as Mr. Hall reports, we are hearing reports from people there of "That was fun."

I imagine it was incredibly fun to be in a room when a rock came flying through the window, or when a beer can hit you in the back of the head or when a glass jug of water dropped from a tower almost hit a living, breathing person. Fun!

Mr. Hall states "If the bleeding doesn't stop now, it never will, which is why you're not going to see us staging sit-ins in protest of some kid getting expelled for partaking in shamelessness. Maybe those kids didn't deserve such a harsh punishment, especially if they're first-time offenders with a clean slate."

I agree. We, as a community, need to stop the bleeding. Each of us needs to do our part. However, the statement about "maybe those kids didn't deserve such a harsh punishment," is the one place where I disagree. Those folks don't deserve to be associated with my alma mater and to besmirch its good name. They committed crimes and felonies – they belong in jail, not at a world-class university.

Tom Schiff
UHS

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

ARTS & LIVING

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 7, 2007 ARTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

DC Dish: a creative way for students to dine

By Mary-Frances Heck
Collegian Correspondent

Have you ever walked into one of the University of Massachusetts award-winning Dining Commons and been astounded by the uneven quality and often uninspired preparation of what's for dinner? Are you tired of waiting in long lines in Berkshire or circling Franklin in search of something tempting? Do you wish that entrees looked and tasted fresher while still offering good nutrition?

You wisayers are not alone. Your hopes of finding a tasty, filling meal have just gotten better. With a little effort, your meal can be elevated from a humdrum dinner to haute cuisine. This column will address the daily monotony of eating on campus with the hope of spicing up meal time from North to Southwest.

All of the dining halls on campus have a few things in common. They offer prepared meals as well as salad, sandwich and pasta bars. They also serve fresh vegetables, cheeses, deli meats and sauces. Additionally, you can usually find basic staples like grilled chicken breast, rice, cooked vegetables and ice cream. Also, dining halls come equipped with microwaves and panini presses. With a little creativity and determination, these seemingly boring ingredients can come together in satisfying dishes that will please any palate.

The next time you are lost and hungry, try one of these recipes:

Bruschetta

2 slices French bread or ½ sub roll
1 tbsp pesto (usually found at the pasta bar)
2 slices tomato
1 slice provolone, cut in half or ¼ cup shredded mozzarella 1 tsp parmesan cheese (optional)
salt and pepper to taste

Lightly toast the French bread or roll. Spread half of the pesto on each slice of bread. Add a slice of tomato to each and sprinkle with salt and pepper. Top with cheeses, parmesan first, then the mozzarella or provolone. Place the bread, cheese side up, on a panini press. (Caution: make sure none of the cheese falls onto the press and burns, leaving a mess for the next user!) Lower the top of the press making sure that it does not touch the cheese; allow a half-inch between the

See RECIPES on page 7

Need for eco-friendly fuel getting larger

By Andrew Richmond
Collegian Correspondent

The world's top producers of the virulent greenhouse gas carbon dioxide are 1) the USA; 2) China and 3) Indonesia. In the looks of the possibility for the continued wave of global warming, Indonesia now earns the honorary mention for blame — and, ultimately, the cause lies in the hands of eco-friendly energy initiatives vehemently supported by the governments of green-thinking Europe especially the Netherlands. But how did such a sad state of affairs come to be?

Unfortunately, the above scenario is an all too real result of what can happen when state-subsidized support is thrown behind quick-fix technological strategies without research into the possible "side-effects" which, in this case, end up adding to the original problem of pollution.

Here, the heart of the issue lies in the industrialization of palm oil for fuel and consumer goods, the cause of recent its amazing rise as an environmentally conscious "green" alternative to fossil fuels (it hardly produces the high-level amount of energy out of the "expendable ones" when burned). Europeans countries desperate for ways to reform their energy usage amid the ever detailed by recent European Union legislation have tapped on this tropical product, predicting to its a range of uses from fuel to cars to generating electricity. The latter initiative was particularly appealing to the government of the Netherlands, which by 2010 has set to have provided extensive financial incentives to Netherlands companies that agreed to convert their power plants to "green energy". Consequently, the latter country was last year's biggest importer of palm oil in Europe.

The overall aim is to replace fossil fuels with plant energy, the plants absorb carbon-dioxide while they grow and the fuels emitted from them emit less when burned. Where's the problem in this? As it turns out, horror-of-horrors, it could not so much have the utilization of palm oil be bad, but that a world away, about 0.6 percent had harvested this crucial stock in Indonesia. There, huge swaths of tropical rainforest and peatland (which actually holds huge amounts of carbon-dioxide) collected from the atmosphere, much of it the result of the latest burst released over the course of global industrialization) are cleared and burned to make room for more oil palm trees.

Both of these practices result in the release of two billion tons of carbon-dioxide into the atmosphere from Indonesia every year, contributing to environmental degradation of not only South-East Asia but the world over. Without considering the palm oil industry, Indonesia ranks 21st globally for harmful carbon-dioxide emissions — but with, it jumps up to third. Due to these unexpected consequences, countries like the Netherlands have rushed to freeze subsidies for palm oil usage, and scientists are scrambling for a way to make the production of palm oil environmentally sustainable. Until then, using this "biofuel" is almost as bad (if not worse) then burning coal and oil for power or diesel for transportation.

The problem with palm oil, as it turns out, is just one of the problems resulting from the use of many early 'biofuels' currently supported by governments and major energy companies. One good example is the inefficiency dogging the corn-based ethanol industry lauded by the United States. According to a recent article in Nature, many studies project the production-employment energy gain for current corn-fuels to be next to nothing — and, in some cases, ultimately negative. This is because the energy input for planting, tending, harvesting, and processing the corn (with each step powered by electricity gained from the utilization of carbon-emitting fossil fuels) is greater than the energy which the end-product ethanol fuel contains.

Of course, technologies under development which utilize corn-stalks and other agricultural detritus instead of just the kernels appear to yield an enormous net benefit, and more then repay their production emissions by the reduction of carbon-dioxide output. These processes are based on breaking down the much more abundant, yet also more resilient cellulose in plant matter as opposed to the (easily utilized) starches currently favored, because cellulose is the place where many plants store the majority of their sugars. However, the means to mass-produce this real 'biofuel' are still a few years away — while everybody can instead make money right now by concentrating on inefficient (but federally supported) corn-kernel ethanol production.

With both palm oil and corn-kernel-ethanol, the moral of the story is this: there are no 'quick-fixes.' Instead of diving right in to new advancement that promises immediate ecological benefits, legislators and other energy investors should first consult experts as to the true costs of production and development for each individual 'solution.' Hopefully, such a forward-thinking strategy will serve to put governments and companies in the position to place their backing behind techniques — such as, perhaps, cellulose-based ethanol — that will actually serve to reduce net emissions, and combat (not contribute to) global warming.

Andrew Richmond can be reached at arichmon@student.umass.edu

Mass. Film festival underway

Festival begins tonight at Amherst Cinema

By Morgan-ann Rousseau
Collegian Staff

The 14th Annual Multicultural Film Festival, "Encuentros: New Cinema of Latin America and Spain," presented by the Interdepartmental Program in Film Studies at University of Massachusetts Amherst opens its doors tonight.

This season's festival showcases 13 weeks of innovative new works of feature and documentary filmmakers from across Latin America, Cuba, Mexico and Spain, according to festival coordinators. In addition to delivering a powerful medley of veteran filmmakers, Encuentros Encounters will also show the works of younger, first-time filmmakers new to the emerging social movement of international film.

The festival's 16 films convey truths about complex histories of foreign cultures, as well as show vibrant musical traditions and deliver insight into the evolving collection of identity, culture and politics in these countries. Encuentros Encounters explores as well as confronts issues regarding race, religion, national boundaries and social class.

Interim Director and Festival curator, Jacqueline Urla, says that coordinators decided to make this year's theme on new cinema of Latin America and Spain because of the emerging spotlight on Latin American and Spanish filmmakers both in the U.S. and International film spectrum.

"It seemed like a good time to focus on [this theme] because of the prominence of Latin American directors," said Urla, who also does much of her work in Spain and holds a personal interest in the subject.

The Chief Undergraduate Advisor in the Interdepartmental Program in Film Studies, Nancy Inouye, is the festival's Assistant Curator. Inouye also points to the notoriety of Mexican directors that are sweeping this year's Academy Awards nominations, as well as the success of Latin American filmmakers at international film festivals, such as the Cannes Film Festival.

Tonight at the Amherst Cinema Arts Center, the festival will debut with a screening of acclaimed Spanish director Pedro Almodóvar's film, Volver. This 2006 murder mystery earned Penélope Cruz the Best Actress award at the Cannes Film Festival, where it also picked up the award for Best Screenplay. The film's title translates to "coming back" in English. Previous landmark films of Almodóvar's include "All About My Mother," "Talk to Her" and "Women on the Verge of a Nervous Breakdown."

2007
Massachusetts Multicultural
Film Festival

Amherst Ma

Free

The Amherst Cinema Arts Center is in close association with the festival, as its opening this past November had been long awaited by arts enthusiasts at UMass and the Five Colleges, according to Inouye. Festival coordinators agree that the Amherst Cinema is an important part of local film culture because of its capability to show 35 mm films. Although, the festival does offer other screening venues, including the Weinstein Auditorium at Smith College, the Stirn Auditorium at Smith

See FESTIVAL on page 7

Not your average cover band

Pink Floyd Experience coming to NoHo

Tom Quinn created The Pink Floyd Experience back in 1995 after being a fan of Pink Floyd for most of his life. Of all Pink Floyd material, the album "Animals" is Quinn's favorite to perform, especially the album's guitar solos.

By Olga Deshchenko
Collegian Correspondent

It is 12:30 on a chilly Jan. 26 afternoon and Tom Quinn, the lead band member and guitarist of The Pink Floyd Experience, is drinking bad coffee and watching the news at a Holiday Inn in Richmond,Indiana.

"You have to rip through these foil packets in frustration and then they explode all over the floor," he explains through laughter. "And then you have to go look for a staff member to get you another one."

The taste of bad coffee at hotel chains is quite familiar to Quinn, who has been extensively touring with his Pink Floyd cover band since Nov. 2006. The night before, the band shared their musical talents with the audience at the State Theatre in Kalamazoo, Mich. They performed timeless Pink Floyd songs and unleashed 270,000 watts of light and 20 tons of quadraphonic sound to create an experience that is a guaranteed crowd pleaser. Annerin Productions, a company that prides itself in injecting entertainment with life on stage, is responsible for the light and sound part of the experience.

"They were looking for the best Pink Floyd show they could find," said Quinn. "We came together with the creative team and have been bringing the complete Pink Floyd experience to the stage since then."

After the release of "The Dark Side of The Moon" in 1973, the San Diego native found a mentor of both technique and sound in David Gilmour, Pink Floyd's legendary guitarist and vocalist. "He was always my man," said Quinn.

The Pink Floyd Experience
Feb. 11, 2007
Calvin Theater
$35.00
$25.00

Quinn was determined to put a Pink Floyd cover band together. He joined forces with long time friend and band-mate Gus Beaudoin, who now plays bass for The Pink Floyd Experience.

"Other players came along at different times," he explained. "The singer Graham Heath from England came along about two years into the project. Keyboardist John Cox and drummer Stephen Shannon were two friends that came into the band together. The youngest member, Jesse Molloy, a firecracker on the saxophone, joined us back in 2004. We've done everything we can do with the music."

Quinn has had the pleasure of seeing Pink Floyd live during their Division Bell Tour.

"It was such a grand concept, huge towering stage, those surround sound moments and mind boggling array of effects," remembered Quinn. "They were way ahead of everyone else. The band members were true multimedia visionaries for many, many years."

Quinn explained that his band condenses that same experience and performs in smaller theatres, something they are proud to present every night. Being a professional guitar player, his favorite solos to play come from Pink Floyd's "Animals" album.

"I believe 'Animals' has David Gilmour's finest guitar playing. It is often overlooked. People expect you to say 'Comfortably Numb,' or something like that, but in terms of the fire in David's playing, [Animals] is just mesmerizing," he said.

The Pink Floyd Experience has been enjoying the packed theatres and the overwhelming applause, signs that prove the band impresses audiences everywhere.

"We had many great experiences in Florida and Wisconsin, but I wouldn't say any one area has the most Pink Floyd fans," said Quinn. "Overall, the 'Floydian' love has been great."

While touring, the band realized that the music of Pink Floyd appeals to more than one particular age group. People of all ages come to experience "Money" and "Wish You Were Here," ageless classics that are accompanied by light and sound effects.

"I was amazed when this

See PINK FLOYD on page 7

Band sparks Floyd experience

Tom Quinn may be known for his work with his band The Pink Floyd Experience, but next year he plans to release a web site to promote some of his own original music. According to Quinn, the music is inspired by Radiohead, Yes and Pink Floyd.

PINK FLOYD from page 6

started on the national level," said Quinn. "I expected people of my own age, you know, the tie dye t-shirt and headband wearing kind of people. Amazingly enough, the older hippie types compose around 20 percent of the audience. A lot of younger kids, those head banger rockers are really tuning into this music."

Quinn himself has always loved progressive rock and listens to bands such as Yes, Genesis and Radiohead. "I love huge sound escapes, the bands that create orchestral sounds," he said.

The Pink Floyd Experience's band leader does not only play cover songs, but also writes his own material.

"I do session work and hang out with my musician friends," explained Quinn. "People think that because cover bands don't write their own stuff they don't have original ideas. I do have an album's worth of material back at home. Hopefully, by next year I will have a website of my own."

Quinn, who describes Pink Floyd as "conceptional, all-inspiring and unforgettable," graduated from San Diego State University in 1988 with a degree in finance and engineering. Nevertheless, we my never find out if he is just as good with numbers as he is with guitar solos.

"I got my plaque on the wall," Quinn explained, "but I haven't worked a day because I'm so happy playing music."

Quinn, and the rest of the Pink Floyd Experience, will be coming to Calvin Theatre Feb. 11, 2007 to bring a taste of Pink Floyd to Northampton.

Olga Deshchenko can be reached at odeshche@student.umass.edu

Festival begins with the film Volver

FESTIVAL from page 6

College, and the Isenberg School of Management on the UMass campus.

Next week's film, to be screened in room 137 of Isenberg SOM, is Salvador Allende, a 2004 Chilean documentary by director Patricio Guzmán. The film looks at the life and vision of Salvador Allende, Chile's first ever democratically elected Marxist president, by using rare archival footage.

Each weekly screening will open with introductions by various film educators from different academic departments of the Five Colleges. According to Urla, speakers are chosen based on their knowledge of the topic or film maker, while others are chosen due to their involvement with the film itself.

Tonight, Justin Crumbaugh from the Spanish Film Studies department at Mount Holyoke College will introduce Volver. Filmmakers and other guests will be present for discussion after some screenings, such as the collection of shorts, "¡Viva Oaxaca's Mas" scheduled for Wed. Feb. 21 at 137 Isenberg SOM.

"I think this year's festival will be equally successful as last year's," said Urla. "We've cultivated an audience because people expect to see internationally well known work."

Encuentros Encounters other screenings include: "Yes, La Sal (Heading South)" on Wed. Feb. 28; Quase Dose Iemãos on Wed. March 7; Habana Blues on Wed. March 14; Morirse Está en Hebreo (Ah, Mexican Shiva)" on Wed. March 28; "Youth Media and Social Movements" on Wed. April 4; "Al Otro Lado (To the Other Side)" on Wed. April 11; "Bombon el Perro" on Wed. April 18; "Cecilia" on Wed. May 2 and "Nomadak Txt" on Wed. May 9.

A one-credit colloquium, entitled "Communication 296H" is available to undergraduate Five College students through SPIRE enrollment. The course, which is graded pass/fail, requires that students attend at least six screening events and complete a survey at the end of each screening.

The festival is organized by the Interdepartmental Program in Film Studies at UMass, and is supported by many academic departments, programs and colleges at UMass and the Five Colleges, including the Alumni Associations, The Arts Council, Commonwealth College and the Graduate school.

All screening events are free and open to the public. For full listings of screening times and locations, visit www.umassfilm.com, or visit the Interdepartmental Program in Film Studies, located in 129 Herter Annex on the UMass campus for more information.

Morgan-ann Rousseau is the Arts and Living Editor and can be reached at lr-desk@dailycollegian.com

Volver starring Penelope Cruz is the first of many films to be screened at this year's Multicultural Film Festival.

An all new dining experience

RECIPES from page 6

press and the toppings. Cook until cheese is melted and bubbly.

Spinach Salad with Chicken and Honey Citrus Vinaigrette

Salad:
1 cup fresh baby spinach
1 grilled chicken breast, cut into bite size pieces
½ medium pear, cut into small chunks or 1 orange, segmented
2 tbsp raisins or dried cranberries
2 tbsp pecans, cashews, walnuts, pumpkin seeds or sunflower seeds
2 tbsp feta, mozzarella or other cheese
For Dressing:
2 tbsp orange juice
4 lemon slices, juiced (check near the tea)
3 tbsp olive oil (in the condiment area)
½ tsp Dijon mustard
1 packet granulated honey
salt and pepper to taste

Combine first four dressing ingredients in a paper cup. Put a lid on the cup and shake vigorously 20 times to emulsify. Add granulated honey, salt and pepper to taste. Replace lid and shake 10 more times. Combine salad ingredients in a shallow bowl and drizzle with dressing.

Rice Pudding with Raisins

1 cup jasmine rice
1 3 cup 2% milk
1 tbsp cinnamon sugar (usually found by the waffle maker)
2 tbsp raisins
1 tbsp pecans, almonds or other nut (optional)

Combine ingredients in bowl. Microwave on high for 2 minutes or until milk has been completely absorbed by rice. Add more sugar if desired.

For those days when the prepared meals don't look too bad, but you feel like something is not up to par, try one of these tips:

If you don't see something that is normally out on the salad or pasta bar, ask. Chances are they have what you are looking for in the kitchen. Most DC workers are more than willing to help you.

If you like your veggies cooked, grab some from the salad bar and head for the microwave. Put a few tablespoons of water in a bowl, add your favorite vegetable (broccoli, carrots, spinach, etc), cover with a plate and microwave for about a minute. Add a pat of butter or a little olive oil and a sprinkle of salt and pepper and voila fresh steamed vegetables in no time!

Sick of greasy bacon? Wrap a couple strips in a napkin and nuke for 10-20 seconds. The napkins will absorb the rendered fat leaving your bacon crisps and hot.

Mary Frances Heck can be reached at mheck@student.umass.edu

ALUMNI ASSOCIATION

Thousands of Dollars in Scholarships Available!

The UMass Amherst Alumni Association is proud to offer the following scholarships:

Leaders in the Making Scholarship
Four $2,000 scholarships given to promising sophomores and juniors with diverse records of achievement in scholarship and volunteerism.

Life Member Scholarship for Internships
One $2,000 scholarship given to a sophomore or junior to help defray the cost of a summer internship.

Michael W. Morris Scholarship
One $2,000 scholarship given to a student from Lawrence or Lowell, MA. The scholarship is in honor of Lawrence native and longtime UMass Amherst champion, Michael W. Morris '63.

Senior Leadership Award
Twenty-five $500 savings bonds will be given to graduating seniors who have demonstrated outstanding leadership and service to the university community. Students must be nominated by faculty or staff.

DEADLINE FOR MOST SCHOLARSHIPS IS FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 23, 2007.
For scholarship eligibility and applications, visit UMassAlumni.com/students

You were. You are. UMASS.

University Health Services
Mental Health Groups, Spring 2007

Pre-registration is required for all groups. To register, or for more information, call 545-2337 or come to Mental Health Services, 125 Hills North, Monday – Friday, 8 a.m. – 5 p.m.

KEEPING IT REAL
Mondays, 3:30 – 5 p.m.
A co-ed undergraduate group focusing on self-exploration and skill-building for positive relationships.

GIRLS JUST WANNA HAVE FUN
Tuesdays, 4 – 5:15 p.m.
An exploration of women and substance use.

MINDFULNESS-BASED STRESS REDUCTION (MBSR)
Wednesdays, 5:30 – 7 p.m.
Mindfulness is a way of paying attention with intention, in the moment and without judgment. With regular practice, MBSR has the potential to lower stress, anxiety and depression, promote relaxation, improve concentration, raise self-awareness and enhance the immune system.

RELATIONSHIP GROUP FOR GRADUATE STUDENTS
Fridays, 3 – 4:30 p.m.
Explore personal relationships, work, studies and other issues in this group for graduate men and women concerned about interpersonal connections.

GAY AND BI MEN'S SUPPORT GROUP
Day and time to be announced
Offering male students a safe place to discuss issues of sexuality, identity development, relationships, isolation, depression, family concerns, coming out, intimacy and more.

Group fees are deducted from the Student Health Fee, Student Health Insurance Plan, GIC or Health New England plan, subject to plan limitations and co-pays.

Northeastern makes statement in HEA

HOCKEY EAST from page 12

Matt Fornataro each scored power play goals in the third period to seal the 2-1 victory for UNH.

Junior Kevin Regan made a total of 77 saves on 81 shots in both games. He earned Hockey East Defensive Player of the Week honors for his strong play in net.

NU'S IMPROVEMENT

Second-year coach Greg Cronin suffered through the growing pains of having a young team last season. Although the Huskies still boast a young squad, their 10-12-4 record is much better than last year's 3 win, 24 loss season.

One of the brightest spots of the team has been the play of freshman goaltender Brad Thiessen. The Saint Louis, Mo., native is sixth in the conference in goals-against average and has defeated Hockey East powers Maine and Boston College.

In the second half of the season, the freshman owns a 5-2-2 record and a 0.949 save percentage. However, the Huskies were not able to ride Thiessen's hot streak into a victory over BU in the first round of the Beanpot.

The team will have an excellent opportunity to earn coveted Hockey East points when it travels to UMass Lowell (4-19-6, 3-14-3 HEA) tomorrow evening.

THE MASTER OF TIES

Boston University has played in a lot of close games this season. Unfortunately for the Terriers, the team has only has 13 wins this year. But then again, BU only has five losses on the season as well.

This phenomenon is because the Terriers have tied eight times – seven in Hockey East games.

Before the team shutout Northeastern in the first round of the Beanpot, BU's last two games were ties – including a scoreless contest with UMass Lowell. The team also went through a stretch in November with three straight ties against HEA opponents.

Of the 10 overtime games the Terriers have been involved in this season, only two ended in non-ties.

Northeastern has also played in 10 extra periods this season, but has only tied four of them. The Huskies are 3-3-4 in overtime games, including a 1-0 victory over Merrimack last Friday.

THE LONE WARRIORS

After losing a 1-0 overtime contest to Northeastern this past weekend, Merrimack (3-19-4, 3-14-2 HEA) is back in last place in the Hockey East standings. The Warriors met their conference win total from last season on Jan. 5, with a 2-1 home win over No. 17 Massachusetts (13-9-4, 10-7-2 HEA).

However, the team has not won a game since that date. But despite their struggles scoring goals, the Warriors have a notably better defense than last year, thanks in large part to their strong goaltending and penalty kill.

Senior Jim Healy has the seventh best goals-against average (2.32) among Hockey East goalies in league games. In fact, Healy has better numbers than the highly regarded Cory Schneider of Boston College in HEA play.

Oddly enough, sophomore Patrick Watson has worse statistics than Healy, but owns the other two thirds of the team's wins.

Senior goaltender Cory Schneider has started every game for the Eagles this season. He has a 2.39 goals-against average and a .914 save percentage.

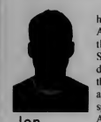
The goaltending certainly hasn't been perfect, but the ability to score goals, especially on the power play has been the real failure of this team.

Against Hockey East opponents, Merrimack averages just over one goal per game – a figure well below the rest of the league. The Warriors have only nine power play goals in 104 opportunities with the extra man.

On the opposite side, Merrimack's penalty kill unit is improved since last season. Although the team is second to last in penalty minutes, its penalty kill is sixth best, operating at an efficiency of 85.5 percent. The league named goalie Nevin Hamilton of UMass Lowell its Player of the Week after the freshman led the River Hawks to a win over Massachusetts and a tie with BU.

Michael King can be reached at mking a student.umass.edu.

Beanpot a bright light for fading sport



Jon Pelland

Some claim hockey in America is on the decline. So what? That doesn't mean there still aren't a few bright spots. The 55th Annual Beanpot Tournament kicked off Monday night with Boston University and Boston College moving on to face each other in next week's finals – no surprise there.

But despite the fact that the tournament is dominated by college hockey's most bitter rivals, the Beanpot is still a huge draw in Boston (the opening round was once again a sellout). It's probably the best hockey in the city given the current state of the Bruins – Bobby Orr isn't walking through that door.

Yet there are the nay-sayers. Yesterday some fellow Collegian sportswriters were in awe of the fact that The Boston Globe featured a picture of Terrier Dan McGoff that nearly spanned the entire broadsheet. The Globe even pulled out the big guns to cover the opening round – columnist Dan Shaughnessy wrote a column about Northeastern's disappointing first-round exit. I don't understand why that is so confusing. The Beanpot is one of the biggest events in college athletics, and not just hockey. It may even carry more weight than the Hockey East Tournament.

Aside from the claim that hockey is dead in this country, non-fans complain about the Beanpot's redundancy. Granted this is BU's 13th consecutive appearance in the title game, the Terriers along with BC deserve it. No matter how many times those two teams face each other (six in 2005-06) it's a great story every time. No one gets sick of Red Sox-Yankees, so why should we be sick of BU-BC?

This year could have been different. Sure Harvard is struggling, but Northeastern is vastly improved over its dismal season from a year ago. Some, including this columnist, believed the Huskies had a shot of winning their first title game since 1988. They're right in the mix for the conference playoffs and received five votes in the polls this week – as surprising as that is.

Entering the first round, Greg Cronin had his crew playing some decent hockey in recent weeks. The Huskies are 5-3-2 since the calendar turned to January, including a 6-1 beating they handed to Maine. In that span, NU has participated in six overtime affairs – 3-1-2 in those games. Northeastern is no longer the whipping boy of Hockey East – that role belongs to UMass Lowell.

But unfortunately they laid a goose egg against Jack Parker's Terriers, and are back to focusing on the conference schedule. However, this may be a sign that things are going to be a different in years to come.

As exciting as seeing a different team in the title game could have been, don't worry, you're still going to see the best hockey in Boston come Monday. All college-hockey eyes will be on the TD Banknorth Garden. Even UMass coach Don Cahoon.

A former player and coach for Parker at BU, Cahoon ventures out of the 413 area code every year around this time to cheer on his alma mater. These two nights in February are the only two of the year that Cahoon can root for someone other than the Minutemen.

The fans are a huge part of the tournament. We're talking about some of the best fans in college athletics. Hockey is all BU has – America East basketball teams don't really count. The Terrier faithful are the best in the conference. Every time I've graced Agganis with my presence, it's been the same thing.

The student section is filled, and all of them are wearing red and white jerseys. There's no doubt that BU and BC hockey chants sound out of place against teams like UMass, but when the Terriers and Eagles square off it's like a game within a game. Seriously, the Beanpot is better because of the classic BU bash: "Sucks to BU."

Even the most die-hard BC hater – and trust me there is no shortage of them out there – has to get excited for Monday's final. There are so many story lines. Personally, I'm always excited about the goaltending matchup when BU and BC meet between the boards. Even though every night in Hockey East is a goalie clinic, BC's Cory Schneider against BU's John Curry is the crème de la crème – even if Schneider is playing like he suits up for Merrimack.

No other collegiate sport has a tradition like the Beanpot. These games don't count towards the Hockey East standings. The Terriers, Eagles, Crimson and Huskies all do it out of passion. There's no way Harvard and Northeastern would continue to take beatings at the hands of the other two if they didn't think the tournament is important.

So, here's a challenge to all of you reading this who think hockey has no business being played in America. Sit down this Monday night, turn on NESN at 8 p.m., sit back and enjoy the smooth sounds of Tom Caron calling play-by-play for what should be another Beanpot final for the ages.

Jon Pelland can be reached at jpelland a student.umass.edu

Cordes, Priest becoming role-players

SWIMMING AND DIVING from page 12

One swimmer whose ability to swim all four strokes (butterfly, backstroke, breaststroke and freestyle) well is senior Mike Cordes. Cordes is not one of the Minutemen's top swimmers, but he consistently takes part in a myriad of races scoring points for the Minutemen.

"Mike Cordes has had some really good sprint work today," Yarworth said. "He's had some great swims this week."

Cordes' name is scattered throughout the UMass record books. Although he doesn't occupy the top spot in any of these lists, he ranks fifth all-time in the 100-yard breaststroke, 10th all-time in the 200-yard breaststroke and 10th all-time in the 100-yard butterfly.

Zack Priest is another swimmer Yarworth values for his versatility. The junior won 200-yard butterfly and took part in the 200-yard medley relay victory. he also finished second in the 100-yard breaststroke.

"[Priest] has been throwing some good swims in there, especially this weekend," Yarworth said.

ON THE MEND

After winter break, Yarworth reported that a few of his swimmers suffered injuries and may miss some time. But these Minutemen persevered and got back into form faster than the coach originally thought – especially A.J. Vivella. Yarworth believed the junior would be out for the remainder of the season. Fortunately for the Minutemen, their top sprinter should be fit for the A-10 finals.

"Well I'm not allowed to disclose what he had, but he was sick," Yarworth said. "He got better a lot quicker than we thought he would."

Defending A-10 100-yard butterfly champion sophomore Nate Bromage suffered an injury as well, but found his way back into the lineup shortly thereafter – as did freshman Mike Berthaume.

SOMETHING FOR EVERYONE

Before the A-10 Championships, some of the Minutemen will swim in the LCAC Championships in Cambridge, Mass. from Feb. 16-18 – only 18 of the Minutemen can compete at the A-10 Championships.

"It's another championship meet we swim in," Yarworth said. "We won't go as a full team but I'm maybe taking four or five swimmers. I have to make that decision this week. But it's an alternate championship for kids that did make the Atlantic 10 team but qualified for the LCAC team."

Jay Mehta can be reached at jmehta@student.umass.edu

The Beanpot Tournament is rich in tradition. Here, Northeastern hoists the championship trophy in 1985.

Make your mark!

UNH's Graduate Programs in Economics

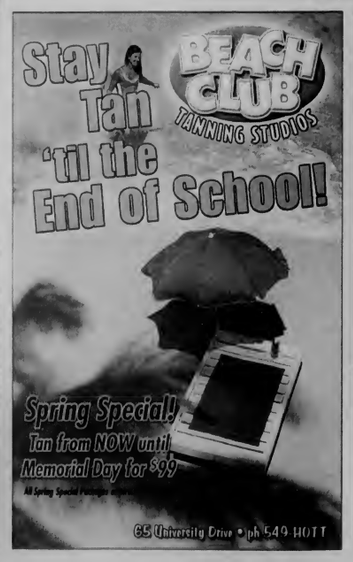
"Our M.A. and Ph.D. programs are some of the most innovative in the country. You will work closely with faculty to develop economic reasoning and data-analysis skills for the 21st century."

—Bruce T. Elmslie
Professor of Economics

- Ten-month M.A. program
- World-class faculty
- Dual-Track Ph.D. program: Training in Economics and College Teaching
- Assistantships for both M.A. and Ph.D. students (March 1 deadline)
- Professional career placement

It's your time. Spend it wisely.

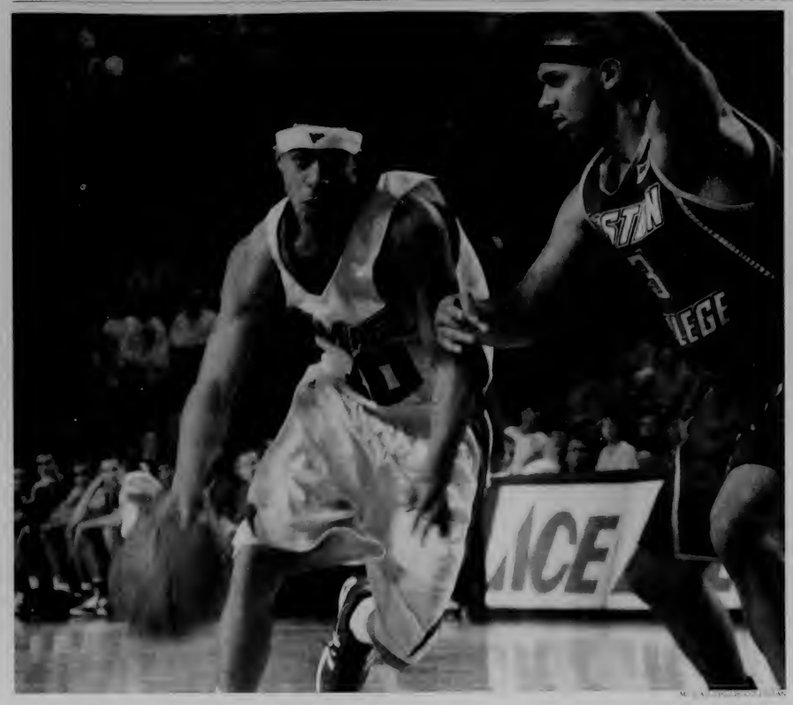
Whittemore School of Business and Economics
UNIVERSITY of NEW HAMPSHIRE
(603) 862-1367 wsbe.grad@unh.edu
www.wsbe.unh.edu/economics



Stay Tan 'til the End of School!
BEACH CLUB TANNING STUDIOS
Spring Special!
Tan from NOW until Memorial Day for $99
All Spring Special Packages expire
65 University Drive • ph 549-HOTT

WRITE FOR SPORTS!
SPORTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

BOSTON BARTENDERS SCHOOL - W. SPFLD
Special Student Rate
Local-National Placement
Includes Certification
1-800-357-3210
BostonBartender.com



Freshman Tiki Mayben is averaging 19.1 minutes per game for the Minutemen, making 12 starts at point guard and playing in 21 of a possible 22 games overall. The Preseason Atlantic 10 All-Rookie Team nominee is second in the conference with 4.43 assists per game.

Youth on top with coaches Ford, Mooney

M. BASKETBALL from page 12

COACHING FIRSTS

UMass coach Travis Ford and Richmond coach Chris Mooney are two of the youngest coaches in Division I college basketball today at 37 and 34 years old, respectively. Ford began coaching at Campbellsville and moved on to Eastern Kentucky – making an NCAA tournament appearance in his final year there – before coming to UMass.

Mooney spent three years with the Air Force Academy basketball program, serving as an assistant coach, the associate head coach and finally the head coach for the 2004-05 season before taking the Richmond job in 2005. Mooney became the youngest Division I men's college basketball coach in the game when he took the head job at Air Force.

Mooney is trying to implement a slow-paced offense that takes at least 20 seconds off of the shot clock in every possession, and has many backdoor cuts and screens that tend to confuse undisciplined defenses. So far this season, the Spiders haven't been able to handle their lack of talent and have limped to a 5-17 record with just one win in the conference.

Richmond had won the previous three meetings between the two teams before the Minutemen ended that streak on Saturday. The Spiders are winning the all-time series vs. the Minutemen with a 5-2 advantage. UMass' one win against Richmond came in 2003 with a 54-53 victory at the Mullins Center. Lowe was averaging 8.1 points and 6.1 assists per conference game before his 19-point effort on Saturday. He is leading the A-10 in assists and assist-to-turnover ratio. Junior James Hoffier is eighth on the all-time 3-pointers list at UMass with 124, although the sharpshooter went 1-for-8 against the Spiders on Saturday. In the most recent Associated Press Top 25 Poll, the Minutemen received four points in the "Others Receiving Votes" category. Here's how the point system works: a team gets 25 points for every No. 1 vote, 24 points for every No. 2 vote, and so on. On the other end, a team gets one point for every No. 25 vote, two points for every No. 24 vote, and so on. So the Minutemen either had four voters choose them for the No. 25 spot, two voters who chose them for No. 24, or one voter for No. 24 and two for No. 25.

Rob Gwentzell can be reached at managingeditor@dailycollegian.com

Rough weekend for UMass

SKIING from page 12

The two placed 14th and 15th with times of 1:57.30 and 1:57.56, respectively. Rounding out the top 20 was Travis Hopkins – who had a time of 1:59.05. Alex Zahorutko finished out UMass' top five with a time 2:03.02. These five combined times gave the Minutemen their second consecutive fourth-place finish overall.

The conditions at Loon Mountain gave the Minutewomen trouble. The lone bright spot of the day was Eliza Hawkins, who tied for first place with a time of 1:59.06. The next UMass skier down the mountain was Emily Zimmerman. She had her best finish of the season – finishing in 37th place with a time of 2:12.54.

Katie Weissman was the third to finish for the Minutewomen in 39th place with a time of 2:13.56. Just like the night before, Emily Shiletto had a costly fall in her first run that kept her from placing. The women placed seventh, dropping them out of the top five in the division standings.

Junior captain Jason Small has been U Mass' most consistent skier. He has placed in the top five in eight of 12 races this season.

Before the race, Fox said he was worried that cross-town rival Smith College would catch up with UMass, and it did. Smith took over the fifth-place spot with a fourth-place finish.

The race on Friday night was much of the same for the Minutemen. Hawkins added another top-five finish to his resume by finishing third with a time of 1:26.62. Hawes was the only other top-15 finisher for the men by placing eleventh with a time of 1:30.86.

Zahorutko and Ian Hohmeister finished next for UMass. They made the top 20, placing 18th and 19th in 1:32.06 and 1:32.35, respectively. The fifth Minuteman to place was Paul Lewenberg. He came in 24th with a time of 1:34.03. UMass got its first fourth place of the weekend, dropping the Minutemen down to second place in the conference standings. BC took the top spot with a third- and fourth-place finish. Fox described the weekend as off and kind of a fluke.

"The results were more than minor but not undoable," he said, and compared getting back to first place to the ever-confusing NHL playoff picture. "For us to get in first we would need to win and BC would need to place third or worse in both events. It's not impossible. If we do that then we made it up."

The Minutemen mathematically have a spot in the regional championships.

"The top five teams are chosen to compete in regionals and MIT is in fifth with 22 points behind us so we could finish ninth and still make it," Fox said. "It's impossible to get knocked out."

Hawkins was the top finisher for the Minutewomen on Friday night. She finished in 11th place, which Fox described as sub-par for her. Her time was 1:33.50.

Lauren Levey finished second for the women in 32nd place with a time of 1:40.98 and Amanda Lea rounded out the top three for the Minutewomen, placing 40th with a time 1:47.08. Freshman-phenom Emily Shiletto fell in her first run of the day, which kept her off the leaderboard.

UMass placed a little better on Friday with a sixth-place overall finish, but still lost the fifth spot in the conference. But Fox remains optimistic.

"We're only two points behind Smith. If we can get third place and Smith is fifth then we're set," he said. "We only need two points on them which is definitely doable. I definitely think we can step up to the plate next weekend and get it done."

Justin McGrail can be reached at jamcgrai a student.umass.edu

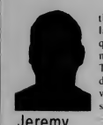
Junior captain Eliza Hawkins has taken first place three times this season, twice in the giant slalom and once in the slalom. Her Minutewomen are currently in sixth place overall in the MacConnell Division.

Check out dailycollegian.com to see these stories and more.

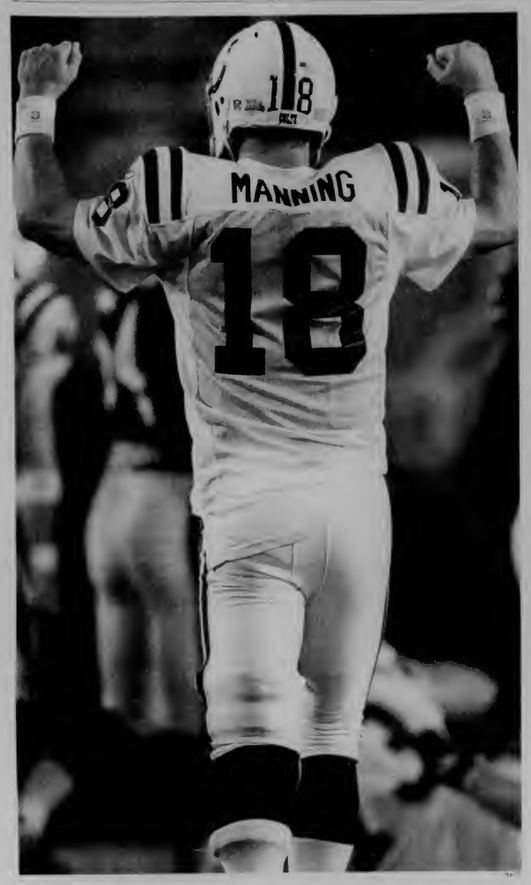
Cut out this ad receive your FREE $10 gift card!
BEACH CLUB TANNING STUDIOS
$10 Gift Card
•Limit one• coupon per customer
•Offer• Expires 02/28/07

FRUSTRATED?
CONFUSED?
DO YOU HAVE...
A grade dispute?
Teacher, roomate or job concerns?
Billing problems?
...or any other University related problems?
THE OMBUDS OFFICE CAN HELP
(confidentially, of course)
Serving the students, faculty, and staff of the Umass Community
823 Campus Center
Office Hours: 8:00 a.m. - 5:00 p.m.
Telephone: 413 - 545 - 0867
fax: 413 - 545 - 9720
e-mail: ombuds@ombuds.umass.edu

Manning makes Pats better



Jeremy Rice



Peyton Manning and the Colts went 4-0 in the playoffs after going 3-4 over the previous four postseasons. The Patriots, Colts, and Steelers have combined for five Super Bowls and eight AFC Championship appearances since 2001.

It was that throw on the last drive that quickly sent me into denial. Tom Brady dropped back with 30-some seconds left — as he always does — and fired over the middle, expecting the receiver to race to the sideline – as he always does.

...Interception.

I didn't see the return. I didn't watch the trophy ceremony, I didn't see Brady and Peyton Manning shake hands afterward, or even listen to Bill Belichick's press conference. I took off my new Benjamin Watson jersey, sat down at my computer and played World of Warcraft (yeah, me too) until I forgot that football happened this fall.

I was beside myself until the following Wednesday when I came to my revelation, but before going any further I must explain to you that in the past couple years, I've lived two lives in the realm of sports: that of a fan, and that of a journalist.

As a sportswriter, the AFC Championship game is easy to write about. No one can come up with a better storyline than the one Brady and Manning have penned with their heroics this decade.

As a fan, you're spoiled. No matter which team you root for, you have the privilege of supporting one of the few teams that put in a great season every year — in a league full of parity and competitive balance. But just because you're spoiled doesn't mean you're any happier when it all doesn't work out.

That's where I was the few days after that game. The next two weeks, and that Super Bowl at the end of it, were just an inevitability. Part of me wanted to root for the Bears and hope Manning breaks his leg as he gallops like a giraffe out of the pocket on one of those goofy rollouts he does. But another part of me knew the Colts would win. They had more talent and a better team that played more as a unit.

Now that it's over, I think that part of me actually wanted Manning to get his ring.

Before you jump on me as a traitor and a Benedict Arnold of the modern-day Patriots, allow me a chance to explain.

Being spoiled by my favorite team winning three championships during my high school and college days, I've made sure I learn quickly to appreciate what I'm seeing because, much like sports dynasties performing a rare feat, we as fans get to experience one as well.

Pittsburgh residents old enough to remember the glory days of the 1970s still talk about the best days of their team. Just like the few remaining Bruins and Celtics fans talk about the times when Boston tops in their respective leagues.

Right now, this decade, is the moment in the sun for the New England Patriots and their fans. The fact that Peyton Manning will have a ring on his finger from now on, only makes it better.

Right now? I hate it. I hate that the Colts will be referred to as the "Defending Super Bowl Champs" all next season. As a fan, I feel I'm entitled to that. But ten years from now, I know I'll appreciate it. So, the sportswriter in me is trying — real hard — to appreciate it now, and I think all of my fellow New England football fans should too.

When this era of football is over, and another quarterback class is at the forefront, the 2000s will be remembered as the decade dominated by the Patriots, regardless of the Colts' championship. A few more in the next couple years could change that, but we'll leave that for the unknown.

However, if the Colts didn't finally win the big one – and the Steelers the year before, for that matter – the accomplishments of the Pats would not be nearly as significant.

Every great team needs that hated rival(or two). Its arch-nemesis. Before the last two Super Bowls, the Patriots really didn't have one. Sure the Broncos beat them a few times, and Shanahan certainly hasn't made it easy for Belichick, but Denver hasn't accomplished anything for itself since Mr. Elway rode off into the Colorado sunset.

The two biggest rivals to the Patriots in the games that count – the playoffs – have been Pittsburgh and Indianapolis, especially Indy.

Outside of the three Super Bowl wins, the biggest victories for the Pats have arguably been the two AFC Championship games in Pittsburgh that became huge upsets, and twice shutting down the daunted Colt offense.

Maybe the Snow Bowl against Oakland was bigger to some, but the Raiders never should have been in that game. They lost their last three regular season games and limped into the playoffs.

So the title of biggest rival goes to Indy, with Pittsburgh as the runner-up. Those two now have Super Bowls under their respective belts, and what does that mean? It means that the Patriots dynasty is as legitimate as any other in NFL history.

Before the 2005 season, the Pats' dominance of the NFL could have been chalked up to the Colts and Steelers performing like choke artists in January. Now we know they can compete and win.

So, 10 years from now, we as sports fans can all look back and say with certainty that we witnessed one of the best eras of football and sports in general. Like the Lakers-Celtics rivals that went back-and-forth, with each winning championships, this rivalry has become one for the ages, making the next Patriots-Colts, Patriots-Steelers – or even Colts-Steelers match-up –exciting to watch again.

You have to admit, it's a lot harder to get tired of the same two teams playing when you truly don't know who's going to pull off the win. That's why people don't get sick of the Red Sox and Yankees playing almost 30 times a year.

The bottom-line is, without Lex Luther, you would have no Superman. Without the Joker and the Riddler, there's no Batman. And without the Steelers and Peyton Manning's Colts, there is no New England Patriots.

The "bad guys" have to win sometime. Otherwise, no one would cheer for the "good guys."

Jeremy Rice can be reached at jeremyr@student.umass.edu

CAREER FAIRS

Plan time to browse, ask questions, and give out your resume. Some employers will be scheduling follow-up interviews, so have your schedule available.

2 DAYS 4 CAREER FAIRS

DAY 1 Wednesday

Dress up & Bring a Resume

Campus Wide Career Fair — Campus Center Auditorium 10am-3pm

All majors and degree levels will find employers who want to talk with you! Meet employers, give out resumes and more! Meet employers looking for all majors for full time opportunities after graduation. Typically employers attending this event have a variety of openings to discuss, and many attend just to meet you and talk about future possibilities.

Hundreds of Employers are Recruiting

Life Sciences & Natural Resources Career Fair — Campus Center Lower Level 10am-3pm

Life Sciences and Natural Resources majors at all degree levels will find employers who want to talk with you! (Biotech, Pharmaceutical, Environmental & Natural Resources)

ALANA Career Fair — Campus Center Auditorium 5pm-7:30pm

Meet employers looking for ALANA students of all majors for full-time, Co-op and/or Internship opportunities. Typically employers attending this event have specific openings to discuss, and many attend just to meet you and talk about future possibilities.

DAY 2 Thursday 2/15

Summer Internship & Co-op Opportunities Fair

INTERNSHIP & CO-OP Opportunities Fair 10am-3pm Campus Center Auditorium

Meet employers looking for all majors for Co-op and Intern opportunities. Typically employers attending this event have a variety of openings to discuss, and many attend just to meet you and talk about future possibilities. There will also be some summer camp opportunities for those of you interested in that option.

UMASS AMHERST Student Affairs & Campus Life

Internships CO-OPS Full-time JOBS

Career Services www.umass.edu/careers

PINOCCHIOS on the go

Specials of the Week

Buy 2 Calzones GET 1 FREE

5 FREE WINGS With Purchase of any Large Pizza

(413) 256-4110 Call Now!

Sun-Wed Open 'til 1am
Thur Open 'til 2am
Fri-Sat Open 'til 3am

Free Delivery to UMass Menu Online @ andiamo.cc

	9			3		4
			5	6		2
4				9		6	3
		7				1		3
			9		8
2		1				8
	9	8		2				6
		2		8	9
	7		3			9

Find all of today's puzzle solutions online!

WWW.DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

ACROSS
1 Wield an axe
5 Window part
9 Metal coat
14 Regan's king
15 Fast-food choice
16 Speeder catcher
17 Not fooled by
18 Shrinking inland sea
19 Portents
20 Lenders
22 High-strung
23 Relatives
24 XIX
26 List ender
27 EST word
31 Guest star spot
34 Winning position
36 Chinese chairman
37 Appearance
38 Grant recipient
39 Facial feature
40 Lennon's love
41 Discovered
42 Minor
43 Stress
45 WWII fighters
46 Some cocktails
49 NBC's "Law & Order"
52 Make tardy
55 Peculiar devotions
57 Jacob's father
58 Same as mentioned
59 Radius neighbor
60 Mail unit
61 Longest river
62 Guzzler's sound
63 Like yesterday's news
64 Back talk
65 Latin infinitive

DOWN
1 Timepiece
2 Painter Matisse
3 Like Cheerios
4 Goad
5 Kind of electricity
6 Home-run king
7 Kind of crow?
8 Undrawn, as a gun
9 March with placards
10 Bermoan
11 Yemen's capital
12 Soaks up sorrays
13 Scottish Gael
21 Toward the center of 25 Relaxation
26 Mouse-spotting cry
28 Give off
29 Engrossed
30 Intrusive
31 Coagulate
32 Top-notch
33 Planetary satellite
34 Water source
35 Traveler's stopover
38 Entry
39 Guitarist Paul
41 Bride to be
42 Trim tower-town
44 Slings mud
45 Taken pulls
47 Type of ink
48 Yuletides
49 Window parts
50 Serena's sister
51 Practice
52 Speech impediment
53 Dog in "The Thin Man"
54 New Mexico art colony
56 Olympic racer

THE HARP

SPECIALS!
Honey Brown, Molson
$2.00 a pint / $6.50 a pitcher

WED: • Open Mic
THURS: • On the Rocks
SAT: • Thumbhead

Pizza 'til midnight 7 days a week

Voted best Neighborhood bar East of the River 2005 & 2006 Valley Advocate Readers Poll

OCMFA All Credit Cards accepted

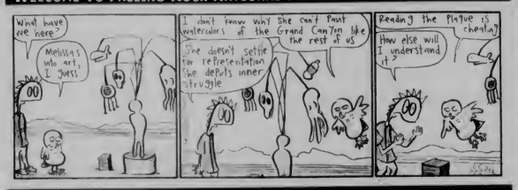
163 Sunderland Rd. - N. Amherst Just north of the apartments
413-548-0900 www.theharp.net

QUOTE OF THE DAY

"I don't do drugs. I am drugs."

-Salvador Felipe Jacinto Dalí Domènech

WELCOME TO FALLING ROCK NATIONAL PARK By Josh Shalek

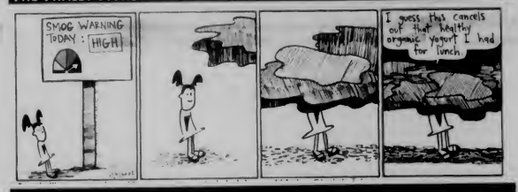


What have we here?
Melissa's who art, I guess!
I don't know why She can't Paint watercolors of the Grand Canyon like the rest of us
She doesn't settle for representation She depicts inner struggle
Reading the picture is cheating!
How else will I understand it?

WOMBAT By Neil Bryer

SO, YOU'RE A PIRATE?
AAARRRGGHH!
BUT YOU DON'T HAVE A SHIP, YOUR EYE PATCH IS FAKE AND YOUR PARROT IS A RUBBER DUCKY!
AAARRRGGHH!
YOU'RE A TERRIBLE PIRATE
AAARRRGGHH!

THE FAMILY MONSTER By Josh Shalek



TWO DUDES By Aaron Warner

OKAY, NOW ON YOUR LEFT IS THE CHEMISTRY LAB. YOU MAY NOTICE A SLIGHT ODOR.
OOOH! IT STINKS!
IT SMELLS LIKE EGGS LEFT IN A HOT CAR FOR OVER A WEEK.
IS THAT FROM THE CHEMICALS HERE?
NOPE. IT'S FROM THE ARMPITS OF MY NON-SHOWERING ROOMMATE.
I'M GETTING A HEADSTART ON MY BIOLOGY EXPERIMENT.

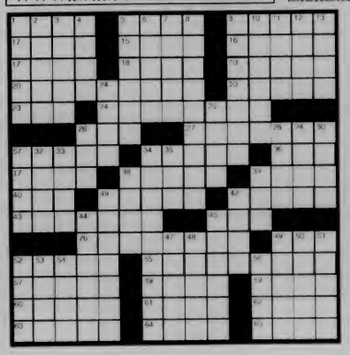
UMass YOGA In Boyden 10

Mon/Wed
2:00-3:15 pm Power Yoga
3:30-4:45 pm Yoga Basics

Tues/Thurs
1:00-2:15 pm Yoga Basics
2:30-3:45 pm Intermediate
5:00-5:15 pm Yoga Basics

Spring 2007

Sign Up Now!
Semester Packages:
1 class per week $80
2 classes per week $150
Campus Recreation
Boyden 215 413-545-0022
umassyoga.com



HOROSCOPES

aquarius Jan. 20-Feb. 18
Shed society's taxing cloak of sorrow. Move into the woods.

pisces Feb. 19-Mar. 20
Remember, it is safer to cut a tomato with a sharp knife than a dull knife.

aries Mar. 21-Apr. 19
Don't ever cut open a tea bag and dump it in your tea. You will choke and vomit.

taurus Apr. 20-May 20
Unexpected things come from the sky. For example, tortoises.

gemini May 21-Jun. 21
Perhaps your sign is named after a boss character from Megaman 3.

cancer Jun. 22-Jul. 22
You're not balding, your head is just getting shinier.

leo Jul. 23-Aug. 22
You could never change your clothes and still smell beautiful. You're that good.

virgo Aug. 23-Sept. 22
A dream is a wish your heart makes. A wet dream is a wish your loins make.

libra Sept. 23-Oct. 22
Stop trying to pick up mad fly honeys in your Women's Studies class.

scorpio Oct. 23-Nov. 21
Oatmeal! It will keep you regular. Evidence:That quaker sure looks happy.

sagittarius Nov. 22-Dec. 21
You can't change the past, but you can hide in the corner and cry.

capricorn Dec. 22-Jan. 19
You and I both know that after your actions last night you don't deserve a horoscope.

GET FAMOUS.

COLLEGIANCOMICS@YAHOO.COM

MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN MARKETPLACE

ACTIVITIES

Global Express Tours Spring Break Montreal Party Weekends from $99 Complete bus, hotels, & clubs. Montrealexpress.net 781-979-9001

Leave Massachusetts. Stay in the Country! Still time to apply for a Domestic Exchange! Deadline for fall 2007 and spring 2008 is March 1, 2007 Information Sessions Tuesdays and Wednesdays @ 4:45 in Goodell 614 through February 21 or call 545-5351.

APARTMENT FOR RENT

Hobart Condos 3 bedroom, hardwood floors, study area in basement. Cable telephone Internet access) in all bedrooms and study. NOW SHOWING for JUNE and SEPTEMBER. NO FEES. www.amherstlincolnrealty.com 253-7879

EMPLOYMENT

Winter/ Spring positions available. Earn up to $150 per day Exp not required. Undercover shoppers needed To Judge Retail and Dining Establishments. Call 800-722-4791

Rent us your ears! Listening Experiments $10/hr English must be your first language. Email: phonetics_lab@linguist.umass.edu voicemail: 545-6837

Become a summer orientation counselor and make a difference in the lives of over 4000 new students. Additional information and applications can be found at www.umass.edu/newstudent/contact/studentjobs/counselor The application deadline is February 16, 2007

EMPLOYMENT

Bartending $300/day potential. No experience necs. Training provided. 1-800-965-6520 ext.162

Cape Cod Summer Near Hyannis. $150/week. 508-428-3456 CapePhotoArt@aol.com

Raft Guide Training Zoar Outdoor is seeking applicants for full and part-time summer jobs for raft guides, rock climbing instructors and kayak instructors. Raft Guide training runs weekends in March. Applicants should have customer service experience and a positive attitude toward learning new skills. Application deadline:Feb. 15th. For more information call Zoar Outdoor at 800-532-7483 or www.zoaroutdoor.com/jobs.htm EOE.

EMPLOYMENT

SUMMER CAMP COUNSELOR ON CAMPUS INTERVEIWS FOR PREMIER GIRLS CAMP IN THE BERKSHIRES

Positions available for talented, energetic and spirited students who love working with kids. Live in a bunk and teach on of the following activities: All Tean Sports, Individual Sprots such as tennis & Golf, Waterfront & Pool Activities, Art, Dance, Theater, Gymnastics, Newspaper, Rocketry, Radio and more. Great Salaries, room, board and travel. Camp runs Jun16th – August 11th. Apply online now! www.campdanbee.com for further information: 1-800-392-3752, ginger@campdanbee.com Interveiwers will be on campus Thursday February 15th, at the "Summer, Co-Op and Internship Fair" in the Lincoln Campus Center, from 10am-3pm.

SERVICES

Pregnancy Testing, HIV Testing, Birth Control, and Emergency Contraception. STI Screening and Treatment. Affordable and confidential. Tapestry Health, 27 Pray Street, Amherst. 548-9992. www.tapestryhealth.com

Call Someone who really cares. Birthright of Amherst Area 549-1906, 1800-550-4900 24 hour hotline Free Pregnancy test 233 N. Pleasant St. Amherst www.birthright.org

ROOM FOR RENT

Room for rent in house minutes away from area colleges. $450 + Electric. Washer/Dryer. Call Ali 413-253-4929.

TRAVEL

Global Express Tours Spring Break Montreal Party Weekends from $99 Complete bus, hotels, & clubs. Montrealexpress.net 781-979-9001

Submit your classified advertisng online at www.daily collegian.com

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

SPORTS WEDNESDAY

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 7, 2007 SPORTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Second-half pace boosts UMass

Minutemen win big despite poor showings from Lasme, Freeman

By Rob Greenfield
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts men's basketball team (16-6, 6-2 Atlantic 10) escaped with a 72-56 victory Saturday against the lowly Richmond Spiders, who were 1-7 in conference and 5-16 overall coming into the matchup with the Minutemen.

UMass gave the Spiders some hope for a victory when it came out sluggish and went into halftime down 31-30. The Minutemen, however, came out with full-court pressure in the second half and forced the Spiders into a style of play unsuited for their personnel.

The Spiders are a disciplined bunch and use a lot of shot clock during offensive possessions, but they simply couldn't hang with UMass' athleticism and speed. The Minutemen upped the pace in the final 20 minutes and it paid off with an easy victory down the stretch.

UMass Basketball

Junior forward Gary Forbes recorded the second double-double of his career with 16 points and 16 rebounds, and sophomore point guard Chris Lowe – who has earned more minutes lately – tallied a career-best 19 points including 11-of-12 shooting from the free-throw line.

With Saturday's win, the Minutemen put up the most wins in a season since the 1999-00 campaign when UMass went 17-16.

Captains kept in check

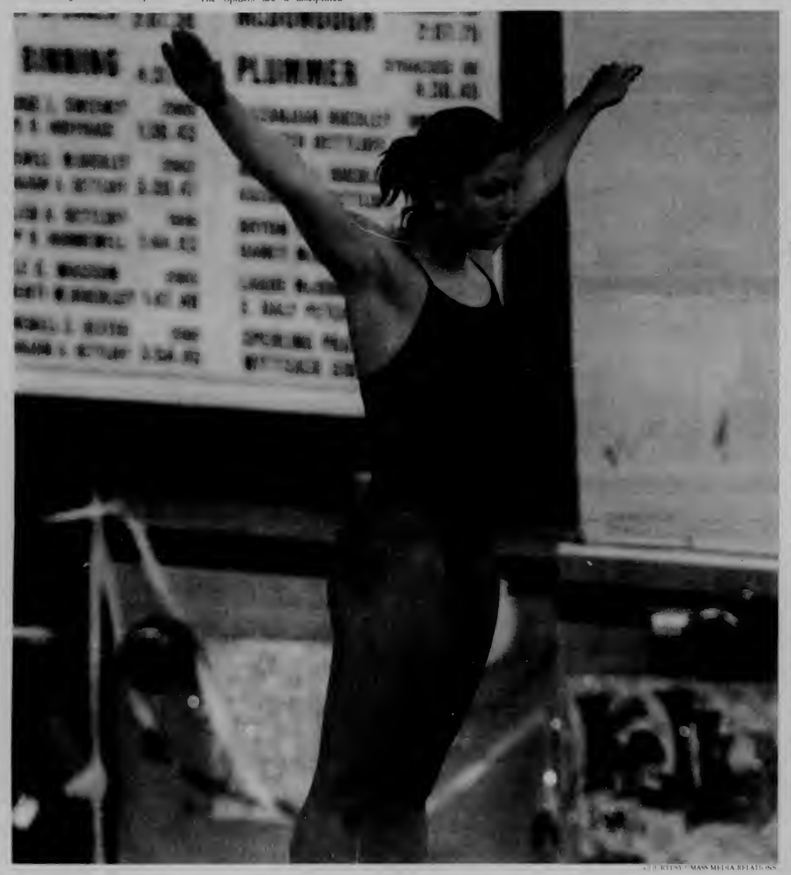
Senior captains Stephane Lasme and Rashaun Freeman were held down for the most part. Freeman finished with 13 points and eight boards while Lasme was nearly a non-factor with eight points, five rebounds and just one block.

Freeman has been stellar in his senior season. He leads the team in scoring with 17.1 points per game and 8.6 rebounds per game. But his accomplishments don't stop when the hardwood ends. Freeman was recently nominated for the 2007 Lowe's Senior CLASS (Celebrating Loyalty and Achievement for Staying in School) award, which is annually presented to for athletes who have stayed in school and excel outside of their respective athletic arenas.

Lasme is emerging as a game-changer on the defensive end. He leads the conference in shot-blocking with over five per game, which puts him second in the nation for Division 1 basketball.

The big man notched just one block on Saturday, putting him 20 blocks away from setting a new UMass single-season blocks record.

See M. BASKETBALL on page 9



Sophomore Karen Upperco was named UMass/Dinn Bros. Athlete of the Week for her performance over the weekend. She swept the one-meter and three-meter dives at Fordham on Saturday, qualifying her for the NCAA Zone A Regional Meet in both events.

Upperco dives into Regionals, earns honors

By Joe Meloni
Collegian Staff

It appears as though sophomore diver Karen Upperco's ascent toward her peak began at just the right time. Upperco received her third-career UMass/Dinn Brothers Athlete of the Week on the heels of sweeping both the one- and three-meter diving events this past weekend at Fordham.

UMass Swimming

"She was great over the weekend, I was really proud of her," UMass diving coach Mandy Hixon said. "She had really nice lift on both boards. I was just really proud of her."

At the Atlantic 10 Championships in Buffalo, N.Y., Upperco hopes to defend her title in both the one- and three-meter dives and capture another A-10 Most Outstanding Diver Award. After garnering the honor last season, Upperco became the fourth Minutewoman to win the award since UMass joined the A-10.

Upperco's performance at Fordham qualified her for the NCAA Zone A Regional Meet for the second consecutive season. Last year, she finished 22nd on the one-meter board and 29th in the three-meter event on the national stage.

Her honor marks the second-straight week that a UMass diver received recognition for an exemplary performance. Senior Melissa Pond won A-10 Performer of the Week after winning the three-meter diving event in her final home meet on Jan. 20.

Finding her stroke

Senior short-distance freestyle specialist Nicole LeBarge spent the fall 2006 semester studying abroad in Italy. When she returned from her sabbatical, women's coach Bob Newcomb lauded LeBarge for getting back to form quickly.

In her first meet back, LeBarge swam in three races – scoring six points for the Minutewomen in a loss to Boston College. After swimming the anchor leg in UMass' third-place finish in the 200-yard freestyle relay, she took second in the 50-yard freestyle and participated in the 400-yard freestyle relay.

At Fordham, she continued to progress. Her finishes were not as high as they were in the BC meet, but that can be chalked up to the fatigue associated with the training before the A-10 finals.

LeBarge pushed herself to catch up with the rest of her teammates when she arrived back in Amherst.

If the Minutewomen are to improve on their third-place finish at last year's A-10 Championship, they need contributions from all of their sprinters.

Last season, LeBarge finished third in the conference in the 50-yard freestyle with a time of 24.18 seconds. This was the third-fastest time in school history, but LeBarge will need to improve her time if she hopes to win her first individual A-10 crown.

Versatile veterans

UMass men's swimming coach Russ Yarworth preaches the value in recruiting swimmers who thrive in the individual medley to build versatility and galvanize his roster.

See SWIMMING AND DIVING on page 8

BU, BC return to Beanpot title game

Hockey East heavyweights to meet again before playoffs

By Michael King
Collegian Staff

There's a familiar sight in the men's Beanpot final – BC and BU. For two schools that hate each other, the Beanpot has served more often as a fourth regular season game than a competition between Boston's four major college hockey programs.

Last year, the rivals met six times on the ice: three times in the regular season, the Beanpot finale, the Hockey East Tournament championship game and the quarterfinals of the NCAA Tournament.

But the struggles of Northeastern and Harvard in Boston's famous college hockey tournament are well documented. The last victory for the Huskies was in 1988, with only four titles overall.

The situation is not much better for the Crimson, as they are winless since 1993. The ECAC11 member school has managed 10 titles in the 54 years of the competition.

Hockey East

In fact, Northeastern and Harvard have never even met in the final.

Even though BC and BU lay claim to 40 of the 54 tournament titles thus far, Boston University has dominated the tournament since its inception. The Terriers have 27 tournament titles, including 13 of the last 17.

The two schools will play next Monday at 8 p.m. to determine which of the two schools will be awarded the tournament trophy.

Harvard (9-13-1) and Northeastern (10-12-4, 7-10-4 Hockey East) will face off in the 5 p.m. consolation game to determine third place.

The No. 8 Terriers (13-5-8, 10-4-7 HEA) defeated Northeastern 4-0 in the first game, while the No. 15 Eagles (14-10-1, 11-8-1 HEA) beat Harvard 3-1 in the second.

Bishop Injured in Collision

A day after defeating No. 3 New Hampshire (20-5-1, 15-3-1 HEA), Maine (17-8-2, 10-8-1 HEA) goaltender Ben Bishop suffered an injury in a collision with a Wildcat player in the second game between the two schools.

The sophomore left the game in the fourth minute of the second period, after allowing zero goals on 17 shots. The injury Bishop sustained was later determined to be a right groin strain.

According to the Bangor Daily News, he is listed as questionable for this weekend's two home games with No. 14 Vermont (15-9-4, 10-5-4 HEA).

Bishop's replacement, freshman Dave Wilson, managed to hold the league-leading UNH offense to only two goals, but the No. 7 Black Bears still could not win the game.

Forwards Mike Radja and

See HOCKEY EAST on page 8

BU and BC will play once again for the Beanpot Championship. The Terriers have reached the final round of the tournament 13 straight years.

Senior Rush Hawkins has won three races this season. The former national champion led UMass to four straight team victories earlier this year.

Minutemen's win streak ends at four

By Justin McGrail
Collegian Correspondent

The Massachusetts men's and women's ski teams did not have the kind of weekend they wanted. The Minutemen were unable to keep their winning streak going, and the women had a hard time finding a rhythm.

Saturday's giant slalom was troublesome for the usually dominant Rush Hawkins. The senior finished, what UMass coach Skip Fox called an uncharacteristic eighth place with a time of 1:55.99. The next two Minutemen to finish were Andrew Hawes and Matt Small. Hawes remained steady with another top-15 finish and Small really stepped up.

See SKIING on page 9

MINUTEMEN HOST RHODE ISLAND | PAGE 14 'POLICE' TO ROCK GRAMMY'S | PAGE 6

THE MASSACHUSETTS

DAILY COLLEGIAN

NEW ENGLAND'S LARGEST COLLEGE DAILY EST 1890

CLOUDY : HI: 27 LO: 12 WWW.DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 8, 2007

Firefighters' safety potentially at risk

'Pass Alert' devices may be defective

By Loraine Burger
Collegian Staff

In the last decade, more than 1,000 firefighters were killed in the line of duty in an attempt to save American lives, not including the casualties due to the Sept 11 attacks, according to the NFPA Journal. Technology today has the world at our fingertips. So why can't we find a solution for saving our heroes?

The Personal Alert Safety System, or "Pass Alert," is a device designed to warn firefighters when one of their team members has stopped moving during an emergency. Investigations show this device may become defective when exposed to too much heat or water – two circumstances that are likely to happen in a fire.

The device is worn by each individual firefighter and is activated once he stops moving for 30 seconds. The motion sensor flashes and lets out piercing beeps loud enough for the rest of the crew to hear.

"We use the Pass device," said Keith Hoyle, Fire Chief of the Amherst Fire Department. "They turn themselves on automatically when we turn the air masks on."

In 2005, 87 firefighters were reportedly killed on duty during a fire emergency in the United States, according to the NFPA Journal. Fifty-four percent of these deaths were from over-exertion during an emergency, and another 25 percent were due to being struck by objects in the burning buildings. The rest of the casualties were due to falls or being trapped.

Federal investigative reports show that 15 firefighters have died since 1998 in cases where a Pass Alert was used but either didn't sound or was too quiet for rescuers to help in time. In 12 of the 15 cases, nothing was heard. In the other three cases, the beeping was muffled by the body of the firefighter covering the device.

"We have not had a firefighter go down before," said Hoyle, "So fortunately, we haven't had the need to use the device. The only disadvantages are that it is battery operated and we have false alarms where the device goes off because a fireman just happens to be standing still."

The Amherst Fire Department has designated one man in the station to check the batteries of each device daily to assure that they are all working properly. They have yet to experience any defects.

In May 2002, Rob Morrison, a firefighter from St. Louis, Missouri, was using a Pass alarm when he entered a burning building of a refrigerator company. Fellow firefighter Derek Martin went looking for Morrison after he had been missing for 20 minutes. Martin got lost, and both men died.

"I just can't believe that this was happening a number of times and no one was told about it," said widow Laura Morrison in an interview with MSNBC News. "I mean, Rob didn't know. None of the firemen knew."

See FIRE on page 4

Students help prevent warming

Web site gives tips on how to save energy

Melissa Toulouse
Collegian Staff

Global warming is not cooling off or slowing down.

That was the verdict the Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change (IPCC) expressed in the first 600 pages of its report released last Friday in Paris. While some national governments are devoting much time and money into finding ways to slow global warming, individuals can do their part by simply jumping on a bus.

With the recent frigid weather sweeping the northern states, global warming might be the last thing on the student's minds at the University of Massachusetts. However, in order to avert the grim forecast predicted for the planet, people need to get more involved.

What can students do?

"Anything that anybody does to conserve energy will have a positive effect," said Frank Kemig, manager of the Climate Research Center at UMass. "Anything that cuts the use of energy will cut the use of fossil fuel and therefore cut greenhouse gas emissions."

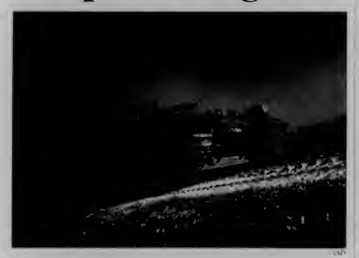
The Web site for the Union of Concerned Scientists offers some simple yet effective solutions to global warming.

It any student is looking to buy a car, pay special attention to the fuel economy. Finding a vehicle that has a good miles-per-gallon ratio is the single most effective step you can take towards reducing global warming.

See WARMING on page 4

Students are urged to conserve energy and help slow global warming by carpooling to campus, turning off lights when leaving rooms, and purchasing environmentally-friendly cars.

Lebanese and Israeli troops exchange fire



An Israeli armored personnel carrier pushes into southern Lebanon through the Israeli-Lebanese border, in 2006.

By Sam F. Ghattas
Associated Press

BEIRUT, Lebanon — Lebanese troops exchanged fire with Israeli forces across the border late Wednesday, for the first time since the summer war between Hezbollah and Israel, Lebanese and Israeli officials said.

The nighttime incident - sparked by an Israeli bulldozer crossing a fence - showed how tense the boundary remains nearly six months after a U.N.-brokered cease-fire ended 34 days of fighting. But the incident was not expected to undermine the overall truce.

Lebanese officials said their troops opened fire on an Israeli army bulldozer that had crossed the frontier near the border village of Maroun el-Rass, scene of heavy fighting in the summer.

The vehicle crossed the so-called Blue Line - the U.N.-demarcated boundary - and entered about 20 yards into Lebanon, Lebanese military officials said.

The officials, speaking on condition of anonymity pending the release of a formal army statement, said the army fired machine guns toward the bulldozer, drawing Israeli forces to return with five anti-tank grenades that targeted an army armored vehicle and a transport jeep.

There were no reports of injury on either side.

Israel confirmed the exchange - with security officials saying Israel's army returned fire with tanks and light weapons - but denied its troops had entered Lebanon.

The Israeli troops crossed the heavily guarded border fence, the Israeli army said, but remained south of the international border and within Israeli territory which stretches beyond the route of the fence.

The Israelis said the army was clearing land, searching for bombs near where explosive devices were planted by Hezbollah on Monday, under the cover of bad weather - meaning Hezbollah had violated the cease-fire. The truce accord also requires international peacekeepers to prevent new attacks on Israel.

Hezbollah has denied the allegation, saying the explosives were planted before the war.

U.N. peacekeepers in south Lebanon described the shootout as a "serious incident." Peacekeepers

See LEBANON on page 4

Brown announces newcomers for '07

UMass brings in 15 recruits for next season

By Rob Greenfield
Collegian Staff

Massachusetts football coach Don Brown got to work with some heavy-duty offseason recruiting after the Minutemen's 28-17 loss to Appalachian State in the Division I-AA National Championship game on Dec. 15, and just released the list of transfers and new recruits who will don the Maroon and White next fall.

Some of the more significant signings include Boston University transfer Ben Coblyn, who will play on the offensive line, Navy defensive back Jeromy Miles who recorded one solo tackle and two assisted tackles against the Minutemen on Sept. 9 – and quarterback Octavious Hawkins, a freshman from Hollywood, Fla.

The Minutemen had some gaping holes in the secondary with the graduation of James Ihedigbo and Brandon Smith, and Brown feels that Miles and community college transfer Chris Pollard can make significant contributions next season.

"Jeromy was interested in UMass and he had a great football experience at the Naval Academy," Brown said. "The military life was not something that he wanted to do. One thing led to another, he visited campus, loved it, and he's here.

"We're counting on [Pollard] and he's getting in the mix at safety. We really were thin at safety with the graduation of [Ihedigbo] and [Smith]."

The Minutemen lost several key offensive linemen, including Alex Miller and David Thompson, who started every game since their freshman year and helped running

See FOOTBALL on page 12

UMass football coach Don Brown has released the list of transfers and new recruits that will suit up for the Minutemen next season. Four of the players are currently enrolled at UMass.

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN
CXVII
ISSUE 79

113 Campus Center University of Massachusetts Amherst, MA 01003
• 413-545-3500 •
• Fax 413-545-3699 •
www.dailycollegian.com

EDITOR IN CHIEF Eric Athas
MANAGING EDITOR Rob Greenfield
BUSINESS MANAGER Dan Conti
PRODUCTION MANAGER Amanda Allen
NIGHT SUPERVISOR Sherd Wolsk
ADVERTISING MANAGER Jaimeson Porter
ADVERTISING PRODUCTION Molly Eggleston
ARTS & LIVING EDITOR Morgan Rousseau
COPIES EDITOR Adam Seagen
EDITORIAL EDITOR Tucker Merrick
NEWS EDITOR Matt Belliveau
SPORTS EDITOR Danny Picard
SPORTS EDITOR Jon Pelland
CIRCULATION MANAGER Jeff Pentz
FINANCE MANAGER David Valade
ASSISTANT OPERATIONS Linda Wallack
ASSISTANT ADVERTISING Nicole Paddester
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Tim McCall
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Alex Butler
ASSISTANT NEWS Anna Dolunitis
ASSISTANT NEWS Nicole Boonjakuakul
ASSISTANT EDITORIAL Brendan Hall
WEB EDITOR James Hale
PHOTO EDITOR Toan Trinh

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN IS PUBLISHED MONDAY THROUGH FRIDAY DURING THE UNIVERSITY OF MASSACHUSETTS CALENDAR SEMESTER. THE COLLEGIAN IS INDEPENDENTLY FUNDED, OPERATING ON ADVERTISING REVENUE. FOUNDED IN 1890, THE PAPER BEGAN AS A RURAL LIFE, BECAME THE COLLEGE SCRAWL IN 1907, THE WEEKLY COLLEGIAN IN 1914 AND THE TRI-WEEKLY COLLEGIAN IN 1956. PUBLISHED DAILY SINCE 1967, THE COLLEGIAN HAS BEEN BROADSHEET SINCE JANUARY 1994. FOR ADVERTISING RATES AND INFORMATION, CALL AMHERST'S BETWEEN 8:30 A.M. AND 3:30 P.M.

PRODUCTION CREW
On staff today

NIGHT EDITOR
Rob Greenfield

COPY EDITOR
Nicole Boonjakuakul

PRODUCTION SUPERVISOR
Chris Martin

Wal-Mart and unions plan to unveil universal healthcare goal

Wal-Mart and three other large U.S. employers are working together to provide universal healthcare coverage for all Americans and to boost the value of U.S. money spent on healthcare.

BY DAN CATERINICCHIA
ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON — Executives from Wal-Mart and three other large U.S. employers on Wednesday joined union leaders in calling for "quality, affordable" health care for every American by 2012.

However, they did not propose any specific policies to achieve this goal, or commit to spending any extra money in the near-term to provide health coverage to more workers.

Joining Wal-Mart Stores Inc CEO Lee Scott and Service Employees International Union leader Andrew Stern at a Washington press conference were top executives from Intel Corp., AT&T Inc. and Kelly Services Inc., a temporary staffing agency. Yet some critics of Wal-Mart's health care policy remained unsatisfied.

"2012 is a still long way away. What about now?" said Dana Rezaie, a widow with three children who works nights stocking shelves at a Wal-Mart store in Fridley, Minn.

The partnership of business and union leaders laid out four main goals, including universal healthcare coverage for all Americans and boosting the value of every U.S. dollar spent on health care. The business and union leaders' coalition, dubbed "Better Health Care Together," pledged to convene a national summit by the end of May to recruit others from the private sector, labor, government and non-profits.

"Government alone won't and can't solve this crisis," Scott said. "By following this campaign's common sense principles, we believe America can have high quality, affordable and accessible health care by 2012."

But Scott and others did not provide a detailed plan. In response to a reporter's question, Scott said Wal-Mart is not committed to spending more on health care or making any immediate promises to provide health coverage to more workers.

The business executives did say that any universal coverage in the U.S. must be flexible enough to give consumers choices about their coverage, unlike plans in some foreign nations.

Stern said the SEIU would continue to fund its Wal-Mart Watch campaign, which as recently as last month said Wal-Mart's health plans were a raw deal for employees. Stern said he expects to be criticized for teaming up with Wal-Mart, but that he felt it was in the best interest of workers who lack coverage, and their families.

Stern said he and Scott first met face-to-face to discuss the partnership "around the holidays."

Joseph T. Hansen, president of the United Food and Commercial Workers union, was critical of other union leaders for teaming up with Wal-Mart.

"It's not appropriate to take the stage with a company that refuses to remedy its mistreatment of workers," Hansen said in a prepared statement. The union he represents funds the Wake UpWalMart campaign, which challenged the company to immediately provide health care to all of its uninsured employees and their families.

The Bentonville, Ark.-based company, which employs more than 1.3 million U.S. workers, has made several changes to its health care policy since 2005, including lowering premiums and shortening eligibility periods.

Yet Scott said Wednesday he would not withhold financial support from lawmakers and candidates who oppose universal health care. Wake UpWalMart spokesman Chris Kofinis called that stance "hypocritical," pointing out that Scott blamed politics as the main reason the nation lacked universal health care.

"Anybody can say they support something. They need to show they really do," said Rezaie, a six-year Wal-Mart employee who says she cannot afford the company's existing health plan and instead relies on state-funded care. Wake UpWalMart supplied Rezaie's name to The Associated Press.

Amherst Police Log

Tuesday, Feb. 6

10:38 a.m.

A woman reported a larceny at the Bank of America on South Pleasant Street. She stated that she had made out a check for $400 at the bank and later discovered that it had been cashed elsewhere. Bank of America responded to say that the check was neither cashed nor deposited.

3:42 p.m.

A 2000 Nissan Maxima struck a stopped 1991 Volvo 744 at a red light on East Pleasant Street. According to the driver of the hit vehicle, the Maxima collided with the stopped car and did not stop. There was no visible damage to the vehicle except for the side mirror which was pushed in.

5:39 p.m.

William Gosnell, 45, of Ball Lane, was summoned due to animal cruelty. Gosnell called emergency services after he had strangled his pet rabbit, put it back into its cage, and threw it in the dumpster. He claimed to report himself because he did not want the embarrassment of being taken away from his house unexpectedly.

6:05 p.m.

A male party reported a larceny when he realized that several changes were made to his bank account. The changes were made in New Mexico from January 17-19.

9:27 p.m.

A woman reported to police that her daughter had been missing for over four hours. The missing party was last seen at 4:00 p.m. in her 2006 Toyota Highlander, but because of the party's age, a missing person's report was not able to be filed.

– Compiled by Holly Seabury.

Harvard proposes curriculum overhaul

CAMBRIDGE, Mass. Harvard University on Wednesday proposed a curriculum overhaul to emphasize sciences, religious beliefs, and world cultures, according to a faculty committee final report.

The recommendations come after years of internal debate over what courses should be required of all Harvard students. The current core curriculum at the nation's oldest college has been criticized for focusing on narrow academic questions rather than real-world issues.

The final report calls for Harvard to require students to take a course in "culture and belief," to introduce students to religion and ideas.

The report calls for mandatory studies in seven areas, including analytical reasoning, ethical reasoning, physical sciences and related engineering, world societies and "United States in the World" to help students connect to societies elsewhere.

"It is Harvard's mission to help students to lead flourishing and productive lives by providing a general education curriculum that is responsive to the conditions of the 21st century," the faculty committee said in a statement.

The recommendations are the latest chapter in a lengthy saga over revamping the university's core curriculum, which dates to the 1970s. Former President Lawrence Summers made reform a priority in 2001, but the work of several committees bogged down and initial recommendations were criticized as weak. Summers resigned last year, forced out by faculty anger over his remarks that gender difference might in part explain a lack of women in the top science jobs, but also over his handling of other matters, including the curriculum review.

Harvard President Derek Bok said in a statement Wednesday that committee members did "an excellent job of listening to their colleagues and crafting a thoughtful and coherent structure to further the aims of a strong undergraduate education."

The report was distributed to the faculty on Wednesday. The recommendations would be adopted after a vote by Harvard's Faculty of Arts and Sciences, which meets Feb. 13.

– Associated Press

WHERE IMAGINATION MEETS INNOVATION

UMass Amherst Fine Arts Center Series Spring 2007

DBR & THE MISSION
Thursday, February 15 at 7:30 PM
Bowker Auditorium
Seamlessly blending funk, rock, hip-hop and classical music, DBR & THE MISSION is a revolutionary blend of an amplified string quartet, DJ keyboards, bass, drums and laptops. DBR is a classical-urban ambassador for the iPod generation.

Sponsored by The Advocate, Juster Pope Frazier Architects
Funded in part by the Expeditions program of the New England Foundation for the Arts

Natalie MacMaster
Wednesday, February 28 at 7:30 PM
Concert Hall
Natalie MacMaster is one of Canada's biggest stars and a fiddling, singing, and step-dancing fireball on stage. She never fails to bring down the house.

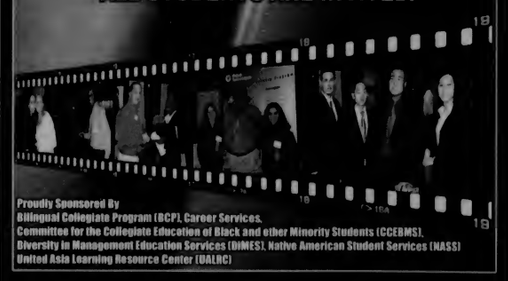
Sponsored by The Recorder, Valley KIDS

Joffrey Ballet
Monday, March 5 at 7:30 PM
Concert Hall
For pure breathtaking beauty of the otherworldly sort, Joffrey is unmistakable. The company will perform Les Presages, Deuce Coupe, and The Green Table, one of the most powerful and important anti-war statements ever created for the stage.

Sponsored by Easthampton Savings Bank, Realty World Sawicki, 88.5 WFCR

TICKETS ARE ON SALE NOW!
TICKETS ARE $25 $5 $10 $15 FOR FIVE COLLEGE STUDENTS
UMass Amherst FINE ARTS CENTER
CALL 545-2511 OR 1-800-999-UMAS WWW.FINEARTSCENTER.COM

ALANA Career Fair
Co-op/Internship Opportunities
Networking
Summer/Permanent Employment
Wednesday, February 14, 2007
Campus Center Auditorium
5:00PM - 7:00PM
ALL STUDENTS ARE INVITED!



Proudly Sponsored By
Bilingual Collegiate Program (BCP), Career Services,
Committee for the Collegiate Education of Black and other Minority Students (CCEBMS),
Diversity in Management Education Services (DIMES), Native American Student Services (NASS)
United Asia Learning Resource Center (UALRC)

FDA approves non-prescription diet pill

The Food and Drug Administration said the prescription weight-loss pill Orlistat can be sold in a reduced-strength version over the counter.

BY RANDOLPH E. SCHMID
ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON — Dieters got a new tool Wednesday to help them take off the extra pounds — the first government-approved nonprescription diet pill.

The Food and Drug Administration said the fat-blocking weight-loss pill orlistat, which has been available by prescription, can be sold in a reduced-strength version over the counter.

The new version will be sold as "alli" by GlaxoSmithKline PLC. Xenical, the prescription version, is made by Roche Holding AG.

The drug is intended for people 18 and older to use along with a reduced-calorie, low-fat diet and exercise.

Dr. Charles Ganley, FDA's director of nonprescription products, stressed that the drug is intended for use along with diet and exercise programs.

"Using this drug alone is unlikely to be beneficial," Ganley said at a telebriefing.

While some dietary supplements make weight-loss claims, Ganley said this is the first nonprescription drug approved by the agency for that purpose.

Ganley said in trials, for every five pounds people lost through diet and exercise, those using orlistat lost an additional two to three pounds.

When taken with meals, orlistat blocks the absorption of about one-quarter of any fat consumed. That fat – about 150 to 200 calories worth – is passed out of the body in stools, which can be loose as a result. About half of patients in trials experienced gastrointestinal side effects.

The agency recommended users take a multivitamin when using this drug.

The new drug would contain half the dose of Xenical prescription capsules. The price has not been set but is expected to run $1 to $2 a day, company officials said. The company estimated 5 million to 6 million Americans a year would buy the drug over the counter.

The Food and Drug Administration said the most common side effect of the product is a change in bowel habits including loose stool and some oily spotting. Eating a low-fat diet will reduce the likelihood of this side effect.

FDA said people who have had organ transplants should not take OTC orlistat because of possible drug interactions. In addition, anyone taking blood-thinning medicines or being treated for diabetes or thyroid disease should consult a physician before using orlistat, the agency said.

U.S. helicopter crashes in Baghdad, 7 killed in wreck

A U.S. marine CH-46 Sea Knight helicopter crashed in a field North of Baghdad, yesterday.

BY ROBERT H. REID
ASSOCIATED PRESS

BAGHDAD, Iraq — A U.S. Marine transport helicopter crashed in flames Wednesday in a field northwest of Baghdad, killing all seven people aboard, the U.S. military said. It was the fifth U.S. aircraft lost in less than three weeks and the latest sign of growing problems with aviation in Iraq.

A U.S. military statement gave no reason for the crash of the CH-46 Sea Knight, which went down near Fallujah in Anbar province, about 20 miles from Baghdad. However, at the Pentagon, three Marine Corps officials said the troop-transport helicopter was in flames when it went down, with the pilot appearing to attempt a hasty landing but losing control as the aircraft descended.

They said witnesses in nearby Marine aircraft saw the flames but saw no sign that it involved hostile fire.

An Iraqi air force officer, however, said the helicopter was downed by an anti-aircraft missile. He spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to release information.

An Iraqi farmer who lives about a half mile from the crash site said he heard a missile fired moments before the crash, which took place in an insurgent-infested region.

"The helicopter was flying and passed over us, then we heard the firing of a missile," the farmer, Mohammed al-Janabi, said. "The helicopter then turned into a ball of fire. It flew in a circle twice and then went down."

Associated Press Television video showed the flaming wreckage lying in a field in front of a cluster of mud homes. A dense plume of black smoke rose over the remains. The Marine officials suspected the fire was caused by a mechanical problem, the officials said. They spoke on condition of anonymity because the investigation was ongoing.

In a statement posted on an extremist Web site, an al-Qaida-linked group, the Islamic State in Iraq, claimed it shot down the helicopter, which it described as a CH-hook — an Army helicopter which resembles a Sea Knight.

Critics have long urged the mili-

See HELICOPTER on page 4

Schools fight for homosexuality discussion

BY DENISE LAVOIE
ASSOCIATED PRESS

BOSTON — Officials from a suburban school district asked a federal judge Wednesday to dismiss a lawsuit filed by two couples who claim their parental rights were violated when homosexuality was discussed in their children's classrooms.

U.S. District Judge Mark Wolf did not immediately issue a decision in the case from Lexington, but peppered lawyers on both sides with questions and said he understood the importance of the case to both parents and school administrators.

Tonia and David Parker sued after their 5-year-old son brought home a book from kindergarten that depicted a gay family. David Parker was later arrested for refusing to leave his son's school after officials would not agree to notify him when homosexuality was discussed in his son's class.

Another Lexington couple, Joseph and Robin Wirthlin, joined the Parkers in the suit after a second-grade teacher read "King and King" to her class. The fairy tale tells the story of two princes falling in love.

Both couples claim Lexington school officials violated their parental rights to teach their own morals to their children.

The case has attracted a great deal of attention in Massachusetts, the only U.S. state that allows same-sex marriage.

John Davis, an attorney for Lexington school officials, argued in court Wednesday that teaching diversity is a "legitimate state interest." He said that it would be "an administrative nightmare" for schools in Massachusetts to try to predict when the topic of gay marriage will come up and to inform parents ahead of time.

"The parents do have rights ... but they don't have the right to dictate to the public school system what their children can be exposed to in the way of ideas," Davis said.

Robert Sinsheimer, an attorney for the parents who filed the lawsuit, called the homosexual discussions and materials "a form of propaganda" that goes against the parents' religious beliefs. He said the parents do not want to dictate curriculum, but do want to be able to remove their young children from classrooms when homosexuality or gay marriage is being discussed.

"What they fear is that their children are being brainwashed," he said.

About 30 people on both sides of the issue demonstrated outside the courthouse.

Annie McQuilken, a Lexington parent who held a sign that read, "We Support ALL Our Families," said she wants the schools to be able to teach children about all different types of families.

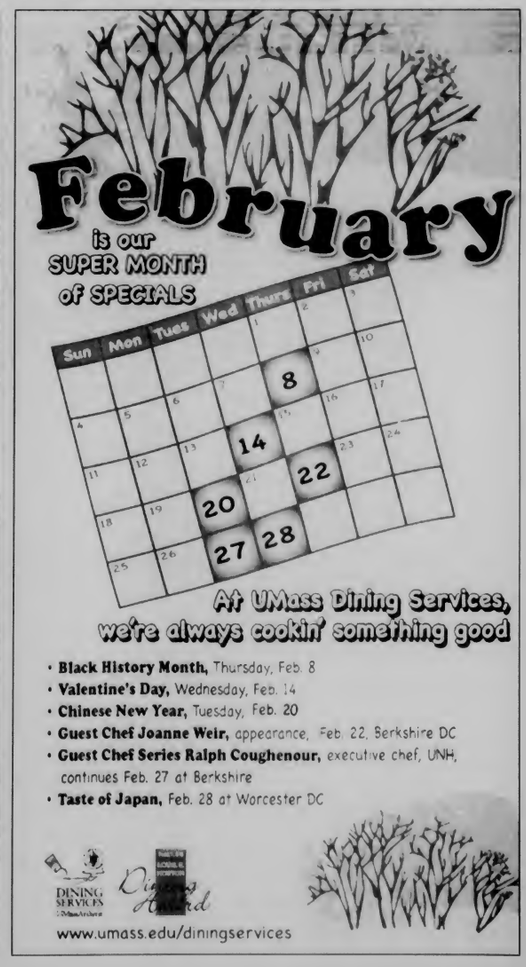
"Discussing families is one of the things that goes on in the classroom, and we shouldn't single out a particular type of family for exclusion," she said.

After the hearing, David Parker said he does not want to limit the school system's curriculum, but does want to be told ahead of time when homosexuality is going to be discussed.

"When the teacher puts it forward, it becomes the gospel according to the teacher," he said. "The children are so young – they can't reflect on that idea. They're too young to put it in context."

In Massachusetts, like most of the nation, there is no official education policy on when or how to discuss homosexuality in the classroom. State guidelines say only that teachers should define the different sexual orientations by the fifth grade; it is up to each school district to decide how to do that.

An "opt out" provision in state law requires parental notification and the chance to remove their kids from the classroom if the curriculum "primarily involves human sexual education or human sexuality issues."



February
is our SUPER MONTH
of SPECIALS
Sun Mon Tues Wed Thurs Fri Sat
At UMass Dining Services,
we're always cookin' something good
• Black History Month, Thursday, Feb. 8
• Valentine's Day, Wednesday, Feb. 14
• Chinese New Year, Tuesday, Feb. 20
• Guest Chef Joanne Weir, appearance, Feb. 22, Berkshire DC
• Guest Chef Series Ralph Coughenour, executive chef, UNH, continues Feb. 27 at Berkshire
• Taste of Japan, Feb. 28 at Worcester DC
DINING SERVICES
Dining Around
www.umass.edu/diningservices

UMass offers solutions to conserve energy

WARMING from page 1

According to the Web site for the Union of Concerned scientists, "For each gallon of gas you burn, 20 pounds of heat-trapping CO2 is released into the atmosphere." Better gas mileage not only means a decrease of global warming causing gases, but also an increase in the amount of money saved at the pump over the life of the vehicle.

Cars with hybrid engines that can be charged like a cell phone are another environment-friendly option.

The University is now offering discounted parking permits for "clean" vehicles, such as hybrids and alternative fuel vehicles.

If buying a new car isn't in the foreseeable future, make good use of the one you have. Get a carpool together to get to and from school.

The University offers the UMass RideShare program, which helps match students and employees living off-campus with other carpoolers with similar routes and schedules. Services are free and participants receive other benefits as well, such as the Guaranteed Ride Home service, if you miss your carpool because of an emergency, as well as a certain number of free one-day parking permits, if you occasionally need to drive in alone.

Students can also take buses to and from school and to get around town.

"Transportation and manufacturing are two of the biggest culprits when it comes to global warming," Keimig said. "One of the simplest ways to help is by using public transportation as opposed to private cars."

The University provides bus transportation free of charge to Five College students, faculty, and staff. The UMass Transit buses operate between the Five Colleges as well as the towns of Amherst, Belchertown, Deerfield, Granby, Hadley, North Hampton, South Hadley and Sunderland.

Taking a bus is an easy solution to the global warming problem, but another solution is as easy as flipping a switch. Keimig points out that, "... even though it seems small, things as simple as shutting off lights can make a difference."

The Power plants that light our homes, dorm rooms and classrooms are the single largest source of CO2 in the United States, according to the Web site for the Union of Concerned Scientists.

Save electricity and turn off the lights when they're not in use.

Students can also replace conventional light bulbs with the more energy efficient compact fluorescents. These light bulbs use less energy and last longer than regular light bulbs.

It doesn't take much to make a difference when it comes to global warming. Next time you want to go into town, try taking the bus, and don't forget to turn off the light.

Shots fired across Israel–Lebanon line

Shots were fired from Lebanon at Israeli troops across the border in Israel, yesterday, causing no injuries.

LEBANON from page 1

contacted both sides, "urging them to cease hostilities with immediate effect," said Liam McDowell, a spokesman for the force.

It was the first time cross-border shooting erupted since shortly after a ceasefire on Aug. 14 ended the fighting between Israeli forces and the Lebanese Hezbollah militants, and after Israeli troops withdrew to their side of the border in September.

A clash involving an Israel's commando raid on the Bekaa Valley town of Boudai deep inside Lebanon occurred five days after the ceasefire and left an Israeli officer killed. Israel said that was an attempt to interdict Hezbollah weapons shipments.

Manufacturers will not recall faulty devices

FIRE from page 1

In April 2005, the Center for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC) finally took action and demanded higher standards for testing Pass alarms, says Bill Dedman, investigative reporter for MSNBC.

The National Institute of Standards and Technology ran tests in a convection oven that proved the beeping of certain models of Pass diminished in temperatures as low as 300 degrees Fahrenheit, a temperature firefighters encounter without even being in the same room as the fire.

Manufacturers say it will be months before an improved device is on the market, and with no plan to recall the defective alerts, it's up to each individual fire department to replace them, costing about $200 a piece. Until then, firefighters have no choice but to trust these alarms as their last line of defense and hope the new devices will be a success.

Loraine Burger is a Collegian staff writer. She can be reached at lburger@student.umass.edu

Federal investigative reports show that 15 firefighters have died since 1998 in cases where a 'Pass Alert' was used but either didn't sound or was too quiet for rescuers to help in time.

Man accused of riding ski lift nude

Blame global warming. An Albany, N.Y., man is accused of riding nude in a gondola at Stratton Mountain Resort on Dec. 15.

William N. Barrett III, 46, pleaded not guilty to felony lewd and lascivious conduct and misdemeanor marijuana possession Tuesday in Vermont District Court.

A witness reported to lift attendants that Barrett was nude and touching himself inappropriately while riding the lift.

Barrett, who was fully clothed when he reached the bottom of the hill, denied being nude. He told police he had taken off his jacket and shirt because of the nice weather.

He also was charged with marijuana possession. Police found a glass pipe and film canister containing marijuana in his pocket when they arrested him, authorities said.

Associated Press

Doctor halts practice in probe of girl's overdose death

BOSTON — The psychatrist who prescribed medication used in the overdosing death of a 4-year-old girl agreed Wednesday, to stop practicing medicine until the case is resolved.

Michael Riley, 34, and his wife, Carolyn Riley, 32, are charged with first-degree murder for what prosecutors call an "intentional overdose" of their daughter Rebecca.

The husband and wife pleaded not guilty Tuesday, and their lawyers said the couple was only following doctor's orders in the medications they gave their daughter.

Dr. Kayoko Kifuji's voluntary agreement not to practice was accepted Wednesday by the state Board of Registration in Medicine. She can't practice medicine again until approved by the board.

Kifuji's attorney, J.W. Carney, told reporters that his client did nothing wrong and is cooperating with investigators.

"She absolutely did not over-prescribe and her medical records will back that up 100 percent," Carney said. "The dosage was appropriate. The drug was appropriate and the monitoring was appropriate."

Plymouth County District Attorney Timothy J. Cruz said Rebecca suffered congestive heart failure as a result of overdosing.

In December, police officers responded to the couple's former home in Hull where they found Rebecca Riley dead on the floor in the master bedroom.

An autopsy found the cause of death as a lethal combination of several prescriptions drugs, including a fatal dose of Clonidine, which Rebecca Riley had been taking for attention deficit hyperactivity disorder, the district attorney's office said.

The coroner's report also found Valproic Acid, also known as Depakote, Dextromethorphan, a cough suppressant in over-the-counter medicines, and the antihistamine Chlorpheniramine in Rebecca Riley's system.

She also had been prescribed medication to treat bipolar disorder, Cruz's office said. The girl was diagnosed with attention deficit hyperactivity disorder and bipolar disorder when she was 2 years old.

Kifuji is certified in pediatrics and psychiatry, specializing in child and adolescent psychiatry, and has been licensed to practice in Massachusetts since 1999, the board said. She is a 1981 graduate of Tokyo Women's Medical College.

Kifuji was put on paid leave from Tufts-New England Medical Center.

On Beacon Hill, the chairman of the Joint Committee on Public Health said Wednesday he'll hold an oversight hearing to examine the practice of prescribing medication to children. Rep. Peter Koutoujian, D-Waltham, said he'll seek legislative measures to better protect children.

Associated Press

NYC driver returns diamonds

BY VERENA DOBNIK
ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEW YORK — Never mind diamonds. A New York cabbie was a Texas girl's best friend. The driver returned 31 diamond rings he found in his cab after dropping off the passenger, who had left him with a 30-cent tip on a $10.70 fare.

"All my life, I tried to be honest," said Osman Chowdhury, a native of Bangladesh. "Today is no different."

But the 41-year-old cabbie from Queens did have a message: "I'm proud of what I did so that people know New York taxi drivers are honest."

What he did started on Monday evening, when he picked up the woman at a hotel in midtown Manhattan and drove her to an apartment building several blocks away. She gave him $20 to pay the fare and asked for $9 back.

Hours later, at about 10 p.m., three other passengers with luggage discovered the woman's suitcase when Chowdhury popped the trunk open for them.

Chowdhury first drove to the building where he had dropped off the woman. But he had no idea in which of the many apartments she might be and didn't want to cause a disruption by knocking on doors.

He took the suitcase to the Manhattan headquarters of the New York Taxi Workers Alliance, a drivers' advocacy group to which he belongs. He and the alliance president looked inside and found two display cases with 31 diamond rings inside."I was shocked. I was trembling."

Cause of crash in Iraq unknown

HELICOPTER from page 3

tary to replace the CH-46, which was introduced in 1964 at the start of the Vietnam War. In 2001, retired Col. Frank Jensen wrote in Defense News that the Marines should replace the CH-46 but cannot because of budget limitations.

Regardless of the cause, the latest crash adds urgency to a U.S. military review of flight operations in Iraq, including whether insurgents have perfected skills in attacking U.S. planes.

The latest crash occurred five days after a U.S. Army Apache helicopter went down in a hail of gunfire north of Baghdad. Three other helicopters – two from the Army and one operated by an American security firm – also have crashed since Jan. 20. A total of 20 Americans were killed in those four crashes.

The military did not say whether all seven killed in Wednesday's crash were Americans, but it was likely that they were.

The first four aircraft that crashed were all believed to have been shot down, the military has said, raising new questions about whether Iraqi extremists are using more sophisticated weapons or whether U.S. tactics need changing.

Any fresh threat to aviation would present serious problems for U.S. commanders as they launch the new security crackdown in Baghdad.

The U.S. military relies heavily on helicopters in Iraq, not only for supporting ground forces in combat but also to move troops and equipment by air to avoid roadside bombs and insurgent ambushes.

At night, U.S. attack helicopters prowl the darkened skies over Baghdad and other cities, using night-vision equipment to hunt for insurgents and militiamen planting roadside bombs or setting up firing positions.

Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, has acknowledged that insurgent ground fire in Iraq has been increasingly effective.

"I do not know whether or not it is the law of averages that caught up with us or if there's been a change in tactics, techniques and procedures on the part of the enemy," Pace told a Senate committee Tuesday.

In December, a spokesman for Saddam Hussein's ousted Baath party, Khudair al-Murshidi, told The Associated Press in Damascus, Syria, that Sunni insurgents had received new stocks of shoulder-fired anti-aircraft missiles and "we are going to surprise them."

Tired of the Dorms?

IT'S NEVER TOO EARLY TO LOOK FOR AN APARTMENT WITH LINCOLN REAL ESTATE

Lincoln Real Estate

25 N. Pleasant St.
253-7879
www.amherstlincolnrealty.com
Now accepting applications for June 2006

CANCUN, ACAPULCO, NEGRIL, MOBAY, NASSAU, S. PADRE, FLORIDA, CRUISES AND MORE!

Join the Party!!!

SPRING BREAK 2007

STUDENT TRAVEL SERVICES

STS Flight Finder™
Save Hundreds on Spring Break Packages!!! Search airfares to Mexico and the Caribbean and save up to $300 per person. Best Deals Guaranteed!

1.800.648.4849
www.ststravel.com

HAMPSHIRE FITNESS club

90 Gatehouse Rd. (At Echo Hill)
Amherst • 256-6446
Off Rte. 9, two miles east of Amherst College
OPEN 6AM-10AM MON-FRI
8AM-9PM SAT & SUN

★Swimming ★Tennis
★Basketball ★Fitness

COMPETITIVE BASKETBALL GAMES w/JERRY Mon/Thurs 6-8pm
OVER 30 FREE CLASSES WEEKLY

HAMPFIT.COM for Rates & Info

Join Now
Winter Special
$188/ 15 Weeks
Student Rate
EFT available

If You've Got a Plan We've Got a Van!
Insurance Replacement Rates
FREE PICK-UP

POTTER'S AUTO & TRUCK RENTAL
• Direct Billing to Insurance Company
• Locally Owned & Operated
• 7 & 15 Passenger Vans
• UMass Purchase Orders, MHEC Rates

Potter's Collision Repair
at North Amherst Motors
78 Sunderland Rd., North Amherst, MA
(413) 549-RENT (7368)
www.pottersauto.com
(One mile North at UMass - on bus route)
Collision Repair & Glass Replacement

Want to write for The Daily Collegian?
come to the newsroom, located in the campus center basement

Cut out this ad receive your FREE $10 gift card!
$10 Gift Card
•Limit one• coupon per customer
•Offer• Expires 02/28/07

Student Special
4 MONTHS
$149
· Aerobics · Mixed
· Free wts · Martial Arts
www.amherstathletic.com
AMHERST ATHLETIC CLUB 256-0900 90 AMHERST

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

EDITORIAL OPINION

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 8, 2007

"I may not agree with what you say but I will defend to the death your right to say it" Voltaire

EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Create more co-ed housing

Kaitlyn Silva

Finding the right roommate is never an easy task. Freshman year, students usually end up living with a complete stranger or someone they'd met during their three-day orientation weekend. Sometimes this relationship works out. The two students learn to tolerate each other, find common ground and in some cases, become friends for life.

However, there are many other instances in which the roommate situation blows up in a student's face. Some roommates are just too different to live comfortably together, and some just flat-out hate each other. No one could have predicted the horrible outcome so nobody is to blame, but that still doesn't help the students who find themselves stuck in housing hell.

Even if a student moves to a different room or a different area on campus, it doesn't necessarily mean that they'll enjoy that housing situation any more. Can't find a friend who has extra space? Can't arrange a room swap? Well then, to put it simply, this student is screwed. But what if there were more options?

If even only a small percentage of students feel more comfortable with the opposite sex for their own various reasons, the university should offer co–ed housing options to these students.

The National Student Genderblind Campaign has started a campaign to get college campuses in the United States to offer gender neutral housing and bathroom options. Such options have been opened up to students at universities such as Stanford and Clark, while initiatives to get these options have begun at Harvard, Dartmouth, and William and Mary.

While the mere thought of gender neutral housing may be uncomfortable for some students, it may be the best option for others. UMass does have certain programs which advocate these types of equality, such as the 2 in 20 program designed for the GLBT community and their allies, as well as a few gender neutral bathrooms around campus. But outside of these premises, the students aren't given many options.

The North Apartments have the housing options that rank closest to genderblind housing. Because they would be assigned separate rooms, North allows students of the opposite sex to share an apartment. As long as a male and a female don't share a room, living together doesn't seem to be an issue to the Housing office.

However, in every other housing area where two students share one room, gender neutral housing is not even offered. The same-sex policy is both unfair and insulting to the student body. If even only a small percentage of students feel more comfortable with the opposite sex for their own for various reasons, the university should offer co-ed housing options to these students.

It's easy to think that gender neutral housing options would simply lead to "couples housing" on campus, but the students need to be given more credit than that. Most of us are mature enough to realize that living with a significant other is not always the best option. Still, a couple of any sexual orientation residing together probably has no worse odds of disaster than two complete strangers shacked up in a dorm. As of right now, couples who really want to live together are moving off campus in order to do so. While they get around the administration's policies, they lose the convenience of campus life.

More than anything, it's not about couples, it's about friends. Should the strength and sustainability of friendship in a living situation be based on biological sex? No. If a male and a female mutually agreed to share a room because they were more at ease with each other than with a member of the same sex, they should be allowed to live together.

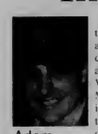
It seems as if the Housing Office believes that it is impossible for members of the opposite sex to live together in a non-sexual situation. Rather than insulting our maturity and intelligence in such a way, the university needs to take personal preferences and circumstances into account.

Gender neutral options may not be for everyone. In fact, they probably aren't preferable for most students. However, for whatever number of students that would feel more comfortable in situations where their biological gender is not taken into account, these options should be offered. It should not be a change to mandatory or random co-ed housing across campus, but the options need to be there.

Students pay a hefty price to live on campus. If students feel trapped in a same-sex room, they should at least have the option of living comfortably.

Kaitlyn Silva can be reached at ksilva@student.umass.edu

In response to Gargano



Adam McGillen

More often than not, when a UMass student receives an e-mail from Vice Chancellor Mike Gargano, it goes straight to the virtual circular file. During the first week of classes, that familiar chime came from my computer to tell me that I had a new message. I saw the UMass heading and knew my boy Gargano had struck again, this time with sidekick Charlena Seymour, Provost and Senior Vice Chancellor of Academic Affairs.

Instead of just ignoring the e-mail, I decided to read this one and found myself puzzled. My degree compromised? My money wasted? The possibility of me having a future career scratched? The seniors who graduate this semester destined for nothing but homeless vagrancy?

The value of our degrees is not determined by the senseless acts of others. Any degree with the name "Isenberg" on it will certainly hold its weight on any management application.

This seemed to be an onslaught of scare tactics specifically designed to target the college student wearily moving towards the edge of the dock, readying his or her self to dive into the real world.

Don't get me wrong though: there is some truth to Mike Gargano and Charlena Seymour's argument. Rioting is stupid, childish and a rampant problem for this campus. Without a doubt, some things need to be changed to defer the mob mentality that seems to overtake Southwest whenever a sporting event doesn't go our way. My problem with the e-mail sent out by Gargano and Seymour is that it takes the wrong angle to resolving the problem. If anything, telling students that their degrees are losing value could very well incite a riot.

The University has done a good job tracking down students who were involved in the riot. Arrests were made, some students were expelled, others suspended or otherwise punished. The fact of the matter is, for those students who are being prosecuted, it is their degrees that are compromised (or erased altogether), their records that are now marred because of their foolish behavior, not mine and not any other student who merely went home after watching the UMass football team finish off a great season (though it may not have ended as well as we all hoped).

If anything was truly devalued as a result of the rioting, it was the honor and pride that our football team brought the university when they earned a spot in the National Championship.

The value of our degrees is not determined by the senseless acts of others; it is purely and wholly a product of our very own effort. Any degree with the name "Isenberg" on it will certainly hold its weight on any management application. Putting in the effort to add honors accolades further lifts the value of any degree. Involving oneself in the various extracurricular activities and community service opportunities around campus boosts the sway of a degree from UMass as well.

But to think that every student's degree takes a blow because some kids don't know how to behave – that is absurd.

The value of my degree is not lessened by the riotous acts of other students. If it is lessened at all it is a result of the university's inability to hire the professors it needs. We pay more and more to attend this university every year, and are our degrees somehow more valuable just because they cost more money? Absolutely not. In fact, rising costs help pave the way for newer buildings, but fancier facilities increase the value of the campus, not the value of our degrees. A beautiful campus brings money in and attracts students, but it by no means equips students to thrive in the real world.

A friend of mine brought up a good point: if our degrees have actually lost value, then don't those students who weren't involved in the riot have some right to demand compensation? Can the university pay us the difference between what we're paying for our degree and what it is now apparently valued at?

For all the students out there, don't think that you'll never get a job because you went to a university where some kids broke windows. A few of those students who managed to deal some damage on Dec. 15 and get away unscathed by the law, could very well end up as CEOs, running solely on their UMass degree.

If you take advantage of all the great things that UMass has to offer and demand more than fancy new classrooms with empty thinkers, then your degree and your resume will be defined by you — not by any rioter, or anybody else.

Adam McGillen can be reached at amcgille@student.umass.edu

Connecting cross-country

Desperate to escape the January cold, my friend and I got into a car and drove south to Florida. We had tentative plans to camp out on a beach in Key West and see some friends in Orlando. But other than that, we had no idea what was in store for us.

Matt Giancola

For me, the chance to finally get out and see this country was enough of a motivation. I have been to different parts of the country before but always through the constricted room of an airplane: sit in this room at Logan Airport for a few hours, and then magically wind up in Florida. This time I would fully appreciate the terrain of this great, big country.

As we drove south towards the capital, my thoughts turned to the new Congress and what the leaders of this country were doing. The Democratic majority in the House was in the middle of its 100-hour legislative blitz, overturning many of the laws of the previous Republican regime. The minimum wage was raised, student loans increased, 9/11 Commission reforms (finally) implemented, among other things. True, the Senate, with its lengthy debates and rights for the minority, would stall. Still, there was a reason to hope, for the first time in years, that our government was being proactive in solving the many problems of this country.

Stopping to get gas in the middle of the night, we saw service workers struggling to pay the bills, making a wage that left them under the poverty line. Whether they were in Maryland, Georgia, or Florida didn't matter; they all yearned for the same better life for their families and themselves.

When I set out to write this column, I envisioned discussing the differences between the North and South – the billboards along I-95 asking me to accept Jesus Christ as my Lord and Savior, the monuments to Confederate leaders, the stars and bars. Or the truck-stop in South Carolina that served grits and let you smoke in the restaurant, the display case of Christian bumper stickers next to road maps, the smell of tobacco as we drove along the historic fields.

As it turns out, however, I discovered we had more in common than politicians and pundits sometimes let on. Annoying talking heads like Bill O'Reilly, John Gibson and Sean Hannity would like us to think that there is a culture war being fought these days in our streets, the Second American Civil War. There are indeed many differences between regions of this country, and we are still getting over the schisms of the past. But the state of our country is not nearly as dire as those right-wingers would like us to think.

There are indeed many differences between regions of this country, and we are still getting over the schisms of the past, but the state of our country is not nearly as dire as those right–wingers would like us to think.

The main problem today we face is a lack of understanding of other's viewpoints and livelihoods. In North Carolina, I was pulled over for speeding. The officer made me get out of the car, searched me and placed me in his patrol car. As he ran my information, he asked if Massachusetts still had an epidemic drug problem. In my head I thought of all the studies showing the northeast to have less of a problem than any other area of the country, but I decided to not bring it up. Was this a case of regional prejudice, trying to scare the out-of-state vacationer or simply an ignorance of how others' lived?

This ignorance is not limited to the differences between red and blue states, though. Corporate executives don't understand the pains of the homeless. "Stop being lazy and get a job," they say. Unions don't understand CEO's and the fact that not all decisions they make are to spite workers. Suburban families don't understand the plight of inner-city families, desperate for quality basic city services taken for granted in wealthier neighborhoods. While these examples are all economic, our need to understand others stretches across all sectors of our culture.

After being released by the trooper, I got back into the car and drove further south, taking in the scenery of decrepit barns and tidy rest stops. We passed the Georgian savannah and the vast Florida orange groves. Finally, we found ourselves at Epcot Center, among people from around the world, all enjoying themselves. The fireworks that night had an audience of thousands. In the middle of the display was a spinning globe, a symbol of our unity.

My friend and I still had more miles to travel, to the southernmost point of the nation, but at that moment I felt connected to everyone else there and everyone I encountered on the drive — even the state trooper.

Matt Giancola can be reached at mgiancol@student.umass.edu.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

ANOTHER VIEW FROM THE STANDS

First of all, I would like to thank [Rob Greenfield] for all the hard work and long hours [he puts] into the Daily Collegian everyday. I don't think you guys get the recognition around campus that you deserve.

Anyway, I had some issues with the article that you wrote in today's Daily Collegian titled "The View From the Stands." You begin the article by ridiculing the student body by saying that they would rather sleep than go to a UMass basketball game. I completely agree with you. It's atrocious that the students don't go to more sporting events and show some school spirit. But after that comment, you go on to bash the players, the team, the coaching staff, the arena, the athletic department and the conference. Why would anybody want to go to a basketball game after reading your depressing comments?

Rather than taking jabs at everything involved with the team, maybe you can talk about the resurgence of the basketball team after a decade in decline. Maybe talk about how we're 16-6 and on the bubble for the NCAA tournament – the most exciting three weeks of the year. Talk about how we're currently tied for first in the conference and have the most important home conference game in years this Thursday night against our rival, URI.

Talk about how every time you go to a game, you will see the premier shot-blocker in the country and a potential NBA player in Stephane Lasme. You will see Rashaun Freeman, who is destined to join a select few players who made the first team all-conference team three straight seasons and may be named Player of the Year in the conference. You will see one of the best 3-point shooters in UMass history, James Life. Most of all, you have will fun rooting for your school with a bunch of rowdy and crazy UMass fans.

Color your face, paint your body maroon. It can be fun. Judging by your article, I would think that going to a UMass basketball game is the worst thing you can ever do.

You attacked James Life's defense, but if you actually watch him, his defense this year is so much better than last year. Travis Ford has even called him the best perimeter defender on the team. It may not be the prettiest, but it's effective – just watch him. The team has everything: great scorers, great rebounders and great passers. We're at, if not near the top, in just about every statistical category in the Atlantic 10 this year including scoring offense. Students love teams that consistently score in the 80s. Its exciting to be a UMass fan now, and the UMass student body should come and support them this Thursday, the most meaningful game in years. The campus would just be electric if the team could make the NCAA tournament, and it would give the University positive national recognition.

I also had a problem with your attacking of the Athletic Department. I don't know any of the head people personally but they're doing everything in their power to increase attendance and make the Mullins Center a better place to watch a sporting game. Whiteout Night has been a huge success for hockey, so what if basketball is now doing it? It's a UMass idea.

Anyway, to get more students at the game is fine with me. Isn't this better than if the Athletic Dept. just sat on their butts and accepted that 500 students come to each basketball game? At least they are trying.

Mark Zaiger
UMass Student

WRITE LETTERS TO THE EDITOR. GET HEARD.

THE COLLEGIAN IS ALWAYS LOOKING TO IMPROVE ITS COVERAGE. PART OF THAT EMANATES FROM TAKING THE PULSE OF YOU, THE MEMBER OF THE UMASS COMMUNITY. LET US KNOW HOW YOU FEEL. YOUR OPINION COUNTS. BUT MOST IMPORTANTLY, GET YOUR VOICE OUT THERE.

(550 WORD LIMIT)

Send an email to:
editorial@dailycollegian.com

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

ARTS & LIVING

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 8, 2007 ARTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

GRAMMY's welcome 'The Police'

Sting's 80's band to play at the 49th annual GRAMMY's in highly anticipated show

It has been almost four years since the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame band has played together publicly.

Mary J. Blige leads the pack with eight nominations for this Sunday's 49th annual GRAMMY Awards. She is up for both Best Song and Record of the Year for her hit album "Be Without You."

By Mandy Thomas
Collegian Staff

After 23 years of separation the hit 80's band "The Police" are reuniting for the opening act of the 49th annual GRAMMY Awards. The nation will be able to watch "Every Breath You Take" singer Sting, drummer Stewart Copeland and guitarist Andy Summers make during their first performance since 2003 when they performed for their induction into the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame. Even after five GRAMMY wins and many nominations, this historic performance will mark a first for The Police, playing at this Sunday's GRAMMY's.

Previous opening acts have included Madonna and the Gorillaz in 2006, an all-star performance featuring the Black Eyed Peas, Maroon 5, Gwen Stefani, Los Lonely Boys and Franz Ferdinand in 2005, a duet by Prince and Beyonce in 2004, and the reunion of Paul Simon and Art Garfunkel in 2003.

Other performers this year include Christina Aguilera, Beyoncé, Mary J. Blige, the Dixie Chicks, Gnarls Barkley, John Legend, Ludacris, John Mayer, Corinne Bailey Rae, the Red Hot Chili Peppers and Carrie Underwood. Justin Timberlake is set to perform, both solo and with the winner of the "My GRAMMY Moment" competition.

The "My GRAMMY Moment" competition gives an aspiring singer a chance to perform live with Justin Timberlake at the awards show. The Recording Academy announced the names of the three finalists during the Super Bowl Pre-Game Show. The top finalists are Africa Miranda, 30, of Montgomery, Ala.; Brenda Radney, 22, of Staten Island, N.Y. and Robyn Troup, 18, of Houston, Texas.

The winner of the competition is determined by fans' Polls are open on music.yahoo.com/mygrammymoment until 9:59 p.m. Feb. 11, the day of the awards show. Viewers will also be given a two-hour window before the winner is announced to send up to 10 votes via text message. The winner will be announced live right before taking the stage with Timberlake.

Nominees for Record of the Year are "Be Without You" by Mary J. Blige, "You're Beautiful" by James Blunt, "Not Ready to Make Nice" by the Dixie Chicks, "Crazy" by Gnarls Barkley and "Put Your Records On" by Corinne Bailey Rae. Last

See GRAMMY'S on page 7

Christina Aguilara's double disc album "Back to Basics" has a jazz-blues feel she claims to have loved since she was a child. Linda Perry, of 'Four None Blondes' fame, produced the second CD that is all live performances.

Goldstein gives astronomical lecture

By Evan Powers
Collegian Correspondent

Do you remember hit movies like Armageddon and Deep Impact and wonder what the chances are of an asteroid actually hitting the earth? Pretty slim, according to a UMass professor. Joseph L. Goldstein, a professor of Industrial and Mechanical Engineering, gave a speech entitled "Extraterrestrial Metals: New Clues on Asteroids and the Early Solar System" on Monday afternoon, at the third Distinguished Faculty Lecture of 2006-07.

Goldstein said that according to astronomers, an asteroid hits the earth every half million years.

"It looks like we're going to get lucky," he joked in front of a full crowd of about 200 faculty, students and area citizens in the Massachusetts room in the Mullins Center.

Goldstein, who has an asteroid named after him, has established himself as a top researcher of asteroids, meteorites and the solar system from the view of a metallurgist. Self-described as one step away from being a blacksmith, he has spent years studying the patterns and forms of chunks of asteroids that have fallen to the earth. He has also specialized in observing their cooling patterns to determine just how big and old the asteroid it came from really is.

To help demonstrate one of the patterns called the "Windstatten" pattern, Goldstein handed around pieces of asteroids that he had collected from areas of the world.

These pieces come from as far away as Argentina, Greenland and

See PROFESSOR on page 8

Professor Joseph Goldstein worked at NASA before coming to UMass to continue his work with asteroids.

Valley Books moves to spacious locale

By Diana Lutek
Collegian Correspondent

Perhaps you've noticed that the space once occupied by Valley Books at 199 North Pleasant St. in Amherst is vacant – but fear not, for it has only moved across the street.

Valley Books reopened Jan. 6 at 220 North Pleasant St. behind Hair for Harlow.

Owner Larry Pruner, a former resident of both New Jersey and Boston, had no previous connections to the town of Amherst but said that "Amherst is just one of those places you come to," and that the town offers "a lot of stimulation to keep life interesting."

Numerous moves have brought Valley Books to the store's current location. The shop opened in July 1975 in the space above the Loose Goose Cafe at 233 North Pleasant St. The first move came of a need for expansion after two and a half years, and Pruner was able to move his store next door to 5 East Pleasant

See BOOKS on page 7

Valley Books has moved three times on North Pleasant Street in an effort to keep up with changing rent prices and shelf space requirements.

First dates made easy

Being comfortable with your date and yourself is the key to starting a first date on the right foot.

By Jasmine Monteiro
Collegian Columnist

Everyone gets a little nervous the first time they go on a date with someone new. You want everything to go as smoothly as possible. And limiting the amount of awkward silences is probably everyone's first priority. Besides that, trying to look your best and making sure your breath isn't kickin' are also vitally important.

To help ensure the best night possible here are some key Do's and Dont's that everyone should be aware of. You can learn a lot about someone on a first date. After all, first impressions should be lasting ones.

Do be on time: Nobody likes to wait around for someone before a date – that's obvious. So if you set a specific time with someone, be punctual. Don't have them waiting around for you, especially if you are meeting them somewhere. The fashionably-late rule does not apply here. If you absolutely have to be late because of an unforeseen circumstance, at least have the courtesy to let them know.

Don't answer your phone: There is nothing more annoying than feeling like your date has something better to do. And answering your phone during the date is a rude way of saying just that. You may not think that when you're talking on the phone, but your date will. Don't you think your date deserves just as much respect as your professors? So do as you would in class – put your phone on vibrate and give them your full attention. If you absolutely need

See DATES on page 7

Timberlake, Aguilera to perform Sunday

Justin Timberlake will perform twice this Sunday. Once will be a solo performance and the second time will be with a lucky fan.

GRAMMY'S from page 6

year's GRAMMY for Record of the Year went to Green Day for "Boulevard of Broken Dreams."

Nominees for Album of the Year are "Taking the Long Way" by the Dixie Chicks, "St. Elsewhere" by Gnarls Barkley, "Continuum" by John Mayer, "Stadium Arcadium" by Red Hot Chili Peppers and "FutureSex/LoveSounds" by Justin Timberlake. Last year's GRAMMY for Album of the Year went to U2 for "How to Dismantle an Atomic Bomb."

Nominees for Song of the Year are "Be Without You" by Mary J. Blige, "Jesus, Take the Wheel" by Carrie Underwood, "Not Ready to Make Nice" by the Dixie Chicks, "Put Your Records On" by Corinne Bailey Rae and "You're Beautiful" by James Blunt. Last year's Song of the Year GRAMMY went to U2 for "Sometimes You Can't Make It On Your Own."

Nominees for Best New Artist are James Blunt, Chris Brown, Imogene Heap, Corinne Bailey Rae and Carrie Underwood while last year's Best New Artist GRAMMY went to John Legend.

Presenters this year include the Black Eyed Peas, Ciara, Nelly Furtado, Jerrence Howard, Samuel L. Jackson, Pink and Rihanna. Other presenters are Joan Baez, current Lifetime Achievement Award honoree; Melissa Etheridge, two-time GRAMMY winner; Jennifer Hudson, Golden Globe winner; Chris Rock, three-time GRAMMY winner; Stevie Wonder a 24-time GRAMMY winner, and GRAMMY winner Queen Latifah.

CBS will air the 49th annual GRAMMY Awards live at 8 p.m. on Sunday from the Staples Center in Los Angeles. The show will be broadcast in HDTV and 5.1 surround sound and supported on radio via Westwood One worldwide and XM Satellite Radio. The GRAMMY's will also be covered online at GRAMMY.yahoo.com.

Mandy Thomas can be reached at mandyrudy@gmail.com

Beyonce will perform from her new album "B'day," which was released on her birthday Sept. 5, at the 49th GRAMMY's.

'Valley' stays on one floor in new home

BOOKS from page 6

[illegible] allowed him to "triple, even quadruple" his floor space. Valley [illegible] resided in this location until [illegible]ending's purchase by another [illegible] forced Pruner to move once [illegible] 199 North Pleasant St. This [illegible] most familiar to local [illegible] in the past 29 years.

[illegible], however, had been looking [illegible] for the past three and [illegible] combination of factors [illegible] move. Decreased foot [illegible] in sales coupled [illegible] were major con[illegible] lot of Valley Books' [illegible] done through web

[illegible] Books' most recent move [illegible] Pruner to keep his [illegible] collection contained to one [illegible] books in a basement is [illegible] way to do business," he said.

Frequenters of Valley Books' previous location were familiar with the collection that spanned two floors in shelves and piles. Pruner hopes the less-cluttered shop feels more "user friendly," and that his main plan for the new space is "keeping the books off the floor."

What separates Valley Books from other bookstores in downtown Amherst is that its collection is entirely composed of used books. This collection includes, but is not limited to, rare, antiquarian, signed and collector's copies, as well as a large number of children's books and used audio books.

With the advent of the internet, a majority of Larry's business is now done through his website. Other [illegible]ential changes have been that of college student traffic.

"I'd say that college students made up a bigger part of my cliental in the first 10 to 15 years than the last 10 to 15," he said. Including internet sales, the majority of Valley Books' customers are libraries and schools.

Valley Books has seen over three decades of fluctuating popularity in genres. Pruner finds the biggest change was in the popularity of science fiction/fantasy books.

"Science fiction and fantasy used to be one of the most active sections in the store in the 1970s," says Pruner. Other high selling sections of the decade that have recently waned in popularity are Women's Studies, New Age and Spirituality and Native American Studies.

These sections' popularity has been traded to newer sections of the store, such as audio books. Also popular are reviews copies of recently published books.

Pruner said that what got him into the bookselling business was simply a desire to "avoid getting a real job." It turned out that owning a bookshop was way more work than a real job."

One of the best things about a used bookstore Pruner said is, "Unlike big stores like Barnes and Noble, used book stores can have 30,000 books and no duplication. The reason people still come here is to find books they can't find anywhere else."

Among other difficult-to-find items, Valley Books is selling ephemera – paper collectibles – including old postcards, prints, original artwork, stamps, and even framed sheet music. Other collectible items include those with local flair, such as old Amherst College beer steins.

Where does a used book store get its unique collection? Pruner said all of his books come from within a 25-mile radius.

"Private collectors make up a vast majority of my sellers," he said, although "anyone can make an appointment to see what they can sell."

Diana Lutek can be reached at dllutek@student.umass.edu

Get a second date

DATES from page 6

to answer a call, be polite and excuse yourself.

Do involve them in conversation: I'm sure your date is interested in getting to know you, but no one wants to sit and listen to you ramble on about how your ex was a jerk or how stressful college life is. We've all heard it before so save it for another time. Show some interest in the other person, ask them questions and keep the conversation fresh. This way there will be no awkward silences, and they will see that you are genuinely interested in getting to know them.

Don't give out too much information: The whole point of going on a first date is to scratch the surface. You want to see if you're interested in someone enough for a second date and to get to know each other further. I'm sure he doesn't want to hear about your last trip to the gym – save that for the fourth or fifth at least.

Do end the night right: If you realize that your final goodbye is lasting longer than your actual date, that's a perfect opportunity for a goodnight kiss. Make sure you read the signs. They will be all over the place, and they're usually extremely legible.

Remember the best way to make it through a first date is to begin comfortably. If you're the shy type, let that be known, but make the best of it. Conversation flows much more smoothly when you feel relaxed, so you have to start somewhere. Think about how much there is to know about you. There is equally as much to find out about your date. You don't need to learn it all at once though, enjoy the time you have together, and make it memorable. If you hit it off, make sure to make arrangements to speak to each other again before you say goodbye. This way, there will be no question marks about what happens next.

Jasmine Monteiro can be reached at jmonteir@student.umass.edu

The technologies we create define leading-edge. So do our opportunities. Join Raytheon, one of the world's most admired defense and aerospace systems suppliers, and apply your mind in ways that you've always thought possible.

Advance engineering with a diversity of people and talents. Take on challenges that defy conventional thinking. And meet us at the forefront of innovation.

Visit our Career Fair Booth on Feb. 14 or Feb. 15, 2007

Opportunities are available in the following areas:

Aeronautical Engineering | Computer Engineering | Computer Science | Electrical Engineering | Math | Mechanical Engineering | Optics | Physics | Software Engineering | Systems Engineering

www.rayjobs.com/campus

Raytheon
Customer Success Is Our Mission

Prof. studies stars

PROFESSOR from page 6

South Africa, with some dating back to almost 4.5 billion years ago. They are "some of the oldest materials you'll ever touch," said Goldstein.

Since coming to the Department of Engineering at UMass in 1993, Goldstein has been working with students and faculty performing experiments by heating and cooling metals that are similar to the ones found in his asteroid samples to determine the age, size and origins of present day asteroids. Goldstein's work is fueled by research funds from NASA, where he worked from 1964 to 1968 at the Goddard Space Center in Washington.

His work has drawn the attention of, not only students and his fellow faculty members, but also local residents.

"I really think it's amazing that someone right here at UMass is working with NASA and bringing students into the studies," said Terry Franklin, a resident of Amherst who attended the lecture. "It's great to see this work being done in such a great field."

Goldstein said the origin of his fascination with asteroids and the solar system came when he began to use electron microscopes when he received his PH.D. from the Massachusetts Institute of Technology.

So what is the best part of Goldstein's job?

"One great thing about my job is that all of my samples I get really cheap. In fact, they're free, they just fall from the sky," he said jokingly, drawing laughter from the audience.

UMass Chancellor John V. Lombardi concluded the event by presenting Goldstein with a medal, calling him a "hero for science and a hero for our university as well." Goldstein said that he plans to take a sabbatical next year to research more on newly developed electron microscopes.

Evan Powers can be reached at epowers a student.umass.edu

Nintendo's new system Wii has potential

By Michelle Fornice
The Observer (Notre Dame)

(U-WIRE) SOUTH BEND, Ind. — Nintendo took a chance with the release of the Wii. It would not compete with the latest Microsoft and Sony releases by traditional measures – such as enhanced, high-definition graphics – but Nintendo's innovation made the Wii a highly interactive console that appeals to both hardcore and casual gamers.

Nintendo's new system packs power, customization and high levels of interactivity into its hardware for the intense gamers while adopting a sleek, white look similar to the iPod in order to attract a more general audience.

The Wii comes with an LED equipped sensor bar (centered above or below any television screen) that, in conjunction with the remote, picks up the player's movements. The console is the smallest of all Nintendo units, only about the size of three DVD cases, and can be oriented horizontally or vertically.

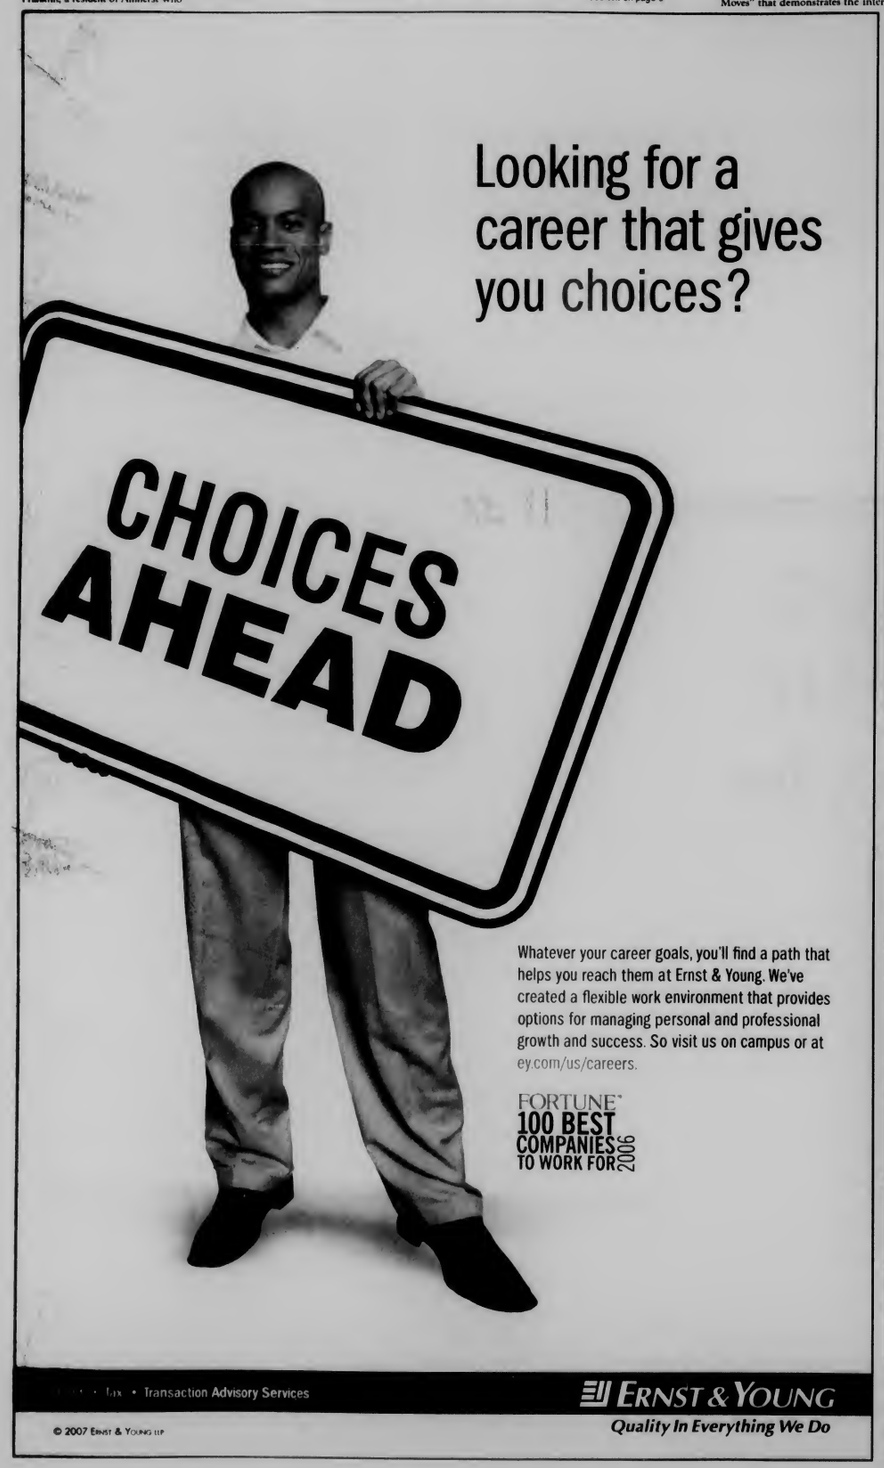
The front of the console accepts Wii optical disks and Nintendo GameCube discs (though not standard DVDs and CDs). The console also has two USB ports and one SD card slot. The remotes run on AA batteries.

The remotes (or Wiimotes) are surprisingly sensitive. While there are limitations as to how far and from what angle a player can approach the sensor, the remotes can distinguish a multitude of different motions and provide six degrees of movement. Most of the time, the required motions are intuitive. The remote takes some time to get used to for more complex games, but the basic games, like those offered in "WiiSports," can be picked up in a couple of plays.

Often for those more complex games the remote is paired with the included nunchuck, which adds on an analog stick and two additional buttons. The remote has a speaker on it, allowing the user to hear the sounds of their movements, such as the clash of a sword. Nintendo also included a vibrating feature on the remote, which is often used to remind the player to make a menu choice.

See Wii on page 9

The Wii gaming system has a game entitled "WarioWare: Smooth Moves" that demonstrates the interactive features well.



Looking for a career that gives you choices?
CHOICES AHEAD
Whatever your career goals, you'll find a path that helps you reach them at Ernst & Young. We've created a flexible work environment that provides options for managing personal and professional growth and success. So visit us on campus or at ey.com/us/careers.
FORTUNE 100 BEST COMPANIES TO WORK FOR 2006
Tax • Transaction Advisory Services
ERNST & YOUNG
Quality In Everything We Do
© 2007 Ernst & Young LLP

Gamers excited for the future

Wii from page 8

An additional controller can be purchased that allows users to play classic Nintendo games they have downloaded to their Wii. "WiiSports" – a game which comes bundled with the console – allows users to play bared-down versions of games including tennis, golf, bowling, boxing and baseball. Tennis and boxing stand out as the more fun of the five, but all the WiiSports games are entertaining as players physically roll their bowling ball down the alley and swing their tennis racket.

Other games specifically designed to be played on the Wii showcase the range of its ability. "WarioWare: Smooth Moves" requires the user (like in past editions of the game) to play a series of short, random games in which they must figure out what to do on their own. There are no more button combinations; the player has to move the remote in many different ways, all of which the system can differentiate, from letting it drop in free fall, hitting it between two hands or using it like a pencil.

"Super Monkey Ball: Banana Blitz," which similarly cashes in on the motion capability of the remote, is a little more difficult to use as the motions are a little less intuitive, but can be just as fun.

Wii also works well with more traditional games that have been updated to work with the Wii controllers, such as "The Legend of Zelda: Twilight Princess" and "Madden NFL 07." Players swing their sword and throw passes, making the games more immersive than their predecessors. The Wii console is also backwards compatible with all Nintendo GameCube software, though a GameCube controller is still necessary to enjoy these games.

The interactivity of the Wii makes it most suitable for multiplayer use. Unfortunately, most of the multiplayer games require the use of multiple remotes, which adds on hefty $60 fee for each new remote and nunchuk pair.

Unlike other game consoles, the Wii is attempting to create a more versatile piece of equipment than just a pure video game system. Users can upload photos from their SD memory cards and use the basic image editor to view and change them (mostly in fun, rather than serious ways). They can leave messages for other players on the console and send messages over the Internet and to cell phones.

Also if they connect the Wii to the Internet, users can check the weather, surf the Internet, use the shopping channels and get news updates. After creating a Mii – a 3-D caricature of the user – players can store up to 10 on the remote and bring them to play on another Wii console.

Eventually, Wii is supposed to have online game play where gamers play as their Miis in multiplayer online games, although this feature has not yet been perfected. This merger of gaming with online interactivity will bring a sense of community to video gaming that has never been accomplished before.

One thing that needs to be improved on the Wii is the straps on the remote. Considering how much the remote swings around, Nintendo should have created a stronger way of keeping it attached to the user's wrist to prevent it from flying across the room. However, Nintendo is offering to replace the original straps with new ones made from a slightly thicker material.

As video games like "Guitar Hero" and others become more and more immersive as gaming technology becomes more advanced, the versatility and interactivity of the Wii should serve it well.

The potential of the Wii to move beyond traditional game system to include internet based games points to a bright future for the interactive Nintendo system.

New show lives up to Bravo's history

By Hillary Busis
Columbia Daily Spectator
(Columbia U.)

(U-WIRE) NEW YORK — With "Top Design," Bravo's latest attempt to hold the attention of "Project Runway" devotees between new seasons, the network expands its franchise of reality shows that are more about having talent than washboard abs.

The new show, which had the highest-rated debut in Bravo's history, is exactly what it sounds like: Interior designers compete in a series of difficult challenges in which they are given an empty room and asked to decorate it in a specific way.

The winner of "Top Design" will receive a grand-prize package that includes a feature in Elle Decor magazine, a new GMC Acadia, and $100,000. As per regular reality show rules, one designer will be eliminated each week.

"Top Design" is utterly original in at least one way – although programs based around interior design have been common ever since the reality TV boom of the early 21st century (think "Trading Spaces" or "Extreme Makeover: Home Edition"), none of these shows are competitive.

However, viewers who are familiar with Bravo's other reality competitions, such as the addictive, aforementioned "Project Runway," and the almost equally captivating "Top Chef," may feel some sense of deja vu when they first lay eyes on "Top Design." For starters, it follows the exact same formula as those other series, right down to the layout of the room where the contestants face the judges at the end of each episode.

Additionally, like the arbiters on "Top Chef" and "Project Runway," the "Top Design" judges have already demonstrated a tendency to eliminate competent, but boring contestants before competitors who are less talented, but make for more interesting TV.

In the very first episode, bland Heather and blander Lisa are kicked off instead of the constantly bickering pair of inexperienced Michael and short-fused John. It brings back memories of how the aesthetically unpleasing and mentally unhinged Vincent somehow managed to stay on "Project Runway" long after he should have been on the receiving end of an "auf wiedersehen" from Heidi Klum.

Luckily, "Top Design" is fortunate enough to have a host who's more of a Heidi than a Padma Lakshmi, or even-shudder-Katie Lee Joel. Veteran designer and brand name Todd Oldham runs the show here, and his enthusiastic line delivery is instantly endearing.

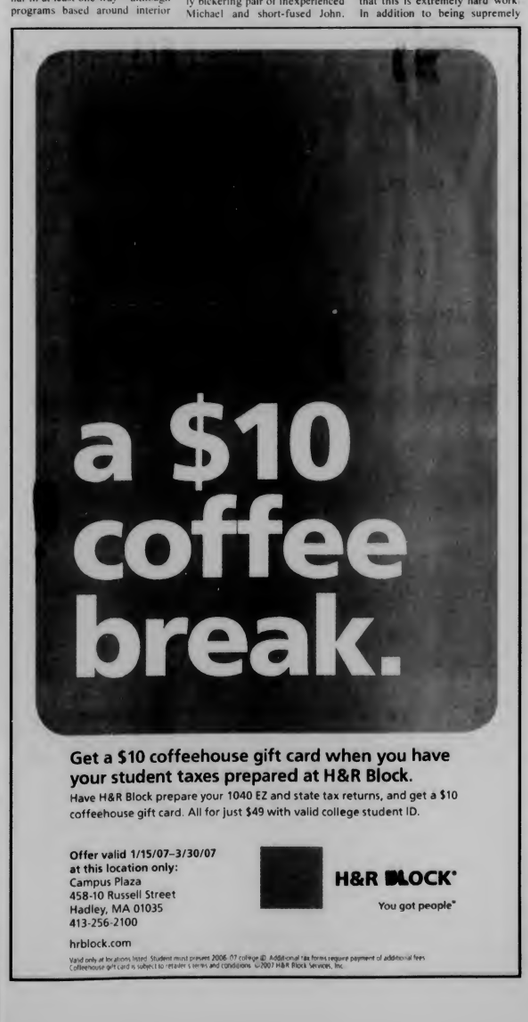
At times, though, Oldham sounds like more like a guest star on "Sesame Street" than the host of a reality show for adults. Maybe that's just part of his shtick, though on his bravotv.com blog, lead judge Jonathan Adler describes Oldham's personal style as "adult-toddler-chic." Oldham may be childlike, but "Top Design" itself certainly doesn't make interior design seem like child's play.

It's clear from the beginning that this is extremely hard work. In addition to being supremely innovative and sophisticated, contestants must also know how to hand-paint their spaces and reassemble their furniture when it arrives in pieces. These Top Designers aren't merely decorators – they're artists. As the incredibly quotable Adler writes: "The reality of interior design is that people always seem to imagine that it's this poncy profession where you can be effete and hands off. And that ain't the way it works."

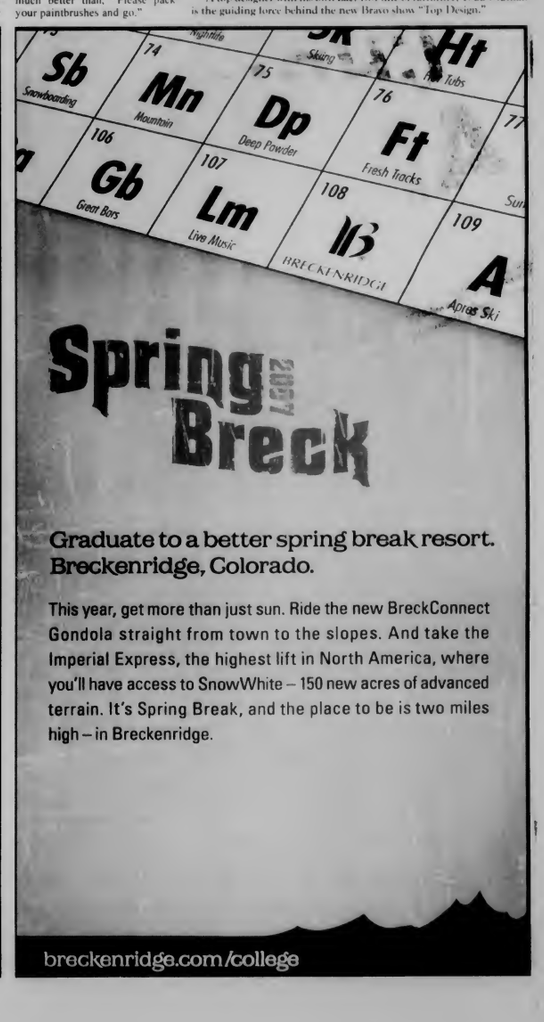
A sneak peek at future episodes shows that more gems from Adler and "Top Design's" other entertainingly bitchy judges are forthcoming – one contestant's room looks like "the hamburger shack," and another resembles "an assisted living facility." One design challenge even prompts a contestant to declare, "If I had to live here, I would shoot myself."

Finally, there's always going to be at least one thing to look forward to on "Top Design" the part where Adler delivers his soon-to-be-signature send-off, "See you later, decorator." That's much better than, "Please pack your paintbrushes and go."

A top designer with his own Lazy Boy line of furniture, Todd Oldman is the guiding force behind the new Bravo show "Top Design."



a $10 coffee break.
Get a $10 coffeehouse gift card when you have your student taxes prepared at H&R Block.
Have H&R Block prepare your 1040 EZ and state tax returns, and get a $10 coffeehouse gift card. All for just $49 with valid college student ID.
Offer valid 1/15/07–3/30/07 at this location only:
Campus Plaza
458-10 Russell Street
Hadley, MA 01035
413-256-2100
hrblock.com
H&R BLOCK
You got people



Sb Snowboarding
Mn Mountain
Dp Deep Powder
Ft Fresh tracks
Gb Great Bars
Lm Live Music
Ht Hot Tubs
A Apres Ski
Spring Breck
Graduate to a better spring break resort. Breckenridge, Colorado.
This year, get more than just sun. Ride the new BreckConnect Gondola straight from town to the slopes. And take the Imperial Express, the highest lift in North America, where you'll have access to SnowWhite – 150 new acres of advanced terrain. It's Spring Break, and the place to be is two miles high – in Breckenridge.
breckenridge.com/college

Defensive battle between a pair of surprising Rams squads

Upstart Duquesne overcomes tragedy, turns season around

By Kevin Dooley
Collegian Staff

It's not too often that a game in which the two opponents each fail to register 50 points is remembered for being anything other than a train wreck to watch. But this wasn't your typical defensive-dominated game when you consider the Fordham Rams (13-8, 6-3 A-10) and the Rhode Island Rams (14-9, 7-2 A-10) entered last Saturday's matchup occupying two of the top spots in the Atlantic 10.

For both Rhode Island and Fordham, the top of the standings is a place neither of these teams expected to be at when the conference schedule commenced in early January. And while the game itself will undoubtedly be overshadowed by the turnaround seasons they've each had, some of the numbers from this offensively-challenged game warrant mentioning.

Despite shooting a miserable 28 percent from the field, Rhode Island proved to be too much to handle from beyond the arc, shooting 5-for-12 from downtown and was 12-of-16 from the free-throw line. Fordham was only 4-for-7 from the charity stripe.

Jim Baron's squad was aided by the fact that Fordham had just as much trouble locating the basket, shooting only 34 percent for the day and was a horrible 2-for-18 from beyond the 3-point line. Fordham's junior forward Bryant Dunston scored over half of the Rams' 44 points, tallying 29 points and was a stellar 13-of-15 from the field.

Rhode Island's high-powered offense has been well documented all season, which made its 45-point performance against Fordham all that more perplexing. The anemic 45-point performance against Fordham was the fewest points scored by Rhode Island in a win since it defeated Maine 33-30 on Feb. 22, 1949.

The Rams are second in the conference in scoring, averaging 76.2 points per game, and it marked only the second time Rhode Island has been held to less than 60 points this season. The Rams prior season low in points in one game came against the Saint Louis Billikens (15-8, 5-4 A-10) in a 62-58 loss.

Rhode Island is hoping the 2006-07 campaign will end a long-awaited March Madness drought. The Rams haven't punched a ticket to the NCAA Tournament since the 2000-01 season, and college basketball prognosticators weren't predicting the Rams to break their postseason drought coming into this year.

Rhode Island lost five seniors to graduation prior to the start of this season, three of those seniors being starters for the Rams. In the A-10's preseason poll, Rhode Island was predicted by coaches and members of the media to finish 11th in the conference. Prognosticators thought a little more of Fordham, forecasting the Rams to end up in 7th place by season's end.

Baron's squad began to turn the page last season when it finished with an 8-8 conference record, a year after it hit a low point in its program with a 4-12 conference record. With a 7-2 conference record this season, the Rams are giving their fans a glimmer of hope that they'll be able to duplicate the overwhelming success they enjoyed in the historic 1997-98 season, capturing the A-10 Title and advancing all the way to the quarterfinals of the NCAA Tournament.

Prior to Fordham's loss at the hands of Rhode Island, the Rams were in the midst of a five-game winning streak and entered the game as the top-ranked defense in the A-10. Fordham is holding conference opponents to just 62.4 points a game, but its Achilles heel has been the fact that it has had as much trouble on the offensive side of the ball as Rhode Island has had on the defensive side of the ball.

The defensive juggernauts of the A-10 are ranked second to last in the conference in scoring, averaging 63.4 points per game, while Rhode Island is ranked second to last in defense in the A-10, allowing opponents to score 76 points a night.

Like Rhode Island, Fordham is only a few years removed from being a member of the obscurity club in the A-10. In 2004-05, Fordham won its first ever A-10 tournament game and finished with a 9-7 conference record – its first winning season in the A-10 since joining the league in 1995.

Becoming Routine

The Duquesne Dukes (9-11, 5-4 A-10) have unquestionably been the story of the year in the A-10 and maybe in the entire country due to the unexpected success they've had this season, following a 3-23 record last year and five of their players being shot before the season started. The Dukes can add one more upset win to their resume after taking down the defending A-10 Champions and pre-season favorite to win the title again, the Xavier Musketeers, 93-91.

Xavier (16-7, 6-3 A-10) erased a 19-point deficit and went on a 23-7 run with eight minutes remaining in regulation to tie the game with 44 seconds left. The Dukes' Andrew Jackson scored on an inbound pass with 22 seconds remaining to pull off the upset victory.

Ron Everhart's club has been a threat in conference play ever since it adopted a frantic full-court press attack along with five-man substitutions two days before a loss to UMass. Since then, the Dukes have won four consecutive A-10 games, most recently a 111-92 win over the St. Bonaventure Bonnies (6-16, 3-6 A-10). During the four-game stretch, Duquesne has averaged over 90 points – the first team in Duquesne history to score over 90 points in four consecutive games. The Dukes haven't been over .500 this late into a season since the 1993-94 campaign.

But for all the success the Dukes have had this year, they've been a mess on the defensive side of the ball. Duquesne is giving up 85 points per game to conference opponents this season, six more points than the Temple Owls (9-12, 3-5 A-10) are conceding per contest. The Dukes are also one of only five teams in the A-10 with an overall record below .500.

Trouble with Villanova and the Big East

The Saint Joseph's Hawks' (15-8, 5-4 A-10) in-state rivalry game with Big East Conference member Villanova was showcased on national television Tuesday night, part of ESPN's Rivalry Week. But the rivalry didn't live up to the hype, as the Wildcats easily handled the Hawks, 56-39. The Hawks shot a pathetic 26 percent from the field and an embarrassing 45 percent from the charity stripe.

But Saint Joseph's isn't the only member of the A-10 to have difficulties with the Villanova Wildcats this season. Villanova defeated Temple, 83-65, earlier this season and took care of the La Salle Explorers (9-14, 2-7 A-10), 64-51.

The Villanova Wildcats and the Big East have been handing A-10 teams losses left and right this season. The A-10 is just 4-17 against Big East teams. Duquesne picked up one of the four wins, defeating the Boston College Eagles on Dec. 28, 98-93. Xavier picked up a win over Villanova, 71-66 back in November. The other two wins came against the Dayton Flyers (14-8, 4-5 A-10) and the Richmond Spiders (5-17, 1-8 A-10), who earned out-of-conference victories beating the Louisville Cardinals and the South Florida Bulls, respectively . . . After documenting Temple's defensive woes this season against the A-10, the Owls have limited their last two foes, Richmond and LaSalle, to less than 70 points in two must-win conference games . . . The Owls' Mark Tyndale got recognition from the league office last Sunday, being named Co-A-10 Player of the Week. The junior guard scored 27 points on 11-of-12 shooting from the field in Temple's 80-59 win over Richmond on Jan. 31 and had a season high 10 rebounds. For the season, Tyndale is putting up 17.5 points per contest and just under six rebounds . . . Xavier's Drew Lavender was the other recipient of the A-10 Player of the Week award after averaging 22.5 points in two games against Duquesne and the Charlotte 49ers (9-12, 3-6 A-10). Lavender was 9-for-10 from the field in Xavier's 91-57 blowout win over Charlotte last Saturday . . . Duquesne's Robert Mitchell collected his second consecutive and fifth A-10 Rookie of the Week award Sunday thanks to scoring 19.5 points per game in two wins over Xavier and St. Bonaventure. Mitchell was 5-of-6 from behind the arc. The Brooklyn native is leading all A-10 freshmen in scoring, averaging 18.1 points per contest . . . Dayton's Brian Roberts is currently ranked 10th in the nation in free-throw percentage, shooting 91.2 percent from the charity stripe this season, preceding Dayton's clash with Fordham Wednesday night. Roberts is 51-of-54 from the free-throw line in nine A-10 games this season and has made 24 consecutive free-throws in his last five games.

Kevin Dooley can be reached at kdooley@student.umass.edu.

THANK YOU FOR YOUR PARTICIPATION IN THIS EXPERIMENT.

AXE LAB

A NEW EAU DE TOILETTE
FROM THE LEADERS IN PHARMASEXUAL RESEARCH.

Available where other Axe products are sold.

View more experiments at axelab.net

Student Special
4 MONTHS
$149
• Aerobics • Mixed Martial Arts
• Free wts
www.amherstathletic.com
AMHERST ATHLETIC CLUB 256-0060 RT. AMHERST

First place in A-10 at stake against URI

M. Basketball from page 14

ning. They are currently in second, behind URI, and a win would catapult them into the top spot in the A-10. They just have to want it more than they did two weeks ago.

"There's a lot at stake with eight games left," sophomore point guard Chris Lowe said after Saturday's win over Richmond. "We're in the midst of everything, and the cream rises to the top. If we want it more than everybody, I think we can come out on the top.

"I think we're starting to gel together," Lowe said. "We all know what coach Lord wants from everybody now. So everybody knows their role, and if we just keep playing together and listen to what he has to say, I think we'll win this league."

UMass survived Rhode Island's heavy 3-point threat – the Rams are the A-10's top 3-point shooting team – last time they met, but it was the Rams' 16 free throws in the final 4:12 that made the difference. URI finished the game hitting 33-of-43 free throws, while UMass was 7-of-10.

Since the loss, the Minutemen grinded out a win at Charlotte, 66-61, and ran away with a 72-56 victory over Richmond on Saturday. Rhode Island lost to George Washington, 82-78, and defeated Fordham, 45-44.

"I told them there's eight games left, and now is the time to see what you're made of," Ford said after Saturday's win. "We can't expect to go out and win games like this every night. Chris Lowe can score 19, but that's not exactly what we want and what we need."

Lowe was the unexpected hero last weekend against the Spiders, posting a career-high 19 points, but UMass is going to need a better showing from senior Stephane Lasme tonight. Lasme had only eight points and five rebounds, and got had only two free-throw attempts.

Rhode Island's Will Daniels led the Rams with 20 points, and Keith Cothran scored 14 off the bench.

UMass has eight games left on the schedule heading into tonight's battle with the Rams. While it looked like the Minutemen may had overlooked the Spiders in the first half of Saturday's win – Richmond led 31-30 at the half – tonight's rematch is one they must show up for.

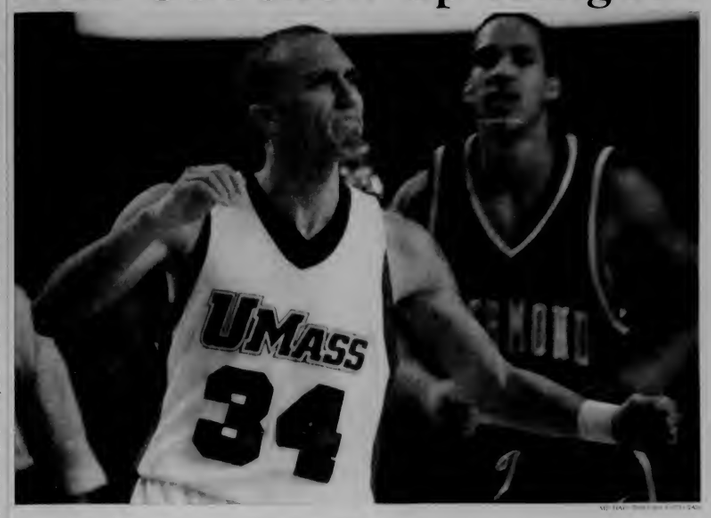
"It's a big stretch coming up," Forbes said. "There's eight games left in the conference, but we're just looking towards the next game. We're just looking towards the Rhode Island game.

"We have to take care of that at home, and then after we take care of that, it's onto the next game. It's just one game at a time."

Danny Picard can be reached at dpicard@student.umass.edu.

Sophomore point guard Chris Lowe had a career-high 19 points in UMass' 72-56 win over Richmond on Saturday at the Mullins Center.

Will UM show up tonight?



Senior guard James Life scored nine points on Saturday afternoon against the Spiders. He shot a dismal 1-for-8 from behind the 3-point line in the win. Life ranks third on the Minutemen's scoring list with 12.8 points per game.

Team from page 14

the easy part for a basketball coach in charge of an intense, tired up team.

But when the Jekyll-vs.-Hyde thing creeps in, what do you do? Coaches, above all, are there to motivate. There are a million guys who can tell you what play to run, but there are only a select few who can make players give maximum physical and mental effort every single day.

With this team, Lord has had difficulty in that regard. And it has burned them once – in a 72-71 loss to Miami at the Mullins Center – but for the most part has been overridden with either a second-half surge or a loss to a better team.

Now it's crunch time. Rhode Island is coming to the Mullins Center for the second meeting between the two teams this season to decide who can claim the pole position in the conference. Tonight's game will test the Minutemen's ability to rise to the occasion.

Lord put it succinctly.

"If you can't get ready for this game then we have problems much beyond Rhode Island," he said. "When we started preparing for this game on Monday, we knew what was at stake. This doesn't have to be a rah-rah week with screaming and yelling.

But Lord admits that he has had difficulty getting a read on this team. To motivate, you have to know what buttons to push, when you need to step on the gas and when you need to back off.

Lord doesn't think he needs to flip out on these guys this week in order for them to work hard, but he has had his doubts before.

"I still haven't figured out this basketball team," Lord said. "Sometimes I wonder if they even remember [the first URI game] That was two or three games ago so . . . with these guys, who knows. This is a pretty loose group of guys and I think that they know that we're playing for first place. But I don't know. It's tough to tell with this basketball team."

At this level of basketball, it is silly to think that a team can't get up for a game. Two of the captains – Rashaun Freeman and Stephane Lasme – lead vocally and by example. Freeman is the team's leading scorer with just over 17 points per game, and Lasme changes the flow of the game on the defensive end with his frequent blocked shots.

Freeman believes that his team is ready to go.

"I don't really want to get caught up in all of the hype because I think that can be a team's downfall and I really don't want that to be ours," he said. "I know as far as preparation and working hard and staying focused, I feel our team has done that."

"Playing for first place at home, it should be a good one," said junior Gary Forbes. "They beat us before but we're going to be ready this time around. We're going to come out with a lot of energy."

When Boston College visited Amherst earlier this season, the Mullins Center sold out and fans packed the place to the rafters. It was loud and crazy, but the Minutemen came out flat. The Eagles jumped to a significant early lead and held on for the 84-73 victory.

Well it's Black Out Night at the Mullins Center tonight, and the Thursday night game with free T-shirts should draw a significant crowd.

The crowd will be ready for the biggest game of the year.

But will the Minutemen be?

Rob Greenfield can be reached at rgreenfi@student.umass.edu.

EXTROVERTS WANTED UMASS AMHERST IS IN SEARCH OF
TOUR GUIDES

1 Lead campus tours for students and families interested in the UMass Amherst Campus.
2 Paid hourly position with a minimum commitment of 5 hours a week including some weekends.
3 Serve as panel speakers, hosts, and tour leaders at on and off campus yield activities such as Open Houses and Accepted Student Receptions.
4 Conduct informational interviews with prospective students and their families.

UMASS AMHERST
To find out more about the position or to pick up an application visit us at the Campus Center Concourse on January 29th & 30th or February 12th - 16th, 2007.
Applications are also available at the Visitors Center. Application deadline is February 16th, 2007

LIQUORS 44

Smirnoff 80° 1.75 liter $19.99	Absolut $20.99 1.75 liter	Parrot Bay Mango-Passion Fruit-Pineapple Coconut 1.75 liter $25.99	Captain Morgan Spiced Rum 1.75 liter $25.99
Jose Cuervo Tattoo 750 mls $13.99	Jose Cuervo Cítrico Orange & Tequila 750 mls $17.99	Tanqueray Gin 1.75 liter $29.99	Crown Royal 750 mls $20.99
Kahlua 750 mls $14.99	Baileys Original Chocolate Mint & Caramel 750 mls $19.99	Belvedere Vodka 750 mls $24.99	Hennessy 750 mls $26.99

DOMESTIC KEGS	1/2 Bbls	1/4 Bbls
Bud	$68.99	$45.99
Bud Light	$68.99	$45.99
Coors Light	$68.99
Miller Lite	$68.99
Keystone Light	$47.99
Pabst Blue Ribbon	$48.99
Natural light/Ice	$44.99
Busch Light	$47.99

AT THE HADLEY LOCATION
458 Russell St. #9 • Campus Plaza
413-253-9344
Visit us at our other locations:
NORTHAMPTON • 236 King St.
HOLYOKE • 44 Lincoln St.
FULL REDEMPTION AT ALL LOCATIONS
NOT RESPONSIBLE FOR TYPOGRAPHICAL ERRORS
DON'T DRINK & DRIVE

UMass announces signing of 15 recruits back Steve Baylark to four straight 1,000-yard rushing seasons.

FOOTBALL from page 1

Coblyn is the main acquisition for the offensive line, and Brown cites his size and athletic ability as strengths.

"He's transferred to us and he's bolstered our offensive line," Brown said. "He's a tremendous athlete and his athleticism will be an important piece.

"In his workouts so far he has shown tremendous athleticism," he added. "He's also 6-foot-7, 285 pounds. It'll take you a year-and-a-half to run around him on the line of scrimmage. We just think he's got natural toughness."

Brown recruited Coblyn as a football player out of high school before he went to BU to play for coach Dennis Wolff and the Terriers. Coblyn transferred to UMass for the spring semester and will use the time to acclimate himself with the team and the new system.

"If he didn't have the Spring semester there would be not shot at getting him ready right now," Brown said. "But we think we have a shot to get him ready. He's physical. He's a great athlete. We think we have a chance to have a pretty special player there."

Incoming recruits Justin Sawicki, Brian Ostaszewski and Tim Nolan will also help to solidify the offensive line.

Brown also signed a new punter to replace All-American Christian Koegel. Brett Arnold transferred to UMass from Tuckwanna Junior College and will get a chance to become the full-time punter for the Minutemen in the fall.

"Arnold at punter will certainly be given a chance to compete for the punter's job," Brown said.

Hawkins, a dynamic quarterback capable of creating offense on his own, comes in behind Liam Coen and will most likely use the time on the sidelines to develop his game and prepare for his chance.

Hawkins threw 37 touchdowns as a high school senior and will most likely be redshirted in his freshman year with the Minutemen.

"[The UMass coaches] want me to be bigger," Hawkins told the Miami Herald yesterday morning.

Hawkins chose UMass over Florida Atlantic because the FAU coaches wanted to make Hawkins into a wide receiver or a defensive back.

"I wanted to be a quarterback," Hawkins told the Miami Herald. "I am a quarterback."

Brown also needed to fill the void on the defensive line left by John Hatchell and Jason Leonard, two of the key defensive figures in last year's title run who were lost to graduation.

Matt Goods, a defensive tackle from Rutherford, New Jersey, and defensive end Courtney Jackson from Maryland will help piece together another solid pass rush and run defense.

"Both [Goods and Jackson] will figure into our plans," Brown said. "We were just trying to bolster the core groups. Leonard and Hatchell are gone. We felt we needed an inside guy and an outside guy there. The offensive line needed to be sized up and we felt we did that."

Rob Greenfield can be reached at rgreenfi@student.umass.edu.

2007 UMass Football Newcomers

Player	Pos.	Yr.	Ht.	Wt.	Hometown
Brett Arnold	P/K	Jr.	6-0	180	Loughorne, Pa.
Ben Coblyn*	OL	Jr.	6-8	285	Amherst, Mass.
Matt Goods	DT	Fr.	6-2	255	Rutherford, N.J.
Octavious Hawkins	QB	Fr.	6-2	205	Hollywood, Fla.
Emil Igwenagu	LB	Fr.	6-2	215	Boylston, Mass.
Courtney Jackson	DE	Fr.	6-2	225	Brandywine, Md.
Jeromy Miles*	DB	So.	6-2	207	Sicklerville, N.J.
Ryan Moreshead	LB	Fr.	6-2	230	Foxborough, Mass.
Tim Nolan	OL	Fr.	6-4	300	Jackson, N.J.
Brian Ostaszewski	OT	Fr.	6-5	300	Stamford, Conn
Chris Pollard*	DB	Jr.	6-2	215	Camden, N.J.
Sloan Russett*	TB	Fr.	5-10	200	Manchester, N.H.
Josh Samuda	OL	Fr.	6-4	300	Weston, Fla
Justin Sawicki	OT	Fr.	6-5	205	Medford, Mass.
Julian Talley	WR	Fr.	6-1	180	Sicklerville, N.J.

* Enrolled at UMass Spring 2007

Sophomore forward Jasmine Adair and the George Washington Colonials have reached the second-highest AP ranking in school history. No. 8 and are riding a 12-game winning streak.

Stone breaks out for Owls

W. BASKETBALL from page 14

to be on the top of her game. Burgin was at her highest level last week, compelling the A-10 to award her with conference Player of the Week.

She shared the honors with Beck.

In Charlotte's only action of the week, Burgin scored a career-high 24 points on 10-of-12 shooting at home against Saint Louis. This was Charlotte's only action of the week. It takes on Fordham and Saint Joseph's next week.

Charlotte owns the A-10's best home record. The 49ers are 11-0 at home and haven't lost at Halton since last December.

Precious Stone

Temple freshman Jasmine Stone came off the bench to average 8.5 points and 7.5 rebounds in the Owls' two games last weekend – wins over Xavier and Dayton.

Stone's emergence provides the Owls with another scoring threat. Senior Kamesha Hairston leads the A-10 in both scoring (20.4 points per game) and rebounding (nine boards per game).

After losing to Rutgers in its final non-conference game of the season, Temple strung together three straight conference wins. The Owls should have more success in the coming week, as they have three consecutive home games to close out league play at Charlotte, Duquesne and No. 8 GW.

In Temple's Feb. 2 home victory over Xavier, the Musketeers held Hairston to just eight points – snapping her 27-game double figures streak. Xavier freshman Amber Harris has been stellar for Xavier defensively – she is a virtual lock to win A-10 Defensive Player of the Year. In lieu of Hairston's output, junior center Lady Comfort poured in 21 points and grabbed 13 rebounds – this was her third double-double of the season.

Harris' defense nearly clinched the upset for Xavier, but the Owls held the Musketeers off – winning 59-58.

Freshman Takeisha Liddy also made up for Hairston's off-day, she scored 13 points on 5-of-13 from the field.

The game also featured 13 lead changes and came down to the final shot. Xavier senior guard Miranda Green front-rimmed a 3-point attempt that would have put the visitors ahead with 10 seconds remaining.

Border battle

The Rhode Island Rams (6-17, 4-5 A-10) have been an interesting specimen in the 2006-07 season. The Rams performed horribly in non-conference play and when that portion of the schedule was over, their record stood at 2-13.

But since A-10 play began, URI has strung together a slightly more impressive stretch. The Rams have won four of nine games in the A-10, while not a great record, it is brilliant when compared to their non-conference mark.

URI takes on UMass this weekend, looking to sweep the Minutemen on the season. The Rams defeated the Maroon and White in both teams' A-10 opener, 71-69 in overtime.

URI carried a two-point cushion at the break, but a back and forth second half sent the game into overtime. With three seconds left in the extra session, URI junior guard Safi Mojidi hit a free throw to give the Rams the lead. UMass turned the ball over on the inbound and Mojidi sank another from the charity stripe for the two-point win.

URI is coming off a loss to St. Joe's in its last game, but with a full week between that game and the contest with UMass, the Rams should feel no ill effect.

Joe Meloni can be reached at jmeloni@student.umass.edu.

FOUR Seasons
WINE • LIQUOR • CIGARS
333 Russell St., Rt. 9
Hadley, MA 01035
584-8174

Beer

Miller Lite 30 pk can $18.99*	Pabst Blue Ribbon 24 pk btl $11.99*	Twisted Teas 12 pk btl $10.99*	Pete's Ales 12 pk btl $8.99*
Icehouse 30 pk can $14.99*	Stella Artois 12 pk btl $11.99*	Don Equis Lager & Amber 12 pk btl $10.99*	J.W. Dundee Honey Brown 12 pk btl $7.99*
Budweiser & Bud Light 18 pk can $11.99*	Newcastle Brown Ale 12 pk btl $11.99*	Harpoon 12 pk btl $10.99*	Ithaca Brewery 6 pk btl $6.99*

all beer prices plus deposit

Liquor

Wine

TASTING NOTES
Friday Feb. 9 6-9p.m.
Magic Hat Brewery
Saturday Feb. 10 6-8p.m.
Baileys Irish Cream New Flavors
10% off 6 bottles* of wine everyday!!!
*some restrictions apply
Hours: Monday - Saturday 9am - 11pm
Sunday 12pm - 11pm

SKYPLEX
SPRINGFIELD'S HOTTEST NIGHTCLUB
3 CLUBS & 3 DJ's ALL UNDER ONE ROOF!!!
Thursday - 18+ College Night "Hot Body Contest"
Friday - 18+ "Underground Electronic Dance Party" Downstairs
"Top 40" Upstairs
Saturday - 21+ "Party VIP Style"
WANTED: Hip Young Promoters/Hosts • Earn $$$$
Calling all DJ's
Do you do campus and house parties? Looking for a chance to work at the HOTTEST Nightclub? Here's your chance to become a Club DJ! Signup online at www.info.skyplex.us
18+ $2.00 off admission before midnight with this ad
21+ FREE admission before midnight with this ad
code:umass
10 Stearns Square Springfield, MA 413-827-9000

Is your room more unique than this?
Do you have the BEST room?

Here's your chance to strut your stuff in the "Collegian Cribs" Contest for a chance to win a grand prize!
Submit up to three pictures online at TheCollegian@gmail.com
Deadline Feb.14 Voting beginning Feb.15

Seven O's
Every Wednesday: ♦Karaoke♦
Every Thursday: ♦Open Mic♦
This Friday: ♦Rock, Paper, Scissors Tournament♦
Win The Big Prize "To Las Vegas"
This Saturday: ♦Live Music♦
♦Ambitiously Malcolm♦
Route 116, 330 Amherst Rd Sunderland, MA 01375 (413) 665-5780
3 PM to 1 AM M-F
1 PM to 1 AM Sat&Sun
Must be 21 or older to enter. Must show valid ID.

Free Delivery to UMass
Menu Online @ andiamo.cc

5								9
	9	4		5	3		7
			2	4
4	2			5	8
	5						6
				7	4		2	3
				2	7
	8		1	3		9	4
2								1

ACROSS
1 Trade agcy
4 Taps player
10 Wedding token
14 Quiet down!
15 Romantically involved
16 Author Ferber
17 MGM's lion
18 Absorbed by environment
20 Tel ___ Jaffa
22 Oberon and others
23 Innumerable
26 Tex-Mex choice
30 Cloudless
33 Vertical fishing nets
34 Route from home to first
37 Foul odor
38 Aussie joey
39 Org. of Ducks
41 Abu Dhabi, Dubai et al
42 Jordan's language
46 Shuts that mass everything
50 Walked vigorously
51 Borscht vegetables
52 Hurries
54 Nauseated
58 Chops up
61 Comic Johnson
62 Gathers momentum
63 CD
68 Sharidk or Ben
69 Club Med. e.g.
70 Caesar's hail
71 Wood and Silver
72 Tampa Bay bridge
73 Strong desire

DOWN
1 Muslim faith
2 Malibu or Vette
3 Church singing group
4 Baby apron
5 Cycle starter?
6 Latch on to
7 Prospector's strike
8 Chris of tennis
9 Add more luster
10 Hip-hop group, Boys
11 Tack on
12 Wind dir
13 Pop
19 Put counter back to zero
21 Moral failing
24 Every last one
25 "Agnus ___"
27 Invadable
28 Transfer image
29 Cigar remains
31 Actress Jillian
32 Post-op regimen
34 Impetuous
35 Blood channel
36 Travels by glider
40 Whopper
43 Aggravates
44 Perfect example
45 Thumbles
47 Order form abbr.
48 A/C measure
49 On the briny
53 Eddie Murphy movie
55 Set in order
56 Cooker
57 Oman neighbor
59 A cinch
60 Put in storage
62 Shortened bk
63 Corp. head
64 Is able to
65 Chapter in history
66 Pigpen

Find all of today's puzzle solutions online!
WWW.DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

the Moan and Dove
come to our annual f*ck valentine's day party.
no couples allowed.
...love is for sissies.
themoananddove.com
460 West St. • Rte 116
Amherst, MA • 256-1710
3pm 'til 1am every day

Quote of the Day

"It's not a tumor!"
-Arnold Schwarzenegger in "Kindergarten Cop"

A College Girl Named Joe By Aaron Warner

I FEEL SO DISILLUSIONED. I THOUGHT COLLEGE WOULD BE ALL CUTE GUYS, CRAZY LIFE AND WE ALWAYS SMILING.
...AT LEAST THE BROCHURE MADE IT LOOK LIKE THAT.
JOE, YOU CAN'T EXPECT COLLEGE TO BE LIKE THE BROCHURE.
THEY NEED TO MAKE THOSE MORE REALISTIC. GUYS THAT DON'T BATHE, HAVING NO MONEY AND ME WHINING.

Welcome To Falling Rock National Park By Josh Shalek

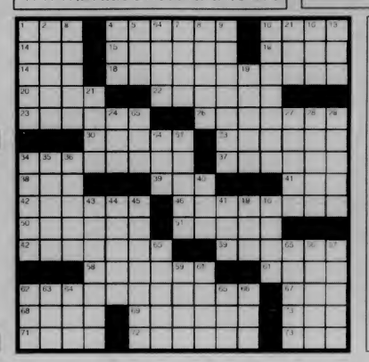
I like the outside world even less than here in the Park.
Do you get captured by animal control if you leave the Park?
No- he had a bad experience at a family-style restaurant
Would zee wee monsieur like to look at zee children's menu?

Wombat By Neil Bryer

SO, WHAT MOVIE SHOULD WE SEE?
HEY GUYS, LET'S SEE THE CRIME FIGHTING MONK MOVIE! IT'S BASED ON THE COMIC BOOK!
NEW RULE NEIL ISN'T ALLOWED TO PICK WHAT MOVIE WE SEE

The Family Monster By Josh Shalek

Tell me about your research projects
Are you curious about... growing proteins?
Not really
Well, that is what I've dedicated my life to studying
Next time we have a visitor, we don't start with Bird
If there is a next time



UMass YOGA
In Boyden 10
Mon/Wed
1:00-3:15 pm Power Yoga
3:30-4:45 pm Yoga Basics
Tues/Thurs
1:00-2:15 pm Yoga Basics
2:30-3:45 pm Intermediate
5:00-6:15 pm Yoga Basics
Spring 2007
Sign Up Now!
Semester Packages:
1 class per week $80
2 classes per week $150
Campus Recreation
Boyden 215 413-545-0022
umassyoga.com

Horoscopes

aquarius Jan. 20-Feb. 18
Revive your dormant interest in music by playing the lute or aquaggaswak.

pisces Feb. 19-Mar. 20
When called on in class, make the "bull sign" with your fingers and snort loudly.

aries Mar. 21-Apr. 19
Time is money. Forego wiping and retire early!

taurus Apr. 20-May 20
The 80's called and they want all their spandex back.

gemini May 21-Jun. 21
Avoid vegetables at all costs, too much roughage can cause leprosy.

cancer Jun. 22-Jul. 22
Jewel is NOT a person you should idolize. She has a snaggletooth.

leo Jul. 23-Aug. 22
You are quite amicable, if you lived in Fraggle Rock they'd definitely love you.

virgo Aug. 23-Sept. 22
Chicks dig scars, but this is not an excuse to fall off your scooter.

libra Sept. 23-Oct. 22
The arm hair of the person next to you is out of control - Comb it!

scorpio Oct. 23-Nov. 21
Ask yourself, "How many baby raccoons had to die so I could wear these boots?"

sagittarius Nov. 22-Dec. 21
Your bizarre habits involving toenail clipping frightens your roommate.

capricorn Dec. 22-Jan. 19
Use wingdings as the font for the next important assignment you turn in.

Chicago Pizzaria
Free Delivery!
PIZZA - CALZONES - SUBS - WRAPS
SALADS - PASTA - DINNERS
RIBS - SEAFOOD - SLICES
PARTY SIZE PIZZA NOW AVAILABLE!
CALZONE SLICES...LIKE NO OTHER!
Now open for lunch!
Hours
Sun-Wed: 11am-2am
Thurs-Sat: 11am-3am
Order For DELIVERY or PICK-UP
(413) 549-6073
150 Fearing Street
Next to Patterson Dorm
Amherst, MA 01002

Massachusetts Daily Collegian Marketplace

Announcements

Global Express Tours Spring Break Montreal Party Weekends from $99 Complete bus, hotels, & clubs. Montrealexpress.net 781-979-9001

Leave Massachusetts, Stay in the Country! Still time to apply for a Domestic Exchange! Deadline for fall 2007 and spring 2008 is March 1, 2007 Information Sessions Tuesdays and Wednesdays @ 4:45 in Goodell 614 through February 21 or call 545-5351.

Employment

Winter/ Spring positions available. Earn up to $150 per day Exp not required Undercover shoppers needed To Judge Retail and Dining Establishments. Call 800-722-4791

Rent us your ears! Listening Experiments $10/hr English must be your first language. Email: phonetics_lab@linguist.umass.edu voicemail: 545-6837

WORK ONLINE AT HOME 23 people needed immediately. Earn PT/FT income. Apply FREE online and get started! 800-807-5176 www.wahusa.com enter ad code 9053

Employment

Raft Guide Training Zoar Outdoor is seeking applicants for full and part-time summer jobs for raft guides, rock climbing instructors and kayak instructors. Raft Guide training runs weekends in March. Applicants should have customer service experience and a positive attitude toward learning new skills. Application deadline:Feb. 15th. For more information call Zoar Outdoor at 800-532-7483 or www.zoaroutdoor.com/jobs.htm EOE.

Employment

Become a summer orientation counselor and make a difference in the lives of over 4000 new students. Additional information and applications can be found at www.umass.edu/newstudent/contact/studentjobs/counselor The application deadline is February 16, 2007

Bartending $300/day potential. No experience necs. Training provided. 1-800-965-6520 ext.162

Services

Pregnancy Testing, HIV Testing, Birth Control, and Emergency Contraception STI Screening and Treatment. Affordable and confidential. Tapestry Health, 27 Pray Street, Amherst 548-9992. www.tapestryhealth.com

Room for Rent

Cape Cod Summer Near Hyannis. $150/week. 508-428-3456 CapePhotoArt@aol.com

Room for rent in house minutes away from area colleges $450 + Electric, Washer/Dryer. Call Ali 413-253-4929

Tracel

Global Express Tours Spring Break Montreal Party Weekends from $99 Complete bus, hotels, & clubs. Montrealexpress.net 781-979-9001

Wanted

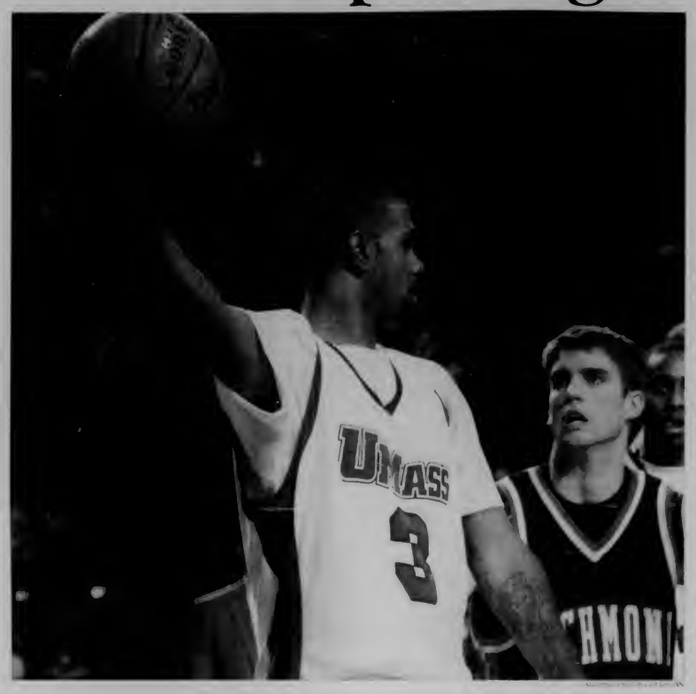
EGG DONORS NEEDED $10,000 (Plus all expenses) We are seeking women who are attractive, under the age of 29, SAT 1300+ (math+verbal), Physically fit and maintaining a healthy lifestyle. If you have a desire to help an infertile family and would like more information please contact us. Email: Darlene@aperfectmatch.com www.aperfectmatch.com 1-800-264-8828

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

SPORTS THURSDAY

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 8, 2007 SPORTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Up for grabs



Junior Gary Forbes led UMass past Richmond last Saturday with 16 points and 16 rebounds, marking his first double-double since he joined the Minutemen. UMass hosts Rhode Island tonight at 8 p.m. in a rematch from the Jan. 24 loss.

UMass hosts URI in rematch for first

By Danny Picard
Collegian Staff

There is plenty at stake for the Massachusetts men's basketball team this evening at the Mullins Center, as the Minutemen host Rhode Island (14-9, 7-2 Atlantic 10) at 8 p.m. in a rematch from two weeks ago. UMass (16-6, 5-2 A-10) didn't live up to its successful away-from-home record (9-4), dropping a heartbreaker to the Rams, 75-72, in a game that was decided by free throws.

URI fans covered the Ryan Center in pink shirts that night in an effort to support the fight against breast cancer. The Mullins Center will be supporting a fight of its own tonight, as the game will mark the first Black Out Night in support of the Minutemen.

Only, when asked if UMass would be wearing its road-black jerseys, coach Travis Ford said, "Probably not." Whether it's an optical illusion or marketing scheme that the team is going for, the Maroon and White must perform better against the Rams this time around.

"We didn't play with a lot of heart, we didn't play as hard as we're capable of playing," junior Gary Forbes said about the Jan. 24 loss to Rhode Island. "But I'm sure it will be different come Thursday."

The Minutemen can move into first place with a win this eve-

See M. BASKETBALL on page 11

Ford hopes to solve team's mystery soon

By Rob Greenfield
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts men's basketball team has been a giant enigma.

UMass is 16-6 overall and 6-2 in the Atlantic 10, a respectable record in a decent league against a tough non-conference schedule. So what's the problem?

The problem is that the Minutemen have their head coach guessing right now. Which team will show up? The electrifying group of guys that lit up the Louisville Cardinals on the road, or the ho-hum bunch that let the Richmond Spiders take a lead into the halftime break?

"I can't describe this group," UMass coach Travis Ford said before practice at the Curry Hicks Cage yesterday. "I don't get a vibe on them. It's hard. The most challenging thing ever in my coaching has been getting a vibe on these guys.

"Some games I think that there's no way that we're ready to play hard. That's the Louisville game. Before that game we had the worst practice ever. I was just really down. And then there are other games when I think, 'We're ready.'"

For a coach, it is the most frustrating dilemma of all. When the effort is there, the rest comes easy. Game planning and X's and O's are

See TEAM on page 11

Colonials ranked eighth in AP poll

Freshman guard Diatiena Hill and the Minutewomen will try to avenge a 71–69 overtime loss to Rhode Island when they host the Rams on Sunday.

By Joe Mitoso
Collegian Staff

Fresh off a decisive 72-53 win over the Richmond Spiders, the George Washington Colonials (19-2, 8-0 Atlantic 10) earned their second highest national ranking ever, landing the No. 8 spot in the Feb. 5 Associated Press Top-25 poll.

George Washington sits atop the A-10 at the moment, tied for first place with Temple. The teams meet in their final game of the season at GW. The Colonials' upcoming schedule shouldn't pose much of a threat. GW takes on Duquesne (7-14, 2-6 A-10) and St. Bonaventure (13-10, 3-5 A-10) on Feb. 8 and 11 respectively.

The Colonials' dominance of the A-10 is no surprise to anyone – they entered the season as the favorites to win the conference. The win over Richmond extended their win streak to 12.

GW junior guard Kimberly Beck is a major reason for the Colonials' excellence. In her only action of the week, Beck scored 16 points and handed out seven assists for GW. Beck's assist total gave her 458 for her career and moved her into third place on GW's all-time list.

Beck's performance netted her A-10 Conference Co-Player of the Week for the second time this season. She won the award for the week of Jan. 15 as well.

49ERS MAKE THEIR MARK

The Charlotte 49ers (16-5, 7-1 A-10) are making some noise within the conference. Their only loss came in Kingston, R.I. to the Rhode Island Rams. URI pulled the unlikely upset in the form of a 91–56 decision.

Charlotte will face it toughest challenges in the coming weeks. The 49ers welcome both George Washington and Temple to Halton Arena in a three-day span.

When the top two teams in the conference arrive in North Carolina, Charlotte will need Danielle Buran

See W BASKETBALL on page 12

Gators are unanimous pick

Florida remains on top of both AP and ESPN polls

Steve Games
Collegian Staff

The Florida Gators are looking like the national champions of last season. The Gators (22-2) have not lost since Dec. 3 against Florida State. The No. 1 Gators are winning with a talented starting five and great defense. During their 14-game winning streak the Gators have held opponents under an average of 65 points.

Junior forward Al Horford could not be contained against Tennessee as Florida won the game easily, 94-78. Horford filled the stat sheet, leading the Gators in almost every category. The NBA lottery-bound Horford recorded a career-high 22 points, 13 rebounds, five assists, one steal and three blocks.

The Gators avenged last year's home loss to the Tennessee Volunteers when junior forward Joakim Noah had his teeth knocked out. The Volunteers were without 20-point scorer Chris Lofton. Lofton has missed four consecutive games with a sprained right ankle.

Gators head coach Billy Donovan feels Horford is not getting the respect he deserves. The John Wooden Award list for the Outstanding College Basketball Player in the United States came out with 30 candidates, and Horford's name did not make the cut. Three of his teammates made the list: Noah (who has almost identical numbers as Horford), junior guard Taurean Green and junior forward Corey Brewer. According to ESPN.com, Horford is projected as a lottery bound pick for the 2007 NBA Draft.

NO LONGER UNDER THE RADAR

The Big 12 Conference showcases some of the best teams in the nation. Nobody could have predicted that Texas A&M would be 8-1 in the Big 12 at this point of the season. The Aggies (20-3) are ranked No. 7 in the country according to the USA Today/ESPN Coaches Poll.

The Aggies defeated two ranked teams within two days. They went on the road to No. 6 Kansas and pulled off a comeback victory, 69-66. Senior guard Acie Law IV outdueled Kansas sophomore guard Brandon Rush. Law finished with 23 points and seven assists, while Rush struggled, scoring 10 points on 3-for-13 shooting from the field.

Junior forward Joakim Noah and the Florida Gators remained No. 1 in both major polls, the first unanimous No. 1 in the AP poll in two years.

Freshman Greg Oden had 17 points, seven rebounds and seven blocks in Tuesday night's 76–63 win over Michigan.

Law scored the game's final five points, including the game-winning 3-pointer. With 45 seconds left the Aggies found themselves down, 66-64. Law then took the game into his own hands. He drilled a 3-pointer right over Rush. With 20 seconds left Kansas sophomore guard Mario Chalmers missed a jumper and Law sealed the game with two free throws.

Two days later the Aggies defeated No. 25 Texas, 100-82. Law showed that Player of the Year favorite, freshman forward Kevin Durant, was not the only superstar on the court. Law put on a passing clinic, dishing out 15 assists and scoring 21 points. Aggies sophomore guard Josh Carter chipped in on the high-scoring affair with 24 points, five assists and 10 rebounds.

Only three years ago – when Law was a sophomore – the Aggies finished 0-16 in the Big 12 Conference.

UPSET SPECIAL

When San Diego State last beat a top 25 opponent, it was 2001. The Aztecs pulled off a convincing upset victory over No. 13 Air Force, 62-41. The Aztecs (16-7) remembered the last meeting between the two teams on Jan. 20, when Air Force won in a close contest, 56-51. Aztecs senior forward Mohamed Abukar scored 16 points and notched eight rebounds.

Air Force struggled from the field shooting 15 percent from 3-point range (3-19). Coming into the game they averaged 72 points per game, the 41 points is a season low for the Falcons.

FOOTBALL OR BASKETBALL: SAME RESULT

Ohio State, like its football team, took care of business against Michigan. The No. 3 Buckeyes defeated Michigan, 76-63. Led by the Indianapolis natives, freshmen Mike Conley Jr. and Greg Oden, the Buckeyes improved to 21-3 overall and are tied for the lead in the Big Ten Conference.

Oden got into foul trouble early in the second half. He sat for 8.5 minutes watching his former high school teammate, Conley Jr., take over. During that span Conley Jr. hit 9-of-12 shots from the field, including two 3-pointers. He finished with a game-high 23 points and six assists.

When he wasn't in foul trouble Oden controlled the inside on both the offensive and defensive end. He scored 15 points and blocked seven shots. The Buckeyes finished the game with 14 blocked shots, one shy of the record set 27 years ago.

Steve Games can be reached at sgames@student.umass.edu.

UMASS, LASME HAMMER RAMS | PAGE 10

'VOLVER' CLIMAXES | PAGE 5

THE MASSACHUSETTS

DAILY COLLEGIAN

NEW ENGLAND'S LARGEST COLLEGE DAILY EST 1890

WINDY : HI: 28 LO: 9 WWW.DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 9, 2007

Student Union rally addresses campus policies

Nicole Boonsakulakul / Collegian Staff

Approximately 80 people gathered to listen and show their concern for higher education at a rally at the UMass Student Union, yesterday.

By Nicole Boonsakulakul
Collegian Staff

AMHERST — The freezing temperatures outside did not cool down the fervor expressed by members of the community at a rally at the University of Massachusetts Student Union, yesterday.

Members of the Graduate Employee Offices, the Student Government Association, undergraduate and graduate students of UMass, as well as members of the Amherst community, united in front of the Student Union steps to raise their voices about the University's administration and its' current policies. About 80 people gathered to listen and show their concern on issues such as educational funding, campus diversity, UMass' quality of education and the overall future of the University's credibility as a public institution of higher education.

Jeff Napolitano, president of the Graduate Student Senate, spoke to the crowd, first stressing a concern about how the administration distributes its funding.

"For the past several years here at UMass, students have been repeatedly told that there's no money to make things better here," he began. "The Vice Chancellor and Chancellor both have claimed the poorhouse when it comes to making this school diverse and representative of people who live in this state." He explained how the administration has cut funding for outreach programs in Holyoke and Springfield, but has managed to double tuition and fees for UMass students.

During his speech, Napolitano raised his arm to display a chart to the audience, illustrating the pattern of tuition and fee increases since 1977. A loud "boo" arose from the crowd as he pointed to the peak of the chart, which represented 2006 the year of the highest hike in fees in the past thirty years. He claimed that the administration blames state funding on higher education when students and faculty complain about the lack of resources, but expressed his realization that the blame shouldn't be entirely placed on the state.

"Last year, Chancellor Lombardi claimed that bringing back faculty to 1999 levels was his number one priority," Napolitano explained. "But when we checked this year, he took the money that he promised away and instead, reduced the student-teacher ratio. He cried 'poor' and said we didn't get enough money from the state, but we have to use the money to repair buildings instead."

Napolitano said that not only is the funding being distributed to the on-going campus construction, but it is falling into the pockets of the administrators themselves. According to Napolitano, as of October 2006 the cost for administrators on campus was $11 million — a $4

See RALLY on page 2

UMass club re-established

Students soar with Hang Gliding and Paragliding Club after ten years

By Alyssa Montalbano
Collegian Staff

If you thought soaring above the earth into the clouds could only happen in a dream, your dream is about to come true. Last semester, the University of Massachusetts started a Hang Gliding and Paragliding Club, a club which existed at UMass until the 1990's.

President Theda Rose Silver-Pell, a transfer student at UMass, was responsible for re-establishing the club. Silver-Pell transferred to UMass from San Diego and was excited to join the Hang Gliding and Paragliding club, but was disappointed to find out that the club no longer existed.

Recently, the U.S. Hang Gliding and Paragliding Association (USHPA) director Gary Trudeau spoke to hopeful members of the club and answered any questions that students had. "It is a common misconception that this sport is dangerous," said Trudeau. "It is not a very high-risk sport and there really is a lot of safety built into it." Trudeau is a hang glider and paraglider himself, and is excited about helping the club start up again.

Vice President of the UMass Hang Gliding and Paragliding club, James Highsmith, traveled to Mexico for three weeks to lead paragliding tours. When asked if there were risks involved in this sport, Highsmith replied, "Yes, but there are risks every time you get off your couch and turn on your television. The college does a lot to minimize the risk."

Although hang gliding and paragliding are very closely related, they are not the same thing. Both hang gliding and paragliding are a recreational, as well as a competitive flying sport. A paraglide, itself, is a free flying, foot launched aircraft, in which the pilot sits in a harness suspended below a fabric wing. When paragliding, it is possible to be thousands of feet from the launch place you began at.

Hang gliding is different in that it uses a much simpler and less expensive craft. The pilot is mounted on a harness hanging from the wing frame and controls the craft by shifting body weight.

The cost of the club's membership is free, although the equipment may be expensive. "We have some equipment for the group. We are trying to do a lot of things with no costs. We are getting support from local businesses. Last semester, we arranged to get free tandem flights," said Silver-Pell.

Tandem flights are a beginning step to this sport to allow

See CLUB on page 2

A paraglide is a free flying, foot launched aircraft, in which the pilot sits in a harness suspended below a fabric wing.

Members of the UMass Hang Gliding and Paragliding Club hang glide in West Rutland, VT, September 30, 2006.

Anna Nicole, 39, dies at Florida hotel

Cause of model's death is still under investigation

By Suzette Laboy
Associated Press

HOLLYWOOD, Fla. — Anna Nicole Smith, the pneumatic blonde whose life played out as an extraordinary tabloid tale — jeans model, Playboy centerfold, widow of an octogenarian billionaire, reality-show subject, tragic mother — died Thursday after collapsing at a hotel. She was 39.

She was stricken while staying at the Seminole Hard Rock Hotel and Casino and was rushed to a hospital. Edwina Johnson, chief investigator of the Broward County Medical Examiner's Office, said the cause of death was under investigation and an autopsy would be done on Friday.

Just five months ago, Smith's 20-year-old son died suddenly in the Bahamas in what was believed to be a drug-related death.

Seminole Police Chief Charlie Tiger said a private nurse called 911 after finding Smith unresponsive in her sixth-floor room. He said Smith's bodyguard administered cardiopulmonary resuscitation about an hour before she was declared dead.

Through the '90s and into the new century, Smith was famous for being famous, a pop-culture punchline because of her up-and-down weight, her Marilyn Monroe looks, her exaggerated curves, her little-girl voice, her ditzy-blonde persona, and her over-the-top revealing outfits.

Recently, she lost a reported 69 pounds and became a spokeswoman for TrimSpa, a weight-loss supplement. On her reality show and other recent TV appearances, her speech was often slurred and she seemed out of it. Some critics said she seemed drugged-out.

Model, centerfold, and reality TV show star Anna Nicole Smith died yesterday, at the Seminole Hard Rock Hotel and Casino in South Florida.

Her former lawyer Lenard Leeds told the celebrity gossip Web site TMZ that Smith "always had problems with her weight going up and down, and there's no question she used alcohol." Leeds said it was no secret that "she had a very troubled life" and had "so many, many problems."

The stepson died June 20 at age 67. But the family said the court fight would continue

Campus culture said to be culprit for eating disorders

By Aaron Steiner
The Observer (Notre Dame)

SOUTH BEND, Ind. — Last year, when an anorexic Brazilian supermodel died weighing 88 pounds and designers announced the creation of size 00 clothes for the thinnest customers, body image debates raged through the style capitals of the world.

Notre Dame may be far removed from runways, but it hasn't escaped the same problems that plague the fashion industry – and that's the reason behind Student Senate's "Eating Disorders and the Campus Culture" conference, which begins today.

Disorders such as anorexia, bulimia, binge eating disorder and muscular dysmorphia are as prevalent at Notre Dame as at other college campuses – if not more so – due to a variety of factors within the University's environment, say University staff members and the conference's student organizers.

Student body president Lizzi Shappell said students in any top-20 university like Notre Dame are ambitious in the classroom – and outside of it too.

"It's a very competitive, perfectionist culture," Shappell said. "I think that combined with the pressures that most women and men, even, experience from the media – those two things together make the college campus a high pressure environment for keeping up that aura of perfection."

Notre Dame Food Services nutritionist Jocelyn Antonelli also stressed the dangers of perfectionism, which she said creates a proneness to eating disorders.

"[Students] want perfection in every area – including how they look and how they eat," Antonelli said.

Such perfectionism can foster eating disorders and body image issues, ranging from compulsive exercising and anorexia to binging and purging meals, Shappell said.

"[Notre Dame] is really a pressure cooker for these disorders," she said.

Valerie Staples, a counselor and eating disorders specialist at the University Counseling Center, said typical Notre Dame students "work hard and play hard."

"Both can be positive. Both can be negative," she said. "Finding a balance is a challenge for many students. Many have excelled [in the past] and find it difficult when they aren't 'number one,' but one of many very successful students."

The fear of transitioning from superstar to another face in the

See DISORDERS on page 2

Battle ensues over Mass. blood supply

By Steve LeBlanc
Associated Press

BOSTON — For the thousands of donors who give blood each year, the act of rolling up their sleeves is a selfless gesture intended to help meet the medical needs of strangers.

But behind the scenes in Massachusetts is a growing battle over who controls the state's blood supply and whether the demand for safe, reliable blood should be thrown open to the forces of the market.

Massachusetts is the only state that does not allow any private groups – other than the Red Cross – to collect or distribute blood. Although the Red Cross can't charge for the blood itself, the not-for-profit can charge hospitals a fee to cover the costs of collecting, testing and distributing blood.

The state's hospitals say the law gives the Red Cross a virtual monopoly and drives up prices. The hospitals are pushing a bill to allow other groups to compete for the blood business.

The decision to limit blood collection to the Red Cross came during the early days of AIDS when some private companies recruited anyone off the street to donate, paying them a small fee. That led to fears of a contaminated blood supply, although better testing has eased concerns.

Paul Wingle, spokesman for the Massachusetts Hospital Association, said the push for the bill is driven by stark fiscal realities.

Hospitals in Massachusetts are

See BLOOD on page 2

Massachusetts is the only state that does not allow any private group – other than the Red Cross – to collect or distribute blood.

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN
CXVII
ISSUE 80

113 Campus Center University of Massachusetts Amherst, MA 01003
• 413-545-3500 •
• Fax 413-545-3699 •
www.dailycollegian.com

EDITOR IN CHIEF Eric Athas
MANAGING EDITOR Rob Greenfield
BUSINESS MANAGER Dan Conti
PRODUCTION MANAGER Amanda Allen
NIGHT SUPERVISOR Sheryl Wolnik
ADVERTISING MANAGER Jameson Porter
ADVERTISING PRODUCTION Molly Eggleston
ARTS & LIVING EDITOR Morgan Rousseau
COMICS EDITOR Adam Staigen
EDITORIAL EDITOR Tucker Merrick
NEWS EDITOR Matt Bellveau
SPORTS EDITOR Danny Picard
SPORTS EDITOR Jon Pelland
CIRCULATION MANAGER Jeff Perer
FINANCE MANAGER David Velade
ASSISTANT OPERATIONS Linda Wallack
ASSISTANT ADVERTISING Nic. & Puddester
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Tim McCall
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Sidney Towne
ASSISTANT NEWS Anna Dolimitis
ASSISTANT NEWS Nicole Boongakakul
ASSISTANT EDITORIAL Brendan Hall
WEB EDITOR James Hale
PHOTO EDITOR Toan Trinh

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN IS PUBLISHED MONDAY THROUGH FRIDAY DURING THE UNIVERSITY OF MASSACHUSETTS CALENDAR SEMESTER. THE COLLEGIAN IS INDEPENDENTLY FUNDED OPERATING ON ADVERTISING REVENUE. FOUNDED IN 1890, THE PAPER BEGAN AS BLUE LIFE, BECAME THE COLLEGE SCRAP IN 1901, THE WEEKLY COLLEGIAN IN 1914 AND THE TRI-WEEKLY COLLEGIAN IN 1956. PUBLISHED DAILY SINCE 1967, THE COLLEGIAN HAS BEEN BROADSHEET SIN E JANUARY 1994. FOR ADVERTISING, RATES, AND INFORMATION, CALL 545-3500 BETWEEN 8:30 A.M. AND 3:30 P.M.

PRODUCTION CREW
On staff today

NIGHT EDITOR
Sheryl Wolnik

COPY EDITOR
Courtney Souza

PRODUCTION SUPERVISOR
Chris Martin

The Daily Collegian is always looking for new writers... come join us!

Student Special
4 MONTHS
$149
Aerobics · Mixed
Free wts · Martial Arts
www.amherstathletic.com
AMHERST ATHLETIC CLUB
256-0080
50 AMHERST

UMass club teaches students to hang glide and paraglide

The club traveled to New York, New Hampshire, Vermont, and Connecticut over winter break, and some of the club members also traveled to Puerto Rico.

CLUB from page 1

a person to get the feel of what they are doing.

"It gives a person a sense of what it is like," said Silver-Pell. "It is actually like real flying. You can stay up for hours," she added.

As of now, the club is also trying to work out a deal with a flight school in New Hampshire to get group lessons, where the previous UMass club used to go.

The club traveled to states such as New York, New Hampshire, Vermont and Connecticut over winter break, and some of the club members traveled to Puerto Rico.

Silver-Pell took three students and trainers to Puerto Rico for ten days over winter break, where they stayed with people who own a flying school and learned more about hang gliding and paragliding. "We did training and flying as well as having fun at the beach," said Silver-Pell.

If anyone is interested in joining the Hang Gliding and Paragliding club, a meeting is being held on Thursday, Feb. 15 at 7 p.m. in Campus Center room 805 or Theda Rose Silver-Pell can be reached by e-mail at tsilverpa@student.umass.edu.

College atmosphere said to raise health anxiety among students crowd contributes to the development of eating disorders, she said.

DISORDERS from page 1

Junior Ashley Weiss, chair of the Student Senate Gender Issues committee, and graduate student and co-conference coordinator Ali Wishon said they believe eating disorders are more common across Notre Dame's campus than people realize or are willing to accept.

"It's something that you wake up and see everyday," Weiss said. "You see the girls that wake up and go running every morning or the guys that are constantly at the gym and then at the dining halls, you can see the health food craze," she said. "None of [these things] are bad, but just taken to the extreme."

Shappell agreed, saying she knew a substantial number of people in high school and at Notre Dame afflicted with eating disorders.

"I think that body image is something that nearly every young woman has struggled with, at least at some point in time," she said.

At Notre Dame, Antonelli said she thinks eating disorders often stem from dieting or restrictive eating habits. Whether a student stops snacking, skips meals or eliminates carbohydrates, these habits — often paved with good intentions — can lead to disorders, she said.

Overall, students seem to put great emphasis on eating and staying healthy, but in some cases students become so food-conscious they are anxious about eating, she added.

"Some people are so concerned about the 'freshman 15,'" Antonelli said. "This summer I had several students call before school started, stating they were anxious about [gaining weight]. That's never happened before."

Antonelli said she regularly sees students for nutritional counseling. If she believes a student is suffering from an eating disorder, she will refer the student to the Counseling Center, she said.

In addition to problems with food, obsessive or compulsive exercising may also become an issue for those struggling with body image disorders.

With a high percentage of former varsity athletes comprising the Notre Dame student body, "our campus is extremely athletic," Shappell said. Such athleticism can place too much attention on staying fit and looking good, she said.

Notre Dame RecSports co-director Sally Derengoski said while RecSports provides services to students that promote healthy exercising habits — including the new personal training program — staff members see some students "take it to the extreme."

"The great majority of students who come to play or work out are doing so within a range that is helpful and healthy," Derengoski said. "Do we see cases that exceed that range? Certainly, and in those cases we work with the Counseling Center and the Office of Student Affairs to best provide for the student."

In addition to problems with food, obsessive or compulsive exercising may also become an issue for students struggling with eating disorders.

Students speak out against campus finances, diversity

As of October 2006, the cost for administrators on campus was $11 million – a $4 million increase from 2004.

RALLY from page 1

million increase from 2004. He shared the numbers for the increases in salaries of Vice Chancellor Gargano, Provost Charlena Seymour and Chancellor Lombardi, which were $20,000, $70,000, and $100,000 respectively.

"The administration has managed to increase their salaries by 50 percent," Napolitano said, stressing that "this isn't just about gaining funds from the state.

"This is about the unaccountable ways that the people who are getting the money spend it largely on themselves," he said. "We've had enough, and we're no longer going to settle for cries of a poorhouse. We're going to the State House to make sure this university is properly funded," he concluded.

Stephanie Luce of the Massachusetts Society of Professors took the platform briefly afterwards to stress the importance of taking direct action on campus to ensure that students, staff and faculty get a voice in how the campus is run.

"It's not only about actually setting the priorities but also, who sets them. And it's clear that the administration doesn't want us as a part of the decision-making," Luce said.

The next issue on the rally agenda was the issue of diversity at UMass, in which Yveline Alexis, co-chair of the Black Graduate Student Organization, addressed concern. Alexis touched upon milestones in educational history, such as the case of Brown v. Board of Education, sharing her fear of history repeating itself. She explained how racially motivated incidents at UMass in the past years caused the administration to develop a diversity commission in 2004.

After the release from the Commission, Vice Chancellor Gargano and Chancellor Lombardi issued a report saying they were committed to building a community of racial and ethnic diversity.

But Alexis described that the number of underrepresented students have dwindled in 2006.

She asked listeners, "Why is it that, in 2006, the diversity fellowship has been re-channeled somewhere else? Why, as a public university, haven't we taken a public stance against the blows to affirmative action that benefits our nation as a whole? And why is it that we are still waiting for the answers to these questions?"

In terms of fighting for fair wages, decent healthcare and working conditions for students at UMass, Justin Jackson of the History Department believes more involvement from students and spreading knowledge on the issue will help win the cause.

But Jackson also suggests that "if the University doesn't want to negotiate in good faith, then we take our hands, and put them in our pockets. We take our pencils, and put them in our desk drawers. Maybe we should take our grades and put those away too at the end of the semester and see how well this university runs without us."

Elvis Mendez addressed the lack of student accessibility to places where students can just be. He shares his concern of how the administration treats its students like consumers and how the University has become a business for administrators to gain profit.

"Whenever I talk to administrators, all they ever talk to me about is marketing and branding the university," Mendez, the SGA president said. "Our relationship to them is as consumers, and their position to us is suppliers. Education should not be a sellable good. It is our right, and to reduce the relationship of students and teachers to one between a supplier and consumer is to devalue the importance of education and undermine why universities exist," Mendez said.

Nicole Boongakakul is a Collegian staff writer and can be reached at nicboong@umass.edu

Blood proposal is 'take it or leave it'

BLOOD from page 1

spending up to 25 percent more per unit of blood than hospitals in other states, a cost that forces up the price of health care at a time when the state is trying to rein in the cost of health insurance, he said.

"There's no competition," he said. "That means contracts for blood are basically a take it or leave it proposition."

Although more than two dozen hospitals in Massachusetts are allowed to collect blood for their own use, licensing other private collectors could greatly increase the state's blood supply as well as bring down costs, Wingle said.

Red Cross officials say they haven't taken an official position on the bill, but say their mission remains the same — guaranteeing a safe, reliable supply of blood in Massachusetts.

"We value our relationships with hospitals," said Donna Morrissey, spokeswoman for the American Red Cross in Massachusetts. "We do try to keep the price as low as possible as part of our mission as a not-for-profit." toughen regulations governing the collecting, testing and delivery of blood products in the state.

EXTROVERTS WANTED UMASS AMHERST IS IN SEARCH OF
TOUR GUIDES

1 Lead campus tours for students and families interested in the UMass Amherst Campus.
2 Paid hourly position with a minimum commitment of 5 hours a week including some weekends.
3 Serve as panel speakers, hosts, and tour leaders at on and off campus yield activities such as Open Houses and Accepted Student Receptions.
4 Conduct informational interviews with prospective students and their families.

UMASS AMHERST
To find out more about the position or to pick up an application visit us at the Campus Center Concourse on January 29th & 30th or February 12th - 16th, 2007.
Applications are also available at the Visitors Center. Application deadline is February 16th, 2007

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

THE CAMPUS SCENE

A WEEKLY LOOK AT THE UNIVERSITY LIFESTYLE

For sweet tooths and valentines alike

BY MELISSA D'AMICO
COLLEGIAN STAFF

St. Valentine's Day, named for three different St. Valentines, is rooted in the festivals of ancient Rome, and did not become associated with love and romance until the 14th century. Over the centuries, the holiday began to change, and by the 18th century, gift-giving and the exchange of hand-made cards on Valentine's Day had become common throughout England. Hand-made valentine cards made of lace, ribbons, and featuring cupids and hearts eventually spread to the American colonies.

Now, Valentine's Day is a holiday recognized throughout the world as a day to celebrate the ones you love, and the ones you want to love, through gift-giving, flowers, romance, and of course, chocolate!

With Valentine's Day swiftly approaching, Historic Deerfield will once again be hosting their day-long celebration of chocolate. On Saturday, Feb. 10, Historic Deerfield will be having their fourth annual Chocolate Festival.

The 13 houses which line the 330-year-old street of Historic Deerfield display a collection of over 25,000 Colonial American objects and artifacts and create a view into Colonial American culture. Historic Deerfield will be donating an entire day to chocolate-themed activities throughout the area for children and adults of all ages.

As visitors are guided through historic homes and exhibits, they are welcomed and encouraged to enjoy chocolate-themed demonstrations and lectures. Some visitors may choose to watch Susan McLellan Plaisted, Director of Foodways at Pennsbury Manor, as she roasts cacao beans over an open-hearth. Cacao beans are the seeds of the cacao tree, and are used to make cocoa. While she roasts and grinds the beans on a metate, or flat stone, visitors will learn about the importance and preparation of chocolate in colonial culture.

Other visitors may enjoy "Sweet Concoctions: The History of Chocolate in Early America," a talk by Susan Lange, Curator of Historic interiors at Historic Deerfield. Lange will highlight the use of chocolate within America, and its development into a favored treat.

At a silversmith demonstration, visitors can watch Steve Smithers as he creates a silver chocolate pot, one of many items crafted and used by Colonial Americans to prepare and enhance the experience of eating and drinking chocolate.

A variety of craft activities are available throughout the day, and are perfect for children and families. Visitors are able to create their own valentines, weave Swedish heart baskets, or even make their own Mexican hot chocolate mix to take home. All visitors can also enjoy a horse drawn wagon ride throughout Historic Deerfield, which begins outside the Hall Tavern.

If visitors want to learn more about Historic Deerfield and life in Colonial America, there are a number of opportunities throughout the festival. Half-hour guided tours are offered throughout many of the historic homes including the Ashley House, Williams House, Frary House, and the Silver Shop. Yet, if you would rather experience Historic Deerfield at your own pace, self-guided experiences can be enjoyed at the Sheldon House, Stebbins House, as well as the Flynt Center of Early New England Life.

The Flynt Center, a museum which looks like many of the tobacco barns located throughout the area, offers decorative art including architectural pieces, antiques, and textiles, from Deerfield's town history.

Of course, a chocolate festival would never be complete without the opportunity for visitors to enjoy a few chocolate samples. A new addition to the festival this year is a gourmet chocolate tasting. This activity will be led with a presentation by Bob Heiss, a specialty food buyer and co-owner of Cooks Shop Here, located in Northampton.

The focal point, however, of Historic Deerfield's Chocolate Festival is not the exhibits or demonstrations, but the variety of chocolate specialties and treats created by and available at the Deerfield Inn. The Deerfield Inn is a fully functioning inn, established in the late 19th century, and is located within Historic Deerfield.

Chocolate tasting can be enjoyed both upstairs and downstairs at the inn throughout the day. It doesn't matter if you order a salad, chicken, or cake, everything offered at the inn uses chocolate as an ingredient in some form. A number of soups, entrees, desserts, and beverages, as well as three chocolate fountains are available for all visitors to buy.

Some may wonder why chocolate has been so strongly connected with love and romance. The connection of chocolate with Valentine's Day, in modern times, was most likely a result of money-making ideas, such as Richard Cadbury's creation of the heart-shaped chocolate box for Valentine's Day in 1861. However, long before Cadbury, ancient cultures discovered and believed in many benefits of eating chocolate.

The history of chocolate is a complicated one, going back to the days of the Aztec in Mexico. The Aztec associated chocolate with their goddess of fertility Xochiquetzal, from which its relationship to love and sex may have originated. It was consumed as a drink called xocoatl, which was often seasoned with vanilla, chili pepper, and pimento.

Throughout history it has also been suggested that chocolate is an aphrodisiac, something which arouses sexual desire. It is even believed that the well-know womanizer Giacomo Casanova made a habit of eating chocolate before going to bed with his women for this very reason. As these beliefs moved through different cultures, greater connections with love and chocolate were developed until it become a common tradition to associate the two.

Whether chocolate truly contains powers as the Aztec believed, or simply because men and women associate love and chocolate out of a historical tradition, the two will remain a key element to the Valentine's Day celebrations between loved ones.

Historic Deerfield's Chocolate Festival begins Feb. 10 at 10 a.m. Admission to the event cost $7 for adults, $5 for children ages 6 to 21, and children under 6 are free. Food tickets for the Deerfield Inn are sold separately, for a dollar each. So whether you want to learn a bit more about Historical Deerfield, want to begin your Valentine's Day celebration a little bit earlier, or just love everything to do with chocolate, Historic Deerfield's Chocolate festival has something sweet for everybody to enjoy.

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

EDITORIAL OPINION

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 9, 2007

I may not agree with what you say but I will defend to the death your right to say it. Voltaire

EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

CASUAL FRIDAY

Burning up inside

Michael Cartwright

I am generally encouraged by my editor to explore campus-related issues, and subsequently offer insightful bits of analysis.

This certainly seems like a sensible suggestion for a journalist, however, I am currently living off-campus while taking nearly forty percent of my courses online. Investigating campus-related topics would force me to suffer freezing university grounds, and abandon the comforts of my cushy Amherst apartment.

If I am ill-prepared for my war with winter I could easily wind up looking like Jack Nicholson during the final moments of "The Shining."

Never in my life have I felt the desire to explore the glacial winter winds of the New England outdoors. I hate skiing (both Alpine & Nordic), loath skating (both Figure & Speed), and feel abnormally indifferent about sledding (both Tube & Wood).

I haven't yet banked enough money to purchase a George Costanza Goretex jacket, and unless I someday become a professor of the Classics, I will continually refuse to don a scarf, or any piece of woolen neckwear whatsoever. Furthermore, unlike the cloned female drones roaming this campus, I unfortunately don't own a pair of Inuit-looking Arctic Seal-stompers.

Just like Mom used to say before she wiped off my nose and zipped up my coat: It's a cold world out there, in more ways than one.

When it is frigid outside, our thoughts often reflect the bitterness. We grit our teeth and become disgruntled at anything and everything. I even a puppy licking a baby brings dark thoughts, and our brains become muddled and slow. Why do you think penguins are such jerks all the time?

With that being said, hopefully readers can forget about campus-related issues for a second, and answer a few anger-fueled questions for me, questions I have asked myself during an off-campus venture into the frost.

I was located along Route 9, trying my best to look busy at Ultimate Fitness. A greasy-haired kid had just finished bench-pressing twice my body weight and stood five feet away from me, wearing a Yankee cap. Being a Sox fan, I naturally didn't care for his hat at first, but I was sent over the edge when I saw a "New Era" sticker attached to the top of his flawlessly flat brim. Oh so now he thinks his hat's better than mine! Please forgive my ignorance, but does this sticker confirm a certain level of freshness I was previously unaware of?

I unfortunately don't own a pair of Inuit-looking Arctic Seal-stompers.

I overheard him groaning about doing an insane amount of sit-ups daily and not seeing any sign of a six-pack. After growing weary of this, I left the gym only to realize I forgot where I parked my car, something I do at least once a week. I wonder if I accomplish this feat more often than any non-Stockbridge student at UMass?

I was only a minute into the ice-cold search for my four-wheeled box of junk when I noticed the same baby Bronx Bomber exiting Liquors 44. The kid who so badly wanted a six-pack was leaving the packie with five six-packs worth of Budweiser. Clearly, these non-light beers were purchased in hopes of achieving his desired goal.

I felt like a complete moron trying to find my car in the freezing cold, but at least I got in that internal remark.

After recovering my vehicle, I discovered my gas tank was empty, in addition to my stomach, and my wallet. I walked to the other side of the plaza into Stop & Stop to grab some food and pay a visit to the Citizen's Bank located inside.

While walking up and down the aisles, I couldn't help but notice Crest toothpaste was the same price as Crest Extra Whitening toothpaste. Now, I probably should be more concerned with the ongoing campus construction or which member of the student government will truly change things for the better, but right now, I couldn't care less.

All I wanted to know is why anyone would buy non-whitening toothpaste.

With everyone currently throwing buckets of peroxide on their smiles, who's opting for an off-white tint at this point?

I headed to the corner of the supermarket to stain my teeth with a Dunkin Donuts coffee. I ordered a coffee to warm up my trembling body and requested a cinnamon bagel. However, the cashier walked away from me mid-sentence to begin pouring my hazelnut.

Why is it that Dunkin Donuts' employees are absolutely incapable of receiving more than one request at a time? A Starbucks employee would remember a double espresso, a mocha latte topped with whipped cream, raspberry-mint brownies sliced in half (diagonally) and then tell me what else I ordered because I forgot. My thoughts screamed.

Eventually, I withdrew some meager cash, returned to my poor excuse for an automobile, and began driving home.

Naturally, I found myself in the midst an Amherst center traffic jam. The guy behind me laid on his horn despite the fact all eighteen cars in front of me weren't visibly moving. It's amazing when people feel the need to honk at the driver hopelessly stuck in a downtown traffic jam. I guess he was cold too.

Finally, after patiently waiting for a collection of Volvo hatchbacks to move along, I was separated from the unbearably gelid climate, sitting comfortably in my apartment, and regaining my humanity.

Tomorrow, thankfully, I won't set foot on campus. Nope, I will not go outside. I will stay in and smile. Any reader can clearly see I'm cold and bitter enough already.

Michael Cartwright can be reached at mjcartwr@student.umass.edu

Slow down and pray

Anthony David Rueli

My friend Chris was pulled over and ticketed the other day on University Drive, twice.

Chris and I had been hanging out in my room on a calm Wednesday evening. There was no drinking, smoking, or any of that nonsense going on, just casual TV watching and the like. Chris left my dorm at around 2 a.m. and pulled out of the horseshoe.

As soon as he pulled out, he noticed flashing headlights in his rear view mirror. Despite his fancy talk, Chris was issued a rather hefty citation for failure to make a complete stop when turning onto the road.

Rather annoyed, Chris continued driving north on University Drive, preparing to turn left on Massachusetts Avenue. Before he could do such, he noticed another set of flashing headlights in his rear view mirror. Thinking that perhaps it was the same officer who had forgotten something, Chris obliged the officer by once again pulling to the shoulder of University Drive.

However, when Chris rolled down his window to greet the officer, he was befuddled by the lack of a familiar face. That's right kids; it was an entirely different officer.

The officer informed Chris that he was driving a bit briskly and thought that perhaps Chris may have been involved in some recreational drinking before operating his motor vehicle. Chris informed the officer that this was not the case. Not to mention the fact that, unless you're drag racing, the area between the horseshoe and the intersection between University Drive and Massachusetts Avenue hardly gives you enough time to gain unorthodox speed.

Unfortunately, logic did not prevail, which is tragically common when dealing with officers of the law. Chris received a second rather hefty citation for speeding.

A casual observer could write the above incident off as a mere coincidence, witty and bizarre, but nothing overly shocking. However, if you have ever driven on University Drive later than 10 p.m., particularly on the weekend, you would know that this is not the case.

It's a well-known fact around campus that the police rule this street with an iron fist.

Chris is not a UMass student, so he's not exactly familiar with how things work on University Drive. It's a well-known fact around campus that the police rule this street with an iron fist. Not that this is necessarily a bad thing – with the amount of students and others driving drunk, police enforcement is undoubtedly essential in high-risk areas like University Drive.

The problems arise in situations similar to poor Chris's tale of woe. There has to be at least some selective process involving who to pull over and especially who to provide a citation to. When two separate officers pull over a sober driver who is operating the vehicle safely and well within reason, there is indeed something wrong with the picture, and it is not the driver.

Is it reasonable for police to watch over one particular area more than others? Yes. I think it is. Is it reasonable for police to flash the blue lights at people of whom they are suspicious? Yes, of course it is. Is it reasonable for an officer to pull someone over late at night because they are the only one on the road? No, it is not.

I could be wrong, but I recall hearing the term "probable cause" used when discussions of police's rights to do certain things are brought up. I'm not sure, but this has to go against some kind of rule.

I could have warned Chris about the possible perils he might face when traveling on University Drive at 2 a.m., but it wouldn't have done any good.

No matter how slow one may be driving, no matter how long one may pause before going through a stop sign or turning onto another street, no matter how well one may be at keeping their ear within the lines on the road, and no matter how tightly one's seat belt may be fastened, the rule remains the same. If you're traveling on University Drive at night, you will get pulled over more often than not.

Whatever you do, don't go toward the blue light.

If you are in the area on a weekend evening and you're in the mood for a chuckle, take a peek out on University Drive. I guarantee you will see an average of five or six flashing blue lights pulled over to the side of the road at any given time. Strange how there are that many people all committing traffic violations on the same street at the same time.

What I'm trying to say is that it is entirely unnecessary to have that many officers patrolling the road if they are not going to discriminate who they pull over and ticket. It is very unfair to those innocent civilians who are sober and driving reasonably to have their time and money wasted by officers who, quite frankly, aren't willing to take the chance that someone driving at 2 a.m. near a college could possibly be sober.

Anthony David Rueli can be reached at arueli@student.umass.edu

Somewhere over the rainbow

Caroline Moss

When I was younger, I had dreams of becoming an astronaut, a teacher, and a gymnast. I was told, like I'm sure most of you were told, that if I put my mind to it, I could do or be anything I wanted.

Now, embarking on my fourth semester at college, this theory seems to be proving itself dead. I have no idea what direction I would like my life to take, and according to UMass policy, I only have until mid-May to decide.

I came into college as a theater major. Then I decided on English, which quickly became journalism, and now, communication disorders. The problem is, I want to do all four.

Why shouldn't we still follow that mantra that was ingrained in our heads on the first day of kindergarten? If we want something we can have it, as long as we worked hard. Sure it still has some truth to it, yet not so much realistic truth. Now in our college years, we are told to find something we enjoy, that we can excel at, and that we can study, leaving most of our childhood goals and dreams behind.

A 300 or 400 level class that both interests you and is not part of your major is rare, but shouldn't be.

Wouldn't the ideal college experience be one where we truly lived by our own rules and very few guidelines? For instance, keeping the 120 credits graduation rule and throwing away the semester by semester credit requirement. Instead of being considered only a part time student if you take less than 12 credits, take as many or as little credits as you want, knowing that you'll have to graduate with 120. If you want to focus on two or three classes one semester, still live on campus, and are willing to make up the credits during another semester (like winter or summer session), why should it be a problem?

General education is understandable when you're a freshman. I finish your math, do your biology, take your comparative literature classes, I get it. But how frustrating is it to see a second semester senior in basic math 100 because he didn't get around to it until then? Gen-Ed's should be solely reserved for freshman so that when you complete them, you have three years to really explore your options without being held back by those 100 level courses.

Very few seniors graduate with degrees in majors they decided on their first semester of freshman year, yet many freshmen start knocking off classes for their supposed "major" before they finish their general education requirements. In many cases, they change their minds and have classes on their transcript that do not aide them in completing what they need to complete before they graduate, in addition to the Gen-Eds they haven't taken yet. It would be so much easier and less stressful to change your mind, knowing that all of your general education classes were behind you.

Lastly, the privilege of taking a 300 or 400 level class that both interests you and is not part of your major is rare, but shouldn't be. Off the top of my head, I know that it is nearly impossible to enroll yourself in a theatre, dance, or journalism class without being a part of the major. This shouldn't be so. Some of the classes that appeal to us should not be exclusive to majors only, for it defeats the purpose of college students getting a well-rounded education that suits their interests. Now I understand this wouldn't be an easy thing to change, nor am I asking anyone to change the system, because it apparently works. But as food for thought, wouldn't it be great to take any and all of the classes you could before you made the final decision on what you wanted to do for the rest of your life?

Sure, it's possible to find success in a field that you didn't concentrate on in college. Both of my parents are proof; my mother, with a degree in sociology, is now a marketing consultant for Pepsi-Co, and my father, with a degree in rhetoric, worked for the New York Daily News for over twenty years. They both have told me on number of occasions that I am only at college for the degree, and that it doesn't matter what it's in. So basically, I'm paying out of state tuition to major in something I probably won't do for the rest of my life. If that's going to be the case for most of us, then I encourage all of you who are confused to go enroll yourself in an art class, a theatre class, entomology, and a turf-grass management class. Why not? Who really knows what we'll end up doing in twenty years?

Caroline Moss can be reached at camoss@student.umass.edu

LETTER TO THE EDITOR

IN RESPONSE TO: 'IN RESPONSE TO GARGANO'

If you read the Collegian Editorial page yesterday, you read a well thought out article about the riots and Gargano's lovely letter that we all were emailed. I got the letter too, and surprisingly, I actually read it. Adam McGillen's article yesterday saying how our school's reputation doesn't affect us as individuals was right on. I have been waiting for someone to prove just how much of a buffoon this Gargano guy is, and although people have taken a few strong swings, Mr. McGillen has finally hit the nail on the head. I mean, the nerve of the Vice Chancellor to say other people's actions affect you! That's like saying that what I do affects other people! Everyone knows that's totally crazy. I live in a single for goodness sake.

I am a graduating senior, one who recently went through dozens of interviews while trying to find a good job. Guess what I found one. Bam! Ouch Gargano, I bet that hurts to read those words, or should I say, eat your words (snap). One thing that was difficult for me though was when one interviewer asked me how I felt about the riots. I was a caught off guard a little because I didn't think anyone even knew about them, especially people in New Hampshire. But I thought quickly and said that it doesn't make a difference to me one way or the other, because I know that what I do doesn't affect anyone else. The recruiter smiled at me, shook my hand, and said my favorite words, "Welcome aboard!"

I would like to take this opportunity to point out another, less obvious issue that has been bothering me: stereotypes – yet another instance where people seem to think that the actions of a group of people affect others within that group. It's quite obvious to me that all people are rational, considerate, and thoughtful, and never make judgments about someone based on their race or the color of their skin or anything like that. This kind of thing only happens on TV like in season six of 24, in which the Indian kid from Van Wilder and Harold and Kumar go to White Castle gets beat up because of stereotypes. In real life, why would you ever beat up such a funny kid? He carried those movies, and no pure blooded American would ever lay a finger on such a hero. Often 24 bends the rules of what is reality and what is fiction, and this is one of those scenarios.

So Gargano, if you're reading this, I hope you realize that me and my boy McGillen are going to be up in your grill from here on out. You should think twice before sending another email to all-undergrad@oit.umass.edu. We are not afraid to tear it apart.

Russell Merrick
UMass student

WRITE A LETTER TO THE EDITOR!

SEND US SOMETHING AND GET PUBLISHED ON MONDAY!

(550 WORD LIMIT)

Send letters to:
editorial@dailycollegian.com

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

ARTS & LIVING

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 9, 2007

ARTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

'Volver' climaxes with compelling cast

Almodóvar creates a beauty

By Morgan-Ann Rousseau
Collegian Staff

From the opening scene, Pedro Almodóvar introduces his delicate style of mixing morbidity and vibrancy as chatter-box women polish the tombs of their departed loved ones. The filmmaker's signature plasticity is nearly tangible in Volver, as it is in so many of his acclaimed works. Forget jewelry. In this quirky comedic drama even the scenery seems plastic. It's so drenched in up beat charisma that even when it rains, it soars.

Volver's title, which translates to Coming Back in English, subscribes to the overwhelming desire of human beings to know, once again, those they've lost. It addresses people in life who have the power to shake our foundation. Their departure often leaves us shattered, and their return is needed to gain stability. Such is the common thread in Volver, as characters go in search of closure, of peace.

Consider, Almodóvar's 1988 film Mujeres al Borde de un Ataque de Nervios (Women on the Verge of a Nervous Breakdown), which features Carmen Maura as the lead role, Pepe. Maura returns in Volver, as the role of Irene, a mother of two grown women. While Maura's role in Volver is emblematic of a warm, yet strong mother, her daughter's character, Raimunda, resembles that of Maura's character in Mujeres.

Similar less in circumstance – though both Raimunda and Mujeres Pepe encounter extreme situations of stress and action – Pepe's florescent essence shines through in Raimunda's high-heeled confidence. To this day, Almodóvar does little to hide his adoration for lively female characters.

Heaving cleavage a-blazin,' Raimunda's cups are filled by Penelope Cruz. Her acclaim in international cinema seems to be overshadowed by her few American works, which do the actress little justice. The Madrid-born 32-year-old packed the part of Raimunda with more presence than any of her roles in such American films as Vanilla Sky, Blow and Gothika.

In Volver, Cruz's character is no lady, at some points vulgar, but she is painted with femininity, both maternal and hard-edged. Her Best

VOLVER

DIRECTED BY PEDRO ALMODÓVAR

STARRING PENÉLOPE CRUZ

A–

Actress award at the 2006 Cannes Film Festival paved the way for little surprise at how well Cruz plays the colorful female role.

A mother, sister, daughter and niece, Raimunda knows how to take

See VOLVER on page 6

Penelope Cruz has earned an Oscar nomination for this, her latest film with Pedro Almodovar. She has said that his films are why she became an actress in the first place.

'Volver' combines serious topics such as death and depression with the colorful, plastic set style of film Almodóvar has become internationally known for.

Smith lectures at Clark Art Institute

Anna Deavere Smith is an author, playwright, actor, and will be the latest keynote speaker at the annual Berkshire Conference.

By Sara Monacelli
Collegian Correspondent

The fourth annual Berkshire Conference begins today at 8 p.m., with actor and playwright Anna Deavere Smith delivering the conference's keynote address.

The conference is held at The Sterling and Francine Clark Art Institute, or simply The Clark, in Williamstown, Mass. The conference will consist of five panel discussions which discuss institutional developments, philanthropic and management trends and connections between culture, business and media.

The main goal of the conference is to show the public what the social, cultural and economic results are based on the integral and prolific interaction between culture and business in a community. The conference alone shows this correlation in that during the weekend, hotel occupancy increases greatly in the Williamstown-North Adams region.

It also provides these visitors with an abundance of cultural activities around the area. Although the conference is held solely by The Clark, it is organized in conjunction with the Massachusetts Museum of Contemporary Art and the Williams College Museum of Art.

The conference also provides leaders within business, arts and policy to come together in dialogue to discuss these future potential developments. Smith couldn't have been a better selection for the keynote address. She is a successful playwright of two one-woman plays including "Fires in the Mirror" and "Twilight: Los Angeles 1992," a screen actor on several shows including NBC's "The West Wing" and "The Practice" and a film actor with appearances in The Human Stain, Philadelphia, Dave and The American President.

She is also the author of two books: 2006's "Letters to a Young Artist: Straight-up Advice on Making a Life in the Arts-For Actors, Performers, Writers, and Artists of Every Kind," and 2000's "Talk to me: Listening Between the Lines," which acts as a guide to her play "House Arrest."

See BERKSHIRE on page 6

'Little Children' tells adults only tale

By Leighanne Noonan
Collegian Correspondent

Little Children embrace peeing in the town pool. Little Children are occupied for hours with the movements of skateboarders. Little Children find joy in a game of football. In Todd Field's latest film, the Little Children are, in fact, suburban, married, parents, and full-fledged adults.

The film, based on a novel by Tom Perrota, combines the desires and perspectives normally attributed to young children with the serious and troublesome elements of a very adult world. Perrota and Field teamed up to produce a script that is as smart as it is subtle, as daring as it is distinguished; work good enough for an Oscar nod.

Peppered with the satirical commentary of a voiceover that can only be attributed to a paternal narrator of children's fables, the film confronts the sordid underbelly of suburbia in a manner that can be barely digested and entirely enjoyed.

Kate Winslet stars as Sarah, a stay at home mom thoroughly fed up with the

LITTLE CHILDREN

DIRECTED BY TODD FIELD

STARRING KATE WINSLET

A–

duties of motherhood. Attached to her daughter Lucy, she is the parent who never does anything right. Winslet's performance, which flows from the understated anxieties of a quiet housewife to the desperate tears of a mother,

See CHILDREN on page 6

'Little Children' is nominated for three Oscars. For Kate Winslet this will be her fifth nomination and possibly her first win.

'Perfume' stinks up the silver screen

By Leighanne Noonan
Collegian Correspondent

"The people of Grasse awoke to a terrible hangover." The words of the narrator in Perfume: A Story of a Murderer should resonate particularly with college audiences. Seeing the film is akin to acquiring a stiff hangover. While overwhelming and intoxicating sensations may seem fun at the time and while some in the film are worthy of exploration, the end result is a splitting headache.

Based on the novel by Patrick Süskind, this story was once deemed incapable of being captured on film. The writer's heavy reliance on description of the senses, a quiet and abstract art, was not easy to translate onto the big screen. Yet, this seemingly impenetrable wall in the art of translation was tackled nicely by Run, Lola, Run director Tom Tykwer.

Using a variety of techniques – from harsh grotesque images to sharp cuts and rapid sequences, stinking sounds to variations in lighting and vision– Tykwer manages to overwhelm the senses of the audience. In his artistic description, the audience can wholly appreciate the repulsive filth, the putrid scents, and the sharp squalls of eighteenth century Paris. Tykwer gives his audience the reality of the setting and the poignancy of the sensations in a manner that is creatively beautiful.

Perfume follows the life of Jean-Baptiste Grenouille, a man born with the extraordinary powers of scent and an insatiable, odorous appetite for any and all aromas. Defined by his nose, a non-verbal aspect of being, Ben Winshaw acts almost as a silent film star. His reactions to smells and situations constitute much of his performance. Yet, like the flow of the plot, Winshaw fluctuates between a dull, contrived caricature and a subtle but intimate man.

The story of the murderer moves sharply amongst such variant realms of crime, thriller, character sketch, and artistic abstraction. The audience is jerked between trying to find sympathy for Grenouille, akin to that incurred by Steinbeck's Lenny, to having no understanding of his motivations. Finally, they are left to recognition of his appall-

See PERFUME on page 6

Dustin Hoffman is the high point of the film 'Perfume: A Story of a Murderer' in his turn as aged perfumist Giuseppe Baldini.

Cruz shines in her new Spanish film

Pedro Almodovar's film 'Volver' features an almost exclusively female cast starring Penélope Cruz.

VOLVER from page 5

care of business and those around her. While expressive of emotion, and showing human fragility, Almodovar's Raimunda doesn't lose control in dire situations. She maintains her cool, and does so with perfectly liquid lined eyes and floral hike-up blouses. In this nearly all-female cast, other characters also excel at handling crises – they lend each other help, and don't consider for a moment that any task is undoable.

Another distinguishing feature of Almodóvar's presence in Volver is his character's lack of concern about any consequences that may arise from their drastic actions. This may be attributed to its success at stitching humor into a story that's built on murder, death, abuse and illness. While the film is a kind of murder-mystery thriller, its plot mainly focuses on the light, comedic queries of the "living" characters, and their strong relationships with one another.

One of the film's main accomplishments is its ability to dangle questions over our brains, teasing with suspense and alluding to possible outcomes. Then, as though blossoming with resolution, answers fall at our feet with precisely the right timing, mere mnemonics before too much confusion sets in.

A certain sentence haunts the movie, and contributes to the sometimes ambiguous nature of the story. "Someday I'll explain it all." Throughout the film, characters assure each other of this. They play off of one another, promising an explanation that ends up partly, though never fully, delivered.

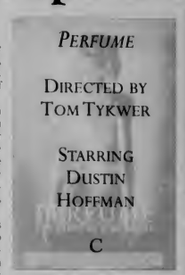
Volver is a film of delayed explanations, but also of high reaching climaxes. While there are enough twists to quench even the driest attention span, the keen observer is able to spot some visibly approaching plot points before their arrival. Despite any anticipation, these twists are brilliantly crafted, and do enough to give viewers the closure that the characters themselves crave on-screen.

Volver speaks to the towering endurance of personal anguish that haunts us all when bereft of explanation. It's a film of confronting the pain of the past and reconciling the demons that haunt our present. This colorfully written and buoyantly directed film exposes no doubt that Almodovar's work is as poignant and pervasive as ever.

Morgan-ann Rousseau can be reached at mrousseau@student.umass.edu

Film leaps and fails to soar

PERFUME from page 5



ing, unredeemable psychosis. The movement follows Grenouille as a man, a boy, an animal, a murderer and savior. All this brings the audience in the way of a grounded sense of character.

Thus only in the action itself can the audience find solace in the strength of the supporting characters. The later sequences are aided by the desperate father of Grenouille's final victim. The character of Richis is played beautifully by Alan Rickman whose subtle concerns and heart wrenching love for his daughter are powerfully poignant.

Nevertheless, it is Dustin Hoffman's role in his all too short stint as washed up perfumist Giuseppe Baldini that overwhelms the acting of the film. From his mannerisms, to his dress, to his dialogue, Baldini is a breath of fresh air after a dull opening. While Hoffman proves his worth as an extraordinary character actor yet again, the audience is left with the feeling that the end of his performance was the end of the film.

Following loosely in the realm of murder, intrigue, and pursuit Perfume tries to do too much. The film dabbles across numerous thematic elements. The audience finds biblical references with a scene of Grenouille's baptism in scent and his role as a savior. The influence of a secular class structure is made apparent with the stringent divisions between the wealthy and impoverished. There is even a typical cliched moment as a dog ousts Grenouille as a vicious murderer. Overall, the work fails to find unity.

As simply a murder film or a mysterious thriller Perfume, with its unique motivations and beautiful filming may have succeeded. And yet, it seemed that it strove to achieve more and failed to accomplish much of anything. Except, of course, a hangover.

Leighanne Noonan can be reached at lnoonan@email.smith.edu

The character of Grenouille becomes obsessed with particular women's scents, which leads to their and his own demise.

Conference attracts big name speaker

BERKSHIRE from page 5

At New York University's School of Law and Tisch School of the Arts, she is a tenured professor teaching the course "The Art of Listening" within the School of Law. She is currently working on her new play titled "Let me Down Easy." It is expected to come out sometime this year.

In addition to her academic accomplishments, she also, in union with the Ford Foundation, founded the Institute on the Arts and Civic Dialogue at Harvard University. This institute works to investigate how the arts function as it relates to social issues. The institute is now at New York University Smith's knowledge, as a result of working within the worlds of culture and business simultaneously, will be of vital usage to issues discussed at the conference.

At the end of the conference, organizers will provide a series of white papers which will summarize the dialogue between the leaders that spoke. They will also be available to the public. If you would like to check out some papers from previous years' conferences go to the Berkshire Conference Web site at www.BerkshireConference.org.

The Clark is at 225 South St. in Williamstown. It is both a public art museum and research and academic center with an art library. The hours for the galleries are Tuesday-Sunday from 10 a.m.-5 p.m., and are open daily in July and August. Admission is free November through May. From June 1 through Oct. 31, admission is $12.50 for adults, free for children 18 and younger, members, and students with a valid ID.

Sara Monacelli can be reached at smonacel@student.umass.edu

The Clark Art Institute is a museum located in Williamstown, Mass that will hold the fourth annual Berkshire Conference.

Is your room more unique than this?
Do you have the BEST room?

Here's your chance to strut your stuff in the "Collegian Cribs" Contest for a chance to win a grand prize!

Submit up to three pictures online at
TheCollegian@gmail.com

Deadline Feb.14 Voting beginning Feb.15

Winslet earns fifth Oscar nod

Kate Winslet and Patrick Wilson explore an extramarital affair in the movie 'Little Children.' Below, Winslet and Wilson contemplate the lasting repercussions of their relationship on their lives.

CHILDREN from page 5

is well worthy of her Oscar nomination.

Brad, played by Patrick Wilson, is an unemployed lawyer to be, who upon bringing his son to the playground, is labeled the "Prom King" by the group of mothers whose cookie-cutter lives are ones of scheduled romance and crustless sandwiches. When the misfits meet on the playground, unlikely princess Sarah becomes Brad's "Queen" when the two engage in a playful and anxious affair.

While Sarah and Brad satisfy their impulses and desires, the film also follows childish desires of a very different kind. This suburban neighborhood is also home to convicted sex offender Ronnie McGorvey, played by Jackie Earle Haley. McGorvey's sordid love for children and inability to control his impulses serves to heighten and highlight both the dark themes and important lessons Little Children has to offer.

The adults in the film, time and again, blindly follow their impulses. From Brad and Sarah's affair and final plan to run off together to Sarah's husband's obsession with online porn; from McGorvey's intrinsic perversion, to Mrs. McGorvey's, played by Phyllis Somerville, unrelenting love for her damaged son.

Even the efforts of the town vigilante, ex-cop, Larry, played by Noah Emmerich, are misdirected. Although he is the only character whose actions promote the standards of society – protection of the home, community, and children – his efforts only cause more damage.

Little Children, through its unique perspective on the issues of this society, seems to make a statement about the assumptions its citizens make and, by with mob mentality, hold as gospel. For, in the end, these standards do not hold.

Mrs. McGorvey, despite her child's crimes, is the only parent who loves unconditionally, who is consistently engrossed in the needs of her child and in her duties as a parent. Ronnie, society's nightmare, would rather castrate himself than indulge his illness. Larry would rather save a life than remain in judgment of the contents of that life. Sarah and Brad do not have to meet the failure that usually comes with rebellion; they do not have to follow in the paths of those who came before them.

Coming to these conclusions Field shoots his final scenes through a lens that is very innocent. The conventions and standards of the larger world have been cast aside.

As Sarah approaches Ronnie in the final scenes of the film there is no judgment, no suburban barriers, there are simply two people. Field's lens holds no previous assumptions. It is a lens that very much mimics the perspective of a child. Only now can Sarah embrace her role as a mother, can Brad relinquish his love for games, and can Larry find purpose. Only through this perspective can Field's characters and audience acquire truths of the world that had been buried in society.

Junior Gary Forbes scored a game-high 22 points last night against the Rams. He added nine rebounds and three assists in UMass' win.

Lasme, Forbes reign supreme

LASME from page 10

"He's a game changer," Rhode Island guard Jimmy Baron said. "Every time you go in the lane you have to see where he is. Our game plan was to just take the ball right at him, and we tried to do that a little bit, but he's a game changer."

UMass knows what Lasme is capable of, but Rhode Island was just another team this season that found out the hard way.

Lasme became only the eighth player in NCAA history to record three triple-doubles in the same season. His prior two came against St. Francis and George Washington. He now has blocked 120 shots this season, which is tied for second in the country.

Shot blocking has become an art form for Lasme. But the funny thing is, it's something he doesn't even practice.

"He doesn't block a lot of shots in practice," Forbes said. "So I guess he saves them for the games."

Lasme finished the night with 18 points, 12 rebounds and 11 blocks. As much of a presence as he's been in the paint in his career, he isn't surprised teams continue to come at him.

"They're going to try their hardest to score," Lasme said. "They do what they want, and I'll keep doing what I'm doing."

He did what he did best last night, and his play combined with that of Gary Forbes was enough to push UMass into first place in the A-10 for the first time since 1998.

Forbes finished the game just one rebound shy of his second double-double in a UMass uniform – his first came last Saturday in a win against Richmond. He recorded a season-high 22 points, along with nine rebounds, and was 2-for-3 from behind the 3-point line. It marked the 18th time this season that Forbes finished in double-digits.

Lasme and Forbes controlled the tempo of the game on both the offensive and defensive ends of the floor, and set the tone going into halftime, combining for 24 out of UMass' 41 points in the first 20 minutes.

A strong start was exactly what the Minutemen needed in what was the biggest game of the season for both teams. It was a game that would determine the direction of each squad in the final stretch. But most importantly, it was a game that would determine the cream of the crop in the A-10.

Thanks to Stephanie Lasme and Gary Forbes, UMass is back on top. And it couldn't have come at a better time.

Danny Picard can be reached at dpicard@student.umass.edu

Minutemen sit atop A-10, separate from Rhode Island

M. BASKETBALL from page 10

half, and he consistently energized the crowd with his stifling blocks.

"I think even compared to the UConn game that we played, this game was a great effort," he added. "Every single person on the team left it on the floor. This is the best effort out of a UMass team since I've been here."

Junior Gary Forbes led the Minutemen in scoring with 22 points in 34 minutes.

"I think you're seeing glimpses of what [Forbes] is capable of doing," Ford said. "I liked his effort tonight. That's the most focused I've seen him in a long time."

With this decisive victory, the Minutemen are now on top of the A-10 with a 7-2 in-conference record, ahead of both Rhode Island and Xavier, which both have three losses.

This was a statement game. The Minutemen led last night's contest by 24 points at one stage in the game, and Lasme made URI scorers look like high school players.

The Minutemen lost to Xavier on the road, 83-77, and lo-I to URI on the road, 75-72, but a lot of questions about the Minutemen's ability to hang with the best in the conference were answered in dramatic fashion last night.

The Rams typical physicality and interior presence was muted by the intensity of the energized Minutemen.

The Minutemen flashed out of the gate with a 12-0 run. Lasme had six points in the first five minutes of the game and finished off the 12-0 run with a baby hook shot in the lane off of a pass from sophomore Chris Lowe.

The Minutemen pushed the lead to 18-4 at the 11:09 with another Lasme bucket. Forbes hit a layup with the foul off of a simply inbounds play, and it was clear that the Rams did not come into their biggest game of the year mentally ready.

Forbes hit the free throw and Lasme put in another two points to make it 23-5, and the Minutemen had their largest lead of the half.

UMass entered the break with a 41-27 advantage, and the Rams didn't get closer than 12 points after the run to start the game.

Lasme led the Minutemen with 13 points at the half followed by Forbes with 11.

Rob Greenfield can be reached at rgreenfi@student.umass.edu

Minutewomen in need of league wins went into overtime with them last time. Still, we should definitely have won by 20 or more," she said. "We have to take them seriously because we know they can put the ball in the basket.

W. BASKETBALL from page 10

"I don't think anybody is underestimating anybody just because our record isn't that great right now and we haven't had any type of real winning streak," she continued. "We can't underestimate any team that we're about to play."

With a total of 18 points, Mills was the Minutewomen's leading scorer last game – a 53-49 win at St. Bonaventure on Sunday. And though she'd like to pick up where she left off, Mills is focusing more on getting the win.

"If I'm able to score that's great, but I hope we just end up with a 'W' on Sunday," she commented. "That's the most important thing. Especially with the tournament coming up – we want to make sure we definitely get into it and that we get a good seed. So, the win is the main thing."

The team's other co-captain, junior guard Alisha Tatham, did not fare as well as her partner against the Bonnies – she registered just one assist and failed to register any points.

The uncharacteristic performance did not discourage Dacko, however.

"She practices hard all the time. She's probably somebody who works harder than anybody on the team," she said. "She doesn't stop working, but she's still learning the game. So, I think if we can just get her to play and put her in good spots, she'll be able to shoot the ball."

Dacko added that Tatham's most important contribution to the Maroon and White is what she does without the ball in her hands.

"Her key on the floor is defense," she said. "If she can come out and play defense, then we're doing well."

Tatham admits she was disappointed by her play last week, but she's confident she will rebound for Sunday's game.

"They do like to get a little out of me off the bench, but everybody else stepped up [last Sunday], so I wasn't really worried about scoring and stuff like that," she mentioned. "I'll definitely be ready for the next game."

"We definitely know [URI is] a good team," Tatham continued. "We know they play tough competition in the postseason, so we know their record has nothing to do with what kind of team they are."

Each UMass player that entered the locker room after practice on Wednesday seemed hungry to get on the court against the Rams. The Minutewomen are starving for a few more victories to secure a solid spot in the A-10 Tournament – and, of course, a little vengeance.

"Every practice, we've come in thinking, 'URI, URI, URI,'" Tatham said.

Domenic Poli can be reached at dpoli@student.umass.edu

Junior Pam Rosanio and the Minutewomen will be looking for revenge against URI on Sunday. The Rams beat UMass, 71-69, on Jan. 9.

Sophomore goaltender Jon Quick is 2-0-2 against Boston University and Providence College this season. He has a combined total of 63 saves against the Terriers this season.

Two opponents, one weekend

By Jeremy Rice
Collegian Staff

If you're a Division I hockey coach battling every week in a conference like Hockey East, you know how much preparation it takes to get ready for the Friday night game with your conference rival. You spend all week trying to figure out which lineups match your players up best with the opposition.

I-Mass coach Don Cahoon does that every week, leading the Massachusetts hockey team through its practices Monday through Thursday while his assistants scout the opponent.

When the game is over – win or lose – it's right back to work for Cahoon and company, preparing for the very next night.

Cahoon has said in the past that one of the toughest parts of the hockey schedule is preparing to play a new team the night after a game. This weekend may present the toughest of those situations, as the Minutemen face two hungry Hockey East rivals.

Tonight the Mass Attack faces off with Boston University to decide the season series. As soon as the game ends, Cahoon's staff will be working hard through the night to get the team ready for Providence, who comes to town Saturday night.

"It's a grind," Cahoon said. "The drudgery goes to my assistants because they break down the [game from] the night before and then they organize the next day and throughout the night."

The I-Mass headman said his job in this area is a little easier, as he mostly just oversees the process, whereas assistant coaches Red Gendron and Ien Quesnelle split up the preparation work for the week, each taking one upcoming opponent to scouting their tendencies.

"I usually just look at the game we just played, and I get to just make an overview and write some general notes and put some general themes together," he said. "Everybody is up until they end up going to bed, and then they get up as soon as they can, usually not later than five or six in the morning."

The reason this weekend may present more of a challenge is the fact that the Minutemen and Friars have not met since they played a home-and-home series on Nov. 3 and 4. Last Saturday, the second team was U-Mass Lowell, who the Maroon and White had met twice in the three previous weeks. However, Cahoon says not much will change.

"We'll do everything pretty much the same," he said. "We have the advantage of working during the week to break Providence down. We've got one coach doing that while the other is doing a lot of the IH stuff, so we still have two teams to break down."

Like any sport, preparation is always key, but this far into the season, Cahoon says, the execution of the players matters more, because they should be prepared to play by now. None of the prep work for PC will be introduced to the players before Saturday, however, so the transition must be made quickly from game 1 to game 2.

"The game is played on the ice," Cahoon said. "It's a pretty simple game once you get to this point in the season. The systems are in place. Now it's execution. Now it's paying attention to detail and doing the things that they're trained to do.

Cahoon even went so far as to say that he and Providence coach Tim Army could switch places and coach the opposing teams players, and the game would still come down to the execution on the ice.

"I guarantee you I could go into the Providence locker room and make valid statements about the game and the way it needs to be played," Cahoon said. "And conversely, Tim Army could come into my locker room, make valid statements about the way the game needs to be played, and it wouldn't affect the execution of the game. That's how simple the game is at this point."

If it truly is that simple, then this weekend's games won't come down the preparation put in by Cahoon, Gendron Quesnelle or Army, but rather the execution of players like Cory Quirk, Jon Quick, and the Friars' Cody Wild and Tyler Sims.

Like Cahoon said, the game is played on the ice, and the coaches won't be getting any closer than the bench until the buzzer sounds.

Jeremy Rice can be reached at jrice@student.umass.edu

UM searches for consistency

Dacko, team still expect big things come A-10 Tournament

By Eli Rosenswaike
Collegian Staff

Finishing a season six games under .500 in a 28-game schedule won't typically breed high expectations for the following year. Don't tell that to UMass coach Marnie Dacko and rest of the Massachusetts women's basketball team though.

The Minutewomen ended strong last year – winning eight of their final 12 games – and despite the 11-17 record in 2005-06, UMass expected to be a serious threat in the Atlantic 10 this season.

But it hasn't quite worked out that way. The recent struggles of the Minutewomen – they've dropped seven of their last 10 contests. That has forced the team to win all five of their remaining games if they wish to improve their conference record for the third consecutive season.

"We were definitely really excited about the season," junior captain Kate Mills said. "We felt as though we were going to make it far in the Atlantic 10. We still feel that way and we have a lot of confidence in our team."

"Our goal this season was to be better than a year ago," Dacko said. "We wanted to help our kids mature and be able to build as we move on. We wanted to get better and better and just improve with each game."

Dacko's wishes came to fruition when the Minutewomen enjoyed their best start since the 1988-89 campaign, matching that season's 5-0 pace. The Maroon and White have started this year 9-2 overall, but since then they've dropped a number of close games to drop them to 13-11 entering tonight's game against Rhode Island.

Despite the recent slide, Dacko believes that they are capable of making a run in the Atlantic 10 – for the rest of the regular season and for the conference tournament.

"I'm still happy with the team's performance and their effort in practice," Dacko said. "I think we're still improving and we're going to get better and better. I don't think by any means we've reached our peak."

After starting the season off so well, expectations for the Minutewomen in conference play went up, but the players have managed to stay positive in spite of their recent struggles.

"We came out really strong, so we would have hoped to keep that up all season," junior guard Pam Rosanio said. "But although we've gone up and down we're still staying positive. We're just looking to win our next few games."

"I'm not disappointed with where the team is right now," Dacko said. "I think that no player wants to go out and have a poor performance and nobody wants to miss shots. We just have to manage to get it done and play through it."

The Minutewomen have lost a number of close games, and if just a few of those turned out differently, the Maroon and White could have found itself near the top of the A-10.

"When you look at six of the 11 games we've lost, we were ahead with four minutes to go in the game," Dacko said. "We have to learn how to get over that. We have young point guards, and when you have a point guard that manages the ball 90 percent of the time, they have to make good decisions."

With a season of inconsistency, it can be confusing to figure the Minutewomen out. Are they more like the team that started off 9-2, or are they the team that has only won three of their last 10 games? Coach Dacko thinks she has the answer.

"I think right now the best reflection of the team is where we started in the beginning," she said. "What happened was we were winning and then we hit a road block. When that happens, disappointment and maybe a lack of confidence will come."

"I think we're capable of being one of the best teams in the Atlantic 10," she added. "We just need to keep improving, get stronger as a unit and get better statistics and effort from the bench."

Dacko's expectation of being a strong team within the conference is a sentiment that is echoed by her players.

"We still have high expectations for our team," Mills said. "We still think we're one of the best teams in the conference, so we just want to be as successful as possible the rest of the season."

Eli Rosenswaike can be reached at erosenswaike@student.umass.edu.

Cut out this ad receive your FREE $10 gift card!
BEACH CLUB TANNING STUDIOS
$10 Gift Card
•Limit one coupon per customer
•Offer• Expires 03/28/07

CINEMARK
The Best Seat in Town
CINEMARK AT HAMPSHIRE MALL 6
367 Russell St. 413-587-4233
Schedule for Fri 2/9/07 - Thurs 2/15/07
DIGITAL SURROUND SOUND IN ALL AUDITORIUMS
Purchase Tickets Online @ cinemark.com
Hannibal Rising (R) 1:05 4:10 7:05 10:00
Freedom Writers (PG-13) 12:55 7:35
Bearcub I Said So (PG-13) 1:00 4:00 7:00 9:30*
Night at the Museum(PG) 1:15 4:45 7:25 10:05
Norbit (PG-13) 1:30 4:15 7:20 9:50
Smokin' Aces (R) 1:25 4:35 7:40 10:20
The Queen (PG-13) 1:30 4:25 7:15 9:40*
Stomp the Yard (PG-13) 4:40 10:25
Catch and Release (PG-13) 1:20 4:20 7:10 9:55
The Messengers (PG-13) 1:45 4:55 7:45 10:25
Dreamgirls(PG-13) 12:50 4:00 7:10 10:10
The Pursuit of Happiness (PG-13) 1:15 4:30 7:30 10:15
Epic Movie (PG-13) 1:40 4:50 7:50 10:05
* no passes or superpasses
• NO PASSES, NO SUPERPASS •
Tickets & showtimes available @ cinemark.com

Minutewomen open season on West Coast

Mollica, Balschmiter have greater roles as sophomores

BY JEREMY RICE
COLLEGIAN STAFF

One game away. That's how close the Massachusetts softball team got to the College World Series last season.

Led by two freshman phenoms, pitcher Brandice Balschmiter and third baseman Whitney Mollica, the No. 23 Minutewomen reclaimed the Atlantic-10 crown a year after losing the title for the first time in 15 years.

The pair of freshmen swept the A-10 individual awards, with Balschmiter taking Pitcher of the Year and Mollica grabbing both the Rookie and Player of the Year honors. Now they're a year older, and already have postseason experience under their belts.

The new season begins today in San Diego, Calif., where the Maroon and White participate in the Campbell/Cartier Classic. Last year, the Minutewomen went 1-4 in the tournament, defeating Sacramento State in the second game of the first day of competition.

This time around, UMass has an opportunity to play against teams ahead of it in the national polls. No. 6 Oregon State and No. 10 California will also be at the classic. The Minutewomen face the Beavers this afternoon at 2:35 p.m. local time, following the matchup with UC-Santa Barbara. UMass then squares off with the Golden Bears Saturday at the same time.

Although it's always tough to play your toughest opponent right out of the gate, UMass coach Elaine Sortino and the Minutewomen know this is their best opportunity to gain headway in the national polls and begin building their resumé for the NCAA tournament and the College World Series.

"When we get an opportunity against teams in the Top 25 early on, it becomes critical that we show up and we show up well," Sortino said. "The challenge of all that is coming out hot from the gym, and onto the playing field, which is not the easiest of transitions."

Most of the teams UMass play over the first two months of its schedule reside in warm climates, which mean those squads have much more on-field practice behind them heading into the games that count, putting the Maroon and White at a disadvantage that they cannot control.

"You take it one step at a time. I don't think anyone is going to be out here, playing their best ball in February," Sortino said. "Having said that, we're going to look at this [weekend], and see where we are. In a trip like this, you hope to get better as the days go on, and that's what it's all about."

The southern schools may not have had more practice time than teams like UMass, but they have certainly spent a lot less time inside places like Boyden Gymnasium, and more time on their home fields running drills on natural surfaces.

"We spend the first two-thirds of our season on the road," Sortino explained. "That is the way a UMass team will always face a top-25 schedule. You've got to do what you've got to do, so there are no excuses. They haven't been practicing any longer than we have. We know how to catch fly balls, and we know what a ground ball looks like."

UMass will be a part of four out-of-state tournaments that will lead well into the month of March, at which time the meat of the Minutewomen's schedule – the A-10 opponents – comes to the forefront.

UMass has dominated its conference, winning either the regular season or A-10 Tournament championship 21-straight years. However, last year Charlotte snatched a share of the regular season crown, and split the season series with the Minutewomen with a win apiece.

Sortino pointed out five teams she felt had a serious chance to threaten the Maroon and White's stranglehold on the conference: Fordham, Temple, Rhode Island, George Washington and the aforementioned 49ers.

"I think the whole league is going to be stronger," Sortino said. "I think that those teams are going to be very, very strong. I think they've got good coaches. They've got good pros in their assistant-coaching ranks that bring good things to those programs. They've had good recruiting years, and those programs are getting stronger every year."

A number of A-10 teams have begun to challenge themselves with ranked opponents on their schedules, showing how much stronger the conference is getting.

"I think the Atlantic 10 is a conference that gets stronger every year," Sortino said. "I also think if you look at those teams I mentioned, at their schedules and who they're going after, you'll see a much stronger strength of schedule."

The Minutewomen, however, are getting stronger too. Mollica and Balschmiter return to lead a younger UMass squad that is coming into the season very highly touted, especially Mollica.

Last year's conference leader in home runs, RBIs, doubles and total bases was named to the USA Softball Player of the Year watch list and ESPN.com's Preseason All-America roster after batting .394 and hitting 12 home runs. Sortino is none too happy about the overexposure her young star is receiving.

"It's way too much," she said. "I think it creates a lot of expectations. If Whitney hits .300 is she having an off year? I think it's kind of goofy, quite frankly."

Mollica will have to take over even more of the load offensively now that K.J. Kelley, the team's catcher and No. 4 hitter has graduated. The added pressure of the preseason awards has Sortino concerned, much like she was when Balschmiter received a lot of attention as a highly-sought-after recruit last year.

"I think that's a lot of pressure to put on a young person," Sortino said. "These kids aren't 35-years old."

Balschmiter was also on the Player of the Year watch list. Sortino has watched her progression carefully over the offseason.

"What you hope to see in [Balschmiter] is her ability to put the ball more where she wants it," Sortino said. "Obviously, we know she has great speed, but we also saw last year that just throwing the ball hard is not enough. Speed cannot overpower a hitter, you've got to be able to move the ball around."

Jeremy Rice can be reached at jeremyr@student.umass.edu.

Third baseman Whitney Mollica was named to ESPN.com's Preseason All-America Team this past week. As a freshman in 2006, Mollica batted .394 while adding 12 home runs and 61 RBIs. The No. 23 Minutewomen open up their season this weekend in San Diego, Calif.

UMass to compete in Valentine's meet

LaFreniere prepares for A-10s, trains women hard

BY STEVE GAMES
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Massachusetts indoor track and field teams are making their third trip to Boston for the Valentine Invitational at Boston University this weekend. Both teams hope to be as sharp as possible before the Atlantic 10 Championships next week.

Last week at the Rhode Island Mega Meet, the Minutemen finished third and the Minutewomen placed second. This week the UMass competitors look to post their best performances with the A-10 Championships a week away.

The Minutewomen had one of their best meets last week at URI. However, head coach Julie LaFreniere would like to see a vast improvement from the team.

"I feel like we are still building our momentum," LaFreniere said. "Last week we had a few good performances, but I was also disappointed with some of the performances."

On Tuesday night, LaFreniere took the Minutewomen to Smith College for an intense workout. She mixed up her middle distance and distance runners making relay teams to compete against one another. This is something rare that LaFreniere will do with the team, but her hope is to have them sharper come next week at the A-10 Championships.

"By mixing the groups up it really helped bond [the team] a little more and everyone stepped it up," LaFreniere said. "It's probably something we will do once a year."

Sophomore middle-distance runner Dionise Miranda is one of the top runners for the 55 meters and the 200 meters. She hopes to break her season best times of 7.53 seconds in the 55 meters and 26.74 seconds in the 200 meters.

"Dionise Miranda is improving every weekend. I think she's ready to take off," LaFreniere said of her young runner. "She looked good in practice yesterday during her runs."

Junior distance runners Christina DeRosa and Amber Sayer will be running the 5,000 meters for the first time this season. DeRosa has run in the 3,000 and 1,500 meters. Sayer has also run the 3,000 meters along with the 1,000 meters.

"I think they're both capable of qualifying for the ECAC's, but they definitely want to qualify for New England's, which I think will be a given for those two," LaFreniere said.

Junior Jennifer Curtin is also running in a different event. Mostly competing in the 500-meter event, Curtin is used to changing events. This season she has competed in the 55-meter dash, shot put, 800-meters and the high jump.

"She usually runs the 500 so we will see what she's made of," LaFreniere said. LaFreniere also wanted to see improvements from the jumpers.

"This is the last chance before the conference meet for the longer jumpers to show us what they can do, hopefully into the good 17's closer to the 18-foot mark," she said.

The best mark for the long jumpers this year came from Miranda. She jumped 17 feet, five inches at last week's meet.

"The high jumpers, the same thing, they are regularly jumping around 5.1 [feet] but they really need to step it up getting at least 5.3-5.4 [foot] range and now it's the time to make it all happen," LaFreniere added.

The best high jump came from senior Katelyn O'Toole who set the high mark back on Dec. 3 at the Northeastern Invitational (5 feet, 1.75 inches). "We are hoping, the weekend before the conference meet, that basically everyone steps up and starts to pull it together," LaFreniere said.

Last week at the URI Mega Meet the Minutemen expected to finish third and they did. The Minutemen continued to improve with a good effort from freshman Andrew McCann and sophomore Jonathan Pierce.

McCann finished first in the 3,000-meter run with a time of 9:02.18 and Pierce came in second in the 5,000-meter run (15:27.74).

Last season at the Valentine Invitational UMass graduate Jonathan Korhonen broke the 25-year-old mile record with a time of 4:04.26. Also breaking records at that meet was senior Erik Hoagland. He set the school record in the triple jump with his leap of 48-feet, 10.25 inches that broke the previous 19-year-old mark of 48-feet, 3 inches.

Hoagland also broke the UMass indoor long-jump record earlier this season with a jump of 23 feet, 10.25 inches.

Steve Games can be reached at sgames@student.umass.edu.

Nathan Barksdale placed sixth last weekend in both the 200- and 400-meter dashes. He checked in with times of 23.17 seconds and 51.17 seconds.

Student Special
4 MONTHS $149
· Aerobics · Mixed Martial Arts
· Free wts
www.amherstathletic.com
AMHERST ATHLETIC CLUB 256-0060 90 AMHERST

PREMIER MASSACHUSETTS NIGHT CLUB
ARE YOU INTERESTED IN DANCING?
Earn $$$$ for school or fun
Earn average $400 a night!
Wanted: Bartenders Shotgirls Entertainers
No Experience Necessary
Flexible hours
Big $$$ Potential
Positions open 9pm-1am
Call for more details! Anthony's Strip Club (413)246-0299

OPEN WEDNESDAY, VALENTINE'S DAY 5PM–10PM
Goten OF JAPAN STEAKHOUSE
FAMOUS FOR CAPTIVATING CUISINE PREPARED AT YOUR TABLE
RT. 116, SUNDERLAND 413-665-3628

THE BEST SPRING BREAK EVER!
Mexico
Creative Writing & Yoga
Sun salutations just after dawn, writing by the sea, exploring jungle hills where the river meets crescents of sand.
March 17 - 24
www.writingretreats.org
Patricia Lee Lewis (413) 527-5819 patricia@writingretreats.org

NOW SHOWING FEB. 2 - FEB. 8
amherst cinema
VOLVER
SAT & SUN 11:10-1:40-4:10-6:40-9:10
MON-THURS 5:30-8:00
Academy Award Nominee Penélope Cruz Best Actress
THE LAST KING OF SCOTLAND
FRI 1:40-4:10-6:40-9:10
SAT & SUN 11:10-1:40-4:10-6:40-9:10
MON-THURS 3:00-5:30-8:00
Academy Award Nominee Best Foreign Language Film
Pan's Labyrinth
FRI 2:30 9:00 SAT & SUN 12:30 9:00 MON-THURS 5:30 8:00
28 AMITY STREET DOWNTOWN AMHERST 413-253-2547
www.AmherstCinema.org

Free Delivery to UMass
Menu Online @ andiamo.cc

		3		7	2
5	6		8
4		7	5				1
	8				1
7	3					8	6
			2				3
	9				3	4		1
					8		6	5
			1	4		8

Find all of today's puzzle solutions online!
WWW.DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

ACROSS
1 Wall and Basin
8 Sonic boomer, briefly
11 Ovine comment
14 Seven Dwarfs chant
15 Sky Harbor or Dulles
17 Brought to light
18 Quakers
19 Writer Angelou
21 Old radio Fibber
22 Confident step
27 Jackie's second hubby
29 Hawaiian coffee
30 Wooden peg
31 Light refractor
33 Gave a makeup exam
35 Lounged about
40 Impressionist Manet
41 Lights out
42 In a cordial manner
43 Sane
44 The present
46 Exemplar of slowness
47 Optimistic
51 Christmas drink
52 Egg extenors
53 Beelike
55 Small isthmus
57 ABC, for one
59 Pasta dish
65 Portuguese nobleman
66 Venetian or Florentine
67 Balance organ
68 Work undercover
69 Having a population

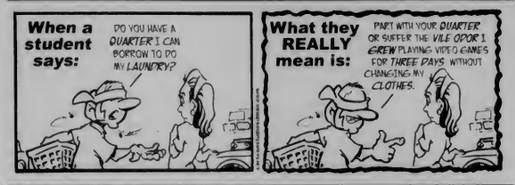
DOWN
1 Trail lady
2 Singer Ritter
3 Actor Tom
4 Sense of self
5 Expressions of confusion
6 School paper?
7 Whiskey mixer
8 African tree
9 Title of respect
10 Prune
11 Hand drum
12 Shakespearean forest
13 Out of port
16 Quick kiss
20 Scotland in London
22 Fang about
23 Actress Barra
24 Dynamo part
25 End of the small intestine
26 Process sea water
28 Coral formation
31 Foot: suff.
32 In vogue
34 Check the fit of
36 Make amends
37 Ultimate
38 Online messages
39 Some desktops
41 Hound sound
43 Road anger
45 Dumbledore's instrument
47 Extent
48 Music drama
49 Ravi Shankar's instrument
50 Tiredness indicator
52 Rollerblade
54 Silent assents
56 Shear
58 Sales agt.
60 Paulo Brazil
61 Swiss peak
62 Hodges of the Dodgers
63 Dundee denial
64 "Pride ___ Prejudice"

IRON HORSE ENTERTAINMENT GROUP PRESENTS
THE RAPTURE
plus Under The Influence of Giants, Locksley
SAT. FEB. 10 • 8:30 PM
DOORS OPEN 7:30 PM/BALLROOM
Pearl Street Nightclub
10 PEARL ST. NORTHAMPTON
ALL AGES FRIENDLY
TO PURCHASE TICKETS ON FOR MORE INFO VISIT OUR WEBSITE OR CALL:
WWW.IHEG.COM or 413-586-8686

QUOTE OF THE DAY

"It is not the length of life, it is the depth of life."
-Ralph Waldo Emerson

TWO DUDES BY AARON WARNER



When a student says:
DO YOU HAVE A QUARTER I CAN BORROW TO DO MY LAUNDRY?
What they REALLY mean is:
PART WITH YOUR QUARTER OR SUFFER THE VILE ODOR I GREW PLAYING VIDEO GAMES FOR THREE DAYS WITHOUT CHANGING MY CLOTHES.

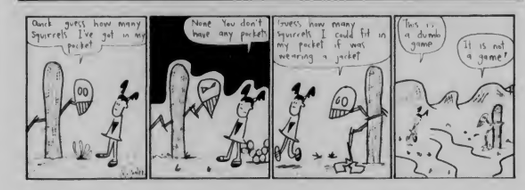
WOMBAT BY NEIL BRYER

I CAN'T BELIEVE JOHN IS STILL HANGING OUT WITH THAT GIRL.
I MEAN, WHAT IN THE WORLD COULD HE POSSIBLY BE DOING WITH SOME GIRL THAT HE COULDN'T BE DOING WITH HIS TWO BEST FRIENDS?
UM, WELL

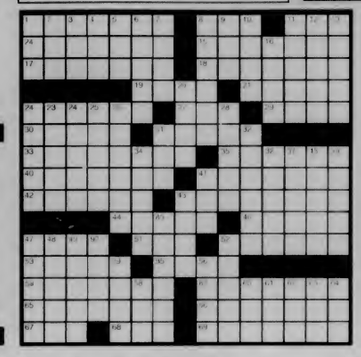
WELCOME TO FALLING ROCK NATIONAL PARK BY JOSH SHALEK

Do you have any sunflowers?
I'm an owl, kid. How bout?
Couldn't you be a little more encouraging tonight?
You have four seconds. I have mine.

THE FAMILY MONSTER BY JOSH SHALEK



Check, guess how many squirrels I've got in my pocket!
None. You don't have any pockets!
Guess, how many squirrels I could fit in my pocket if was wearing a jacket!
This is a dumb game.
It is not a game!



UMass YOGA In Boyden 10
Mon/Wed
4:00-5:15 pm Power Yoga
5:30-6:45 pm Yoga Basics
Tues/Thurs
4:00-5:15 pm Yoga Basics
5:30-6:45 pm Intermediate
7:00-8:15 pm Yoga Basics
Spring 2007
Sign Up Now!
Semester Packages:
1 class per week $80
2 classes per week $150
Campus Recreation
Boyden 215 413-545-0022
umassyoga.com

HOROSCOPES

aquarius JAN. 20-FEB. 18
Your coworker has a shrine in your honor. Weird, huh?

pisces FEB. 19-MAR. 20
You can't un-hook up with someone, but you can hook up with their parents.

aries MAR. 21-APR. 19
Incorporate the word "fecundity" into every conversation you have today.

taurus APR. 20-MAY 20
Replace your favorite breakfast cereal with Gushers, then add milk.

gemini MAY 21-JUN. 21
Your computer is trying to take over your mind, confuse it with pornography.

cancer JUN. 22-JUL. 22
Pick up your feet when you walk you lazy putz.

leo JUL. 23-AUG. 22
Somewhere between a plate and a napkin exists the omnipotent tortilla.

virgo AUG. 23-SEPT. 22
Make friends with a small, tree-dwelling marsupial.

libra SEPT. 23-OCT. 22
If you were a mime, and I called you stupid then walked away, you'd be screwed.

scorpio OCT. 23-NOV. 21
You'd be a better person if you hired a tiny, bearded assistant.

sagittarius NOV. 22-DEC. 21
G-Unit does not stand for Gorilla Unit but rather Garbanzo-Unit. Like the bean.

capricorn DEC. 22-JAN. 19
It's not technically unethical to date your TA.

Sweet mother of mango, write some comics.

collegiancomics@yahoo.com

MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN MARKETPLACE

ANNOUNCEMENTS

Global Express Tours Spring Break Montreal Party Weekends from $99 Complete bus, hotels, & clubs. Montrealexpress.net 781-979-9001

Leave Massachusetts, Stay in the Country! Still time to apply for a Domestic Exchange! Deadline for fall 2007 and spring 2008 is March 1, 2007 Information Sessions Tuesdays and Wednesdays @ 4:45 in Goodell 614 through February 21 or call 545-5351.

APARTMENT FOR RENT

Center of town, 1,2,3 bedrooms hardwood floors. NOW SHOWING for JUNE and SEPTEMBER. NO FEES www.amherstlincolnrealty.com 253-7879

EMPLOYMENT

Winter/ Spring positions available. Earn up to $150 per day Exp not required. Undercover shoppers needed To Judge Retail and Dining Establishments. Call 800-722-4791

Rent us your ears! Listening Experiments $10/hr English must be your first language. Email: phonetics_lab@linguist.umass.edu voicemail: 545-6837

Become a summer orientation counselor and make a difference in the lives of over 4000 new students. Additional information and applications can be found at www.umass.edu/newstudent/contact/studentjobs/counselor The application deadline is February 16, 2007

EMPLOYMENT

Bartending $300/day potential. No experience necs. Training provided. 1-800-965-6520 ext.162

Raft Guide Training Zoar Outdoor is seeking applicants for full and part-time summer jobs for raft guides, rock climbing instructors and kayak instructors. Raft Guide training runs weekends in March. Applicants should have customer service experience and a positive attitude toward learning new skills. Application deadline Feb. 15th. For more information call Zoar Outdoor at 800-532-7483 or www.zoaroutdoor.com/jobs.htm EOE.

Dell Campus Reps Needed Promote a top 30 company to gain real-world business & marketing experience! www.repnation.com/dell to apply.

EMPLOYMENT

SUMMER CAMP COUNSELOR ON CAMPUS INTERVEIWS FOR PREMIER GIRLS CAMP IN THE BERKSHIRES Positions available for talented, energetic and spirited students who love working with kids. Live in a bunk and teach on of the following activities: All Tean Sports, Individual Sprots such as tennis & Golf, Waterfront & Pool Activities, Art, Dance, Theater, Gymnastics, Newspaper, Rocketry, Radio and more. Great Salaries, room, board and travel. Camp runs Jun16th – August 11th Apply online now! www campdanbee.com for further information: 1-800-392-3752, ginger@campdanbee.com Interveiwers will be on campus Thursday February 15th at the "Summer, Co-Op and Internship Fair" in the Lincoln Campus Center, from 10am-3pm.

SERVICES

Pregnancy Testing. HIV Testing. Birth Control, and Emergency Contraception. STI Screening and Treatment Affordable and confidential. Tapestry Health. 27 Pray Street. Amherst 548-9992. www.tapestry-health.com

Call Someone who really cares. Birthright of Amherst Area 549-1906. 1800-550-4900 24 hour hotline Free Pregnancy test 233 N. Pleasant St. Amherst www.birthright.org

ROOM FOR RENT

Cape Cod Summer Near Hyannis. $150/week. 508-428-3456 CapePhotoArt@aol.com Room for rent in house minutes away from area colleges. $450 + Electric. Washer/Dryer. Call Ali 413-253-4929.

TRAVEL

Global Express Tours Spring Break Montreal Party Weekends from $99 Complete bus, hotels, & clubs. Montrealexpress.net 781-979-9001

WANTED

EGG DONORS NEEDED $10,000 (Plus all expenses) We are seeking women who are attractive, under the age of 29, SAT 1300+ (math+verbal), Physically fit and maintaining a healthy lifestyle. If you have a desire to help an infertile family and would like more information please contact us. Email: Darlene@aperfectmatch.com www.aperfectmatch.com 1-800-264-8828

WWW.DAILY COLLEGIAN.COM

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

SPORTS WEEKEND

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 9, 2007 SPORTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Rhode Blocked

Win puts UMass alone in first place

By Rob Greenfield
Collegian Staff

You wouldn't think that the Massachusetts men's basketball team had lost to this team before.

From the beginning to the end it seemed like the Rhode Island Rams were just the sideshow for UMass' first-ever Black Out Night at the Mullins Center and the largest crowd for an Atlantic 10 home game since 2001.

"When I took the UMass job, this was the way I envisioned it," UMass coach Travis Ford said about the Mullins Center crowd. "The place was packed. The players were even saying before the game, 'We want to win it for the fans.' Not only were there a lot of people here but they were loud. They were very, very loud and very much into the game."

The Minutemen started with a 12-0 run and never took the foot off the gas, as the Maroon and White cruised to a 77-55 win to take over first place in the Atlantic 10 standings.

UMass (17-6, 7-2 A-10) travels to Temple on Sunday for a matchup with the Owls at 2 p.m. in Philadelphia.

"That was the best effort we've had," Ford said. "We played very, very well. That was the hardest we've played and the most focused we've played in a very, very long time. We extended a lot of energy mentally and physically in that basketball game. That was as ready as I've seen that basketball team all year."

UMass	77
URI	55

The 75-72 loss to URI on the road was a distant memory last night, and the Minutemen made sure that they didn't suffer the same fate on their home court.

Senior captain Stephane Lasme was spectacular in the biggest game of the season, scoring 18 points, blocking 11 shots and grabbing 12 rebounds to become just the eighth player in NCAA history to record three triple-doubles in one season.

"It got to a point where I was like, 'Let your man go,'" Ford said about Lasme's defensive presence. "He was in rhythm, and he was in an incredible rhythm there for a few minutes. It was frustrating the other team a little bit. I challenged him the last couple of days. I told him yesterday that he needs to quit scoring nine, 10 points like he did the last three games."

"This is the first time I've been in first place," Lasme said. "It feels great. We just have to keep working hard and staying hungry."

Lasme finished with 11 blocks, four of them coming in one sequence during the second

See M. BASKETBALL on page 7

MICHAEL BUSH/COLLEGIAN

Senior Stephane Lasme recorded his third triple-double of the season last night against Rhode Island. He paved the way for UMass with 18 points, 12 rebounds and 11 blocks.

Lasme leads with another

By Danny Picard
Collegian Staff

The fans showed up for what felt like only the second time all season. This time, the Massachusetts men's basketball team did too.

There were plenty of black shirts at the Mullins Center last night, courtesy of UMass Athletics handing out black t-shirts to the first 1,500 fans. It was the most crowded the Mullins had been in quite a while, since Dec. 2 against Boston College to be exact.

"This time we were prepared for it," junior Gary Forbes said about the big crowd. "[Against BC] we were worrying too much about the crowd, and this time we were worrying about taking care of business. This game was for first place, so it was a big game."

It was undoubtedly the second-biggest home game of the year for the Minutemen. They got off to a much different start than the first, thanks to Forbes and senior Stephane Lasme. The duo combined for 17 of UMass' first 23 points in an early 23-5 run to open the game, leading to a 41-point first half finish, and an eventual 77-55 win.

Rhode Island struggled mightily to make baskets early on, and at times looked physically shaken by the revved up Minuteman faithful behind each net. And how could you not be, knowing that one of the top shot blockers in the nation is out for revenge. Lasme got his vengeance, and the 11 blocks he was credited with when it was all said and done seemed like a mistake on the final stat sheet. Certainly you would have thought by watching the game that he had swatted more balls than that in one of his most dominating performances of the season. But 11 will suffice.

"You can't do anything with the scouting report," Forbes said about Lasme's play on Thursday night. "They know he's going to block shots, and he still does it, but it doesn't surprise me."

See LASME on page 7

KARIN WING-FOLLEY/COLLEGIAN

Sophomore Cory Quirk has faired well against both Boston University and Providence College this season, scoring four goals and two assists in four games combined against the Terriers and Friars. The Minutemen go for the series win against BU tonight and the season sweep over PC tomorrow.

URI loss still eats at Minutewomen

By Dominic Poli
Collegian Staff

The last time it played Rhode Island, the Massachusetts women's basketball team (13-11, 3-6 A-10) left the Ryan Center in Kingston, R.I., with a heartbreaking 71-69 overtime loss and just one thing on its mind: payback.

Heading into last month's contest, the Rams (6-17, 4-5 A-10) had a 1-12 record, but came from behind and claimed the OT victory, jamming a dagger into the hearts of the Minutewomen.

With eight seconds left in overtime, UMass freshman guard Kim Benton tossed up a desperate shot from downtown that found the basket. The 3-pointer tied the game at 64-all.

Then, with three ticks remaining, URI guard Safi Mojidi drew a Benton foul sending her to the free-throw line. She drained one of her two shots, putting her team up by one. UMass turned the ball over in its attempt to march down the court for the win, and Mojidi was again sent to the charity stripe in the process. She sank one more free throw to make it a 71-69 game with less than one second left and URI snuck away with the narrow win.

The Minutewomen say they have had a chip on their shoulders ever since.

"We don't look at them lightly at all," UMass coach Marnie Dacko. "We look at them as a huge opportunity for revenge."

When asked if she agreed about the vendetta against the Rams, sophomore guard Sakera Young responded, "Indeed I do. We had the momentum and then we just let them back in the game. So, we definitely want to get revenge.

"We're going to be up for this game," she continued. "First because we need to get revenge. Second, because we need to get a couple of wins to think about running into the A-10 tournament."

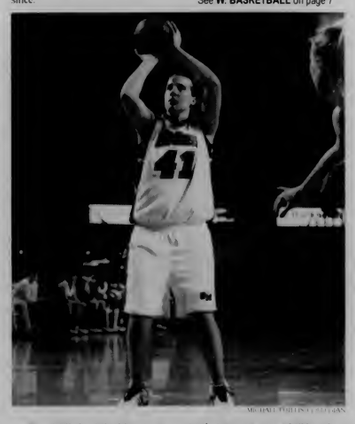
Some teams might be prone to taking a 6-17 squad lightly, but that's not UMass' way. The Minutewomen are not underestimating anyone, especially after early January's little fiasco.

"They beat us. What is there to underestimate?" Dacko asked. "We don't take anybody lightly, especially Rhode Island, because they always get up for us. Their number's always against us. They're playing very well."

Junior forward, and team co-captain, Katie Mills echoes her coach.

"They're definitely not being underestimated. They beat us. We

See W. BASKETBALL on page 7



MICHAEL BUSH/COLLEGIAN

Kate Mills lead the Minutewomen in their game against URI on Jan. 9. She had 21 points and five rebounds in the 71-69 defeat.

UM seeks series win, sweep

Mass Attack has two ties with Terriers, two wins over Friars

By Jon Pelland
Collegian Staff

From here on out, all the weekends are important for the Massachusetts hockey team. As the Minutemen battle inconsistency, they are also battling for home-ice advantage in the opening round of the Hockey East playoffs.

This weekend, UMass has a pair of home games against Boston University and Providence College. Both games are set to begin at 7 p.m. at the Mullins Center.

Last weekend the Minutemen experienced the highs and lows of college hockey. On Friday, they traveled to Boston and took out Boston College at Conte Forum, 5-3. The win marked the second of the season for UMass over the Eagles, giving the Minutemen their first season-series win over BC.

With a number of upsets the night before, the Maroon and White appeared poised to take over the No. 4 slot in the standings with the Eagles standing pat for the Beanpot on Saturday. But it wasn't meant to be as UMass Lowell handed the Minutemen just their second home loss of the season, 2-1.

"I think that's always what we're striving for is to be a little more consistent," said UMass coach Don Cahoon after practice on Wednesday. "We've been playing at a higher level, for the most part, than we have in a few years and I think it shows in some of the really good performances we've had."

Cahoon also notes how the Minutemen have for have not skated themselves into holes this season, much like last Saturday's disappointing loss to the River Hawks.

"We've found a way in certain games not to skate at the same level for much of the game, and that shortens that game, which makes it much more difficult," he said. "The factware, last Saturday night against Lowell we didn't skate for the first 30 minutes. We didn't give ourselves a chance to push and take charge of the game.

"We out-chanced them in the game [8-8] and those are the facts. So are chances to win the game were there, it's just that we make it more difficult on ourselves by not playing as hard as we need to play for the whole 60 [minutes]."

This weekend could be a good test of UMass' consistency. The Minutemen face a tougher opponent in BU on Friday and then take on eighth-place Providence following evening. The situation is much similar to a week ago.

UMass has skated very well against the Terriers in the teams' previous two meetings, both ties (2-2 in Boston on Nov. 28 and 3-3 at the Mullins Center on Jan. 27). The first meeting of the year saw exceptional goaltending from sophomore Jon Quick. He turned away 33 Terrier shots, including 17 in the third period and overtime combined.

Senior Kevin Jarman recorded tying goal at 9:32 of the third to force overtime. There UMass peppered BU netminder John Curry with seven chances, but couldn't get the winning goal across.

Quick played well in the Amherst game as well, but made one error that allowed the Terriers to finish off a three-goal comeback. Kevin Schaeffer dumped the puck into the offensive zone and Quick came out to play it. But the puck ricocheted off his stick and slid into his own net, tying the score after the Minutemen had gone up, 3-0.

The winner of tonight's game, if one team does in fact come out victorious, takes the season series. For Cahoon, it would mean the first time he took a season series from his alma mater, and mentor, Jack Parker. But that is something, Cahoon says, is far from his mind entering tonight's affair.

"Just winning games is the only thing that's important right now," the coach said. "I'm not worried about milestones or breaking new records or anything of that nature."

Last year's surprise team in the conference, Providence has struggled to reclaim the success of last season. The Friars enter Saturday's game battling their own inconsistencies. In recent weeks, Providence has taken down the likes of Vermont, 4-1, in Burlington, and Maine, 3-0, at home. But the Friars have also lost games to those teams, as well as a 2-1 defeat at the hands of New Hampshire.

"They've had a little bit of a problem scoring goals, and they've been inconsistent on that front, and that's probably been much of their troubles," Cahoon said. "We just have to take care of business one night at a time and we have to be ready two nights, and there can be no let up."

Jon Pelland can be reached at jpelland@student.umass.edu

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

DAILY COLLEGIAN

NEW ENGLAND'S LARGEST COLLEGE DAILY EST 1890

SNOW : HI: 35 LO: 7 WWW.DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM MONDAY, FEBRUARY 12, 2007

MINUTEMEN FALL TO OWLS | PAGE 12

TRACEURS TAKE TO THE STREETS | PAGE 6

SGA joins forces with education coalition

UMass students and PHENOM to take issues to State House

By Amber L. Vaillancourt
Collegian Staff

This past Wednesday, discussion of Valentine's Day was all the rage at the University of Massachusetts Student Government Association's first undergraduate Student Senate meeting of the spring semester.

On Feb. 14, chocolates and flowers will be the last thing on the SGA's mind. Almost all discussion at their 1,516th regular meeting last week was about the Lobby and Convention Day to be held at the Massachusetts State House in Boston in support of PHENOM.

PHENOM, a new statewide coalition standing for the Public Higher Education Network of Massachusetts, in Motion 2006-F28, which was passed, is said to be comprised of students, faculty and staff who are organizing and advocating for the finest, most affordable and most accessible system of public education possible.

Lobby and Convention Day is an event that SGA is sponsoring with PHENOM to bring UMass students to the State House by bus in an attempt to influence legislators for affordable higher education. Those attending the event plan on speaking to State Rep. Kevin J. Murphy (D-Lowell), who serves on the Joint Committee on High Education.

With the passing of the motion, the SGA entered into a membership commitment with PHENOM that entailed "a unified approach to improving the entire public higher education system of Massachusetts," as stated in PHENOM's statement of principles. They also want to encourage organizing on the Amherst campus, in a student-staff-faculty coalition, around issues of particular concern.

Senators broke into a brief recess to discuss among small committees what they could do as far as tabling, dorm storm and teach-ins (or sym-

See SGA on page 4

DANIEL SOLOMON/COLLEGIAN

The SGA is sponsoring Lobby and Convention Day, where students will push for affordable higher education at the State House on Feb. 14.

Students discuss HPV vaccination

By Stella Cernak
Collegian Staff

In recent months, three letters have been gaining an increasing amount of recognition throughout millions of American homes, colleges, hospitals and courtrooms – HPV.

The letters do not just spell out the commonly used acronym for the sexually transmitted human papillomavirus, with the aid of a new vaccine coupled with a Texas law, HPV has recently managed to spell out a mixture of controversy and celebration as well.

Planned Parenthood states on its website that HPV is one of the most common sexually transmitted virus in the United States. According to Dr. Robert Horowitz of University of Massachusetts Health Services, the virus infects more than 50 percent of sexually active men and women at some point in their lives, and around 70 percent of teenagers and college students.

Yet, due to the rare occurrence of symptoms in HPV sufferers, most people infected with it do not recognize that they even have the virus. Still, what is of most concern regarding HPV is its strong link to cervical cancer, the second leading cause of cancer deaths among women throughout the world.

It is this link to cervical cancer that drug manufacturer, Merck & Co., Inc., has tried to battle with the recent release of their HPV vaccine, Gardasil. With this release, women between the ages of 13 and 26 now have the option to receive the vaccine from their medical providers.

The U.S. Congress recently jumped on board with Merck as well, by placing a bill in motion that would make Gardasil mandatory for most girls entering the sixth grade. Texas, on the other hand, has managed to beat the U.S. Congress to the punch by already mandating a law last week, making the vaccination a requirement for sixth grade girls regardless of parental approval.

Many parents in Texas have complained that a law requiring a vaccine for a sexually transmitted virus in an eleven-year-old girl seems outrageous.

See HPV on page 4

Mass Attack salvages one point | page 12

MICHAEL BUSH/COLLEGIAN

Sophomore Jon Quick and the Mass Attack are sixth in the Hockey East standings with a 10-8-3 conference record. The goaltender has a 2.29 goals-against average and a .925 save percentage.

Proposed farm bill stirs debate

ILLUSTRATION BY MARK MCCLELLAN/COLLEGIAN

Agriculture Secretary Mike Johanns proposed on Jan. 31, a new farm bill that would end loan deficiency payments that ensured government guaranteed prices for farmers and reduce government subsidies over the next decade.

By Derrick Perkins
Collegian Staff

The Bush Administration proposed a new multi-year farm bill last month that would reduce government subsidies by $4.5 billion over the next decade and end federal funding for wealthy farmers.

The bill, proposed by Agriculture Secretary Mike Johanns on Jan. 31, is designed to tighten loopholes in the current farm bill and reduce agricultural spending by the federal government, according to the Washington Post. The current farm bill, passed in 2002, expires on Sept. 30, 2007.

The proposed new bill would end government subsidies for individuals with an adjusted gross income of over $200,000, close a loophole that allowed non-farming landowners to receive subsidies and end loan deficiency payments that ensured government guaranteed prices for commodities farmers, according to the Washington Post. Subsidies would end all together for about 80,000 individuals if the bill passes in its current form in both the U.S. House and Senate.

The current cap on federal payments received by any one eligible individual would remain unchanged at $360,000, according to the Associated Press.

Johanns told members of the press that the proposal reflected the savings resulting from the rise in prices and export rates of corn and other farming commodities since 2002.

"The 2002 Farm Bill, I believe, was the right policy for the times," Johanns said. "But like every thing the times do change, and times have changed."

See FARM on page 4

Tips for preventing the flu

By Eden Univer and Cara Grannemann
Collegian Staff

Folks, it is officially cold and flu season. It's the end of February, so everyone on campus is most likely a cesspool of college-born illnesses. Try as one might to Purell their hands every five minutes, it's a known fact that college students are more likely to get sick, especially at this time of year. There's no where to run, no where to hide, but changing some bad habits can at least help.

Prevention is the first step to a healthy winter season. Cutting back on some of typical unhealthy habits such as smoking, drinking and staying up late is the best way to avoid getting sick in the first place. Along with that University Health Services' Doctor Pierre Rouzier recommends minimizing transmission by regular hand-washing and coughing and sneezing the right way.

Dr. Rouzier explained that coughing and sneezing into your hands is one of the easiest ways to spread germs. He recommends coughing and sneezing into the crook of the elbow.

If a student does happen to get sick there are a number of ways to get body-better faster. It's hard enough being away from mom's TLC so here are a few tips to self-treatment and care. Dr. Rouzier suggests students create their own cold care kit.

"It should contain Tylenol or Ibuprofen for aches and pains, Robitussin for coughs and Sudafed for a runny nose," he said. "You can self-treat for several days to a week before coming in [to UHS]."

This is when many students run into confusion about when to go to UHS or when to stick it out. Given that the wait is an average of two to four hours, UHS doesn't have to be the first stop when feeling under the weather.

Dr. Rouzier said a few good reasons for coming in are "High fever, chills, shortness of breath and coughing up brown, yellow or green sputum."

The steps students can follow when they get a cold or the flu are to try and make an appointment at UHS or better yet, call their primary care physician from home first.

Doctors in general tend to over-prescribe antibiotics creating a resistance to other medications.

Beth Schumacher, a UMass freshman and regular client of UHS said that she often walks away from Health Services with a "goodie bag" of prescriptions.

Because of the two day absence allowance in most classes, students feel obligated to go to class even when it could make other students sick or themselves sicker. Dr. Rouzier understands that without parents keeping their kids home from school it is hard to know when to stay and when to go. Huge lecture halls with high rates of student traffic raise chances of encountering some nasty germs.

Even during the frigid winter, try and open your dorm windows for just a couple minutes to freshen the stale recirculated air of your dorm.

So as the sickness season starts, hunker down in your dorm room with some soup, take a nap and pretend that your roommate shuffling around is your mother.

UMass professor publishes book

By Eli Rosenswaike
Collegian Staff

Being a parent isn't an exact science, but the media often portrays it otherwise, bombarding mothers and fathers everywhere on how to parent their children. Adjunct University of Massachusetts journalism professor Meredith O'Brien discusses that topic and more in her new book, A Suburban Mom Notes from the Asylum.

Released by Wyatt-MacKenzie Publishing in January, the book is a compilation of 76 essays and columns that O'Brien – a mother of three – has written on a variety of parenting issues over the past eight years. O'Brien's book is filled with experiences she's had with her children, and the immense expectations the media places on parents to be perfect.

"The book shows how parenting has changed over the past eight years, at least in my eyes, through my experiences," O'Brien said. "I thought they might make for interesting reading when put together, so I shopped around and looked for a publisher."

O'Brien doesn't claim to have all the answers to being a perfect parent, but the book delves into her reasoning that there's no right or wrong way to raise your children.

"One theme that runs through the book is that I'm shocked about how parents are told what to do and how to do it," she said. O'Brien wants to send out the message that not all parents are perfect, and they can't live up to all of the standards that some parenting experts put out there.

"I hope parents can find the book humorous and take joy in that they're not the only imperfect parents out there," she added. "I think parents feel they have to appear as though they have it all going on, that everything's perfect. The house is clean, the kids are perfect and getting straight A's, they're superstars in soccer and you have a thriving career," she said. "The reality is most people don't live like that, and hopefully this book will let people know that a lot more people than you think lead less-than-perfect parenting lives."

A freelance writer, O'Brien brings a dearth of experience in writing and blogging about parenting through many different publications. In addition to her teaching at UMass, she currently pens a weblog – entitled Boston Mommy – on the Boston Herald's website. She also writes a column for the Boston area publication, Parents and Kids and online for Working Moms in Pop Culture and Politics.

Professor Meredith O'Brien writes about being a parent in her new book.

O'Brien – who received a bachelor's degree in Journalism and Political Science from UMass and a master's degree in Political Science from American University – began her career cov-

See BOOK on page 4

Leader Bricklayer Human being*

We believe community service is a part of our job description. Last June, we asked our US staff of 29,000 to take a day away from work and help their neighbors. We called it 29k/30.

Learn more about this project and others.

Visit pwc.com/community

*connectedthinking

PRICEWATERHOUSECOOPERS

© 2007 PricewaterhouseCoopers LLP. All rights reserved. "PricewaterhouseCoopers" refers to PricewaterhouseCoopers LLP (a Delaware limited liability partnership) or, as the context requires, the PricewaterhouseCoopers global network or other member firms of the network, each of which is a separate and independent legal entity. *connectedthinking is a trademark of PricewaterhouseCoopers LLP (US). We are proud to be an Affirmative Action and Equal Opportunity Employer

Abortion bill revisited in S.D.

A demonstrator holds up a pro-choice sign alongside an opposing demonstrator during a rally to protest South Dakota's new anti-abortion law outside the Federal Court building in downtown Sioux Falls, S.D.

By Joe Kafka
Associated Press

PIERRE, S.D.—Lawmakers who watched as a near-total ban on abortions failed in South Dakota voting booths last year have revived the legislation with changes that may make the difference in public acceptance. But the bill's success is far from assured.

None of the Legislature's leaders, notably some sponsors of last year's bill, are joining the effort this year because waging last year's fight was so exhausting.

"It's far too soon to put our state through something of such a difficult nature again," said Democratic Sen. Julie Bartling, a prime sponsor of last year's abortion bill.

"The state needs to heal, and I just don't feel that we need to take this up in this legislative session again," she added. "The people have spoken."

The bill introduced in January includes exceptions for victims of rape or incest and if continuing the pregnancy would harm the woman's health significantly.

Last year's ban exempted only abortions needed to save a woman's life, and the lack of more exceptions was cited when voters repealed the ban in November. Public opinion polls have shown that a ban with rape and incest exceptions would pass muster with South Dakotans.

A chief sponsor of the current bill, Republican Rep. Gordon Howie, said legislators must not lose their momentum and noted that the repeal passed with only 56 percent of the vote.

"What the voters told us was that they were uncomfortable with the rape and incest circumstances. And so this bill is one that was specifically designed for the majority of South Dakotans or with them in mind," Howie said.

The bill would allow rape victims to get abortions if they report the rapes to police within 50 days. Doctors would have to confirm those reports with police; doctors also would have to give blood from aborted fetuses to police for DNA testing in rape and incest cases.

In the case of incest, a doctor and the woman would have to report the identity of the alleged perpetrator to police before an abortion could be done.

Abortions could be done only until the 17th week of pregnancy in cases of incest and rape.

Opponents of both bills say this year's bill carries onerous reporting provisions for victims of sex crimes.

"Rather than helping rape and incest survivors, this bill does nothing more than re-victimize them by forcing them and their families into a web of government bureaucracy and intrusion," said Kate Looby, state director of Planned Parenthood in South Dakota. "Under this bill, the victim's privacy and confidentiality are lost entirely."

About 800 abortions are done each year in South Dakota, nearly all of them at a Planned Parenthood Clinic in Sioux Falls, the state's largest city.

Howie and others who support this year's bill hope it can become a legal avenue that could cause the U.S. Supreme Court to revisit its 1973 Roe v. Wade decision legalizing abortions.

Utah also has legislation in progress that would ban abortion except for rape, incest and saving the mother's health, and the bill would set up a trust fund to pay for the expected court challenge.

The Mississippi Legislature, which last year considered a near-ban, this year also added exemptions for rape or incest. Both versions allowed abortions to save a mother's life, but not her health.

South Dakota Gov. Mike Rounds, a Republican who signed the near-ban last year, said he was not prepared to say whether he would sign the current version.

Bartling doubts it will even pass both legislative chambers. Although support appears strong in the House, she doubts sentiment is the same in the Senate State Affairs Committee. Testimony on the bill was scheduled to start Monday.

"I just don't think it'll make it to the Senate floor," Bartling said. "I've even talked to very pro-life Republican legislators that are not in favor of bringing it back this year. I think it's just too soon."

Heather DeWit, 26, an after-school program director in Sioux Falls, said she's glad lawmakers have revived the abortion issue. Dewit voted in favor of last year's bill in November.

"I think they should look at it again and maybe look at it in a different way, with the exceptions, if that's what they think it'll take to get it through," DeWit said. "I don't necessarily think the exceptions are needed, but it seems like the voters want to see that."

Village may set N.Y. record for snowfall

By William Kates
Associated Press

REDFIELD, N.Y.—This village in upstate New York's snowbelt gets a lot of snowfall during the winter, but last week's total — more than 11 feet, unofficially — might be an all-time record.

Before it began to wind down Sunday, persistent streams of squalls fueled by moisture from Lake Ontario during the last week consistently dumped lake-effect snow in this western New York region.

All that's left — apart from the massive dig out — is to claim the record for the most snowfall in a week. Redfield's total of 136 inches would break the state record of ten feet, seven inches that fell in nearby Montague over seven days ending Jan. 1, 2002, said Steve McLaughlin, a meteorologist for the National Weather Service in Buffalo. A National Weather Service official will travel Monday to verify the amount.

"In all my life, I mean my entire life combined, I've never seen this much snow at once," said Jim Beveridge, 47, of Timmonium, Md., who drove up Thursday for a long weekend of snowmobiling.

McLaughlin said the proper way to measure snow requires taking readings about every six hours. It's very important with lake-effect snow.

"It can be light and fluffy. If you did hourly measurements, you might come up with 24 inches, when there's really only 16 on the ground. It needs to be able to pack some," he said.

The heavy snow is common along the Tug Hill Plateau, a 50-mile wedge that rises 2,100 feet from the lake's eastern shore. It usually gets about 300 inches — roughly 25 feet — of snow a year.

The hamlet of Hooker holds the state's once-year record with 466.9 inches, about 39 feet, in winter 1976-77. Redfield receives an annual average of 270 inches — more than 22 feet.

The weeklong snows left behind surreal scenes.

Some of the more hardened locals, however, aren't impressed.

"It's snow. We get a lot of it. So what?" said Allan Babcock, a lifelong resident who owns a popular diner in this village of 650 people located about 38 miles northeast of Syracuse.

Roads were mostly cleared Sunday as workers turned their attention to removing the snow and trimming down 10- and 12-foot-high snowbanks.

The intense blast of snow hasn't been blamed for any deaths in Oswego County. Elsewhere, however, more than a week of bitter cold and slippery roads have contributed to at least 25 deaths across the northeastern quarter of the nation — five in Ohio, four in Illinois, four in Indiana, two in Kentucky, seven in Michigan, and one each in Wisconsin, and Maryland and elsewhere in New York, authorities said.

Controversial KKK costume discussed

ST. PAUL, Minn.—A party that asked students to come dressed "politically incorrect" has prompted an investigation by Macalester College officials who learned one student was costumed as a Ku Klux Klan member and another wore blackface with a noose around his neck.

Students at the private school told administrators about the Jan. 16 party on campus.

"My initial reaction was shock," said Paul Maitland-McKinley, a member of the Black Liberation Affairs Committee, a student group. "I thought, this can't really happen on my campus."

A campus-wide discussion is planned for Tuesday.

"We hope we can start a deeper dialogue on ... why these types of activities hurt people and why they get the kind of response they do," said Jim Hoppe, the school's associate dean of students.

The student newspaper, The Mac Weekly, quoted senior David Nifoussi, who attended the party, as saying it was meant to be a satiric comment on "things that would be considered taboo in most situations" at the liberal school.

Macalester is the latest in a series of colleges to investigate student parties and incidents that have involved racial overtones.

Earlier this school year, Trinity College and Whitman College had parties where students showed up in racially offensive costumes or blackface. At Texas A&M University, students made a racist video that apparently was intended as satire, and a fraternity at Johns Hopkins University was suspended after a "Halloween in the Hood" party displayed a fake skeleton hanging from a noose.

The Macalester party was held a week before spring classes started and did not draw a large crowd, Hoppe said.

Macalester President Brian Rosenberg sent a statement to students, faculty and staff members condemning the offensive costumes and party theme.

"It is important to understand that the college condemns and will not tolerate activities of this type," he wrote. "It is deeply disappointing that Macalester students would be so insensitive and demonstrate such a lack of understanding of the college's values and mission."

Associated Press

Trends in high-risk pregancies increase

By Marilynn Marchione
Associated Press

Madelyn Engelman, who turned six on Feb. 1, plays with her mother, Dr. Gabrielle Fish, in their New Jersey home. Fish was in her mid-30s when she decided to try a risky pregnancy after her kidney transplant.

High-risk pregnancies are on the rise in the United States and may be more common now than at any other time since modern obstetric care became available.

Why? More fortysomething moms are having babies, and epidemics of diabetes, obesity and high blood pressure are causing pregnancy and birth complications.

But in this otherwise troubling trend is also some good news: a small but growing number of women are successfully having children despite life-threatening conditions that once made a safe pregnancy almost inconceivable.

Exact numbers are not available, but doctors say that tens of thousands of organ transplant recipients, breast cancer survivors, women with heart defects and even women with the AIDS virus have decided to risk childbearing in the last several years.

"These people define a whole new era of pregnancy for us," said Temple University's Dr. Vincent Armenti, who runs a registry that tracks births to transplant patients.

"We have to change our mindset about the perfect pregnancy," he said. Women should be given advice based on solid research "instead of an emotional feeling that some people just shouldn't have a baby."

Births to women 35 and older are soaring. And many complications are becoming so routine that nurse midwives can manage them instead of sending women to high-risk care specialists. Doctors around the country say they are treating far more of these risky cases than they did a decade ago.

"Patients are getting older, so by definition, they're higher-risk. The diabetes rate is going through the roof, so that's high-risk. More people with high blood pressure are getting pregnant. The list goes on and on," leaving fewer women considered low-risk, said Dr. Jacques Moritz, director of gynecology at Roosevelt Hospital in New York City.

Dr. Mary D'Alton, the Columbia University Medical Center obstetrics chief who recently delivered twins to a 59-year-old woman, has replaced the term "high-risk" with a 1-to-10 scale.

Birth outcomes for older women and those with medical problems "have been better than we would expect," although complications are more common, she said. For example, about half of organ transplant recipients give birth prematurely, although often by just a couple of weeks. "I don't mean to paint a rosy picture, but I would want to paint an optimistic picture," D'Alton said.

Dr. Gabrielle Fish felt optimistic when she decided to try pregnancy after her kidney transplant. Fish, of Cherry Hill, N.J., was in her mid-30s and had been stable on her anti-rejection drugs for two years. After researching pregnancies among transplant patients there have been more than 1,000 in the last decade, she asked her doctors' advice.

"They pretty much encouraged me. They said, 'You're a healthy woman and you don't want to wait till you're high-risk because of your age,'" Fish said.

"Usually if they were able to get pregnant after the embolization, it means that blood supply to the uterus is pretty good," he said. Doctors expect more of these cases as embolization becomes a popular option to hysterectomy for fibroids, which plague millions of women.

Other reasons high-risk pregnancies are increasing:

• Older moms. In 2005, there were more than 104,000 births in the United States to women ages 40 through 44, and over 6,500 to women 45 and older. Advanced age raises the risk of birth defects.

• Chronic health problems. Obesity among women ages 18 to 44 rose from under 9 percent in 1990 to almost 22 percent in 2005.

Hospital admissions for diabetes or related conditions among pregnant women and new mothers rose from 175,655 in 1993 to 369,861 in 2004, says the March of Dimes. Admissions for high blood pressure rose from 260,222 to 403,271.

• More drugs. Nearly two-thirds of women who gave birth from 1996-2000 took a medication during pregnancy, a large federally funded study found. Of those, nearly 40 percent took a drug whose safety in pregnancy is not established, and nearly five percent took a drug potentially risky to the fetus. More pregnant women have taken new medicines for cancer, depression and other problems. More than 30 registries now track outcomes of pregnant women on various drugs.

• Growing prevalence of HIV. Each year, about 6,000 to 7,000 HIV-infected American women give birth. Such pregnancies have been controversial because of the risk of spreading the virus to their babies. But modern AIDS drugs are so effective at protecting babies from the virus' spread that more doctors are accepting these women's choice to have children.

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian
CXVII
Issue 80

113 Campus Center University of Massachusetts Amherst, MA 01003
• 413-545-3500 •
• Fax 413-545-3699 •
www.dailycollegian.com

Editor in Chief Eric Ad...
Managing Editor Rob Ge...
Business Manager Dan...
Production Manager Amb...
Night Supervisor Sheryl W...
Advertising Manager Jaime...
Advertising Production Moth...
Arts & Living Editor Morgan...
Comics Editor Adam...
Editorial Editor Jackie...
News Editor Mari Pe...
Sports Editor Danny...
Sports Editor Jon Pe...
Circulation Manager Jeff Per...
Finance Manager David Wa...
Assistant Operations Linda W...
Assistant Advertising...
Asst. Arts & Living Tim Mc...
Asst. Arts & Living Sydney L...
Assistant News Anna D...
Assistant News Nicole L...
Assistant Editorial Brendan H...
Web Editor James H...
Photo Editor Evan Tri...

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian (USPS [illegible]) is published Monday through Friday during the academic year except during vacations and exam periods, and weekly during the summer, by the University of Massachusetts Amherst. The Collegian is independently operated by an advertising manager, business manager, and editorial staff. Founded in 1890, the paper became a daily in 1971. Periodicals postage paid at Boston, MA. Circulation is 10,000. Subscriptions are $150 per year. Postmaster: Send address changes to The Massachusetts Daily Collegian, 113 Campus Center, University of Massachusetts, Amherst, MA 01003. Printed by Journal Printing, Inc., Keene, NH. Ads are accepted on a space basis. Rates are negotiable between $30 a column inch and $50 a column inch.

Production Crew
On staff today

NIGHT EDITOR
Matt O'Rourke

COPY EDITOR
Callie Williams

PRODUCTION SUPERVISOR
Amanda Allen

WRITE FOR NEWS!
e-mail:
newsatdailycollegian.com

Attention First-Year Students

Have you completed MyStudentBody? It's easy, interesting ... and required for all first-year students. To avoid a registration hold, you must take and pass the course no later than Monday, March 12th. For instructions, go to the University Health Services website.

www.umass.edu/uhs
Center for Alcohol and other Drug Abuse P...

ASIAN ARTS & CULTURE PROGRAM

Taikoza: Japanese Taiko Drums & Dance

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 16

Taikoza is a Japanese Taiko drum and dance ensemble that uses the deep and powerful rhythms of the Taiko drums, stringed instruments, metal percussion and bamboo flutes to create an electrifying energy and a highly visual musical art form. Drawing from Japan's rich tradition of music and performance, Taikoza has created an original and high-energy sound that transcends national boundaries.

Concert Hall at 7:30pm
Tickets $25, $20, $15
Youth 17 & Under and Four College Students $15, $10, $5
www.taikoza.com

UMASS AMHERST

www.fineartscenter.com/asian TICKETS 1-800-999-UMAS or 545-2511

Commercial spreads awareness of HPV

HPV from page 1

At UMass, however, the vaccine has been greeted by most with open arms. Some students, such as Maggie Lebonno, have not received the vaccine, but consider receiving it in the future.

"It's better to be safe than sorry," Lebonno said. "I think the vaccine is a good idea."

On the other hand, sophomore Tina Paul recently received the vaccine, not out of her own concerns, but out of suggestion from her mother. "I didn't get the vaccine necessarily because I was afraid of getting the cancer, but I'm glad now that I'm protected against it," Paul said. This fear, which Dr. Horowitz recognizes as what he calls a "knee-jerk reaction to ads" recently put out by Merck, drives many people to misinformed decisions. He said he feels that although the vaccine is a breakthrough, "it is still crucial for students to be informed and to understand the facts."

Yet, some students still have obtained much of their knowledge on HPV from Merck commercials. In a discussion of HPV amongst a group of female students, where one student was unaware of the recent release of the vaccine, another quickly fired back, "What? Haven't you seen the commercials?"

Most people with HPV do not get cancer, as most HPV cases are low-risk, said Dr. Horowitz. However, he does point out that 70 percent of cervical cancer cases are caused by high-risk cases of HPV. He recommends that "women receive their annual exams, as they are what end up saving women's lives."

Many students, however, even those who are aware of the importance of HPV screening, are not fully informed on how to protect themselves against the virus, which cannot always be avoided through use of condoms. Many UMass students, like Masha Gutarova, claim they receive most of their information on the virus from the media.

"I read Cosmo, which has stuff on HPV all the time, and of course, I've seen the commercials," Gutarova said.

Yet, there are still plenty of UMass students that have somehow escaped the grasp of the Gardasil advertising campaign. Many of these students, who weren't aware of happened to be the males on campus. This is most likely due to the fact that HPV is often portrayed, even through Merck's Gardasil commercials, as a women's virus.

On the contrary, not only do men contract HPV, but they can act as carriers of the virus and pass it onto their female partners, putting them at risk for cervical cancer, according to Planned Parenthood.

In a random survey of 40 UMass students conducted by the Collegian, half of which were men, 13 men could not define what HPV was. Out of the 20 women however, only two of them were unaware of HPV.

Dr. Horowitz sees HPV cases frequently amongst UMass students and suggests that above all, UMass students should be safe, something which can only be achieved through being informed.

Nadia Cermak is a Collegian staff writer and can be reached at ccermak@student.umass.edu

UMass students to lobby at State House

Senators, including Peter Barros, discussed what they could do as far as tabling, dorm storm and teach-ins to make the State House lobby a success.

SGA from page 1

is collectively progress, not one particular part moving ahead, but faculty, students, and staff."

"We hope to make higher education more quality for all students in terms of affordability, in terms of tenured faculty, and to make the education at the highest quality it can be," said Sarah Morgan, UMass freshman and SGA volunteer.

"It's a statewide concern," she continued. "The affordability of education and the high tuition costs and the fees have grown in the last few years, and I definitely don't think it's just a UMass issue."

PHENOM is looking for as many people as possible to participate and go to lobby on Feb. 14; all those students interested in going can sign up or inquire for more information at massphenom@gmail.com.

Members of Farm Bureau support new bill

FARM from page 1

Agriculture industry groups have pushed for a minimum of changes between the 2002 bill and the newly proposed Bush Administration bill in the structure of federal programs and spending.

"Farm Bureau members from across the country have repeatedly and strongly emphasized the need to keep the 2007 farm bill consistent and very similar to the concepts in the current bill," said American Farm Bureau Federation President Bob Stallman in a statement released last month. "We are keeping an open mind about the administration's proposal and intend to give it full consideration."

Sen. Tom Harkin, D-Iowa, Chairman of the Agriculture, Nutrition and Forestry Committee, criticized the proposal for failing to include ample funding for the full range of agricultural programs affected by the farm bill.

"While it's positive, the proposal takes significant steps in the right direction, it falls short of the investment levels needed to reach our nation's objectives," Harkin said, citing renewable energy, rural economic development and conservation as the nation's key agricultural goals in a Jan. 31 statement.

"While I support the rhetoric, I do not see adequate resources dedicated to backing it up," he said.

The proposed bill would cost $87.3 billion in the next five years, according to the Associated Press, an $18 billion reduction in federal agriculture spending. Ten billion dollars have been allocated for wetlands restoration, biofuel development and new conservation initiatives. A further $5 billion would be spent on increased government purchases of fruits and vegetables for school lunch programs, according to the Washington Post.

"Farm bills are so challenging because I will work with lawmakers from every region on the country, every crop you can possibly think of. The diversity in farm policy is just huge," Johanns said speaking of the varied responses in congress concerning the new bill. "We got a long way to go to the finish line."

Farmers in Massachusetts were eligible for $67.5 million in government subsidies between 1995 and 2005. The Commonwealth is ranked as 44 in the nation for receiving government farming subsidies. Hampshire County was eligible for $9.76 million of those subsidies during that period of time, according to the Environmental Working Group, a Washington-based organization that examines environmental issues. Between 1995 and 2005, the University of Massachusetts received $34,885 in federal subsidies, the 63rd highest amount in Hampshire County according to the EWG's Farm Subsidy Database.

Sen. Tom Harkin criticized the bill for its lack of funding for programs.

First woman elected as Harvard's president

By Jesse Harlan Alderman
Associated Press

CAMBRIDGE, Mass.—Harvard University on Sunday named historian Drew Gilpin Faust as its first female president, ending a lengthy and secretive search to find a successor to Lawrence Summers and his tumultuous five-year tenure.

The seven-member Harvard Corporation elected Faust, a noted scholar of the American South and dean of Harvard's Radcliffe Institute for Advanced Study, as the university's 28th president. The 30-member board of overseers ratified the selection.

Faust, 59, recognized the significance of her appointment.

"I hope that my own appointment can be one symbol of an opening of opportunities that would have been inconceivable even a generation ago," Faust said at a news conference on campus. But she also added, "I'm not the woman president of Harvard, I'm the president of Harvard."

With Faust's appointment, half of the eight Ivy League schools will have a woman as president. Her selection is noteworthy given the uproar over Summers' comments that genetic differences between the sexes might help explain the dearth of women in top science jobs, comments which sparked debates about equality at Harvard and nationwide.

Faust oversaw the creation of two faculty task forces, formed in the aftermath of Summers' remarks, to examine gender diversity at Harvard. She has been dean of Radcliffe since 2001, two years after the former women's college was merged into the university as a research center with a mission to study gender issues.

"This is a great day, and a historic day, for Harvard," said James R. Houghton, chairman of the presidential search committee.

Some professors have quietly groused that — despite the growing centrality of scientific research to Harvard's budget — the 371-year-old university is appointing a fifth consecutive president who is not a scientist. No scientist has had the top job since James Bryant Conant retired in 1953; its last four have come the fields of classics, law, literature and economics.

Faust is the first Harvard president who did not receive an undergraduate or graduate degree from the university since Charles Chauncy, an alumnus of Cambridge University in England, who died in office in 1672. She attended Bryn Mawr College and the University of Pennsylvania, where she was also a professor of history.

Faust pivots from managing Radcliffe, a think-tank with 87 employees and a $17 million budget, to presiding over Harvard's 11 schools and colleges, 24,000 employees and a budget of $3 billion. The Harvard presidency is perhaps the most prestigious job in higher education, offering a pulpit where remarks resonate throughout academic circles and unparalleled resources, including a university endowment valued at nearly $30 billion.

"Faculty turned to her constantly as someone whose opinion is to be trusted," said Sheldon Hackney, a former president of The University of Pennsylvania and southern historian who worked closely with Faust. "She's very clear, well-organized. She has a sense of humor, but she's very even-keeled. You come to trust in her because she's so solid."

In Faust, Harvard not only has its first female leader, but a president who has candidly discussed her feminist ideals in a memoir, "Shapers of Southern History: Autobiographical Reflections."

Born Catherine Gilpin in the Jim Crow era, to a privileged family in Virginia's Shenandoah Valley, Faust wrote that a conversation at age 9 with the family's black handyman and driver inspired her to send a letter to President Eisenhower pleading for desegregation.

She then began to question the rigid Southern conventions where girls wore "scratchy organdy dresses" and white children addressed black adults by their first names.

"I was the rebel who did not just march for civil rights and against the Vietnam War but who fought endlessly with my mother, refusing to accept her insistence that 'this is a man's world, sweetie, and the sooner you learn that, the better off you'll be,'" she writes.

Faust joins an exclusive roster of former Harvard presidents that have included colonial clergymen, Bay State patricians and a cabinet secretary. Former President Derek Bok has been leading the university this academic year on an interim basis.

While the presidential search was marked by disciplined secrecy — committee members met behind closed doors in a Georgian mansion and were quietly ushered away in idling Lincoln Town Cars — it also revealed an embarrassing trend: several top-tier candidates said they weren't interested.

In January, Thomas R. Cech, head of the Howard Hughes Medical Institute and a Nobel prize winner, asked the search committee to remove him from consideration. The presidents of Columbia, Brown and Princeton all said they did not want the job.

O'Brien discusses parenting in new book

BOOK from page 1

ering politics for various newspapers, including the Springfield Republican. She co-authored the book The Burying of the President in 1996, but most of her work since then has dealt with parenting.

"It wasn't anything that I ever set out or planned to do," O'Brien said, in regards to her work on writing about parenting. "It just happened. I was home with twin babies, and I really couldn't get out of the house. I didn't have to leave my kids to go research anything and I could write about my experiences from home.

"Writers are advised to write what they know, and Meredith O'Brien has taken that advice to heart in her new book," said Karen List, Chair of the UMass Journalism Department. "Since she juggles the demands of three young children, her freelance writing career and her teaching at UMass, it's something of a miracle she could find the time to write the book at all. She's an exceptionally committed and talented journalist, teacher and mom."

O'Brien balances her responsibilities as a mother by doing her work while the kids are at school, but her book explains that there is no right or wrong way to make that balance work for any parent.

"I made some choices about my career and decided I would work from home because it would work better for my family," she said. "But that's not necessarily the answer for everybody. When you have kids it changes everything and you need to know that you need to work out what's best for your family, and don't let anyone else tell you what to do about it.

"One of the toughest things about being a parent is trying to figure out what the right decision is, in the moment, for anything," she added. "And probably the reality is that there is no right decision. I always feel like there's some right answer out there, but I somehow don't know what that is, and I feel like I'm winging it most of the time."

O'Brien's 304-page book retails for $16 and can be found in major bookstores everywhere.

Eli Rosenswaike is a Collegian staff writer and can be reached at erosenswa@student.umass.edu

Meredith O'Brien wants to send out the message that not all parents are perfect but have to know what's best for their families at the right time.

EXTROVERTS WANTED UMASS AMHERST IS IN SEARCH OF
TOUR GUIDES

1 Lead campus tours for students and families interested in the UMass Amherst Campus.
2 Paid hourly position with a minimum commitment of 5 hours a week including some weekends.
3 Serve as panel speakers, hosts, and tour leaders at on and off campus yield activities such as Open Houses and Accepted Student Receptions.
4 Conduct informational interviews with prospective students and their families.

UMASS AMHERST
To find out more about the position or to pick up an application visit us at the Campus Center Concourse on January 29th & 30th or February 12th - 16th, 2007.
Applications are also available at the Visitors Center. Application deadline is February 16th, 2007

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian
EDITORIAL OPINION
Monday, February 12, 2007
"I may not agree with what you say but I will defend to the death your right to say it" Voltaire
Editorial@dailycollegian.com

Tuition: how much is too much?

An out-of-state admission

Joe Hughes

As University of Massachusetts students enter into a new semester, many continue to express concern with the increasing fees that are hurled our way. In addition to tuition being at an all-time high, some students are shelling out more than $100 for a single book, while the average UMass student is attending five classes a semester. Dorm rent and meal plans further increase the already severely expensive costs.

Although fees have indeed skyrocketed in the past few years, for some the expenses are far more significant. Specifically, I am referring to the out-of-state students of whose tuitions are more than 100 percent more costly than of those who are in-state. According to the UMass Web site, approximately 20 percent of UMass undergraduates are out-of-state, withholding international students.

The standard tuition, including required fees, rent, telecommunications and a meal plan, for in-state students is $15,795. Students from out-of-state, meanwhile, are charged $24,914, a difference of $9,114 in fees.

Although Massachusetts taxes might have something to do with this obscene difference, they only account for a small percentage. Where is the rest of this money going, and why should traveling students be required to pay this outrageous amount?

The arguments supporting the dramatic differences in tuition between the students are weak. Supporters claim that out-of-state students make it more difficult for in-state students to gain acceptance into nearby schools, and result in less locals enrolling in universities. This argument, however, fails to perceive the big picture.

Out-of-state students provide UMass with diversity, different experiences, broader connections, an overall better national reputation, in addition to more varied opinions and ideas. It is unquestionable that UMass would not be as outstanding as it is without the enrollment of out-of-state students. If anything, students who are not Massachusetts residents should be encouraged to attend.

Instead of embracing these out-of-state students, however, they are exploited.

In Minneapolis, where I'm from, the rules of tuition are quite different. A large number of my buddies went to Wisconsin for school, and Wisconsin locals swarm across the University of Minnesota's campus. A beautifully-orchestrated tuition reciprocity agreement exists between Wisconsin and Minnesota. This means that Wisconsin residents are allowed to attend college in Minnesota without increased out-of-state tuition, and similarly Minnesotans may attend college in Wisconsin without the same added fees. If diversity and the right to explore options where best-suited is encouraged in this country, why is it that this reciprocity agreement is not national instead of being limited to two states in the upper Midwest?

After doing some research, I learned that Minnesota and Wisconsin aren't the only two states with a reciprocity agreement. The Academic Common Market is a reciprocity agreement between 16 states located in the south. Ironically, the south is consistently ridiculed and criticized as being "backwards," and yet it has developed a more advanced, more equalized and free system of higher education than the northeast.

A Midwestern version of the ACM excluding Wisconsin exists, composed of Kansas, Michigan, Minnesota, Missouri, Nebraska and North Dakota. This system has regulations on out-of-state tuition. Every state is happy, because nobody has to pay more regardless of where a family's kid is sent.

A national plan that would banish tuition prejudice and nurture the thought that we, as Americans, can graduate high school knowing that we have the option of attending any school we'd like without having to pay exorbitant amounts, would decrease regional disparity gaps in education and economy, and further equalize opportunities for all citizens – rather than simply those born in the right area.

Instead of embracing these out-of-state students, however, they are exploited.

The only thing hindering this national reciprocal agreement from happening is the multitude of students from wealthy families who are willing to pay any out-of-state tuition required without concern. Thus most schools, including those in the five college area, do fine financially without the adherence to such an agreement.

Every school has its pros, and every student has their own reasons for attending a certain university, whether it's because it offers better overall education, has a better specified area of concentration or simply offers a wide range of options in majoring. The cost is merely a factor that should not be a reason.

Personally, I'm glad I was able to come to a new place, undertake a new experience and meet a lot of new people in a location where I previously didn't know anyone before. Since I came to UMass, I've gained an entirely new perspective on things, and it has completely changed my life.

It's the right of any potential student to be able to have this same experience, to gain insight by traveling to a new location, to a school that's best suited for him/her individually, without being underprivileged by the costs.

Joe Hughes can be reached at jhughes@student.umass.edu

Tuition Costs

(Taken from the universities' websites)

School	In-State	Out-of-State
Michigan	$20,688	$40,096
Illinois	$18,682	$32,768
UConn	$16,628	$29,828
Florida	$14,370	$28,900
Rutgers	$19,000	$27,505
UMASS	$16,584	$26,306

UMass: money over mind

Dan Nicastro

On Thursday, Feb. 8, roughly 80 students and faculty gathered outside the Student Union to protest the administration's (mis)handling and (mis)appropriation of funds, and to try and expose why tuition and fees keep climbing higher and higher.

80 out of 22,000 students.

More people rioted in Southwest after the UMass loss to Appalachian State than showed up at this protest. I have more people in several of my classes than those who attended this protest.

Anyway, at the protest, Graduate Student Senate President Jeff Napolitano pointed at the 50 percent increase in administration salaries (from $7 million in 2004 to $11 million projected in 2007), including a $20,000 increase for Vice Chancellor Gargano, a $70,000 increase for Provost Seymour and a whopping $100,000 increase for Chancellor Lombardi.

So other than the fact that all of these people make more than my parents' combined income, why should we care? Well, I am, like many other middle class students, motivated by my ever-increasing student loan bill. Other than that, it comes down to a debate over how education should be managed.

Almost every time I attend a family event, I'm invariably flanked on both sides by uncles involved in either the education system or in town politics. They argue with each other over whether or not education is a business and should be treated as such. The University of Massachusetts, like many other institutions of higher learning, has decided to treat education as a business. At the last family party I attended, my Uncle Doug, who is heavily involved in town politics, argued that education has turned into a business and needs to be treated and run as such.

The University of Massachusetts, like many other institutions of higher learning, has decided to treat education as a business.

However, my Uncle Jeff, who is an elementary school educator, argued against them, saying that neither Doug nor my cousin had really been involved in a school system for years, and therefore didn't understand the fact that the education system is meant to "educate" and not to make money. This is a change for my Uncle Jeff, who, in his early years as an educator, had actually supported and voted for Mitt Romney because of his promise to run education as a business. However, as he spent more time in the education system, Jeff saw those left behind when education is treated as such.

Those not involved in education – as in, people who have graduated and not looked back – don't really care about how education is run, as long as it doesn't cost them money. Unfortunately, this poses a problem for a publicly-funded university. This attitude allows people like Vice Chancellor Gargano to try and run the university in a way which brings in students who are, as Gargano once famously quipped, less "Old Navy" and more "Abercrombie and Fitch." Gargano's wish for a more affluent student body seems to suggest that he doesn't care that this is supposed to be a public institution serving all students, particularly those who can't afford private school.

The mission statement of the University of Massachusetts is "to provide an affordable and accessible education of high quality and to conduct programs of research and public service that advance knowledge and improve the lives of the people of the Commonwealth, the nation, and the world." These are good, idealistic goals. However, the terms "affordable and accessible" have been thrown out the window. In fact, the UMass Financial Aid Web site claims the "University of Massachusetts Amherst believes that the primary responsibility for financing your college education rests with you and your family."

I can understand that the state isn't going to pay for my education, but what happened to affordable?

So where does this leave us? The protest on Thursday was a decent continuation of protests which have been going on for quite a long time. However, more drastic measures may need to be taken.

First, we need to define the job of a public university. UMass can stand to raise prices because it is a University in high demand, as shown by growing application rates. But does that mean they should? Is UMass still willing to follow its mission statement and provide "affordable and accessible education of high quality" to those who couldn't normally afford it? Or should the mission statement be changed to say the University provides education to only those who make more than $100,000 a year?

Second, we need to understand that everyone has a stake in this, especially the students of this university and their parents. Every single person at this school should be irked that the public university system in Massachusetts is being used to make a profit from education.

A public university's reason is to educate everyone and give them a chance to function more effectively in the real world. With a job market that is now demanding a college degree from prospective employees, the state needs to step in and make sure that its citizens can actually be profitable, prosperous members of society. One of the best ways to do that is to make education affordable and available to everyone, no matter what their income.

Dan Nicastro can be reached at dnicastr a student.umass.edu

Native Americans neglected

Melissa Garber

Every elementary school kid in America learns that this country was discovered by Columbus and that the first colonies were settled in Jamestown and later Plymouth. But how do you discover a land that had been inhabited for thousands of years? Our Eurocentric textbooks fail to explain the hypocrisy behind the colonization of America – an oversight that explains the condition of Native American tribes today.

In the early 19th century, more than a century after the colonists forced the Native Americans off of their land, tribes began to legally cede their land over to the United States. In exchange for over 540 million acres of land, Native Americans were relocated to reservations to make way for the expansion of America.

In return for the land, the Nation Congress for American Indians (NCAI) says, the US government made a federal trust commitment to the tribes; it is divided into three general requirements: protection of Indian trust lands, protection of tribal self-governance and provision of basic social, medical and educational services for tribal members. Basically, the reservations are protected by the federal government in a similar fashion to national parks.

Unfortunately, this trust is in desperate need of reform. The U.S. Commission on Civil Rights reported in 2003 that the persistent underfunding of federal trust commitments to tribes constitutes what the NCAI has called "a quiet crisis."

The federal trust responsibilities have never been met and its effects are detrimental to the Native population. The NCAI says Native American tribes have a 26 percent poverty rate, higher than any other ethnic group in the US.

Native Americans that live on reservations are governed by tribal leaders who exercise sovereignty through self-determination and self-governance. The individual tribal governments have sovereignty, except over currency and foreign policy, according to the Department of the Interior.

From 1944 to 1986, according to the Los Angeles Times, 3.9 million tons of uranium ore were mined on Navajo lands for the Manhattan Project and the arms race against the Soviets. The U.S. government paid private companies to operate the mines and coerced Navajo tribal leaders to open up their land to "uranium exploration." Federal officials convinced the Navajo's that the mining would aid the American war effort and provide jobs.

Exposure to radioactive material is just the tip of the iceberg when examining all of the atrocities committed against Native Americans.

The Los Angeles Times adds, "The companies often left behind radioactive waste piles and open tunnels and pits. Few bothered to fence the properties or post warning signs, federal inspectors seldom intervened."

The federal government has yet to clean up the radioactive waste that has been decimating the Navajo population. The Indian Trust is a faint mark on the bottom of the government's priority list.

For decades now, the Los Angeles Times said, the Navajos have been breathing in the radioactive dust from the piles of waste; they have drank water from abandoned pit mines that filled with rain, then fed their livestock that water and ate the meat; children play in the mines and homes have been built using left over radioactive material.

The cancer rate for a tribe that was once revered for its "cancer immunity" in medical journals has doubled since the uranium mining. What is most tragic about these numbers is that the federal government is doing little to fix this dire problem.

The federal government has little interest in making an effort to discover just how bad the problem is and the Navajo tribal leaders are rendered helpless by the lack of federal funding.

The U.S. is barely adhering to their original Indian Trust commitment much less funding the removal of hazardous radioactive material from tribal lands. Neither the private companies nor the U.S. government that paid for those companies, have owned up to their responsibilities toward the native peoples and their tribal lands.

Negligence is a recurring theme in the federal government's policy regarding Native Americans. Since the 19th century, when the indigenous people were forced to relocate to allow American expansion with no compensation or for empty promises, Native Americans have been treated as second-class citizens in their native land. Exposure to radioactive material is just the tip of the iceberg when examining all of the atrocities committed against Native Americans.

The effects the radiation has had on the Navajo community are irreversible. The Navajo people continue to live in contaminated homes and drink contaminated water and eat contaminated meat and breathe contaminated air, without knowledge of the radiation they are being exposed to.

Even with information regarding the radiation, there is still no funding or resources to counteract the problem. The federal government is leaving it up to the self-determination and self-governance it granted to the tribes to fix the problem. The Navajo peoples' suffering is being routinely ignored.

The federal government has a responsibility to the Native Americans. When the native people of this country ceded their land for little more than 540 million acres, roughly two percent of American land, the government made a commitment to those people. Native American's were to receive government funding for the protection of their land, and basic social, health and education services.

It is apparent that with the cancer rates among Navajos doubling, with 26 percent of Native American's in poverty, and with the desecration of Navajo land by uranium mining, that these promises were not kept and were never intended to be kept.

Melissa Garber can be reached at mhgarber@student.umass.edu

DID YOU HEAR OBAMA AND HILLARY MAY SKIP THE EARLY DEBATES?
IF THEY SKIPPED THEM ALL, MAYBE I'D VOTE FOR ONE OF THEM!
STAYSKAL TRIBUNE MEDIA SERVICES '07

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

On Scientific Debate

I write to express disagreement with Ben Duffy's Feb. 7th op-ed entitled "The demise of open debate." Specifically, I believe Duffy is misconstruing Dr. Heidi Cullen's recommendation that Brian Van de Graff be stripped of his American Meteorological Certification as "scientific debate." In fact, Van de Graff was making comments in a scientific capacity but not in a scientific nature. His claims that global warming "is so politicized and those on both sides don't always appear to have their facts straight," is very unscientific and is what Cullen described as "junk political controversy." Duffy misquotes Cullen several paragraphs later using the term "junk science" in his attempts to frame this incident between scientists as anything more than one scientist chastising another for moving away from the world of deductive scientific reasoning to that of politically motivated dogma. It's understandable that Duffy would confuse the two considering his prolific attempts at "intellectual bullying" through his columns, but I urge Duffy to pay more attention in GEOSCI 100, Global Climate Change, a class of which we are both members. There, I hope he will learn the difference between "junk political controversy" and actual scientific debate.

Alex Peterkin
UMass student

Police Presence

Yesterday's article, Slow Down and Pray by Anthony Rueli is spot on. The UMass police are out of control. Can someone explain to me why they must pull over and ticket so many people? When it gets to the point where innocent students like me are afraid to drive across campus, the cops have gone too far. I believe they should just set up sobriety points, people will slow down and their patrol cars won't be using any gas. This eliminates the guess work and will make the roads much safer. Maybe the police will lose out on some of their revenue (and maybe not) but the last time I checked, the money brought in by their ticketing hasn't done anything positive for those of us who abide by university policies. If I ever get a ticket from UMass police, I want it to go towards stopping drunk drivers, not students like Rueli's friend Chris.

Josh Burns
UMass Student

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

ARTS & LIVING

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 12, 2007 ARTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

For traceurs, world is a playground

A form of urban tree-swinging sweeps metropolitan areas

By Jackie Hai
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

BOSTON — As public transit riders stream out from the MBTA stop at Government Center on a Sunday afternoon, seven young men and women dash up a slanted brick wall next to the subway stairs.

They are near the top to run sideways, across and back down with gravity-defying momentum. One leaps off early, flies through the air and lands on the paved ground, instantly tucking into a fluid roll that disperses the impact. They range in age from 13 to 26, wearing t-shirts, track pants and running shoes, and their unconventional motion is a sudden break in the monotony of pedestrian travel.

They are traceurs, practitioners of a physical discipline called Parkour. The term originates from the French word parcours, or "course" as in obstacle course.

To practice Parkour is to practice a philosophy of effective movement, finding creative paths through any environment and challenging expectations of the human body's capabilities.

Once completely unknown to mainstream public knowledge, Parkour has been popularized over the last few years through Internet videos, media exposure in ads and screen time in big action flicks like the latest James Bond movie, Casino Royale. But popularity comes with a price; sensationalism surrounds the subject, as well as negative misconceptions and, not too mention, officials which prevent traceurs from practicing the discipline in public.

For the last several months, Boston traceurs have been barred from their usual training grounds around Northeastern University, shooed away by campus police whenever they are seen.

"[The officers are] obligated to ask people to refrain from participating in activities that might injure themselves or others," James Ferrier, Northeastern's associate director of public safety, told Northeastern News last October. "The university would be placed in a potentially liable situation if someone got hurt."

The portrayal of Parkour as an extreme sport or dangerous pastime is fueled by media spots featuring practitioners who bound from rooftop to rooftop and perform similar high-risk stunts. However, it's an incomplete picture of the discipline, which is far more commonly exercised at the ground level.

Darren Donahoe, 26, flows like water as he navigates a set of rails winding up the edge of a handicap-accessible ramp near Harvard Square. He grips the top bar with

See PARKOUR on page 7

A group of seven traceurs skillfully leap from one concrete wall to the other in what is known in Parkour as a "kong vault."

Parkour is growing in popularity for those who find the discipline a natural part of human existence in urban areas, while others are concerned about injury and legal liability.

Dench's 'Scandal' chills with sick obsession

'Notes on a Scandal' teaches lesson on unlikely love, lust and the dangers of infatuation

Cate Blanchett stars opposite Judi Dench is the riveting thriller, "Notes on a Scandal," a film about a female school teacher's unhealthy secret obsession with another female colleague.

By Katie Bauer
COLLEGIAN STAFF

If Judi Dench were to enter a room, she'd probably cause everyone in it to be stunned into silence. Though small in stature, Dench attracts the attention that a president, or even a queen, would normally command upon entering a room. Going from her recent work, we certainly know how good she is at playing a queen.

Well into her seventies, Dench has been built up as an icon among actors, and she certainly has shown no signs of stepping down from her throne. Dench steps into her role in Notes on a Scandal like a second skin with her role as Barbara, an aging spinster of a woman who spends her days teaching in a small public school as if it were the bane of her existence. Who knew she could be so good at playing someone evil?

At the beginning of a new school year, Barbara, along with her fellow colleagues, is introduced to the new art teacher, Sheba Hart (Cate Blanchett, Babel, Coffee and Cigarettes). Young and beautiful, Sheba immediately draws the attention of not only the rest of the staff, but a particular student as well.

After an incident in which Barbara is forced to school Sheba in the art of teaching, Sheba invites Barbara to her home as an act of thanks. Barbara, whose attention of Sheba has increasingly grown, jumps at the chance to be friends. Barbara is surprised to be introduced to, as she puts it, a very bourgeoisie lifestyle, meeting Sheba's decidedly older husband, Richard (Bill Nighy, enticing as ever), her sexually aware daughter Polly and her Down Syndrome son, Matt.

Sheba is also surprisingly candid of her feelings, opening up to Barbara as if she were some kind of psychologist. Barbara obliges, soaking in every detail of Sheba's early marriage to Richard and unfulfilled life. Barbara's watch over Sheba, her soothing and straight motherly instinct is a mask to her true intentions: she has become fixated on Sheba – obsessed.

When Barbara catches Sheba with one of her students doing something a bit more risqué than teaching a painting lesson, Sheba tearfully confesses the affair, laying her total confidence on Barbara, hoping she's not going to tell. Barbara sees this as an opportunity to gain a stronger hold on Sheba, and when she agrees to keep Sheba's secret, the steely manner in which she says it with a slight smirk on her face, shows that she has plans in mind for her power over Sheba. She hooks on to Sheba like a fisherman hooking a fish, slowly reeling her in.

Instead of seeing this film through the eyes of the traditional protagonist – in this case, Sheba – we see the events unfolding through the eyes of Barbara, the bitter,

See DENCH on page 7

Facebook offers new contest

Competition allows members to submit their videos, winners aired on television

By Morgan-Ann Rousseau
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Oh, the wonder of Facebook: a Mecca of wall-comment inspired fights between boyfriends and girlfriends, and a goldmine for people with stalker-inclined tendencies.

But in addition to giving information about others, Facebook provides an outlet for common interests, quick communication and access to intriguing photo albums. But starting in March, Facebook will offer something new.

On Feb. 7, the internet's leading social utility and Ziddio.com announced a partnership that will allow Facebook users to create and share user-generated videos that will give members the chance to become part of a new television series titled "Facebook Diaries."

Ziddio.com is a national multiplatform user-generated video site recently launched by Comcast Interactive Media. In March, the companies will begin a program that includes contests which will ask users to submit short video segments about their lives. This Facebook contest will entail the uploading, viewing, sharing and rating of member-submitted videos.

When videos are selected, they will be featured on the Internet via Facebook.com and Ziddio.com, as well as on television with Comcast's "On Demand" subscription service.

The member-submitted videos will also form the basis for the new television series, "Facebook Diaries," which will be produced by the Oscar-nominated, Emmy award-winning TV producer R.J. Cutler. Cutler's award-winning TV shows include "30 Days," and "American High." Cutler is also a director, filmmaker and president of Actual Reality Pictures, which specializes in the development and production of non-fiction projects for film and television. Once the contest concludes, Cutler will choose from the best video submissions before bringing them together to produce 10 30-minute episodes.

Chief operating officer of Facebook, Owen Van Natta, said that video sharing is extremely popular among Facebook's 16 million users. Van Natta also said Facebook's partnership with Comcast will make it easier for the Facebook community to share video content in a trusted online environment, and will give members the opportunity to tell their stories on TV.

Producers of this new endeavor consider the concept to be a groundbreaking fresh spin on entertainment and programming.

"Everyone has a story to tell, and 'Facebook Diaries' is a really new and exciting way for people to share their experiences," said Cutler. Facebook members interested in uploading their videos in March must join the Ziddio-sponsored group on Facebook, or join through Ziddio.com.

The online-phenomenon of Facebook is in the midst of its three-year anniversary, having been founded in Feb. 2004 by Mark Zuckerberg, who began the social data-base to help people better understand the world around them by facilitating the spread of information through social networks.

At this point, Facebook, which is privately held and headquartered in Palo Alto, Calif. has more than 16 million registered users in over 47,000 geographic, work-related, collegiate and high school networks. According to ComScore's MediaMetrix report, Facebook ranks as the seventh-most trafficked site in the U.S.

Morgan-ann Rousseau is the Arts and Living editor, and can be reached at Collegiatearts@gmail.com

Parkour discipline races through U.S. streets

Controversy emerges as popularity of French-originated urban sport spreads across country

A Brazilian traceur performs what is known in the Parkour discipline as "a passe muraille." Such stunts raise concerns about the safety of traceurs.

TRACEURS from page 6

both hands and swings feet first through the narrow gap between the bar and a lower rung in a technique known as an "underbar." It's one of many fundamental movements traceurs learn in their progression through the discipline's skill set that includes vaulting, rolling, climbing, balance, precision jumping and safe landings.

Parkour began around 15 years ago in the Parisian suburb of Lisses, local athlete David Belle is its most credited founder. Sebastien Foucan, a childhood friend of Belle's, later pioneered "free running," a more acrobatic school of the discipline that focuses on aesthetics over efficiency. Belle drew inspiration from his father, a French soldier in the Vietnam War who trained with his comrades in the "methode naturelle" developed by physical theorist George Hebert. The "natural method" consists of physical conditioning patterned after the skills utilized by prehistoric humans and indigenous people for survival.

Bring those maneuvers into the urban jungle, and you have the essence of Parkour. Where man-made structures contain us in cubicles, direct our traffic and herd us through predetermined routes, traceurs break free of barriers in their path and use them as a springboard for action. A concrete wall does not represent a dead-end, but merely an obstacle to overcome, a challenge to conquer.

"You're really problem solving, and learning obstacles have a way around them," said Mark Toorock, the 36-year-old founder of AmericanParkour.com. "That's something you can apply to other things in your life."

The spread of Parkour into an international movement has met mixed reactions from much of society. Some, like the spectators at Government Center, are dazzled by the remarkable feats of human ability and welcome their display in public spaces. Others are less thrilled, due to issues of danger and liability.

"It always seems the bad media outweighs the good, because that's what sticks in someone's mind," said Chris Levesque, 25, Northeastern alum and founder of the local group New England Parkour. "Someone gets injured, or portrayed as death-defying; it just takes a few bad articles to give us a negative representation."

For Levesque, Parkour means "being useful, training yourself so that you can be prepared in any situation and help other people."

One can imagine a firefighter needing to navigate a burning building as quickly as possible to save a person trapped inside. And for Jesse Woody, a certified CrossFit trainer from Virginia and father of two, the analogy is not far from reality.

Woody teaches Parkour techniques to emergency personnel, law enforcement, the Navy SEALs and Special Forces around the country. They have to operate under the kind of circumstances where it is genuinely useful, Woody said.

"Every single aspect of fitness can be trained through Parkour," he added. "Strength, balance, agility, coordination, commitment, confidence. It's the pinnacle of what the human body is capable of."

Woody is optimistic about the chances of Parkour gaining acceptance. "If law enforcement itself starts to realize the validity of an activity, they're less likely to kick people out," he said.

Parkour is still considered a relatively new movement, having become widely recognized only within the last few years. Its future is uncertain, faced with hurdles created by societal restrictions. But in the nimble mindset of traceurs, any difficulty thrown in their path is fair game for surmounting.

"My take on Parkour is that it's primal. It's instinctive. It's what humans were meant to do," said Toorock. "We've gotten so far away from the creatures that we're supposed to be: we don't eat right, exercise, play or think on our feet anymore. We are inquisitive, active, sociable beings. We need to challenge each other, pull each other along. That's why I do Parkour."

Jackie Hai is a Collegian correspondent, and can be reached at Jhai@student.umass.edu

Scandalous acts in Dench film

Blanchett stalked by school teacher in 'Notes'

DENCH from page 6

unhappy antagonist. This refreshing change not only breathes new interest and attention to a typically unused subject – the female as a bad guy – the film delves into a typically avoided subject about lesbian love.

Though you may not notice the hints in the beginning of the film, Barbara, though never outwardly professing her sexual nature, desires women of a younger age (which is a coincidence as she tells a colleague that Sheba seems to favor men of a much younger age, herself). As seen in the film's trailer, when Sheba demands to Barbara "do you think this is a love affair?" Barbara's shock and hurt at hearing Sheba ask such a question reveals that Barbara is not, and perhaps never will be, able to admit her desires.

As Barbara's affections grow, yet are never shown in any outward, typical signs of emotion, she sees everyone else as competition for Sheba's attention. She sees others as wanting to steal Sheba away for her. Sheba's family, other teachers and especially the boy that she continues to see are, in her mind, all out to devoid Barbara of being truly happy with someone. When Sheba flouts Barbara's need for her, instead of helping her own family, Barbara sets in motion a chain of events that leads to the affair's exposure, and consequently, the destruction of Sheba's world. So, needless to say it'd be a good idea not to get on Barbara's bad side.

Cate Blanchett stars as Sheba, a somewhat naive colleague opposite of Judi Dench's character, Barbara.

This psychological thriller, cleverly derived from a book by Zoe Heller, and written by Patrick Marber is deliciously rich and sharp at the same time, wrapping itself nicely around its two phenomenal leads. Dench relies on her older, stooped figure as a weapon – she appears as a strong authoritative figure, but still conveys loneliness and depression, like someone who hasn't had a good shag in a long while. Blanchett's willowy, fragile Sheba is a nice change from the strong-willed characters she's played in roles like Katharine Hepburn and Queen Elizabeth (both times nominated for Academy Awards). Too foregoing with her emotions, Blanchett's character's naivety is the ultimate curse of her own demise.

The supporting characters add their depth to the story as well. Nighy's Richard is caught between hatred and detestation at his wife, questioning his role as a husband. Notes on a Scandal would probably be more appreciated by an older, more literate (no offense) audience than a college-based one, but you can't argue that Dench is compelling on screen. This woman can act, and is just another example of Brit women who rock.

Katie Bauer is a Collegian staff writer, and can be reached at Kbauer@student.umass.edu

There's little doubt that Dench will make your skin crawl in her role as creepy closet-lesbian school teacher who harbors a secret infatuation.

DELANO'S & Pinocchio's
Presents The Return Of:
Trivia Mondays!
$2,000 Prize Pool! 8 PM Start
$1.50 Super Size Pizza Slices and $.10 Wings
Watch 24 and HEROES on our big screens!
Wednesdays are:
Holeshot's
TATTOOS NIGHT PROMO
Win a $200 Gift Certificate
Free Raffle Tickets 10:30-11:30
Weekly:
$1.50 PBR Drafts!
$2.00 "Flu Shots!"

UM salvages weekend with tie

HOCKEY from page 12

The extra frame offered no conclusion to the contest, as neither team could muster a fourth goal. UMass outshot PC 3-2 in overtime.

The game did not start the way UMass wanted, falling behind 1-0 in the first period for the second night in a row. The Friars' Colin McDonald streaked up the right side of the ice and fired on Quick from the bottom of the faceoff circle, tucking the puck under the crossbar over Quick's shoulder.

The Minutemen kept pace, however, tallying a goal of their own just outside two minutes to play in the period.

Senior captain Matt Anderson scored his fifth goal of the year with five seconds remaining on Dinos Stamoulis' penalty for holding. Crisp passing made the play possible, as P.J. Fenton fought for control of the puck on the boards and passed to Kevin Jarman behind the net. Jarman quickly relayed the puck to Anderson, who was sitting at the top of the crease.

Sims had no chance to stop the shot. The play came too quickly, and UMass tied the game, 1-1 heading into the second period.

The Minutemen pulled ahead seven minutes into the middle frame. Freshman Will Ortiz grabbed his sixth of the year when the puck took a funny angle off a Providence defenseman's skate.

Ortiz was racing up the left boards and threw the puck towards the net. Friars defenseman Mark Fayne was sprinting to get into position, but his stride caused him to kick the puck straight into the net behind Sims, who was squared up to his left to face Ortiz. Jarman and Martin Nolet assisted on the play.

"It was a great play by Martin Nolet just to get the puck up [the ice]," Ortiz said. "Coach has been harping on us to just get the puck to the net, so I just threw the puck to the net. I thought I had a little alley way but it hit the kid's skate and just ended up going in."

Providence tied it up later in the second and took the 3-2 lead with eight minutes left to play in the third period. PC took control of the puck inside the UMass blue line, and Quick never saw Taormina's shot through traffic, and PC went up by a goal.

The score remained the same until the final minute of play when Matheson tied it back up.

"We battled and hung in there all night to salvage something from two nights' work," Cahoon said. "We played pretty hard most of the weekend just to salvage one point, but it's a whole lot better than coming up with a goose egg."

The second-largest crowd ever packed the Mullins Center Friday night, as 7,240 fans were in attendance for White Out Night. Those who came for the free t-shirt got the bonus of a great hockey game as well.

Both teams played well for 60 minutes, though the Terriers never trailed in the game. BU won the first period, scoring with a minute left when Kenny Roche one-timed a centering pass from Chris Higgins, beating Quick glove-side.

The Terriers took a two-goal lead at 4:17 in the second on a Pete MacArthur shot over Quick's right shoulder. Higgins and Matt Gilroy assisted on the play.

The Minutemen kept it close, cutting the lead in half at 11:05 in the second when junior David Leaderer scored his second goal of the season. Cory Quirk carried the puck across the slot and dropped it to Chris Capraro on the right boards.

Leaderer filled the void left by Quirk in the high slot. Capraro fed him the puck and Leaderer hurried it, beating BU netminder John Curry top-shelf.

"Cappy and Quirky have great vision," Leaderer said. "I just saw an opening in the slot. I took it and just fired it as quick as I could. That's what we try to do with Curry is just shoot it as fast as we can."

BU went back up by two less than a minute into the third period. Bryan Ewing set up a perfect screen as he crossed the blue line. The forward came out to the slot from behind his teammate and two UMass defenders, beating Quick glove-side.

Justin Braun made it interesting with just under 10 minutes to go, banging home a rebound out in front, but that's as close as the Minutemen would get.

An intense final two minutes yielded nothing for the Mass Attack, despite a number of close calls.

"Both teams played very well," Cahoon said. "[BU] just capitalized on one more critical mistake than we did."

Jeremy Rice can be reached at jeremyr@student.umass.edu

Senior forward Kevin Jarman recorded three assists in Saturday night's 3-3 tie with Providence at the Mullins Center.

Mass Attack comes up short against BU consisting of Chris Capraro, Chris Davis, Cory Quirk, Matheson and Mike Kostka.

PRESSURE from page 12

UMass struggled to get any semblance of an offense going in the early stages of the power play. The Minutemen passed the puck around choosing their shots wisely, perhaps a little too wisely.

1:18 REMAINING

UMass' momentum all but disintegrated when it was called for offsides, taking the faceoff out of the offensive zone.

The Minutemen were in their set passing the puck around. But a feed to the point missed its mark and slid to the blue line. It barely crossed into the neutral zone before Matheson had a chance to keep it in.

To the chagrin of the UMass faithful and players, the linesman whistled the play dead. Despite the fact that the offsides call didn't help his team's cause, Cahoon said the Minutemen remained confident.

"It's not deflating so much, it's just that those plays happen," UMass coach Don Cahoon said. "How many close trickles did we have by the net in the last couple of minutes? That's the game and it takes the wind out of your sails, but one thing I think our kids are demonstrating is they have great resolve."

UMass' play didn't pick up after the draw, prompting Cahoon to take matters into his own hands.

1:01 REMAINING

With a faceoff coming in the offensive zone, Cahoon called timeout to go over a number of things with his team – the last time he'd have that chance before the final whistle blew.

"I probably said about 35 things," Cahoon noted, concerning the timeout. "After that the kids just play. The game is too fast – it's read-and-react. You think you're coaching them through every play, [but] you're not."

Cahoon also took the opportunity to make changes in the Minutemen's lines. He pulled Quick in favor of a 6-on-4 advantage. Matt Anderson took Quick's spot, and the coach sent junior P.J. Fenton in Kostka's stead.

Even with its top-six skaters on the ice – and no defensemen – UMass couldn't regain the momentum it garnered just a minute and a half earlier.

:36 REMAINING

And once again the Minutemen couldn't get the break they so desperately needed.

This time the puck was tipped, sending it soaring end-over-end into the stands. That brought play out of the Minutemen's offensive zone and all the way down the ice. Nothing was going UMass' way on the final power play.

:01

That is until the Minutemen mustered some more offense on Curry at the last possible second – literally. Now the third-largest crowd in Mullins Center history was on its feet in anticipation of a miracle finish.

Just as the buzzer sounded, Curry stopped a shot from point blank, and got into a scuffle with some frustrated Minutemen. The final save capped Curry's stellar performance. It was extra-special given his performance here on Jan. 27 – a game in which he allowed three goals and was pulled midway through the second period.

"[Curry] made a couple of fabulous saves in the third period," BU coach Jack Parker said. "I thought he stood tall in the 6-on-4 at the end. I would say the last six minutes he looked terrific. [UMass] had all kinds of jump and the crowd had them going."

Jon Pelland can be reached at jpelland@student.umass.edu

Godinho sets school indoor track record

By Kevin Dooley
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Scoot over, or maybe even leap over, Erik Hoagland. Either way, you have company in the Massachusetts track and field record-holder club.

Just two weeks after the senior standout and long-jump specialist for UMass leaped his way into the record books after breaking the all-time indoor long-jump record in New Hampshire, fifth-year senior James Godinho made his own mark by running into the history books last Friday in the 400-meter dash competition at the Valentine Invitational.

Senior James Godinho set a new school indoor track record on Friday with a seasonal-best time of 48.61 seconds in the 400-meter dash.

Godinho clocked in at 48.61 seconds, which now stands as the third best time in UMass history, behind only Tom Ioye and Neil Concepcion. His historic performance was good for a 16th place finish out of 161 runners. He has also now qualified for his second event at the Indoor Track and Field Championship, which is scheduled to be held early next March. The Sandwich, Mass. native earned himself a spot in the 500-meter dash earlier this season at the Reebok Boston Indoor Games.

Godinho and Hoagland were joined by the rest of the Minutemen and also the Minutewomen in the state capital the following day at the Valentine Invitational. The event was hosted by Boston University. Overall, the Minutemen had a quiet day, meeting stiff competition from the most schools they've competed against this indoor season.

Godinho's 16th place performance was tied for the highest finish any athlete from UMass had all afternoon. For the young and upcoming Minutewomen, they also failed to find themselves near the top of the leaderboard in any of the events, but were still able to turn in some decent results.

The Minutemen and Minutewomen will both make a return visit to Kingston, R.I. when they part in the Atlantic 10 Championships this Friday and Saturday. The Minutemen are slated to compete at 9:30 a.m., while Coach Julie LaFreniere's squad will hit the track and field the following day at 2:45 p.m. The A-10 Championships will be the last meet before the New England Championships, which are scheduled to be held the following weekend.

Hoagland was the other bright spot for UMass on Friday, finishing in 16th place in the 55-meter dash, clocking in at 6.58 seconds. Hoagland's finish ties his previous best time in that competion, which coincidentally, came in Boston on Jan. 17th.

If improving each and every meet is the main goal of coach Ken O'Brien, then the face of UMass track and field certainly got what he wished for Friday, as seasonal best times were put in by a number of athletes in Boston.

Nathan Barksdale had the second-best finish for the Minutemen in the 400-meter run, coming in 37th place out of a total of 161 runners with a time of 49.80 seconds. For the junior sprinter from Valparaiso, Ind., his previous best run in the 400-meter dash came at last year's A-10 Championships.

Senior Zachary Prysiecki provided the Minutemen with their best performance in the 800-meter run, and also his best run in the event this indoor season, finishing in 39th place with a time of 1:55.98.

In the women's 200-meter dash, the Minutewomen were led by sophomore Dionise Miranda, who placed 50th in the event, clocking in at 26.34 seconds, a season-best time for any of the Minutewomen in this event.

Freshman Shiyi Zan put forth a solid performance in the 3,000-meter run, coming in 47th place with a time of 10:33.33 out of 119 runners. Junior Christina Derosa currently holds the top time in this event for UMass (10:18.28), but did not compete in the 3,000-meter run on Saturday.

Kevin Dooley can be reached at kdooley@student.umass.edu

UMass routs URI at Mullins Center

W. BASKETBALL from page 12

"It was like pulling teeth [in the first half]," UMass coach Marnie Dacko said. "They controlled the boards, and we needed to play defense, and that's what we did in the second half."

That second half may have been the Minutewomen's best 20 minutes of basketball all season.

"I'm very pleased with our second half effort," Dacko said. "I think this team is capable of playing this kind of basketball. I think this is indicative of what we're capable of. Now we have something to build on and hopefully we'll continue to build on it."

UMass shot nearly 60 percent from the floor in the second half, outscoring Rhode Island 49-24.

"The second half we proved that we were the better team," Benton said.

Once again, the Minutewomen proved that was in containing Safi Mojidi, who was coming off a 33-point performance against Saint Joseph's. Mojidi still managed to pour in 25 points on a 9-of-20 shooting night. The rest of her team went 11-for-40.

Dacko made a point to emphasize that this was a team victory.

"We have people coming off the bench giving us quality minutes," Dacko said. "That's important because as you go down the stretch and into the tournament we need to generate points and rebounds from everyone on the team."

The UMass bench outscored Rhode Island 32-9 Sunday. In its overtime loss to the Rams last month, the Maroon and White bench was on the short end of a 28-5 tally in that same category.

Heading into the final two home games of the season this weekend, the Minutewomen can aim a bit higher after this resounding victory.

"It's a big game for us," Mills said. "We were 11th [in the conference] coming into this game. A couple more teams lose and that puts us right back into the thick of things. That fourth place is still up for grabs, and we're going to try and get there."

Josh Friedman can be reached at jmfriedm@student.umass.edu.

Freshman Kim Benton set a Mullins Center record for a UMass player on Sunday, hitting six 3-pointers in a win over URI.

comedy CONNECTION HUKELAU 413•593•5222 705 Memorial Drive in Chicopee www.hukelau.com
MARCH 17TH
From HBO's "Tourgasm" and NBC's "Last Comic Standing 2 & 3"
GARY GULMAN
MARCH 10TH JOHN VALBY
FEB. 23RD JEFF DUNHAM & FRIENDS
APRIL 21ST ADELE GIVENS
whosyourpadre.com
CANCUN, ACAPULCO, NEGRIL, MOBAY, NASSAU, S. PADRE, FLORIDA, CRUISES, AND MORE!
Join the Party!!!
STS Flight Finder™ Save Hundreds on Spring Break Packages!!! Search airfares to Mexico and the Caribbean and save up to $300 per person. Best Deals Guaranteed!
1.800.648.4849 www.ststravel.com
CHECK OUT www.dailycollegian.com FOR MORE SPORTS HIGHLIGHTS
If You've Got a Plan We've Got a Van!
Insurance Replacement Rates FREE PICK-UP
POTTER'S AUTO & TRUCK RENTAL
• Direct Billing to Insurance Company • Locally Owned & Operated • 7 & 15 Passenger Vans • UMass Purchase Orders, MHEC Rates
Potter's Collision Repair
at North Amherst Motors 78 Sunderland Rd., North Amherst, MA (413) 549-RENT (7368) www.pottersauto.com (One mile North of UMass - on bus route)
Collision Repair & Glass Replacement
whosyourpadre.com

UM celebrates women in sports at halftime

Female athletes spend time with children after big win

By Domenic Poli
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Massachusetts women's basketball team (14-11, 4-6 Atlantic 10) celebrated the 21st annual National Girls and Women in Sports Day (NGWSD) with a 79-49 victory over Rhode Island (6-18, 5-5 A-10) yesterday.

First established in 1986, NGWSD is recognized by girls and women's teams throughout the nation as a way of commemorating the vast achievements and accomplishments of female athletes over the years; and the Minutewomen picked a very special way to honor the predecessors who blazed the trail they currently stroll.

Dozens of young, aspiring Minutewomen – ages five to 12 – were on hand for the first game of a three-game homestand for the Maroon and White. During intermission, those who had signed up beforehand were welcomed onto the court for a special halftime ceremony.

Earlier in the day, those same girls spent some quality time at Boyden Gymnasium with several student-athletes from the UMass women's athletic program, including members of the basketball, soccer, rugby and volleyball teams.

After the game, hordes of the young girls – as well as some boys – were brought courtside for an autograph session with the triumphant Minutewomen.

All the activities were free of charge.

"It's always good to come out and play well and be a role model for the kids," sophomore guard Sakera Young said afterwards. "They look up to us and we have to play well. I know when we were younger we looked up to older players and it's good for the kids to see us play and [for us] to see them having fun."

Young's teammate Kate Mills agrees with her.

"It was a great day for us just to be able to have some young girls come out and watch us play," the junior forward said. "And hopefully this will kind of give them the hopes and dreams that [it] could be them some day.

"I think it's a great thing for us to do," she continued. "It can only be a positive to try to get more people involved in college sports and get people aware of the women's side and what we're doing. I mean, our games are just as exciting [as the men's games]. They should definitely stick with it."

Mills was UMass' second-leading scorer (15 points), going 6-for-12 from the floor and 3-for-4 from the free-throw line. She also added three blocked shots, a couple of rebounds and an assist.

The team co-captain went on to say that observing the history of women's college athletics on the same day as crushing a conference rival was icing on the cake.

"Just to get this win was great," she said.

It was a 'W' the Maroon and White was itching for. The last time they played the Rams (Jan. 9), the Minutewomen suffered a devastating 71-69 overtime loss that left all of them bitter – and wanting revenge.

Yesterday, they finally paid Rhode Island back – and with interest.

The 30-point margin of victory is the largest in UMass vs. URI history.

After edging the Rams in a narrow 30-25 game going into halftime, UMass cut it loose in the second half.

Freshman Kim Benton was UMass' leading scorer (18), inscribing her name into the record books in the process.

She went 6-for-9 from behind the arc – an all-time Mullins Center record.

The 5-foot-5 guard also recorded three boards and an assist in the victory.

Benton mentioned that she was excited to have contributed to a win on such a special day in women's sports.

"We definitely put on a show for the young girls. We definitely came out today and showed them what women's basketball is all about," she said. "We don't really get as much recognition as the [men's team] does. So, this is definitely a great idea."

The celebration of the 21st NGWSD comes just about a week after news broke that the NCAA is considering banning women's teams from training against male practice squads.

Considering such methods an infringement on Title IX (a 1972 bylaw demanding absolute equality for women's sports), the league has proposed outlawing male practice players as a means of ridding collegiate athletics of any passive sexism and ensuring more opportunities for improvement for women bench players.

UMass coach Marnie Dacko says that the proposal is silly, however.

"The thing with [that] is somebody isn't happy. Somebody may be abusing [the ability to use male practice players], but is that the majority? No. I think that we all understand that the men are not taking place of the women," Dacko said. "If you talk to my kids, they would all want the men practicing against us because that's the only way we're going to get better."

Regardless of what becomes of the new proposal, however, a thing like the National Girls and Women in Sports Day will guarantee that the spirit, character and moral fiber of Title IX will carry on for years to come.

Domenic Poli can be reached at dpoli@student.umass.edu.

Junior Pam Rosanio finished Sunday's win with nine points, six assists and five rebounds. Rosanio ranks third on the Minutewomen in scoring, averaging 11.7 points per game.

Insight comes from all directions.
You bring something unique to the table, and at Ernst & Young, you'll be encouraged to speak up and contribute. Because we know that bringing together people with different backgrounds and perspectives lets us deliver quality results for our clients. It's why we've created a work environment of mutual respect that promotes your personal and professional growth and success. So visit us on campus or at ey.com/us/AC
FORTUNE 100 BEST COMPANIES TO WORK FOR 2006
Audit • Tax • Transaction Advisory Services
ERNST & YOUNG
Quality In Everything We Do
© 2007 Ernst & Young LLP
WRITE FOR SPORTS!
sports@dailycollegian.com

TAKE A PHOTO OF YOURSELF WITH YOUR COMPLETED SUDOKU OR CROSSWORD AND SEE YOURSELF ON THE COMICS PAGE
COLLEGIANCOMICS@YAHOO.COM

Free Delivery to UMass
Menu Online @ andiamo.cc

		3		7	2
5	6			8
4		7		5			1
	8				1
7	3						8	6
				2			3
	9				3	4		1
					8		6	5
				1	4		8

ACROSS
1 Munch on
5 Slip-prevention device
10 Links vehicle
14 "Damn Yankees" vixen
15 Singer Buddy
16 Regan's father
17 Curmer's partner
18 Opera songs
19 New York canal
20 Jackson and Principal
22 Queeg's ship
23 Getty and Winwood
24 Drew and Mariah
25 Affirmative
26 Comic crash
27 Gomez or Morticia
31 Manner
36 Prepare to drive
37 CD's rival
38 10 sawbucks
39 Fit for guys
41 Detonations
42 Major ISP
43 Pool tool?
44 "On the Waterfront" star
48 Puts in place
53 Russo and Cory
54 One with the most smarts
55 Requests
56 Japanese car maker
57 Sense organ
58 Electrical unit
59 Total
60 Mental spark
61 Has debts
62 Naps
63 Transmit

DOWN
1 Writer Barker
2 Larry of "Hogan's Heroes"
3 Choose by vote
4 Refuse
5 English prince
6 Aussie parrots
7 Walt Disney's middle name
8 Lamenter's cry
9 Herndon and Cobb
10 Sharply defined
11 F.D.E. chapter
12 Like the wet season
13 Elders and aiders
21 Four-year intervals
22 Confessed
24 Machinery part
26 Make a wager
27 24-hr. banker
28 Narc's org.
29 Hideaway
30 Eur. nation
31 Man about the house
32 SNL's Gasteyer
33 Ph. bk. listings
34 Giant Mel
35 Notes of scales
37 Dolores ___ Rio
40 Monkey house address
41 Interments
43 Infant's bed
44 La Scala cheer
45 Plant new seeds
46 Leg joint
47 Bird homes
48 Ball's partner
49 TLC's "___ Treehouse"
50 Crystalline cavity
51 German city
52 Bird follower
54 Cher's Sonny
56 Stashed away

Find all of today's puzzle solutions online!
WWW.DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

DELANO'S
This Wednesday:
Holeshot's TATTOOS NIGHT
&
gansett promo
Tons O' Free Stuff!
"The Heart of downtown Amherst"

Quote of the Day

"If a pig loses its voice, is it disgruntled?"

-George Carlin

Two Dudes By Aaron Warner

SOME GIRL CALLED WHILE YOU WERE GONE.
I'LL GIVE YOU THREE GUESSES WHO IT WAS.
SOMEONE WE OWE MONEY TO? THE CRAZY LADY WHO LIVES DOWNSTAIRS? MY MOM?
ALL THREE WERE RIGHT.

Welcome to Falling Rock National Park By Josh Shalek

What do you think of my Sculpture?
I'm trying to come up with a different word for it
Because you want to be understood?
Because I want to insult you while sounding classy

A College Girl Named Joe By Aaron Warner

ALL COME LADIES, I'M COACH BENNIS I'M GOING FORWARD TO HAVING A LOT OF FUN AND HOPE YOU WIN, TOO WHAT?
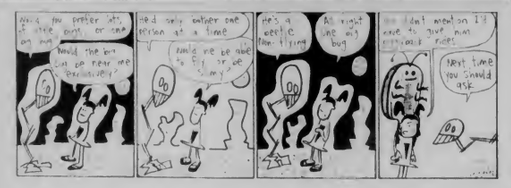
THAT'S WEIRD
I WOULD'VE EXPECTED A GIRL COACH FOR A GIRL'S SOFTBALL TEAM.
YOU KNOW WHAT'S MORE WEIRD??
COACH BENNIS IS A GIRL.

The Family Monster By Josh Shalek



Now you prefer ugly, stupid, or dead on me?
Would the kid on be near me exclusively?
He'd only eat one person at a time.
Would we be able to fly or be scary?
He's a people like thing.
All right she ain't bug
I don't mention I'd one to give him approval rides.
Next time you should ask

Submit your comics!
collegiancomics@yahoo.com
Submit your classifieds!
(413) 545-3500

Horoscopes

aquarius Jan. 20-Feb. 18
Perhaps, some people really do just get their ears lowered at the barber.

pisces Feb. 19-Mar. 20
To save money, wait until Valentine's Day is over and get mega discounts on your gifts.

aries Mar. 21-Apr. 19
You will suddenly become inspired and write many comics for the Collegian.

taurus Apr. 20-May 20
You don't have to be a spider to spin a web of lies. By that I mean, you're a filthy liar.

gemini May 21-Jun. 21
Watch "The Lion King" to help get your priorities in order. Major emotional catharsis.

cancer Jun. 22-Jul. 22
You will finally realize that you would be way cooler if you were more like Robocop.

leo Jul. 23-Aug. 22
You are only a single being, but you will be as productive as whole hive of bees today.

virgo Aug. 23-Sept. 22
You're only as good as the grade of beef that you eat. Sorry vegetarians.

libra Sept. 23-Oct. 22
If four mutated turtles can get along with a rat, why can't human live in harmony?

scorpio Oct. 23-Nov. 21
Someday your prince will come, until then...only you can prevent forest fires?

sagittarius Nov. 22-Dec. 21
Steal a giant tub of ice cream from the DC. You can do it, you are the chosen one.

capricorn Dec. 22-Jan. 19
Stop! Stop that right now! I'm not mad, but I am very dissapointed in you.

Those who write comics will be handsomely rewarded.

Perhaps candy bars are in order?

collegiancomics@yahoo.com

Massachusetts Daily Collegian Marketplace

Announcements

Global Express Tours Spring Break Montreal Party Weekends from $99 Complete bus, hotels, & clubs. Montrealexpress.net 781-979-9001

Apartment for Rent

Center of town. 1,2,3 bedrooms hardwood floors. NOW SHOWING for JUNE and SEPTEMBER. NO FEES www.amherst-lincolnrealty.com 253-7879

Employment

Rent us your ears! Listening Experiments $10/hr English must be your first language. Email: phonetics_lab@linguist.umass.edu voicemail: 545-6837

Employment

Winter/ Spring positions available. Earn up to $150 per day Exp not required Undercover shoppers needed To Judge Retail and Dining Establishments. Call 800-722-4791

Become a summer orientation counselor and make a difference in the lives of over 4000 new students. Additional information and applications can be found at www.umass.edu/newstudent/contact/studentjobs/counselor The application deadline is February 16, 2007

Employment

Bartending $300/day potential. No experience necs. Training provided. 1-800-965-6520 ext.162

Dell Campus Reps Needed Promote a top 30 company to gain real-world business & marketing experience! www.repnation.com/dell to apply.

House for Rent

Northampton Cathedral ceiling, sky-lites, hardwood floors, 4-5 bdrms. 9/1 $1950. 413-730-6660

Services

Pregnancy Testing, HIV Testing, Birth Control, and Emergency Contraception. STI Screening and Treatment. Affordable and confidential. Tapestry Health, 27 Pray Street, Amherst. 548-9992. www.tapestryhealth.com

Call Someone who really cares. Birthright of Amherst Area 549-1906, 1800-550-4900 24 hour hotline Free Pregnancy test 233 N. Pleasant St. Amherst www.birthright.org

Travel

Global Express Tours Spring Break Montreal Party Weekends from $99 Complete bus, hotels, & clubs. Montrealexpress.net 781-979-9001

Wanted

EGG DONORS NEEDED $10,000 (Plus all expenses) We are seeking women who are attractive, under the age of 29, SAT 1300+ (math+verbal), Physically fit and maintaining a healthy lifestyle. If you have a desire to help an infertile family and would like more information please contact us. Email: Darlene@aperfectmatch.com www.aperfectmatch.com 1-800-264-8828

Classifieds

Submit your classifieds online at:

www.dailycollegian.com

or visit our offices in the Campus Center basement.

(413) 545-3500

Minutewomen upset No. 10 California

No. 23 UMass splits weekend in San Diego to open season

By Jeremy Rice
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts softball team shook off some rust in the early going to finish its first weekend of the 2007 season at .500. The Minutewomen (2-2-1) lost their first two games of the Campbell/Cartier Classic Friday, but woke up on Saturday, defeating No. 10 Cal 1-0 and blowing out San Diego State 16-1.

Sunday's game against Kansas was called due to rain and ended in a 1-1 tie. The Minutewomen's next trip takes them to Columbus, Ga. for the NFCA Leadoff Classic. Play begins on Friday with games against Baylor and Florida.

"Overall, I think we had a pretty good showing," UMass coach Elaine Sortino said of the weekend. "Obviously, there were some things we would like to have done better, but at this point in the season, and considering the field of competition, I felt very satisfied."

In freshman Bailey Sanders' first collegiate game in the circle, the Minutewomen fell to UC Santa Barbara, 8-6, in the first game of the classic. Sanders gave up six earned runs, but it was the two unearned runs that were the difference in the score.

After falling behind 3-0 in the top of the first inning, UMass trailed the whole way. Sanders helped her own cause in the bottom of the seventh, reaching on an error. Davina Hernandez tripled on the next at bat, bringing the Minutewomen within two runs.

An Amanda Morin walk and stolen base brought Canidce Molinari to the plate with two runners in scoring position. Molinari flied out to end the game, but Sortino was happy with her team's performance in its first chance to play on a real surface this year.

Immediately following the game with UCSB, the Maroon and White faced its first ranked opponent of the year in No. 6 Oregon State.

The game was a pitcher's duel between sophomore ace Brandice Balschmiter and OSU's Ia'iyana McElroy until the fifth inning. The Beavers' Mia Longfellow blasted a 2-2 pitch down the right field line for a triple, driving in the first two runs of the game.

Oregon State grabbed another run in the sixth before UMass could respond with a run of its own in the bottom of the sixth. After Morin led off with a single, OSU pulled McElroy in favor of All-American Brianne McGowan to close out the last two innings. She got the first two outs without any harm, but Samantha Salato hit a bloop single into shallow center to bring in Morin.

Pinch-runner Carly Morin attempted to reach home from second on a Laurne Proctor single, but was thrown out at the plate. The Minutewomen were held to the single run. Sortino reflected on a tough first day.

"The first day is the first day," Sortino said. "If you're not a team that gets to go outside, it is a different first day from someone that lives in California, and I think that was part of the difference on Friday."

With the less-than-hospitable weather in New England recently, UMass has not been able to practice outside in real conditions yet this year.

"Pitching on the Boyden Gym floor is not like pitching in the middle of a San Diego field," Sortino said.

Saturday saw marked improvement from the Minutewomen in every facet of the game, especially from Sanders, who earned her first collegiate win in a 16-1 rout of the Aztecs.

Balschmiter also earned her first win of the season, shutting out the high-powered Cal Golden Bears, 1-0.

The only score of the game came on a bases-loaded walk to Amanda Acampora in the bottom of the first. From then on, it was another pitcher's duel for Balschmiter, but this time, the sophomore came out on top.

Last year's Atlantic 10 Pitcher of the Year threw six strikeouts, allowing just four hits in the win, including getting out of a bases-loaded jam in the top of the seventh with no outs.

Balschmiter drew a line out to first and then struck out the final two batters to preserve the victory. She struggled with a new changeup Friday against Oregon State, but gained better control of the pitch in Saturday's win.

"[Balschmiter] had a better changeup against Cal," Sortino said. "Cal's a great hitting team. They scored 14 runs in two games before meeting us. That was one heck of an offense, and she shut them down and held them scoreless. I thought that was a great job."

The Minutewomen followed up their first win with a blowout of San Diego State. Sanders held the Aztecs to a single run, as her offense made it seem easy for her with 16 runs, including 11 in the sixth inning.

SDSU got out to an early 1-0 lead in the third, but the Minutewomen responded quickly. Second baseman Stacy Ollington hit the first home run of the season for the Maroon and White in the top of the fourth, and it was all UMass from there on out.

Sanders did a nice job of shutting down the Aztec offense, keeping them out of the game for good.

"She played wonderfully," Sortino said. "She played San Diego State, a good hitting team, and held them to one run, which was unearned. It was a total 180 from her first appearance the day before.

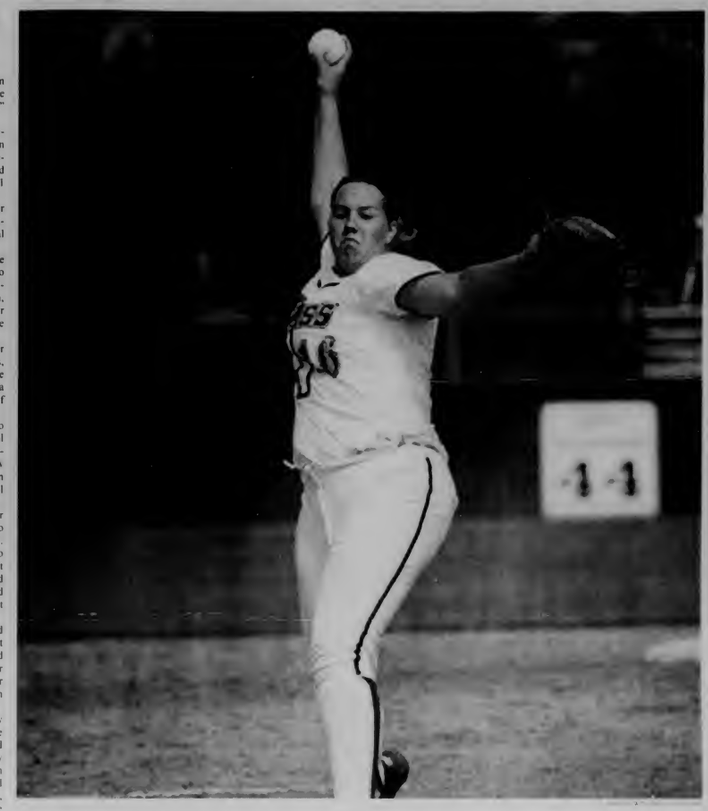
"She made numerous adjustments, and I thought she had great poise," Sortino added. "She was in a 1-0 game for a while there until we went up 2-1, and then obviously the floodgates opened. She showed the same demeanor from 0-0, to 0-1, to 16-1. I think that's pretty good for a freshman."

Sunday's game was a wash, literally, as UMass and Kansas battled to a 1-1 tie before the game was cancelled due to rain.

Last year's A-10 Player and Rookie of the Year drove in the only UMass run on a two-out single in the third inning, but the Jayhawks got it back in the fourth on a throwing error by Salato, which allowed Kansas' Amanda Jobe to advance to third. Ille Pottorf smacked the next pitch into left-center, bringing in Jobe.

After a 35-minute rain delay, the game was called, and each team was granted a rare tie.

Jeremy Rice can be reached at jeremyr@student.umass.edu.



Sophomore pitcher Brandice Balschmiter allowed one unearned run on four hits and a walk in five innings of work on Sunday. Balschmiter struck out four batters in UMass' 1-1 tie with Kansas. The game was called after five innings due to rain.

Sophomore third baseman Whitney Mollica drove in UMass' lone run with a two-out, RBI single in the third inning yesterday.

Learn More About GCC's Health Career Programs:

Licensed Practical Nursing Certificate Program
Location: VA Medical Center, Leeds
Thursday, March 22, 2007 ..... 7 p.m.
Thursday, May 10, 2007 ..... 7 p.m.

Stillpoint Massage Therapy Certificate Program
Location: Dowtown Center, 270 Main St., Greenfield
Wednesday, March 7, 2007 ..... 6:00 p.m.
Wednesday, April 11, 2007 ..... 6:00 p.m.
Wednesday, May 9, 2007 ..... 6:00 p.m.
Wednesday, June 13, 2007 ..... 6:00 p.m.

Paramedic Certificate
Location: Dowtown Center, 270 Main St., Greenfield
Tuesday, March 20, 2007 ..... 6 p.m.
Friday, March 30, 2007 ..... 4:30 p.m.
Monday, April 9, 2007 ..... 5 p.m.
Wednesday, April 25, 2007 ..... 6 p.m.
Thursday, May 3, 2007 ..... 4:30 p.m.

Associate Degree Nursing
Location: Dowtown Center, 270 Main St., Greenfield
Wednesday, April 18, 2007 ..... 4 p.m.
Tuesday, June 12, 2007 ..... 3 p.m.

GREENFIELD Community College
For more information contact (413) 775-1802 or visit www.gcc.mass.edu

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

SPORTSMONDAY

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 12, 2007 SPORTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Short stay at the top

UMass falls out of first place in A-10 with loss to Owls

By Rob Greenfield
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts men's basketball team followed up its triumphant win over conference rival Rhode Island at the Mullins Center with an ugly loss to the Temple Owls on the road yesterday, falling 98-89 to a surging Owls squad.

UMass returns to the hardwood on Thursday for a 9 p.m. matchup with Fordham on the road.

"[Temple] just outplayed us," UMass coach Travis Ford said. "I don't think our guys took it lightly or weren't ready. They outplayed us. We ran into a team that was running on all cylinders.

"They were the better team. We never really made it much of a game."

Junior Gary Forbes led the Minutemen with a career-high 31 points on 10-of-23 shooting from the field and 3-of-6 from 3-point range. It is the most points a UMass player has scored in a game since senior captain Rashaun Freeman tallied 31 on Feb. 28 against Saint Bonaventure in 2004.

Forbes went 8-for-8 from the free-throw line and over his last 11 games he has shot 50-of-66 from the charity stripe, good for 76 percent. In his first 13 games, Forbes hit 54 percent. The 31-point, 14-rebound performance was Forbes' second double-double of the season. He out-rebounded the Richmond Spiders, 16-13, on Feb. 3 in a UMass win at the Mullins Center.

Forbes' prolific scoring was no consolation for the Minutemen, however, as they dropped to 17-7 and suffered their third loss in the conference.

UMass	89
Temple	98

"You know it is a marathon," Ford said. "The Rhode Island game was just one game and this is just one game. But you know, I told our team there is still a long season left. The road is tough and hopefully we respond from this. I don't think we overlooked Temple. We can't make any excuses. They just outplayed us."

The Owls scored 98 points, the most the Minutemen have let up all season, and got 30 from Dionte Christmas, who lit up UMass with an efficient 10-for-16 from the field and 5-of-8 from 3-point land.

Temple featured a balanced attack with double-digit scoring from three other players, including Dustin Salisbery (25 points, 8-for-8 from the free-throw line), Mark Tyndale (15 points, nine rebounds) and Nemaj Inge (11 points).

The Owls shot 53.4 percent from the field and 50 percent from downtown. Ford believes that it was the hot shooting that kept the Minutemen on their heels.

The 3-point shot got them going," Ford said. "It wasn't really our offense. It was their offense. It was our defense. We could just never get in a flow because we could just never stop them. We could never get out on the break.

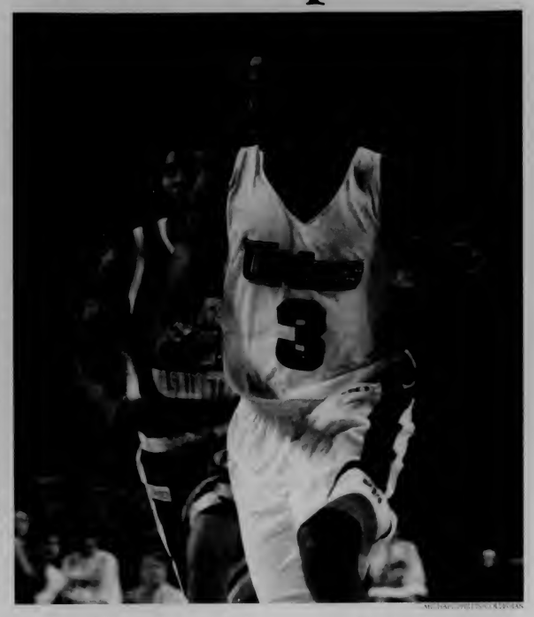
"That's not a scenario [you want] when you are just taking the ball out of the net," he added. "We just couldn't get any flow. They just made a lot of shots. Every time we would make a run they would come down and make some threes. We were in their face and they hit the shots give Temple all the credit."

The loss to the Owls significantly damages the Minutemen's chances of getting an at-large bid into the NCAA Tournament, and the Minutemen have two more road games before returning home on Feb. 21 to face Saint Bonaventure in the first game of a three-game home stand.

Ford knows that winning on the road is no easy task.

"It doesn't get any easier," he said. "[Fordham is] a very, very good basketball team. We have to just get back to work and focus on Fordham."

Rob Greenfield can be reached at rgreenfi@student.umass.edu



Junior Gary Forbes scored a career-high 31 points in Sunday's 98-89 loss to Temple in Philadelphia. Forbes became the first UMass player in three seasons to finish with 30 points in a game.

Mass Attack gains one point

Minutemen play strong but lose to BU, tie Providence

By Jeremy Rice
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts hockey team played perhaps its best weekend of hockey this season – certainly since the holiday break – but came out with only a single point to show for it.

The Mass Attack dropped a close game to Boston University, 3-2, before a huge crowd on White Out Night, but salvaged one conference point by tying Providence with 40 seconds remaining in regulation. Neither team scored in overtime.

BU	3
UMass	2
PC	3
UMass	3

Sitting in sixth place in Hockey East and just two points behind fourth-place Maine, UMass will head to Burlington, Vt. for a pair of games against Vermont. The Catamounts are currently in fifth place, between the Minutemen and Black Bears.

The Minutemen's hopes of home-ice in the playoffs were dimming fast, as the UMass faithful watched another 3-2 game slip away, until senior Mark Matheson scored a potentially season-saving goal with under a minute left.

Down by the same score as the night before against BU, the Minutemen resurrected their hopes of playing postseason hockey in the Mullins Center.

With the seconds ticking down and goaltender Jon Quick on the bench for the extra attacker, Matheson with his dad in attendance – got a feed from Chris Capraro and fired a shot from the blue line, beating Friars goalie Tyler Sims over the left shoulder, sending the 3,384 fans into a frenzy.

"Mark's goal was a huge goal for us," UMass coach Don Cahoon said. "It was particularly gratifying because I know Mark's dad is in town. That was the first thing I thought of when he scored it."

See HOCKEY on page 8

Freshman forward Will Ortiz scored his sixth goal of the season during Saturday's 3-3 tie with Providence. He now has 17 points on the year.

UM can't convert in final minutes

By Jon Pellani
Collegian Staff

All 7,240 fans at the Mullins Center on Friday night held their collective breath for the final two minutes of the Massachusetts hockey team's 3-2 loss to Boston University.

Those final minutes constituted some of the most exciting hockey UMass has played this season. The Minutemen put intense pressure on Terriers goaltender John Curry, but couldn't push the tying tally across.

Although the climax to Friday's game lasted just 2:20, it felt more like a lifetime.

2:20 REMAINING

Curry faced shot after shot throughout the third period with the biggest flurry occurring with just under two and a half minutes to go in regulation. He made several spectacular saves to keep the Terriers in front.

"At that point in the game you're just running on all adrenaline," Curry said. "Sometimes you get out of position and I definitely got out of position a few times in the last five minutes – you just try to work your butt off."

After several passes in the offensive zone, senior center Mark Matheson ripped a shot on net. Curry made the save, but the puck got lost in the confusion in front of the crease, allowing UMass to get off several more chances.

Out of position and on his backside, the netminder showed terrific athletic ability to make the game-winning saves. The second shot of the UMass flurry came from the stick of Will Ortiz. Once again, the rebound made its way out front where Matheson was stationed.

He fired his second shot of the sequence, but the puck sailed high. For the moment it appeared that UMass gained some much-needed momentum for the final stretch run.

1:56 REMAINING

The Minutemen's newfound momentum was boosted a notch some 24 seconds after Curry's spectacular display. BU's Brian Strait was whistled and sent off for interference. The penalty put UMass on the power play for the remainder of regulation.

With his team's back against the wall, Parker called a timeout to regroup the Terriers.

When the teams retook the ice, Cahoon sent out a power-play unit

See PRESSURE on page 8

Senior Tamara Tatham was one of three Minutewomen with double-digits on Sunday. Tatham's 14 points and seven rebounds helped UMass to a 79-49 win over Rhode Island at the Mullins Center.

Minutewomen blow out Rams

Benton's hot hand leads team to fourth Atlantic 10 win

By J.M. Friedman
Collegian Staff

The Mullins Center hasn't been hospitable to the University of Rhode Island basketball program over the past few days. Thursday night, before a raucous crowd, the Minutemen avenged their previous defeat and manhandled the opponent ahead of them in the conference standings. Yesterday afternoon, the Massachusetts women's basketball team (14-11, 4-6 Atlantic 10) pulled the same trick, blowing the Rams (6-17, 4-5 A-10) off Jack Leantan Court with a 79-49 rout.

UMass had three players score in double figures, led by a record-setting night for freshman point guard Kim Benton. Benton sank a Mullins Center record six 3-pointers, accounting for all 18 of her points. She finished the game 6-for-9 from behind the arc.

The Minutewomen had no shortage of motivation for this critical matchup. Looking to climb out of a 0-4 conference hole, the Maroon and White had won three of its last five and needed a statement game. The Rams were the perfect mark.

Early last month, UMass suffered a heartbreaking 71-69 overtime loss to Rhode Island in the Ryan Center. In a wild game that saw seven lead changes and 40 turnovers, junior guard Safi Mojidi delivered victory through a pair of free throws with three seconds left in the extra period. At the time, the Minutewomen had just wrapped up their non-conference schedule with a 10-5 record. Their loss to Rhode Island began a string of four consecutive defeats within the conference.

URI	49
UMass	79

With four conference games remaining in the season, the Minutewomen hope to see a reversal of fortune. Dismantling their rival is a good place to start. The Minutewomen's 30-point margin of victory represents the largest disparity in the 60 all-time meetings between the two teams. Coming into Sunday's matchup, Rhode Island had won seven of eight against UMass, including the last five trips to Amherst.

Junior co-captain Kate Mills scored the first eight points of the game on 4-of-4 shooting to set the tone on an afternoon that the Minutewomen shot 56 percent from the field.

"It's great. It's great to be able to get a little payback," Mills said. "We know we can play at this level all the time."

Heading into the locker room with a five-point lead, the Minutewomen had let the Rams sneak back into the game, losing the battle on the boards. The Rams held a 6-1 advantage in offensive rebounds. Both teams struggled to hold onto the ball in a half that saw each side commit 10 turnovers.

See W. BASKETBALL on page 8

THE MASSACHUSETTS

DAILY COLLEGIAN

NEW ENGLAND'S LARGEST COLLEGE DAILY EST 1890

SHOWERS : HI: 25 LO: 16 WWW.DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 13, 2007

WHITE OUT NIGHT A SUCCESS FOR UM | PAGE 12

49TH GRAMMY AWARDS A BIG SUCCESS | PAGE 6

Robert Childs of the Plant, Soil and Insect Sciences department teaches a class after returning from an 8-month battle with pancreatic cancer. Childs has been teaching at UMass since 1981 and wishes to continue because "it's one of those things that make me feel human," he said.

Students burglarized in Totman

Suspect breaks into gym locker and student's car

By David Humphreys
Collegian Staff

Nearly $3,000 worth of stolen goods has taught one student from the University of Massachusetts the importance of keeping his property under lock and key.

Bin Chen, 30, a graduate student in the Computer Science Department became a victim of theft while swimming laps in the pool inside Totman Recreational Facility. After finishing his swim, Chen found that his keys were missing from his locker. In addition his laptop, iPod and his wallet with at least $60 were stolen from his car. The suspect not only made away with the electronics and money but charged $425 on a credit card at Wal-Mart.

Deputy Chief Patrick Archbald of the UMass Police Department commented that while locker

See TOTMAN on page 4

Teaching Hope

UMass instructor shares experience with cancer

By Jamie Mason
Collegian Staff

Last May, Robert Childs, an instructor in the Plant, Soil and Insect Sciences department at the University of Massachusetts, was diagnosed with the most aggressive form of pancreatic cancer.

When he received the phone call from his doctor, telling him the biopsy of his tumor was malignant, Childs was about to teach a workshop in Martha's Vineyard.

The call didn't stop him.

"The most important thing I could have done at that time was to do something normal, because I love teaching," Childs said. "It was a very serious diagnosis. Most people diagnosed with pancreatic cancer don't live for more than a year."

According to the John Hopkins Pathology Web site, cancer of the pancreas strikes approximately five out of 100,000 people every year and is one of the deadliest forms of cancer.

The National Cancer Institute estimated that in 2007, there will be 37,170 new cases of pancreatic cancer, of which 33,370 cases will result in death, as shown on their Web site.

Childs is not a part of that figure. Because of his immediate treatment and early detection of the tumor, he is now in remission and hopes he will someday be completely cancer-free.

"Surprisingly, for me, I was pretty cool about it," explained the instructor. "To this day, I have never really been upset about it for myself. I have never had a pity party. All I could think about were my kids and my wife."

"I have always been a guy who stopped and smelled the roses along the way, but these days roses never smelled so good."

After the diagnosis, Childs went in for surgery at Massachusetts General Hospital in Boston on May 30. What was supposed to be a three-hour procedure turned into a seven and a half hour surgery. Doctors originally believed that the cancer was in the tail end of Childs' pancreas, but later found that it moved throughout his pancreas. He had his entire pancreas and spleen removed.

While in the hospital recovering from the operation, Childs learned the power of "get well" cards. He was receiving 15 to 20 cards a day from friends, former students and colleagues. He's since received over 350 cards from hundreds of "well wishers," he said.

A month after healing from the surgery, Childs went through four months of chemotherapy. Every week he traveled 110 miles from Conway to Boston, to receive treatment at Massachusetts General Hospital. After a two-week break, he began daily treatments of chemotherapy and radiation, 24 hours a day, five days a week, for six weeks.

When he began his daily treatments, Childs created a list of about 50 or 60 people that he could ask for rides to Boston.

"At first I didn't want to ask people, but people really feel like they want to do something," he said. "People feel helpless, so to do anything is good. Everyday I rode with someone different, and we had the greatest conversations. I was actually looking forward to someone taking me to Boston for those horrible treatments. It was a

See CHILDS on page 4

MassPIRG hopes to recruit UMass students

By Nicole Boonsiriseth
Collegian Staff

In an effort to increase student involvement on campus, the local chapter of the Massachusetts Public Interest Research Group, or MassPIRG, will be holding a kick-off meeting tonight at 7 p.m.

The goal of the meeting is to recruit students from the University of Massachusetts to join the fight in MassPIRG's five campaigns: Stopping Global Warming Starts Here, Hunger and Homelessness, Water Watch, Save Darfur and Affordable Textbooks. The group encourages interested student to attend the meeting – to be held in Campus Center 101 – not only to learn more about their recent campaigns, but to gain an internship or volunteer position with the organization.

"Coming to MassPIRG's Kick-Off Meeting is the best way for any student to get involved in important causes," said Marni Wasserman, coordinator of the Stopping Global Warming Starts Here campaign at UMass Amherst's chapter of MassPIRG in a press release. "As students, we always hear about global warming, poverty, and all of these other issues, but we don't know how to do something about them. MassPIRG provides an outlet to students that want to make a difference."

MASSPIRG is a statewide, nonprofit, nonpartisan public interest organization dedicated to environmental protection, consumer rights, and good government. They provide extensive skills training to their interns, such as public speaking, time management, coalition building and media outreach.

This semester, MassPIRG's top priority campaign is Stopping Global Warming Starts Here to increase the use of

See MASSPIRG on page 3

House Democrats to vote on anti-war bill

By David Espo
Associated Press

WASHINGTON – House Democratic leaders circulated a nonbinding resolution Monday saying that Congress "disapproves of the decision of President George W. Bush ... to deploy more than 20,000 additional United States combat troops to Iraq."

The measure, expected to come to a vote by Friday, also says that "Congress and the American people will continue to support and protect the members of the United States armed forces who are serving or who have served bravely and honorably in Iraq."

Debate on the resolution is scheduled to begin on Tuesday, with each of the 435 House members allotted five minutes to speak. It will mark the first debate in Congress on the war since Democrats won control of the House and Senate in last November's elections. Opposition to the war figured heavily in the outcome of the election.

Democratic leaders in the House and Senate have vowed to force an end to U.S. participation in the war, and made debate over a nonbinding resolution a symbolic first step.

The House measure was drafted in simple, unadorned terms, an attempt by Democrats to maximize the number of Republicans who would support it and also to emphasize support for the troops. Republican leaders have said they expect at least a few dozen defections when the vote is taken later in the week.

House Republican leader John Boehner (news, bio, voting record), R-Ohio, has said the GOP will have an alternative, but it is not clear that majority Democrats will allow it to be offered on the

See DEMOCRATS on page 3

Amherst landlords talk about rent increase

By Will McGuinness
Collegian Staff

Many students at the University of Massachusetts seem to enjoy the convenience of living on campus. Their classes are nearby, meal plans allow them to eat whenever they'd like and hundreds of potential friends are in close proximity. However, others believe that added freedom and responsibility of off-campus housing makes the grass a little greener when living beyond the boundaries of campus.

Part of the allure of living off campus comes from the money saved from paying rent instead of paying to live in the dorms (See chart). But the price gap between dorm fees and apartment rent could lessen as rent costs nationwide are expected to rise 5 percent this coming year, in addition to a near 15 percent rise since 2004.

According to an article in USA Today, published Feb. 4, the national scramble to convert apartments to condos in the early half of the decade left a paucity of rentable apartments in comparison to prior availability.

Though this issue hasn't affect the area, some Amherst landlords, who rely on an ever changing cast of student-renters, have different reasons for increasing their rates.

"We have to charge more simply because utilities are so high," said Angelo Niu, an area landlord. "It is very rare to be able to buy a property and rent [it] out to break even. I think rent will definitely go up."

Another local landlord Laura DeVault contends that increased area property taxes would also result in the raising of monthly rent. Those who still have mortgages on the property owned insist that the reluctance to raise rent for college students must be overlooked so bills can be paid.

"My rent will not go up," said

See RENT on page 3

On Campus	Off Campus
$1852.50 (base double, triple fee per semester) X 2 (two semesters per year) = $3705	$709.83 (average 1 bedroom apartment in a complex) X 9 (months per semester including landlord) = $6,388.47
$3705 + $200 (mandatory yearly telecommunications fee) + $1542 (basic mandatory meal plan) = $5442	$6388.47/2 (roomate division) = $3194.24 (two people in the one bedroom as a double on-campus)
= $5442 per person	= $3194 per person

The average rates of housing costs were taken from the University of Massachusetts Commuter Services and Resource Center Web site. The chart compares the price per student for living on or off campus.

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN
CXVII
ISSUE 82

113 Campus Center University of Massachusetts Amherst, MA 01003
• 413-545-3500 •
• Fax 413-545-3699 •
www.dailycollegian.com

EDITOR IN CHIEF Eric Athas
MANAGING EDITOR Rob Greenfield
BUSINESS MANAGER Dan Conti
PRODUCTION MANAGER Amanda Allen
NIGHT SUPERVISOR Sheryl Wolnik
ADVERTISING MANAGER Jameson Porter
ADVERTISING PRODUCTION Molly Eggleston
ARTS & LIVING EDITOR Morgan Rousseau
COMICS EDITOR Adam Staigin
EDITORIAL EDITOR Tucker Merrick
NEWS EDITOR Matt Belliveau
SPORTS EDITOR Danny Picard
SPORTS EDITOR Jon Pelland
CIRCULATION MANAGER Jeff Pentz
FINANCE MANAGER David Valade
ASSISTANT OPERATIONS Linda Wallack
ASSISTANT ADVERTISING Nicole Puddester
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Tim McCall
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Sidney Towne
ASSISTANT NEWS Anna Dolianitis
ASSISTANT NEWS Nicole Boonjakuakul
ASSISTANT EDITORIAL Brendan Hall
WEB EDITOR James Hale
PHOTO EDITOR Toan Trinh

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN IS PUBLISHED MONDAY THROUGH FRIDAY DURING THE UNIVERSITY OF MASSACHUSETTS CALENDAR SEMESTER. THE COLLEGIAN IS INDEPENDENTLY OWNED, OPERATING AS A PROFIT-MAKING BUSINESS. FOUNDED IN 1890, THE PAPER BEGAN AS NORTH LIGHT, BECAME THE COLLEGIAN NEWS IN 1902, THE WEEKLY COLLEGIAN IN 1914 AND THE DAILY COLLEGIAN IN 1936. PUBLISHED DAILY SINCE 1947. THE COLLEGIAN HAS BEEN PRINTED BY SINGLE DAILY SINCE 1994. FOR ADVERTISING RATES AND CIRCULATION, SEE WITHIN BETWEEN BOARD AND HARD.

PRODUCTION CREW
On staff today

NIGHT EDITOR
Matt Belliveau

COPY EDITOR
Jamie Mason

PRODUCTION SUPERVISOR
Tiffany Van Tatenen

Pa. woman pleads guilty in attempted fetus homicide

By Ramesh Santanam
Associated Press

PITTSBURGH — A woman pleaded guilty Monday to attempted homicide, assault and kidnapping for trying to cut a fetus from her neighbor's womb. Peggy Jo Conner, 39, was accused of plotting to steal Valerie Oskin's baby and pass it off as her own. Both Oskin and the baby survived after a boy on an all-terrain vehicle spotted the two women in a clearing.

The plea came as Conner's trial was to begin Monday.

"I think she wanted to take responsibility and have that going for her in the sentencing hearing," Conner's attorney, David J. DeFazio, told The Associated Press. "She is facing repercussions to her behavior but, given her options, I think she is satisfied."

Authorities accused her of attacking Oskin on Oct. 13, 2005, with a baseball bat at her home, then driving her to a remote location and using a razor knife to cut her abdomen in an effort to remove her unborn baby.

The ATV rider who spotted the women told his father, who called authorities.

Oskin's baby was delivered by emergency Caesarean section and was put up for adoption, which had been Oskin's intention before she was attacked.

Conner pleaded guilty to attempted homicide, kidnapping and two counts of aggravated assault. She was initially charged with two counts of attempted homicide, but prosecutors withdrew the charge that alleged Conner intended to kill the unborn baby.

She remains in custody pending sentencing.

Under a plea agreement, a judge will determine Conner's degree of guilt on the attempted homicide charge that applied to Oskin. If the judge determines Conner did not attempt first-degree murder, the attempted homicide charge will be dismissed, DeFazio said.

He said he believed that would leave her facing at least three years on the assault charge and nearly two years for kidnapping.

District Attorney Scott Andreassi did not return a phone call seeking comment.

Peggy Jo Conner is accused of trying to cut a fetus from her neighbor's womb. She pleaded guilty to attempted homicide and aggravated assault on Monday.

Sinister pastor steals from church

The First Congregation Church in Ripon, California, is where Randall Radic was the pastor for 10 years before parishioners found out he sold the building for more than half a million dollars.

By Garance Burke
Associated Press

RIPON, Calif. — For nearly a decade, members of Ripon's First Congregational Church bared their souls to Pastor Randall Radic. But clearly it didn't work both ways. There were certain things he wasn't telling them.

That became obvious a year ago, when Radic pleaded guilty to betraying his flock and secretly selling the church and its rectory out from under them. He used the money to buy himself a brand-new black BMW and a laptop — exploits he later chronicled in a cheeky, almost gleeful blog about his double life as a sinner.

"We didn't know anything until we got a call from the bank that he had bought a BMW," said David Prater, who led the church board during Radic's tenure. "He drove that car right down Main Street."

Irate parishioners had been rooting for a long prison term of up to 16 months at his sentencing, set for Thursday.

But Radic's lawyer said last week that the 54-year-old former pastor, who spent six months in jail awaiting trial, will not have to serve any more time behind bars because he agreed to testify about the alleged murder confession of a jailmate.

"Most of the congregation, being a good Christian congregation, has forgiven him. But there are still things happening to the church that we can't understand," said Judy Edwards, who took over as pastor last year. "If the parsonage was stolen, why isn't it being returned?"

Radic was a respected figure in Ripon, population 14,000, a quiet town of 1940s-era homes and tree-lined streets just off California's Highway 99, where 18-wheelers thunder down the San Joaquin Valley.

"The church was basically senior citizens, people in their 80s, 90s and close to 100," Prater said. "He was their favorite son."

"This is a town with a lot of faith," said Navid Fardanesh, president of the Ripon Chamber of Commerce. "People had a lot of trust in him, and unfortunately he took advantage of the situation."

First, Radic faked documents giving him possession of the parsonage, and used the property to take out about $200,000 in personal loans, prosecutors said. Then he forged papers saying he had the power to sell the church, and sold it to a couple for $525,000.

After investigators began inquiring about the $102,000 BMW, Radic fled to Denver. Prosecutors coaxed him back, and he was arrested in 2005.

It was in jail that Radic met Roy Gerald Smith, a sex offender awaiting trial in the 2005 slaying of a woman in a death penalty case. In Radic's blog on a now-defunct Internet site, the former pastor suggested that as he gained Smith's confidence, Smith confessed.

Radic soon struck a deal: He would plead guilty to embezzlement and be released from prison. And prosecutors would drop nine other felony charges in exchange for Radic's testimony.

Since Radic was not Smith's pastor, the inmate's incriminating statements are not protected by the usual confidentiality rules involving members of the clergy, Radic's lawyer Michael Babitzke said.

As he awaited sentencing from the comfort of home, Radic started blogging about his personal life. He tried to solicit a literary agent for a tell-all book he called "SNITCH" and spelled out the details of how he fleeced his flock.

Describing the proposed memoir as "a kind of new Bible," Radic wrote that "true-crime shall have a container in which to wallow, a boat which, when it embarks, will traverse the major oceans. Like an esoteric prayer, a Catholic confession, a Gregorian chant or a murderer's insuaciance, it will hum a tune inside one's bones."

Radic, who still lives in Ripon, did not find a buyer for "SNITCH," but he did sign a deal last month to publish a book called "The Sound of Meat," billed as a "(fairly) truthful" memoir.

"So, you really want to know which camp I belong to ... right? Saint or ... Sinner?" he wrote on his Web page, which features grainy shots of a nearly naked woman and a portrait of Radic smoking and drinking. "The truth really is a lot more complicated. It leads down the winding paths of the human heart and challenges anyone who follows to defy it."

ALANA
Career Fair
Co-op/Internship Opportunities
Networking
Summer/Permanent Employment
Wednesday, February 14, 2007
Campus Center Auditorium
5:00PM - 7:00PM
ALL STUDENTS ARE INVITED!

Proudly Sponsored By
Bilingual Collegiate Program (BCP), Career Services,
Committee for the Collegiate Education of Black and other Minority Students (CCEBMS),
Diversity in Management Education Services (DiMES), Native American Student Services (NASS)
United Asia Learning Resource Center (UALRC)

Anti-war bill stirs debate in House

House Speaker Nancy Pelosi of California, prepares to testify on Capitol Hill in Washington last Thursday, before the House Science and Technology Committee hearing on climate change.

DEMOCRATS from page 1

House floor.

"We're going to have Republicans who are skeptical of (Bush's) plan who'll probably vote for this," he said. Asked if he thought House Republicans would lose a third of their members to the Democrats' resolution, he said, "I don't think we'll lose that many."

On Thursday, House Majority Leader Steny Hoyer (news, bio, voting record) said Republicans would be permitted to propose an alternative this week to the Democrats' resolution. But on Sunday, Hoyer said that is "not necessarily our plan."

Hoyer, D-Md., said a House vote will be limited to the proposed resolution opposing President Bush's troop escalation and a Republican alternative would be voted on 30 to 45 days from now.

Boehner said Republicans want to offer a resolution saying a bipartisan panel should oversee the president's plan, with benchmarks to keep track of whether it is progressing.

President pitches free-trade policies for U.S.

By Jeannine Aversa
Associated Press

U.S. President George W. Bush makes remarks in the East Room of the White House. The country's economic growth is expected to slow somewhat in 2007 before picking up again in future years, a White House economist said.

WASHINGTON — Free-trade policies that make it easier for U.S. companies to sell their products are important to the economy's vitality, President Bush said Monday as he projected a year of good — though somewhat slower — economic growth.

Bush, in his annual economic report to Congress, made a fresh pitch for breaking down trade barriers and energizing global trade talks. He also called on Congress to extend his authority to negotiate free-trade deals, a request likely to face an uphill battle in the Democratic-controlled Congress.

"This authority is essential to completing good trade agreements," Bush wrote in the introduction to the report. "The Congress must renew it if we are to improve our competitiveness in the global economy."

With the United States racking up record trade deficits and facing intense competition from rapidly growing China and India, global trade tensions have intensified.

Democrats blame Bush's free-trade policies for contributing to the trade deficit, costing U.S. factories jobs and exposing U.S. workers to unfair competition from low-wage countries.

Against that backdrop, Bush faces a daunting challenge in getting Congress to renew the Trade Promotion Authority, also known as fast-track authority. It lets the president negotiate trade deals that Congress must approve without amendments. That authority expires on July 1.

"Further trade liberalization, particularly in services, could bring even larger gains to American consumers, firms and workers," according to the report.

The Bush administration argues that the way to deal with the trade deficit is through free-trade policies that make it easier for U.S. companies to do business abroad. Getting China to move to a more flexible currency system, another administration goal, also would help U.S. exporters.

A technical chapter in the president's economic report dealt with currency markets and exchange rates. It mentioned that "economic theory does not dictate a clear preference" between two different monetary policy tools countries may use to influence economic activity. One way is for a country's central bank to set short-term interest rates; another way is to rely on linking the value of the country's exchange rate to another currency.

Asked how this squares with the administration's policy regarding China's currency practices, Edward Lazear, chairman of the White House's Council of Economic Advisers, said the chapter aimed to be an academic discussion on how currency markets function, not a message about appropriate exchange rate policy, which is left to the president and Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson, he said.

Critics contend that China is keeping its currency artificially low, giving Chinese companies a big trade advantage over U.S. companies. The United States has a record $202 billion trade deficit with China alone, the greatest ever with a single country.

Irked by China's currency and trade policies, some Democrats and Republicans in Congress want to impose hefty tariffs on Chinese made goods flowing into the United States.

On other matters, Bush also talked about restraining growth in Medicare and Medicaid and the need to financially shore up Social Security as a wave of retiring baby boomers will place massive strains on the government's resources.

And, he promoted his plan to balance the budget while not raising taxes.

Bush, in a budget plan sent to Congress last week, proposed balancing the budget by 2012, three years after he has left office. That would be done by spending restraints. Bush's plan would make his first-term tax cuts permanent, which the administration says is key to maintaining economic growth.

Democrats charged that the president's budget plan works only on paper and that it is based on overly optimistic assumptions about how much revenue the economy will generate and leaves out expensive items, such as further war costs after 2009.

On immigration, the report said that "effective immigration policy can curtail illegal immigration and at the same time promote America's national and economic interests."

Looking back on last year, Bush said the economy turned in a solid performance despite the ill effects of the residential real estate bust.

The economy grew by 3.4 percent last year, as measured by gross domestic product from the fourth quarter of 2005 to the fourth quarter of 2006.

The president's report projects that economic growth will slow to 2.9 percent this year, reflecting lingering fallout from the housing slump. Next year growth will pick up, with the economy expanding by 3.1 percent.

The nation's unemployment rate, which averaged a six-year low of 4.6 percent in 2006, should hold steady at that rate this year and then edge up to 4.8 percent in 2008, the White House estimates.

Inflation, as measured by the Consumer Price Index, is expected to edge up 2.6 percent both this year and next. Last year, consumer prices rose by 2.5 percent, the smallest increase in three years. The improvement came as once-surging energy prices calmed down.

Students speak about off campus living

RENT from page 1

DeVault. "But some people have to raise the rent to make ends meet."

However, many student-tenants are weary of these claims.

"Many landlords claim to keep rent to a minimum," said Dean Toulan, a senior at UMass and a veteran of off-campus living points out. "But I've never heard anyone say he had gotten a deal on a place unless people were forced to reside in living rooms as a method of defraying the cost."

UMass upperclassman James Poro adds, "It's economically known that Amherst is one of the most expensive places to rent in western Mass. Local landlords use the demand as a reason to raise rent."

If every UMass student wanted to live on campus, it would be impossible. According to the UMass Housing and Residence Life Web site, housing capacity is over 12,000 as compared to more than 20,000 enrolled students, a number from the Office of News & Information.

Those forced to live off campus would be subject to the same housing scarcity and the same rent inflation of the city apartment dwellers who cannot afford condos. This demand for housing and the subsequent rent increases leave many students skeptical to the idea that landlords try to keep rent as low as possible for students.

"While most students willingly move off campus, landlords are taking advantage of a student's necessity for housing," Toulan continued. "Because the tenants are students and temporary, building owners are content with charging too much for apartments in a dilapidated state. Paying $1,700 per month to live in a building that should be knocked down is crazy, but few options remain."

UMass student Beckey Palmer believes that landlords with apartments closer to campus not only charge more but do so for apartments of lesser quality. She does not believe area rent costs are kept low to help students.

One landlord, Joel Greenbaum, sympathizes with these students.

"I keep my rents as affordable as possible," Greenbaum said. "I know how expensive it is for students and their families to afford higher education. The cost of doing business in real estate has sky-rocketed. Rents cover our costs for buildings we bought at lower prices; new purchases do not make money."

Will McGuinness is a Collegian staff writer. He can be reached at wmcguinn@student.umass.edu

Local MassPIRG to hold kick-off meeting

MASSPIRG from page 1

renewable energy within the state. The group is trying to get the State House to sign a Renewable Energy Bill, which would increase renewable energy use by 20 percent within the next 13 years.

Students involved with the Global Warming campaign organize an Earth Day festival in April. They also design an energy-saving contest for students in the residence halls, as well as a hybrid car test-driving event among others.

The Affordable Textbooks campaign is another effort to pass a bill in the State House to regulate the cost of textbooks statewide. The group's other campaigns involve working in community homeless shelters, organizing stream clean-ups, educating elementary school children about water conservation, and educating the community about the genocide in Sudan and the horrors of the Darfurian War.

"In our chapter of MassPIRG, we're all really passionate about these problems and we're actively trying to make a difference. Having more volunteers and interns helps us to get more change accomplished," said Wasserman in a press release.

Interested students should attend the meeting at the Campus Center 101 tonight to find out more information on the campaigns or learn how to become an intern or volunteer with the group. The meeting is free and informal. Interested folks are welcome and encouraged to bring their friends. Refreshments will be served.

THE HARP
WHERE ELSE BUT WOULD YOU CELEBRATE IRISH PUB
The GUINNESS Toast
GREAT GIVEAWAYS!
LIVE IRISH MUSIC!
THIS FRIDAY AT 11P.M.
THE ONLY PLACE TO BE!
JOIN US FOR A GREAT TIME AND ENJOY AMHERST'S GREAT TRADITIONAL IRISH PUB!

Celebrate
Valentine's Day
with your Favorite Chocolate Dessert.

Wednesday, February 14, 2007
All DC's from 5—9 pm

• Chocolate Fondue with Fresh Fruits • Chocolate Pizza
• Double Chocolate Mousse Cake • Chocolate Profiteroles
• Chocolate Cake with Ganache (vegan) • Hot Chocolate

DINING SERVICES
Enter Our Raffle Today!
Godiva Chocolates and Red Roses
Drawings February 13, 2007

Totman thief takes $3,000 in goods

TOTMAN from page 1

break-ins are common, this specific case is "unusual." Because there was no damage done to the car, Archbald said the perpetrators must have used the remote attached to Chen's keys to gain access to the vehicle.

"This circumstance is the first that I have heard of in which someone was able to access a [car] remote and use it to get into a car," said Archbald.

Another student victimized in the robbery lost his laptop valued at $2,000 during the incident. The student, who asked to remain anonymous, is also a part of the Computer Science Graduate Program and said that his "every day life depends on [his laptop]."

"The loss makes my life very inconvenient," he said.

The car break-in, occurring somewhere between the hours 5:30 p.m. and 6:30 p.m. on Monday, Feb. 5, left Chen feeling "very angry" and upset that something like this could happen.

Although car break-ins in the Totman parking lot are rare, noted Archbald, they do happen occasionally.

One police campaign, designed to help stop thefts like this from happening, is called "Like it, Lock it, Keep it."

"This plan is a collaborative effort between UMPD and Residence Life," said Archbald. He also noted that students should take extra time to secure their belongings, or they run the risk losing them.

According to Chen, this is not the first time valuables have been stolen from a locker at Totman. Earlier this school year, Chen mentioned that his friend lost a wallet and a cell phone, and another person lost their wallet in the locker room.

David Humphreys can be reached at dhumphre@student.umass.edu

Pancreatic cancer doesn't stop UMass instructor

CHILDS from page 1

total surprise and a gift."

His treatments lasted from July to mid-December.

"I felt like an eighteen wheeler was parked on me. I was really exhausted," Childs explained. "The [doctors] told me it would be about a month before I felt back to normal, and six months to a year before I would feel 100 percent again.

"I am strong enough to be teaching and I am fortunate to have some great teaching assistants, which are helping out with my six lab sections. There is no way that I could do it all, right now," he said.

Childs returned to UMass on Jan. 29 to teach this semester. He instructs Insects in Related Forms and Principles of Pesticide Management, and will teach Insects of Ornamentals in the fall.

"I can't believe that I'm back doing what I love," he said. Childs explained that one of the biggest challenges he faces is taking things slowly and being kind to himself.

Childs has been an instructor at UMass since 1981. He also received his undergraduate and masters degree from the university. In addition he does outreach teaching for the UMass Landscape, Nursery and Urban Forestry Extension program. his specialty area being insects that attack trees and shrubs. His outreach teaching generally consists of 30 or more talks around the Northeast to arborists, landscapers, nursery managers, town foresters and tree wardens about the green industry.

He said he wanted to come back to UMass this semester because, "I love my job, it is one of those things that makes me feel human."

Since his diagnosis he has found himself no longer fretting over the little things that he used to worry about; he no longer stresses over the little things, which he said he hopes lasts.

"I have always been a guy who stopped and smelled the roses along the way, but these days roses never smelled so good," he said.

It was only two weeks ago that Childs really began to feel good for the first time in eight months.

UMass instructor Robert Childs was diagnosed with pancreatic cancer last May. Since then, he has undergone treatment and an operation to remove his tumor and has become one of the few survivors of the deadly cancer responsible for taking about 33,000 lives a year.

"I had forgotten what it felt like, to feel good. I was surviving everyday. I was focused on my treatments. That was my life," he said.

Childs, although in remission, is still in recovery. The removal of his pancreas has caused him to have, "full blown" diabetes.

"It's not like cancer I can deal with it, but it is frustrating at times" he said. He will be diabetic for the rest of his life but is able to control his blood sugar levels through his diet and a computerized insulin pump, which is connected to him through a site on his body.

His doctors say his chances of survival are 60 percent, which he says is about as high as it gets with pancreatic cancer.

"My wife and I were never so happy to hear 60 percent; it sounded like 100. If I had been farther along with the illness before they found it, I would have been within a five to 10 percent survivability," he said.

After Christmas, Childs saw a billboard on the side of the highway in North Adams, which stated that in 2006 over 33,000 Americans were diagnosed with pancreatic cancer, and last year over 32,000 Americans died.

"I have never seen an awareness billboard about pancreatic cancer. It was surreal. I am in a very rare group," he said.

About a year ago Childs became very sick with a stomach virus leading him to the hospital, where he was diagnosed with pancreatitis. After a CAT scan, doctors found a pseudocyst on the tail of his pancreas. Childs discovered that he had two ducts in his pancreas (most people only have one, which increased his chances for getting pancreatic cancer).

"I still have a long way to go," he said. "People who have the kind of procedure that I have, which is called a Whipple, usually have a 20 percent chance of surviving, and we are hoping for much more than that. If the cancer comes back, it will be much harder to deal with and treat this time."

After five years, if the cancer does not return, Childs will be put back into the general population for longevity.

He says he will make it.

"One of the most amazing things with this whole process is that I have had this thing called hope," he said. Hope and love have carried him through this experience.

"The human element and the love have been amazing. The love has been unbelievable, I have been overwhelmed by it," he said. After his surgery his wife drove to see him everyday in the hospital for three weeks.

Throughout this experience Childs has realized that he has accomplished a lot in his life.

"I was able to be at my own memorial service throughout this. I have got to hear what people think of me, the kind of impact that I have had on them I have touched many lives," he said.

Childs is hoping to be able to continue to be "Dad" to his two children.

"My father died when I was eight years old, so I think I have always had an extra sense about what its like not to have a dad influence as you grow up. It is a thing that really haunted me throughout the illness," he said.

He said his family was the rock that carried him through the experience.

"There were days where I was so sick, where my feeling was, if this is what life is going to be like I am not sure that I am interested in going forward with this. It was my family that gave me something to hold onto. I am an incredibly lucky person," Childs said.

A positive person, Childs was upbeat throughout his illness and also about teaching.

"My favorite expression is 'old dog, new trick.' I love learning. If you are in my class, and you really want to learn about bugs, you are going to learn about bugs," he said. "And we are going to have fun with it, because if you don't have fun with it, why get out of bed in the morning."

Childs would like the opportunity to thank his family, friends, colleagues and the university for the support and help during his illness. He is grateful to Deborah Swanson, John McLain, Liz Wiernasz, Kathy Conway, Gail Shoeman, Craig Hollingsworth, Bill Coli, Bill Graves, and many others.

Jamie Mason can be reached at jlmason@student.umass.edu

CAREER FAIRS

Plan time to browse, ask questions, and give out your resume. Some employers will be scheduling follow-up interviews, so have your schedule available.

2 DAYS 4 CAREER FAIRS

DAY 1 Wednesday

Campus Wide Career Fair

All majors and degree levels will find employers who want to talk with you! Many employers give out resumes and more! Most employers looking for all majors and full-time opportunities after graduation. Typically employers attending this event have specific openings to discuss, and many attend just to meet you and talk about future possibilities.

Dress up & Bring a Resume

Campus Center Auditorium 10am-3pm

Life Sciences & Natural Resources Career Fair

Life Sciences and Natural Resources majors at all degree levels will find employers who want to talk with you! (Biotech, Pharmaceutical, Environmental & Natural Resources)

Hundreds of Employers are Recruiting

Campus Center Lower Level 10am-3pm

ALANA Career Fair

Meet employers looking for ALANA students of all majors for full-time, Co-op and/or internship opportunities. Typically employers attending this event have specific openings to discuss, and many attend just to meet you and talk about future possibilities.

Campus Center Auditorium 5pm-7:30pm

DAY 2 Thursday 2/15

Summer Internship & Co-op Opportunities Fair

INTERNSHIP & CO-OP Opportunities Fair

10am-3pm Campus Center Auditorium

Meet employers looking for all majors for Co-op and Intern opportunities. Typically employers attending this event have a variety of openings to discuss, and many attend just to meet you and talk about future possibilities. There will also be some summer camp opportunities for those of you interested in that option.

UMASS AMHERST Student Affairs & Campus Life

Internships CO-OPS Full-time JOBS

Career Services www.umass.edu/careers

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

EDITORIAL OPINION

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 13, 2007

"I may not agree with what you say but I will defend to the death your right to say it" Voltaire

EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

It didn't end with Abe

Debbie Friedman

When I found out my cousin was volunteering for a group called the American Anti-Slavery Group, I couldn't imagine what he did. History books taught me that slavery had vanished from the world decades ago, barring some minor exceptions in dark corners of the globe. I assumed modern day slavery referred to the kinds of atrocities that occur in sweatshops, where workers are paid pennies to perform grueling labor in poor conditions.

Turns out, I couldn't have been more wrong in my assumptions. For in actuality, slavery is as present as it ever was. It's also just as "brutal and hazardous," writes the President of the American Anti-Slavery Group (AASG), Charles Jacobs in his essay, "Slavery: A Worldwide Evil." Those statements alone are shocking, but sadly, they are only the beginning of a grim and ugly reality.

Twenty-seven million people are believed to be in bondage right now throughout the world; meaning they are forced to work with out wages and stripped of all human rights. Around 15,000 of those people are enslaved right here, on the soil of this supposedly free country. To say this incredible violation of human rights is invisible would be a terrible understatement, because in the minds of most people, it simply does not exist.

Modern slavery takes shape in many different forms as noted by the AASG's website (www.iabolish.com). The most common form of slavery is called debt bondage. This involves people selling themselves or their children in order to pay off large amounts of debt. However, once a person enters into a program like this, it becomes next to impossible to get out, and future generations are subsequently born into a life which is not their own.

Chattel slavery, another form, closely resembles the traditional form where a master owns a slave like property. This kind of slavery is predominant in Africa where a racial hierarchy controls the positions of power and subordination.

Perhaps the most well-known form is sex slavery, commonly found in Southeast Asia. The trade is also prosperous in Central and Eastern Europe as well as North America. The Web site states that "an estimated two million women and children are sold into sex slavery around the world every year."

27 million people are believed to be in bondage right now throughout the world.

As a result of all of these crimes against humanity, billions of dollars are made. The AASG says, the United States alone makes nine billion every year from slave trafficking.

Unfortunately, this issue has remained completely isolated from the mainstream media and American political realm, leaving the public in the dark. Talking with a handful of University of Massachusetts students made this all the more clear.

Most students I spoke with felt similarly about modern day slavery pertaining to the struggles of migrant workers in sweatshops. Nearly every student was certain that slavery no longer existed in the United States, and the average numerical estimate of enslavement through out the world was thought to be around 200,000. Once informed of the reality, students were stunned. More than likely, most Americans are also oblivious to the enormity of this problem and would be stunned to learn the truth as well.

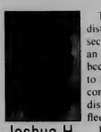
As for finding a solution to this contemporary human rights crisis, awareness seems to be the key. Without awareness, this issue will never have the opportunity to be addressed to the extent that is necessary.

Becoming informed and creating a discourse about what is happening throughout the world is the first step towards helping the millions who are suffering. The next is to lend support to the AASG, which gives direct aid to victims of slavery and encourages them to become modern day abolitionists who can educate the public.

Freedom is an easy thing to take for granted when it is offered up on a silver platter. In this country, the word is thrown around in political speeches and slapped onto bumper stickers, lessening the magnitude of its meaning and creating a comfort which blinds us from those who are left without a voice. But even though we cannot see or hear the 27 million who are enslaved, they still exist and struggle everyday. Their families still grieve, and they still hope for a day when they might be granted the freedom to take back their own lives. If we all took a moment to listen, we might hear that hope and resolve to make sure that in our lifetime, slavery really does become history.

Debbie Friedman writes on Tuesdays. She can be reached at dcfriedm@student.umass.edu.

The courage not to fight



Joshua H. Wilder

The war in Iraq has taken some disturbing turns so far in 2007, with sectarian violence on the rise and an argument at home on strategy becoming more intense. We seem to be in the ultimate catch 22: too committed to leave Iraq yet at such disadvantage that success seems fleeting.

In the midst of this hub of public opinion, political one-upmanship and disturbing statistics on our boys abroad lies the trial of First Lt. Ehren Watada.

Watada is facing the possibility of up to four years in a military prison as well as a dishonorable discharge if found guilty of refusing to deploy to Iraq and openly denouncing the army's role in the war.

So far the situation does not look bright for Watada, who has not refuted any of the charges he is currently facing. To make matters more interesting, Watada has also explicitly charged the Bush Administration with twisting around intelligence information and deceiving the American people.

Perhaps the most controversial of all Watadas' comments were when he publicly encouraged soldiers to "throw down their weapons." Such attitudes have had a seemingly polarizing effect on the citizenry, dividing people who feel the troops are being disrespected and those who are fed up with the violent war. It is crucial to note, however, that Watada's anti-war campaign is truly more thought out and genuine than that of a "No Blood for Oil" bumper sticker or a moronic botched joke by Senator Kerry.

According to Watada's reasoning during a June 7, 2006 press conference, the military occupation in Iraq "violates our democratic system of checks and balances," thus making it illegal. Furthermore, being a soldier and an "officer of honor and integrity," he must refuse to fight in Iraq. He has openly asserted that he has no problems with serving in Afghanistan.

This case raises certain hard to answer questions especially when the war in question here is an existent one. We are not, despite Donald Rumsfeld's school of thought, playing Risk. The lives being lost are real and will be missed. If a country has indeed entered into a war illegally, is the only lawful option to then withdrawal and count losses, especially when objectives have not been met? And if you are a member of a platoon, part of a working unit of soldiers, is it honest to abandon ship? Do you have no obligations to your fellow soldier, or for that matter your fellow American?

Many people will be quick to label Watada as a coward; as a man with no sense of loyalty, grit or determination. After all, no person respects a quitter. Yet before slamming the book shut on this man's integrity, it is important to remember the stakes involved in this case.

If Watada is convicted, he will be going to military prison. Military prison is like any of the worst kinds of detention facilities you never want to go to. It's not a run of the mill, white-collar resort with large mattresses and conjugal visits. Take the opportunity to speak to some poor soul who has actually spent hard time in such a place. Odds are they won't even want to talk to you about their experiences.

Before slamming the book shut on this man's integrity, it is important to remember the stakes involved in this case.

Being a member of the armed forces before, Watada surely must have been aware of what consequences he would have to face. Going to Iraq would be dangerous, but being confined, harassed and possibly physically abused for four years is even worse. It is no surprise to see someone trying to avoid going to fight a war. Draft dodgers during the Vietnam War were extremely common, yet the main difference is that they were chosen to go to fight. Watada, on the other hand, joined the armed forces willingly and has no problem fighting in other parts of the world.

Also, there seems to be a bit more to this story than meets the eye. Watada is not the first U.S. soldier to refuse deployment in Iraq. In fact, in 2005, Sgt. Kevin Benderman refused to return for a second tour of duty in Iraq because he objected to the war.

An anti-war Web site among soldiers entitled "couragetoresist.org" tells the story of over eight members of the military who have gone to Iraq and refused to go again. Web sites with stories such as this only contribute to the media firestorm in Iraq, however it seems as if that hasn't accomplished anything positive recently.

Lt. Ehren Watada is refusing to fight in Iraq, the first commissioned officer to do so.

Approval for the war has dwindled lower and lower, and there is no question that something needs to be done to change our strategy. Hopefully Watada's case will pull back the shades in order to shine some light on a new way to bring the troops home and secure the streets of Baghdad. Yet this seems more and more unlikely.

Far too many Americans are willing to latch onto one point of view and attack the other, with some people being evil and others unpatriotic. While it is easy to argue, every American can agree on achieving a quick and bloodless end to this war.

The next few months will be crucial—lets hope we aren't reading a similar column like this next February.

Joshua H. Wilder can be reached at jhwilder@student.umass.edu

Do not have your palm read

Lauren Modisette

So you can't afford to go to college? Well, this only means that you may not make it to the middle-class. That's ok, just go get a job. But wait, that job is now being redirected overseas to people who work for less. And almost half of new jobs that are surfacing require a college degree. So now what?

There it is, the economic limbo between wealth and poverty. It has become more difficult for Americans to reach "the dream" that continues to sweep the country.

A Bachelor's Degree (or higher) has basically become a necessity in "making it" in our country. But with tuition increases and little help being provided to students in need, how are some people even going to make it that far?

A high school diploma used to be enough for someone to make a substantial income. If college wasn't in your cards there was no need to stress. With the assistance of state and local government, receiving a secondary education has been made available to all American citizens and has even stretched to the less fortunate communities among us.

Now, however, there is a lack of assistance for many Americans to receive the level of education that will keep them out of poverty. That level has grown from a high school diploma to a college degree; and even then college may not be enough. Those who can't afford to go to a state school find themselves in the working class; but therein lies a problem.

Globalization is absorbing the jobs of low-income workers. Chains such as Wal-Mart are now, more than ever, looking overseas for cheap labor to keep their prices low and therefore earn higher revenue. While this provides depressed countries with job opportunities; it is taking the work away from American's who cannot afford to go to college. This is inevitably expanding the income inequality American's are experiencing.

Since higher education is now a necessity rather than a privilege and costs have increased, the rate of enrollment may decrease. If the increase in tuition costs affects the enrollment rates in institutions across the country, Americans are going to find themselves deeper in the hole than they are now.

Those who can't afford to go to a state school find themselves in the working class.

At the same time, students who are attending college are finding themselves with an increasing dollar amount in loans hovering over their heads. Especially with out-of-state tuition costs, students are going to be in deeper debt than before. Sure, there are loan forgiveness opportunities, but even they don't offer much mercy.

Deval Patrick has formed a working group that is going to assist illegal immigrants with their higher education. The ethics of this action could be debated considering how many American citizens could use the assistance. There are around 90,000 high school seniors in Massachusetts that would benefit from the tuition breaks; but instead somewhere between 400 and 500 illegal immigrants will receive an $11,000 a year in financial assistance.

On another note, rather than spending an additional $100 billion on Iraq and the global war on terror, why couldn't a fraction of those funds be directed towards educating the country?

The only way to really fix this problem is to eliminate the income gap and make higher education more accessible to American citizens. If enrollment rates do plummet then more people will find themselves in the working class. But if globalization continues at the rate it's going then all of those people won't be able to find a job and will most likely live in poverty.

Evening out the income in our country would benefit everyone (except for CEOs).

Envision a ladder to symbolize the net income of Americans. On the top of that ladder is 1 percent of Americans making a total of 20 percent of our nation's income. This includes CEO's and their $53 million dollar bonuses. The amount a CEO is paid in one day is equivalent to the net income of an average worker; and a CEO's net income averages to about 400 times as much as those workers. Imagine how many Americans could be put through college on that CEO's bonus. I hope I'm not alone when I ask: who needs that much money anyway?

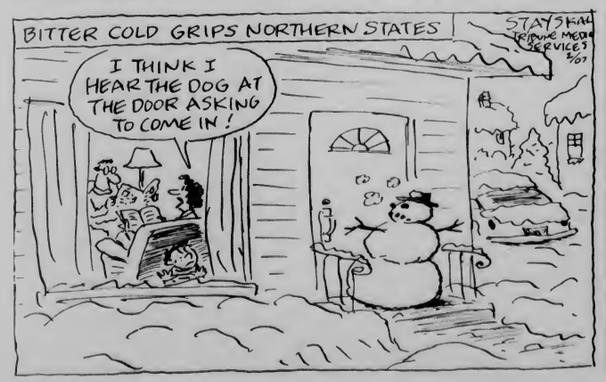
"As middle-class assembly-line jobs vanish, and routine white-collar work gets outsourced overseas, the value of education and special skills rises," states Uri Berliner, sports and business editor of NPR's National Desk.

Though this all seems overwhelming, it is certainly not meant to cause anxiety. Many already have a vague awareness about such future threats. But for those who don't pick up a newspaper everyday, this is for you.

So what happens next? What do we do with this information? Not many of us are directly affected by these issues right now, but we will be. If anything this should bring on a new appreciation for the future that we often take for granted. As college students we don't have much power to change this, but knowledge is the first step to making a difference. Get aware and prepare. If this all comes to nothing, you're still a step ahead.

Lauren Modisette can be reached at lmodisett@student.umass.edu

Doc came back from the future to tell a college-bound Marty there was more to worry about than hitting that Rolls Rovce.



BITTER COLD GRIPS NORTHERN STATES
I THINK I HEAR THE DOG AT THE DOOR ASKING TO COME IN!
STAYSKAL Tribune Media Services 2/07

LETTER TO THE EDITOR

DRIVE AT YOUR OWN RISK

The issue of UMass police pulling people over is out of control. I was pulled over on campus the first night of school. The officer claimed I went through a stop sign. I investigated the area the next day and saw no stop sign anywhere.

Last night, I saw an officer pull someone over for what I believed to be a turning infraction (no signal). There were no cars around and it was in the horseshoe area. It was completely unreasonable abuse of power.

What I'm wondering is, is there a quota that needs to be met in terms of citations? The officers are abusing their power and an investigation should begin.

Michael DeFilippi
UMass student

WE WANT MORE LETTERS LIKE THIS FROM YOU!

SEND THEM IN AND WE WILL PRINT (UNLESS THEY ARE JUST PLAIN OLD SILLY)

E-mail 'em here
editorial@dailycollegian.com

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

ARTS & LIVING

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 13, 2007 ARTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

49th Grammy Awards a big success

Dixie Chicks sweep Grammy Awards, Sting reunites with The Police

Emily Robison, from left, Natalie Maines and Martie Maguire, of the Dixie Chicks, winners for Album of the Year, Record of the Year, Song of the Year, Best Country Performance by a Duo or Group with Vocal and Best Country Album, in the pressroom at the 49th Annual Grammy Awards at the Staples Center in Los Angeles, California, Sunday.

BY MANDY THOMAS
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Recording Academy pumped out yet another year of the entertaining 49 th annual Grammy Awards. Big names in pop music hopped on and off the stage throughout the night singing songs and receiving trophies.

"I told you I'd take you to the Grammys. Stick with me," Natalie Maines said during one of five acceptance speeches made by country trio the Dixie Chicks. The girls took home Grammys for Album of the Year, Record of the Year, Song of the Year, Best Country Performance by a Duo or Group with Vocal and Best Country Album.

The 80s rock band The Police kick-started the night with their highly anticipated reunion performance. The trio began by playing their hit song "Roxanne" which quickly had the audience singing along.

It was a good night for Mary J. Blige. The veteran R&B star belted out a powerhouse performance of her hit songs "Stay With Me" and "Be Without You," which won her a Grammy for Best Female R&B Vocal Performance and Best R&B Song. Blige was accompanied by a full orchestra and she attributed her success and her passion to the fact that she is "in love." Blige also received a Grammy for Best R&B Album, "The Breakthrough."

Before the show, Lionel Richie told red carpet reporters the Grammys were going to be "smokin'." Richie took the stage later in the show along side Smokey Robinson, Chris Brown and Christina Aguilera. Robinson began by singing his classic, "Tracks of My Tears" followed by Richie's old time favorite "Hello." Complete with handstands, dancers, trampolines, bells and whistles, Chris Brown dominated the stage with his performance of "Run It." Then Aguilera rounded out the medley paying tribute to James Brown by singing the Godfather of soul's song "It's a Man's World."

Pop sensation Justin Timberlake wanted to set the record straight before performing what he considers the best song he has ever written.

"It just flowed out," he explains in a prerecorded statement shown on monitors to introduce the pop star's performance of "What Goes Around Comes Around." Timberlake started his performance on top of a piano and then moved to the main stage, all the while videotaping himself with a mini-cam. Timberlake's "Sexy Back" won the Grammy for Best Dance Recording.

The "My Grammy Moment" winner was Robyn Troup, 18 from Houston, Texas. Troup paired with Timberlake to sing "Ain't No Sunshine" and "My Love."

Stevie Wonder introduced the group performance of Corinne Bailey Rae, John Legend and John Mayer. With only her voice and her guitar, Rae began the montage by singing her song "Like a Star." She was followed by Legend on piano and his song "Coming Home." The three ended their performance with Mayer's classic guitar style and his simple jam, "Gravity."

Before the show, Legend commented on his happiness for being able to perform with "people who really get it musically." Legend took home a

See GRAMMY on page 8

NEW MUSIC TUESDAY

Simone's latest album features a new twist to classic material

BY SYDNEY TOWNE
COLLEGIAN STAFF

It isn't often that the dead put out a new album, but when they do it's usually worth listening to. That's how it is with Nina Simone's new CD "Nina Simone: Remixed and Reimagined." The album features 13 of her greatest songs done over with a modern edge that is intended to bring her work to a new public.

When Simone died in 2003 she took with her an ability to add depth and power to music. She had put out 12 albums before she passed away, but none of them have quite the sound of this, her latest production. "Remixed and Reimagined" took the soulful lyrics and blues sound of her work in the late 1960s and early 1970s and added to them a strong baseline and techno vibe.

The songs are each produced and remixed by a variety of musicians and DJs, which gives the CD an eclectic edge that keeps the overall sound from getting stale. It creates a range of interpretations of Simone's sound and allows for different listeners to each have their own favorite tune.

The sound of DJ Logic's "Obeah Woman" has an authentic sound that makes it seem as if that version of the song is how Simone could have intended it to sound all along. It is completely different from Coldcut's remix of "Save Me" which would fit in at a bubble filled rave.

The contrast of hard beats with touching lyrics heard throughout the album makes the songs more than the average club tune. They are songs that would be completely at home in a dark, smoky club, but at the same time they would be equally appropriate to play as background sound when you're simply hanging out.

See SIMONE on page 7

Mitchell recreates 60's folk on her third full length album

BY DONNA LUDICK
COLLEGIAN CONTRIBUTOR

Folk music fans need look no further than Anaïs Mitchell's "The Brightness" to satiate their hunger for a 60s folk revival. Her Righteous Babe Records debut on February 13 is reminiscent of Dylan and Guthrie's stories-through-song complete with a colorful cast of characters and wide-ranging subject matter.

"The Song They Sang When Rome Fell," Anaïs' now out-of-print debut, was recorded in a single afternoon in Austin, Texas in 2002. In 2003, she performed at the Texas Kerrville Folk Festival which garnered her the prestigious New Folk Award. Shortly after, Anaïs hooked up with the Chicago based Waterbug Records and recorded her second album, "Hymns for the Exiled" released in 2004. Legendary folk singer Ani DiFranco attended several of Mitchell's shows, later signing Mitchell to the Righteous Babe label.

"The Brightness" is Anaïs' third album, which feels less politically charged than "Hymns for the Exiled." The 11 tracks on "The Brightness" suit a more romantic palate than a political one, which may disappoint "Hymns" fans. They will be relieved to find that despite a departure from the peaceful, political voice of "Hymns," "The Brightness" manages to blend romance and longing without becoming saccharine. Many of the tracks also relate the stories of a vast array of travelers. From a hobo in a train car to the three Wise Men, these tracks bring the listener along for the journey.

Born on a Vermont sheep farm, Anaïs' travels have led her to Beirut cafes, Cairo apartments and Austin recording studios. A voice that understands both small town life and the restlessness of a traveler's heart creates a rich, worldly point of view that pervades through many of the album's tracks.

See MITCHELL on page 7

Remix album perfect for gym

SIMONE from page 6

Without knowing Simone's work, it would be hard to pinpoint when the songs were written, but the CD has a faintly retro vibe that gives one pause. It seems that in the same moment the two sides of every song, the old lyrics and new sounds, contrast and complete each other. The refrain of "O-O-H Child" is one everyone has heard before, "O-o-h child things are going to get easier. O-o-h child things will get brighter." In the remixed version Nicodemus adds a glitz that you never realized was missing from the song until it was added.

Perhaps the best song on the album is a new version of "Ain't Got No I Got Life." It's a song from the Broadway musical "Hair" and in "Remixed and Reimagined" has been given a strong folk guitar sound. The song is fleshed out with brass instruments that complement the lamentations of the singer really nicely. It takes on an almost humorous tone.

The new remixes may not measure up if you are familiar with Simone's originals, but as a body of work on their own they are worth a second listen. Her lyrics and outline for songs give what could have simply been a techno DJ produced album a point of view. For the more musically inclined listener the lack of authentic instrumentals may be disheartening, but for the casual listener hearing the songs they are well engineered.

NINA SIMONE

"NINA SIMONE: REMIXED AND REIMAGINED"

LEGACY RECORDS

4/5

This album is perfect for the gym. It seems to be almost the ideal soundtrack to running on the treadmill or spinning for an extended period of time. The beat sets a pace for you and the lyrics keep you interested long enough to finish whatever you set out to do. The tunes are catchy without being redundant and the beats are lively enough to help you push through that last half mile.

Overall the album is an interesting intersection of classic songs and new sounds. It might be a vehicle to introduce a new generation to the diva who is Nina Simone. It may, however, simply be an upbeat mix of well written lyrics and over mixed sounds that have little connection to Simone, but are worth listening to anyway.

Sydney Towne can be reached at stowne@student.umass.edu

Mitchell's "Room" full of love

MITCHELL from page 6

Mitchell's unique vocals dominate "The Brightness." Though melodic, Mitchell's voice is somewhat childlike, making the 25 year old sound closer to 12. It is, however, wide-ranging and emotive, and the unique vocals grow quickly on the listener. A careful selection of stringed instruments complements each song, with thoughtful placement of banjos and baritone saxophones that foster the lyrics' illustrative qualities. Percussion appears on only two tracks, lending to "The Brightness's" unique sound.

The track "Changer" laments a lover turned stranger and the difficulty of acceptance and saying goodbye. "Old-Fashioned Hat" describes how an old hat transforms a fiancé back into the exciting stranger reminiscent of a first date, and a desire to bask in the light-hearted fun of pretend before marriage complicates their relationship.

Singing for both parts on the track "Hades and Persephone" Mitchell highlights her wide range of subjects in this love song with an ancient twist. This track is also a selection from Mitchell's traveling folk-opera, Hadestown, which recounts the myth of Hades and Eurydice.

"Santa Fe Dream" is one of the best examples of how Mitchell's restless spirit of a traveler makes an appearance in her songs. This track captures the conflict of the eternal wanderer, from their attachment to elements of a domestic life and their need for the open road with the constant change and uncertainty it provides.

ANAÏS MITCHELL

"THE BRIGHTNESS ROOM"

RIGHTEOUS BABE RECORDS

4.5/5

The last track, "Out of Pawn," perhaps best combines the politics of "Hymns" and the romance of "The Brightness" in the story of a romance devastated by Hurricane Katrina. Here we meet a man who has just fallen in love with a girl who lives out on the levee, and not even love can keep the world from being a sad place. Simple, yet poignant, the lyrics of this song leave more room for interpretation than most of the other tracks on the album.

The 11 tracks of "The Brightness," come together to celebrate the romance in the landscape, the traveler and the lover. They also deal with the conflicts of each in a delicate and intimate style, perfect for those searching for understanding.

Diana Ludek can be reached at dludek@student.umass.edu

Is your room more unique than this?

Do you have the BEST room?

Here's your chance to strut your stuff in the "Collegian Cribs" Contest for a chance to win a grand prize!

Submit up to three pictures online at TheCollegian@gmail.com
Deadline Feb.14 Voting beginning Feb.15

Grammy Awards full of sparkle

The Pussycat Dolls arrive at the 49th Annual Grammy Awards at the Staples Center in Los Angeles, California. Last year the group was nominated for Best Pop Performance by a Duo or Group with Vocal, but lost to the band Maroon 5.

GRAMMY from page 6

Grammy for Best Male R&B Vocal Performance with his song "Heaven." Mayer went on to receive a Grammy for Best Male Pop Vocal Performance with his song "Waiting on the World to Change," and Best Pop Vocal Album, "Continuum."

The Grammy for Best New Artist went to country newbie and former American Idol star Carrie Underwood. With the help of well-known pop country band Rascal Flatts, Underwood covered songs by Bob Wills and the Eagles. She began with a twangy rendition of "San Antonio Rose" and then Flatts chimed in with their version of "Hotel California." Underwood moved on to the classic "Desperado" and Flatts ended the performance with "Life in the Fast Lane."

In a pretty gold dress and white flowers in her hair, Beyonce gave a crowd pleasing performance of the song "Listen" from the hit movie Dreamgirls. Beyonce was also accompanied by a full string section.

Shakira and Wyclef John appeared belly dancing and back flipping to Shakira's "Hips Don't Lie." A bearded James Blunt gave a frill-less performance of his hit "Beautiful" with a little help from his guitar and piano.

Mary J. Blige took the stage again with an eclectic combination of performers to sing "Runaway Love." Blige teamed up with Earth Wind & Fire and Grammy winner for Best Rap Album, Ludacris, along with a group of folks holding candles and singing the songs refrain.

Gnarls Barkley racked up two Grammys for Best Alternative Music Album "St. Elsewhere" and Best Urban/Alternative Performance with their song "Crazy." The two also made an interesting appearance dressed as 1970s airplane pilots during their performance of "Crazy." One half of the talented duo, Cee-Lo, started the performance on a small stage in the middle of the audience and slowly made his way to meet his other half, Danger Mouse, who was on the main stage playing piano. The two were joined by a 16-piece orchestra, a rock quartet and a female choir dressed in orange jumpsuits.

Lastly, the Red Hot Chili Peppers ended the night with a performance from their award winning album "Stadium Arcadium." The band's bassist Flea took the stage dressed in a yellow basketball jersey, while Anthony Kiedis and John Frusciante sported street tuxedos during their performance of "Snow (Hey Oh)." The Red Hot Chili Peppers took home four Grammys including, Best Rock Performance by a duo or group, Best Rock Song "Dani California" and Best Rock Album, which prompted band member, Chad Smith, to speak up during the acceptance speech and say, "We need more rock bands." The performance was completed by a magical and colorful shower of confetti over the stage and the audience.

Mandy Thomas can be reached at ajthomas@student.umass.edu

49TH Annual GRAMMY AWARD NOTABLE WINNERS

Album of the Year: "Taking the Long Way," Dixie Chicks.

Record of the Year: "Not Ready to Make Nice," Dixie Chicks.

Song of the Year: "Not Ready to Make Nice," Martie Maguire, Natalie Maines, Emily Robison and Dan Wilson (Dixie Chicks).

New Artist: Carrie Underwood.

Female R&B Vocal Performance: "Be Without You," Mary J. Blige

Pop Vocal Album: "Continuum," John Mayer

Pop Collaboration With Vocals: "For Once in My Life," Tony Bennett and Stevie Wonder.

Country Album: "Taking the Long Way," Dixie Chicks.

Rap Album: "Release Therapy," Ludacris

Rock Album: "Stadium Arcadium," Red Hot Chili Peppers.

R&B Album: "The Breakthrough," Mary J. Blige

Producer of the Year, Non-Classical: Rick Rubin.

Traditional Pop Vocal Album: "Duets: an American Classic," Tony Bennett

Female Pop Vocal Performance: "Ain't No Other Man," Christina Aguilera.

Male Pop Vocal Performance: "Waiting on the World to Change," John Mayer

Pop Performance by a Duo or Group With Vocal: "My Humps," Black Eyed Peas

Pop Instrumental Performance: "Mornin'," George Benson (& Al Jarreau)

Pop Instrumental Album: "Fingerprints," Peter Frampton.

Rock Instrumental Performance: "The Wizard Turns On ... " the Flaming Lips

Rock Song: "Dani California," Flea, John Frusciante, Anthony Kiedis and Chad Smith (Red Hot Chili Peppers);

Solo Rock Vocal Performance: "Someday Baby," Bob Dylan

Cover band recreates Pink Floyd's magic

By Matthew Solomon

The Pink Floyd Experience opened up their Sunday night show at Northampton's Calvin Theater by creating a powerful rumble of rattled bass guitar, static and feedback slamming their audience which consisted of many college Floyd fans some space cadets among kids, and grandparents.

The crowd got a eclectic mix of early "Dark Side of the Moon"-era Pink Floyd album and were impressive in their ability to imitate the original group almost perfectly, note for note. The fleeting Pink Floyd cover band was made up of two guitarists, a drummer, a bassist, a keyboardist and a saxophonist.

However, the band members switched instruments on occasion and included other elements such as tambourines, spacey-psychedelic sound effects and back-up vocals. Tom Quinn, the grizzled veteran of the group, even put down his Fender Stratocaster guitar at one point and proceeded to rock a jaw dropping slide guitar solo. He was able to create pure energy out of thin air on this beautiful instrument.

The band rolled into "Sheep" with a flashy technical improvisational introduction, utilizing auto-wah to control a hypnotic delay effect on the bass guitar, slowly building it into an intense chaotic array of vibrations. The resonating sound of the saxophone brought about an eerie fog that floated through the theater at various points in the show, leaving the crowd wide eyed and speechless. The pinnacle of the concert though, rightfully earning the most applause, was the shockingly audacious "Shine on You Crazy Diamond."

At this point the crowd shifted anxiously in their seats as the music was sprinkled with emotion. The band also had some powerful images displayed on a screen above their heads and they were able to successfully blend them into the performance along with some intense sound effects.

There was a pink pig on the screen for much of the show and at one point they showed a black and white scene depicting a World War II airplane battle. The scene which appeared to be straight out of the Pink Floyd movie The Wall was blended perfectly into the concert's storyline and created a movie theater-like atmosphere amongst the crowd.

Despite the flawless and at times creative performance, the vibe in the Calvin Sunday night was fairly calm. The crowd was quiet and subdued throughout the evening, behaving mostly as if they were watching a classical orchestra rather than a rock band. The dance floor was covered with fold-up chairs and everyone remained seated throughout the concert, staring in awe and soaking up the powerful sounds rather than dancing to the vibrant rhythms. The average fan was wearing a black t-shirt and black pants matching appropriately the gloomy atmosphere that filled the theater. The Sunday night time slot was very appropriate for this tired crowd of rock'n'roll veterans, in which many of whom seemed to have grown out of their partying days and matured to a life of kids and responsibilities.

Some of the other songs that were played included Pink Floyd classics such as "Another brick in the wall Part Two," "In the Flesh" and "Have a cigar." The band put into every song as much energy as they could possibly muster up but they seemed slightly withdrawn at some points during the show, possibly in response to the crowd's mellow reaction.

The boys from San Diego, California definitely brought their A-game to Northampton, yet unfortunately the overall vibe in the show still felt more like a movie theater than a live concert venue. There was very little crowd-performer interaction; however, the band was able to interact with each other very well. As a group they were very musically tight and brought a justly positive Southern California energy to the show. They shone through each track flawlessly, recreating each classic tune to its fullest extent.

However, I believe that the band should have included more improvisation throughout their performance in general. There were very few surprises incorporated into their music because they were very intent on recreating each song exactly the way Pink Floyd had originally recorded them. This made for a fairly predictable concert, even a little boring, despite the fact that the band was extremely talented.

Mathew Solomon can be reached at msolomon@student.umass.edu.

The Pink Floyd Experience recreated songs from many of Pink Floyd's albums, but lacked improvisation .

Leonard's exhibit a bundle of emotion

By Leighanne Noonan
Collegian Correspondent

Zoe Leonard's latest project, "Analogue" conquers holding an array of images but doesn't always succeed at capturing their memories.

Leonard spoke on her project at the third annual Kivie Denison Fieldman Lecture at Smith College last night. Dually sponsored by the college's art department and program for the Study of Women and Gender, the talk was an opportunity for the photographer to display her work before the exhibit's opening in May.

Leonard started shooting for this project almost ten years ago in her native home of New York City. Her focus stems from her desire to capture a "home" that she saw fading fast. In her travels around the world and her years in one place, Leonard saw the world moving quickly, saw the forces of globalization creating new images and destroying many of the past. She strove to both record what the world was losing while documenting its developments.

In an exhibit that will house over 350 images, Leonard organized three major movements. The first wave focuses on her home, New York City. Leonard then moves on to what she called the stage of the "bundles." Bundles, stacks, boxes, piles of products that have no home, they cannot be attributed to only one place as they travel the globe, crossing state and cultural lines, an impersonal commodity. For Leonard, the bundles represented the transference of images around the world and how those images have a presence in her home.

In her final organizational stage Leonard examined what she called the "half life of our iconography." In tracing the iconography of her home in other parts of the world Leonard recognizes that there is a both "strong homogenization and a strong visual resistance."

The messages that Leonard strives for are evident in the actual images. Her display shows both her range as a photographer and the range of images available to her. From black and white to color, from close ups of words such as "diesel" to long shots of storefronts papered with coca-cola advertisements, Leonard captures a world that can be appreciated anywhere. Her cohesiveness in framing certain shots and placement of surprising visual arrangements makes the entire exhibit interesting to view.

While all her images are both similar and distinctly unique, there are certain photographs that, as Leonard put it, "hold the project within." There are certain images that show the resistance to globalization, the half-life of iconography, the emotions associated with familiarity and home. There are images "that make the audience realize that it's "not just my scene that is changing, that there is a relation to the global interactions we have" said Leonard.

It is these images that seem to invoke the most interest and emotion.

Leighanne Noonan can be reached at lnoonan@email.smith

EXTROVERTS WANTED UMASS AMHERST IS IN SEARCH OF

TOUR GUIDES

1. Lead campus tours for students and families interested in the UMass Amherst Campus.
2. Paid hourly position with a minimum commitment of 5 hours a week including some weekends.
3. Serve as panel speakers, hosts, and tour leaders at on and off campus yield activities such as Open Houses and Accepted Student Receptions.
4. Conduct informational interviews with prospective students and their families.

UMASS AMHERST

To find out more about the position or to pick up an application visit us at the Campus Center Concourse on January 29th & 30th or February 12th - 16th, 2007. Applications are also available at the Visitors Center. Application deadline is February 16th, 2007

Mass Attack still in hunt for postseason

HOCKEY from page 12

crowd, especially because the vulgar chants weren't repeated.

"I thought the response was pretty good. The students were certainly great all night," Cahoon said.

Key cog returns

After missing games against BC and UMass Lowell, sophomore winger Chris Davis returned to the UMass lineup. Cahoon remained uncertain of Davis' status last Wednesday.

During the games against the Eagles and River Hawks, Cahoon placed sophomore Alex Berry in Davis' place. That line struggled, recording just two points in those games – a goal for Capraro against UML and an assist for Quirk against BC.

But the usual line of Quirk-Davis-Capraro reunited against BU and PC. Although the numbers stayed the same (Capraro had an assist against each team), Quirk and Capraro appeared more comfortable paired with Davis.

On the Mark

Senior Mark Matheson's goal with 40 seconds left against Providence on Saturday night was special for two reasons: 1) because it earned UMass a conference point and 2) because his father was there to witness it.

"This year he's going to get down three times – for the last weekend for senior night," Matheson said.

The elder Matheson, Ken, usually makes the trip down from Alberta, Canada once or twice a year to see his son play. UMass' postgame press conference saw Mark, Cahoon and Will Ortiz debate when Matheson's father made the trip earlier in the season.

It could have been the opening weekend, or the New Hampshire-Maine series earlier in the season or perhaps the game against UVM before just before Thanksgiving – the issue was never resolved.

"[My parents] get down twice a year, usually," Matheson said in conclusion.

Postseason picture pretty blurry

UMass sat alone in fifth place entering the weekend. But the one conference point – out of a possible four – dropped the Minutemen down one spot to sixth. Currently the Mass Attack finds itself one point behind Vermont, and two points behind the third-place tie between BC and Maine.

If the postseason started this weekend the Minutemen would be traveling to Boston and face the Eagles. BC holds the head-to-head tiebreaker with the Black Bears, 1-0.

Maine and BC face each other Thursday night, while Vermont and UMass meet in Burlington this weekend.

Slip-sliding

The less-than-stellar weekend also dropped the Minutemen in the national polls. They were at No. 17, but now find themselves at No. 19 in the USCHO.com/CSTV Top 20.

Jon Pelland can be reached at jpelland@student.umass.edu

Freshman Brett Watson had his first multi-point game against UNH on Jan. 20. The center has four points on the season, all assists.

Pair of young aces leads UM

Senior Candice Molinari leads the team in batting average after five games with a .538 average on seven hits in 13 at-bats and also has a team-high .615 slugging percentage. The centerfielder was an All-American last year with a .388 batting average, 50 runs scored and 25 stolen bases.

SOFTBALL from page 12

her young athletes getting loads of attention from the media, and this new episode is no different. Sortino expressed her concern for Mollica before the weekend. After five games in three days, Sortino said her young third baseman is taking it all in stride.

"I think Whitney is doing what Whitney has always done for us," Sortino said. "For her it's about the team. It's about putting the team in a position to win."

It's not often a coach asks her slugger to drop a bunt to move a runner, but Sortino has Mollica do just that because she knows the sophomore is willing to do anything to win.

"She's been called upon to sacrifice [bunt] about five or six times in five games," Sortino said. "She puts the bunt down better than anybody else does. She gets her RBIs when we need it, the ball for a sacrifice fly. She's doing what every great player does, and it's totally and completely unselfish. She does whatever the team needs her to do. You can't ask for more from a kid."

Pitching in

UMass will be depending on solid pitching this season from a very young staff. Sophomore ace Brandice Balschmiter returns as last year's A-10 Pitcher of the Year. She had a solid weekend, going 1-1 with an ERA of just 0.37. She gave up one earned run in three games, striking out 15 and walking four.

"I thought [Saturday] she pitched good enough to win," Sortino said. "It certainly wasn't a stellar performance from her, and she'd be the first one to tell you that."

Saturday Balschmiter shut out No. 10 California in the 1-0 upset. She gave up four hits, striking out six and walking three en route to the Minutewomen's first victory of the season.

Balschmiter's teammate in the circle, freshman Bailey Sanders, also had a good first outing. She battled her way through a close game on Friday against UCSB and gave her team a chance to win in the final inning.

Saturday, she returned to the circle and dominated a strong San Diego State team holding the Aztecs to a single run in the Maroon and White's 10-1 blow out.

Sanders had a 3.23 ERA while giving up six earned runs. She gave up 12 walks and struck out seven batters in two starts.

Defense getting better

Last year the Achilles' heel of the Minutewomen was their sloppy defensive play that failed to support Balschmiter when she was hit in a number of key situations.

UMass committed 90 errors last season in 57 games, nearly two per game and 12 more than its opponents committed. Sortino has stated since last year that defensive improvement would be a priority entering this year, and she was satisfied with how her team played the ball over the weekend.

"For the first weekend out, I think we're taking much better care of the softball," Sortino said.

The team committed eight errors in five games, so statistically the defense played about the same as last year's averages, but Sortino attributed much of that to getting reacquainted to a real diamond after practicing in Boyden Gym.

Jeremy Rice can be reached at jcrice@student.umass.edu

Like sports?!! Come write for us!! sports@dailycollegian.com

ALUMNI ASSOCIATION

Thousands of Dollars in Scholarships Available!

The UMass Amherst Alumni Association is proud to offer the following scholarships:

Leaders in the Making Scholarship
Four $2,000 scholarships given to promising sophomores and juniors with diverse records of achievement in scholarship and volunteerism.

Life Member Scholarship for Internships
One $2,000 scholarship given to a sophomore or junior to help defray the cost of a summer internship.

Michael W. Morris Scholarship
One $2,000 scholarship given to a student from Lawrence or Lowell, MA. The scholarship is in honor of Lawrence native and longtime UMass Amherst champion, Michael W. Morris '63.

Senior Leadership Award
Twenty-five $500 savings bonds will be given to graduating seniors who have demonstrated outstanding leadership and service to the university community. Students must be nominated by faculty or staff.

DEADLINE FOR MOST SCHOLARSHIPS IS FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 23, 2007.
For scholarship eligibility and applications, visit UMassAlumni.com/students

You were. You are. UMASS.

HAMPSHIRE FITNESS club

90 Gatehouse Rd. (At Echo Hill)
Amherst • 256-6446
Off Rte. 9, two miles east of Amherst College
OPEN 6AM-10AM MON-FRI
8AM-9PM SAT & SUN

★Swimming ★Tennis
★Basketball ★Fitness

HURRY SPECIAL ENDS WEDNESDAY 2/15 OVER 30 FREE CLASSES WEEKLY

HAMPFIT.COM for Rates & Info

Join Now
Winter Special
$188/ 15 Weeks
Student Rate
EFT available

Lasme targeted as legitimate NBA player

Stephane Lasme became just the third player in NCAA history to record three triple-doubles in a season during UMass' 77-55 win over URI on Thursday. He ranks third on the Minutemen in scoring with 13.3 points per game.

GREENFIELD from page 12

was drafted by the Detroit Pistons in 1995 but played just two seasons in the league, averaging just two points per game. Only two players sniffed the pros after Roe – Lari Ketner and A.J. Wydner – and both players fizzled out shortly after their entrance.

Ketner, who averaged 12.2 points and seven rebounds per game in four seasons as a Minuteman, played for three different NBA teams in as many seasons before exiting the league for good after the 2000-01 season. Ketner averaged just 1.4 points per game during his short-lived NBA career.

So that leaves Stephane Lasme with a Sisyphean task on his plate. Only six UMass players before him have gone on to the NBA, and the pros are harder to reach now because of the sheer athleticism of the players.

But all signs have shown that Lasme has the body build and the determination to overwhelm all of the obstacles.

The big man from Gabon is 6-foot-8, 220 pounds, and plays every night of basketball like it was his last, pushing himself to the absolute limit every time he steps on the floor.

It's a big time cliché, but in Lasme's case, it truly applies. There aren't many players that give 100 percent mental and physical effort on the basketball court, but there is no doubt that Lasme does it.

And he does it with class and humility. Lasme has blocked his fair share of opponents' shots over his four-year career, but not once has berated or taunted an opponent with a finger-wave or meaningless trash talk.

There are three home games left in the Minutemen's season, and if you happen to stop by, just watch Lasme in the second half. If it's a close game, he'll have played a lot of minutes, and the sweat will be dripping off of his face like he just got hit with some heavy rainfall.

Lasme moves around the court with no regard for his body or his opponents', leaping and reaching and sprinting and dunking with all of the energy that's left in his skinny limbs.

His performance in the Minutemen's 77-55 win over Rhode Island at the Mullins Center was defensive art – the work of a man who can completely dominate the game without dominating the basketball, and those types of players come few and far between.

Lasme had a triple-double against URI (18 points, 12 rebounds, 11 blocks), his third of the season, putting him with just seven other players in NCAA history who have accomplished the same feat.

So it's no surprise that he's getting looks from NBA teams now.

But here's the hard truth: no one really knows. There are college players who seem like sure-fire hits in the big time and sign long-term deals only to disappoint and frustrate.

And then there are guys like Lasme who reside on the border between fortune and failure. Lasme will not be a superstar on the professional stage, but he could contribute some significant minutes off of the bench somewhere down the road.

We don't know how Stephane Lasme will fair after he leaves UMass. But one thing is certain. He is a special player who has nearly completed his career assault on the UMass record books, and Lasme will play just three more times at the Mullins Center before moving on.

The block party is almost over, so get down there and watch him while he's here in Amherst. You might never see a Minuteman like Stephane Lasme again.

Rob Greenfield can be reached at rgreenfi@student.umass.edu.

Prepare yourself for March Madness

Rob Greenfield

I'm in heaven right now.

The Boston Celtics have lost 18 in a row and are a pathetic 12-38 on the season – perfect for one of the worst franchises in professional sports – and college basketball is entering March Madness, which will end in a glorious tournament that trumps all other major sporting events in this country.

So here are some observations about what has recently transpired in the world of college basketball.

1. Actually, this isn't really about the NCAA Tournament, but if Georgetown's Greg Oden and Kansas' Kevin Durant, so it is somewhat appropriate. I don't know why there is even a discussion on who will have a greater impact in the NBA or who will get chosen first in the draft.

Kevin Durant. The kid is the prototypical NBA player. He's 6-foot-9, 225 pounds. He's lanky, can come from the post, shoot from 3-point land and score off the dribble. Twenty years ago, I would've argued on Oden's behalf. But the NBA doesn't need another big men who make no impact changing impact, so I don't think Oden will be the guy to lead a franchise to a title. Durant, at a lesser extent, will have more problems.

Drawing to the obvious choice here ...

2. Duke is out of the Top 25 for the first time since the 1996 season. Finally. I was afraid that the Associated Press wouldn't get its Coach-K-is-the-greatest blinders off. Glad they did. Maybe they won't make the NCAA Tournament. That'd be even better. Here's hoping to no Blue Devils in March.

3. I'm rooting for Boston College now. When Sean Williams was on the team, I loathed the Eagles. Williams was a slacker, and didn't play hard unless the spotlight was hot or there were NBA scouts at practice. Al Skinner's last-to-show-up, first-to-leave coaching didn't help my sentiment's either, but I always liked Jared Dudley.

Now the team is blue collar. The Eagles have stormed back from Williams' suspension to become No. 21 in the country and one of just two Atlantic Coast Conference teams in the Top 25. Dudley is the underappreciated talent trying to prove everybody wrong. They have me hooked in.

4. Why would UCLA schedule West Virginia in the out-of-conference portion of its season? It doesn't make any sense. The Mountaineers are annually impressive under head coach John Beilein and they are almost always around come March. WVU wasn't in the Top 25 when the Bruins played them (they are now) but it seems counterproductive to schedule a team that's capable of beating any team in the nation in the out-of-conference portion of the schedule. UCLA paid for it with a loss.

5. There are only two teams left that have gone undefeated in conference play. Memphis and Florida. John Calipari is at it again with the boys in blue, posting an 11-0 record in Conference USA and a 21-3 overall record. Memphis' only losses came to Georgia Tech at home and Tennessee and Arizona on the road.

Florida's undefeated conference record is somewhat more impressive, considering that both Kentucky and Alabama are ranked. But the SEC is not the best college basketball conference in the nation like some predicted it would be. Alabama, Mississippi State, Mississippi and LSU are not the powerhouses that the analysts expected. No team is challenging Florida for supremacy of the conference (Kentucky had a chance the other night but buckled at the start of the game and lost by three).

The Big Ten is the best college basketball conference simply because of Ohio State and Wisconsin, both 10-1 against conference opponents although you could make an argument for the Pac-10, which has four teams in the Top 25, but UCLA and Washington State aren't the equals of Wisconsin and Ohio State. Bo Ryan has the Badgers on course for a No. 1 seed in the NCAA Tournament and has lost just two games on the year (one was a slip up at Missouri State earlier in the season and the other was an understandable road loss to the ranked Indiana Hoosiers).

Ohio State is 22-3 and has NBA definite Greg Oden on the interior averaging over 14 points per game. The Buckeyes also have three other players averaging double digits in points per game to balance Oden's inside presence. The Buckeyes, however, could not keep up with Florida, North Carolina and Wisconsin (their three losses this season) and lost to the Gators by a hefty 26 points. If any of the top five teams last long enough to get a matchup with the Buckeyes in the tournament, you'll be talking about Oden and the NBA sooner than you think.

6. The Atlantic 10 has become the symbol of mediocrity over the last two months. With once prestigious teams like George Washington, Xavier, Saint Joseph's, Temple, Dayton and Charlotte (previously an annual NCAA contender in Conference USA), the A-10 has now moved into the muck and mire of college basketball. Only one team from the A-10 will make the NCAA Tournament this season, and from what has happened so far, the odds are on Xavier, George Washington, UMass or Rhode Island. There are three teams atop the conference with three losses each (URI, UMass, Xavier), and two more teams with four losses (GW, SJU). Saint Louis was dubbed as a contender in the conference, but the Billikens have limped to a 5-5 conference record, tied with Dayton, Fordham, Duquesne and Temple with five A-10 losses.

Xavier was supposed to run away with the entire thing and was ranked in the Top 25 earlier in the season before losing to Saint Joseph's, Saint Louis and Duquesne in the conference. The Musketeers played a tough non-conference schedule, but couldn't pull off any big wins against Creighton, Cincinnati or Alabama. A victory in any one of those games would have caught the eye of the NCAA selection committee, but the Musketeers came up short and have sunken further as conference play drags on.

Have fun preparing for the best basketball event on the planet. I know I will.

Rob Greenfield can be reached at rgreenfi@student.umass.edu

It is being reported that Paul Pierce suffered a hip injury in Sunday night's loss to the Timberwolves. It marked the Celtics' 18th straight loss.

Celtics need to plan for future by losing

PICARD from page 12

Boston area kindly, so why should you believe the stage will be different at Madison Square Garden on June 28?

I'm not here to tell you to pack up the minivan with a couple of 30 racks and your Al Jefferson Hathead and drive to the Big Apple for Draft day. I'm just saying this is the plan, whether you like it or not.

In the organization's recent history, the Celtics have always been too good to lose, but not good enough to win. Get my drift?

From 2002 to 2005, Boston has advanced to the playoffs. And despite an exciting run in which they lost to New Jersey in six games in the 2002 Eastern Conference Finals, the Celtics never stood a chance.

They were swept by the same Nets team in the 2003 Eastern Conference semifinals, and were eliminated in the first round in back-to-back seasons by the Indiana Pacers in 2004 and 2005.

The plan during those years was to win. Just look at the trade for Ricky Davis in 2003-04, and Antoine Walker's return in 2004-05. The Davis trade was a sign that Danny Ainge wanted to convert from a Jim O'Brien-like defensive organization to an up-tempo Phoenix Suns-like team.

The decision to bring Walker back at the trade deadline in 2005 got Boston over the hump, winning 18 of its last 27 games and grabbing the No. 3 seed in the playoffs.

Seven games later, Celtics fans found themselves in no man's land once again. And there simply seemed to be no point to that trade, as Ainge later sent Toine packing to Miami in exchange for three guys we may never lay eyes on.

You might not like to admit it, but bringing Walker back got plenty of fans to jump back on board the "green line." His presence catapulted the Celtics to a division title, and kept the organization's thoughts on the present.

And where did that leave them?

Nowhere.

That was the plan then. Since then, everything on Causeway Street has changed, other than a Joe Thornton return (which by the way would only be a good thing for the Bruins, but that's for a different time.)

The plan now is based on the future, as well it should be.

As much a competitor as Paul Pierce is, the Celtics would be crazy not to convince him to take a little vacation with Greg Oden and Kevin Durant on the horizon. I can see the commercials now. Danny Ainge calling Oden into his office to explain why he chose "Lucky" as the No. 1 pick instead.

The battle for last place may not be something each organization will speak of publicly, but behind closed doors "How do we get Oden or Durant" conversations must be taking place.

The answer to that question is simple. Continue to make Pierce sit. Continue to let the young guns learn. Continue to lose.

So take your pick Boston, Oden or Durant?

And take your seat, Paul, the Celtics don't need you quite yet. It's not something you want to do. It's something you need to do. It's the only option.

It's the Truth.

Danny Picard can be reached at dpicard@student.umass.edu

sports@dailycollegian.com

SPRING BREAK '07
JAMAICA
Once you go, you know.
Free Drinks and Meals
Pool Parties
Beach Parties
Jamaica has it all. Let us show you the way:
Sun Splash Tours
800.426.7710
www.sunsplashtours.com
Student Travel Services
800.648.4849
www.ststravel.com

ASIAN ARTS & CULTURE PROGRAM
Taikoza: Japanese Taiko Drums & Dance
FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 16
Taikoza is a Japanese Taiko drum and dance ensemble that uses the deep and powerful rhythms of the Taiko drums, stringed instruments, metal percussion and bamboo flutes to create an electrifying energy and a highly visual musical art form. Drawing from Japan's rich tradition of music and performance, Taikoza has created an original and high energy sound that transcends national boundaries.
Concert Hall at 7:30pm
Tickets: $20, $18, $15
Youth (17 & under) and Five College Students: $17, $15, $7
www.taikoza.com
UMASS AMHERST
www.finearts center.com/asian TICKETS 1-800-999-UMAS or 545-2511

FRUSTRATED? PUZZLED? DO YOU HAVE:
A grade dispute?
Teacher, roomate or job concerns?
Billing problems?
...or any other University related problems?
THE OMBUDS OFFICE CAN HELP
(confidentially, of course)
Serving the students, faculty, and staff of the Umass Community
823 Campus Center
Office Hours: 8:00 a.m. - 5:00 p.m.
Telephone: 413 - 545 - 0867
fax: 413 - 545 - 9720
e-mail: ombuds@ombuds.umass.edu

Seven O's
Every Wednesday:
♦ KARAOKE ♦
Every Thursday:
♦ OPEN MIC ♦
♦ LIVE MUSIC ♦
Friday, February 16th, 2007:
80 PROOF
Saturday February 17th, 2007:
FOUR ON THE FLOOR
♦ STUDENT BAND WANTED ♦
Route 116, 330 Amherst Rd Sunderland, MA 01375 (413) 665-8788
3 PM to 1 AM M-F
1 PM to 1 AM Saturday
Next To Cliffside Apts.

Free Delivery to UMass
Menu Online @ andiamo.cc

2		3	8	7	9
				5			9
1			4	2				7
		1				6	8
				1
	2	4				1
4				9	2			6
	9			8
			6	3	1	5		9

Quote of the Day

"Hell hath no fury like a woman's scorn for Sega."
-Jason Lee in "Mallrats"

Paul By Billy O'Keefe

I'D LIKE TO RETURN THIS NOVELTY MUSCLE PLATE.
OH? WAS THERE A PROBLEM WITH IT?
UH, YEAH — NOBODY BELIEVED IT. I DIDN'T GET A SINGLE GIRL'S PHONE NUMBER LAST NIGHT
ISN'T THAT FOR THE BEST? I MEAN, WHAT WOULD YOU DO IF YOU WERE IN THE THROES OF LOVE, AND THEN SHE SEES YOU'VE GOT FAKE PLASTIC MUSCLES?
I'D EXPLAIN I'M PART MACHINE — PART LOVE MACHINE. SHE'D LAUGH AND LIKE ME SO MUCH FOR MY PERSONALITY THAT IT WOULDN'T MATTER. GIRLS LOVE HUMOR.
WELL I'M A GIRL, AND I DON'T FIND THAT VERY ALLURING.
THERE'S A WHOLE POSE TO GO WITH IT. TRUST ME, IT'S AWESOME. YOU MISSED OUT!

A College Girl Named Joe By Aaron Warner

THANKS FOR COMING ALONG WITH ME TO SHOP FOR MY WEDDING DRESS, JOE.
OH, I LOVE IT! IT'S SO EXCITING!
DRESS SALE 50% OFF
BESIDES, I ONLY HAD ONE CLASS TODAY, AND IT'S SO BORING I DON'T MIND SKIPPING. I'M SURE I'M NOT MISSING ANYTHING.
GOOD MORNING, CLASS. TODAY'S MODEL IS JOHNNY DEPP.

Welcome To Falling Rock National Park By Josh Shaler

I'm So sick of this Park
I feel trapped There's nothing to do
I FEEL LIKE A MONK
You're Such a precious little mont.
You aren't listening

Two Dudes By Aaron Warner

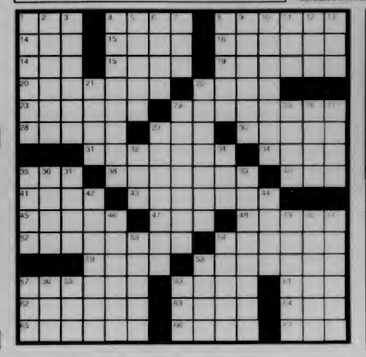
THIS IS ONE OF THE BEST MEALS YOU'VE EVER MADE.
THERE'S NO DIRT, NO HAIR, AND IT'S NOT LEAVING STAINS ON THE TABLE!
WE SHOULD USE PLATES MORE OFTEN.

ACROSS
1 GP group
4 Talon
8 Wake of a scythe
14 Sodom fleer
15 Bad financial situation
16 Hiding places
17 In favor of
18 Good gracious!
19 Kitchen tools
20 Active involvement
22 Possess
23 Warnings
24 Tending to correct
28 Family car
29 Prohibit
30 Ziegfeld Follies, e.g.
31 Christmas burner
34 Satisfy fully
35 Period
38 Adds up
40 Also not
41 Actress Miles
43 Arizona's ___ Desert
45 Watery swelling
47 Quitting event
48 Fails to win
52 Bad 'uns
54 Waterborne
55 Always
56 Worn ornaments
57 Humiliated
60 Bombay wrap
61 $ dispenser
62 Therapeutic
63 Jennings or Ludwig
64 Greek X
65 Contents of a will
66 Cain's victim
67 Storm center

DOWN
1 Greek letters
2 Group's level of optimism
3 Made amends
4 Reddish-brown horse
5 Corporate IDs
6 Greenspan or Ladd
7 Married
8 Go away quickly
9 Deferment
10 Gives consent
11 Definite article
12 "I Saw ___ Again Last Night"
13 Double bend
21 Sturdy cart
22 Female lead
24 Recovers from a setback
25 Lendl of tennis
26 Model T, e.g.
27 Sly look
29 Harp on
32 Track circuit
33 Obtain
35 12/24 and 12/31
36 Decorate again
37 Region
39 Stubborn determination
42 Loss of memory
44 Pineapple brand
46 Arrival
49 Consolation
50 Hearty and natural
51 Thwart
53 Marsh grass
54 Lofty nest
56 Doorway part
57 Hole-in-one
58 Public conveyance
59 Knack
60 Aegean or Caspian

Find all of today's puzzle solutions online!
WWW.DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

THE HARP
SPECIALS!
Honey Brown, Molson
$2.00 a pint / $6.50 a pitcher
TONIGHT • Trivia Night
WED • Open Mic Night (all are welcome)
Pizza 'til midnight 7 days a week
Voted best Neighborhood bar East of the River 2005 & 2006 Valley Advocate Readers Poll
DC/MC/AE All credit cards accepted
163 Sunderland Rd · N. Amherst
Just north of the apartments
413-549-6900 www.theharp.net



Submit your comics!
collegiancomics@yahoo.com
Submit your classifieds!
(413) 545-3500

Horoscopes

aquarius Jan. 20-Feb. 18
Inhalation of cadmium causes gangrene of the testes. AVOID CADMIUM!

pisces Feb. 19-Mar. 20
No matter what this day brings, if you find time to do a merry jig, it will be stellar.

aries Mar. 21-Apr. 19
Bear Grylls has drank water from elephant dung, somehow this makes him cool.

taurus Apr. 20-May 20
Your cell phone ring completely defines who you are.

gemini May 21-Jun. 21
Bears spend whole seasons simply sleeping yet they remain quite admirable.

cancer Jun. 22-Jul. 22
If you want to walk on the moon, you must first learn how to walk.

leo Jul. 23-Aug. 22
You're blessed with the gift of a double jointed brain. Odd, but extremely flexible.

virgo Aug. 23-Sept. 22
The tighter the jeans, the bigger the bulge.

libra Sept. 23-Oct. 22
You are a gaping cavity in the mouth of society.

scorpio Oct. 23-Nov. 21
Candles can be relaxing, but they can also melt your flesh, so be careful kiddies.

sagittarius Nov. 22-Dec. 21
Tiny fairies are hiding in your lunch. Throw your meal on the floor to vanquish them.

capricorn Dec. 22-Jan. 19
Remember, if used in the correct context, pillaging is not necessarily a bad thing.

On this campus, there exists a secret club filled with joy, wonder, happiness and an overwhelming feeling of ecstacy. Submit a comic and all of this can be yours.

collegiancomics@yahoo.com

Massachusetts Daily Collegian Marketplace

Announcements

Global Express Tours Spring Break Montreal Party Weekends from $99 Complete bus, hotels, & clubs. Montrealexpress.net 781-979-9001

Valentine's Day Gift to You! FREE! Workout plans, Nutrution Guides, Exercise Plans, Diet Analysis PLUS! Find Local Gym Singles HOMEAND CAMPUS.COM

Apartment for Rent

Center of town, 1,2,3 bedrooms hardwood floors. NOW SHOWING for JUNE and SEPTEMBER. NO FEES www.amherstlincolnrealty.com 253-7879

Employment

Rent us your ears! Listening Experiments $10/hr English must be your first language. Email: phonetics_lab@linguist.umass.edu voicemail: 545-6837

Bartending $300/day potential. No experience necs. Training provided. 1-800-965-6520 ext.162

Dell Campus Reps Needed Promote a top 30 company to gain real-world business & marketing experience! www.repnation.com/dell to apply.

Employment

Become a summer orientation counselor and make a difference in the lives of over 4000 new students. Additional information and applications can be found at www.umass.edu/newstudent/contact/student-jobs/counselor The application deadline is February 16, 2007

Winter/ Spring positions available. Earn up to $150 per day Exp not required. Undercover shoppers needed To Judge Retail and Dining Establishments. Call 800-722-4791

House for Rent

Northampton Cath-edral ceiling, sky-lites, hardwood floors, 4-5 bdrms. 9/1 $1950. 413-730-6660

Services

Pregnancy Testing, HIV Testing, Birth Control, and Emer-gency Contraception. STI Screening and Treatment. Affordable and confidential. Tapestry Health, 27 Pray Street, Amherst. 548-9992. www.tapestryhealth.com

Services

Call Someone who really cares. Birthright of Amherst Area 549-1906, 1800-550-4900 24 hour hotline Free Pregnancy test 233 N. Pleasant St. Amherst www.birthright.org

Travel

Global Express Tours Spring Break Montreal Party Weekends from $99 Complete bus, hotels, & clubs. Montreal express.net 781-979-9001

Wanted

EGG DONORS NEEDED $10,000 (Plus all expenses) We are seeking women who are attractive, under the age of 29, SAT 1300+ (math+verbal), Physically fit and maintaining a healthy lifestyle. If you have a desire to help an infertile family and would like more information please contact us. Email: Darlene@aperfectmatch.com www.aperfectmatch.com 1-800-264-8828

www.dailycollegian.com

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

SPORTS TUESDAY

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 13, 2007 SPORTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

White Out Night a success

Sophomore Cory Quirk (above) added to his point totals with an assist against Boston University on David Leaderer's second period goal in the 3-2 loss. Quirk is the Minutemen' second-leading scorer with 23 points on 10 goals and 13 assists. U Mass is currently sixth in Hockey East, one point behind Vermont.

Near-record crowd fills Mullins, keeps it clean

BY JON PELLAND
COLLEGIAN STAFF

As anticipated, the Massachusetts hockey team's annual White Out Night was a success on Friday night. The fan turnout was the second-highest in Mullins Center history — 7,240 people witnessed the Minutemen (13-10-5, 10-8-3, Hockey East) lose an exciting 3-2 contest to Boston University.

The most fans to see UMass on its home ice was 8,373 in 2004 against Boston College — the Eagles won that game 5-2. In fact, the Mass Attack, dating back to Dec. 1, 1995, is 1-4 in games in which it has drawn at least 7,000 fans.

UMass Hockey

Add away games, and the Minutemen's record in front of 7,000+ drops to 2-10-1. UMass' wins came against BC last season, at home, and against Nebraska-Omaha on the road on Nov. 7, 1997.

But the Maroon and White faithful came out in full force on Friday, despite the loss. Even BU coach Jack Parker said he was impressed with the crowd.

"The crowd they had last time [BU was in Amherst] was nowhere near what they had tonight," he said. "I thought it was terrific tonight for the program, terrific for Toot [Cahoon] and for the league."

CROWD ETIQUETTE

Profanity is nothing new around the Mullins Center, or any other sports arena for that matter. Many of the classic chants at hockey games involve language your mother wouldn't approve of, but UMass hockey coach Don Cahoon is OK with that. He just doesn't like it when the fans cross the line.

"I know there are some swears that are used in certain cheers, like the penalty situation, but I didn't hear the gross vulgarity that I had heard a couple of weeks ago when BU was here," he said. "[The fans] have to understand there is a fine line … I have a 6-year old granddaughter that comes to the games.

"The gross vulgarity is something that I'd like to do away with."

The vulgar language Cahoon referred to was directed at BU goaltender John Curry. Throughout that game, the UMass student section shouted a chant involving Curry's mother.

Before the puck dropped on Friday, Cahoon addressed the crowd, asking the fans in attendance to cheer on the Minutemen, but in good-natured fashion.

After the game, he said he was pleased with the

See HOCKEY on page 9

Lasme has sights set on future in NBA

UMass power forward Stephane Lasme is a legitimate NBA prospect. How many times do you get to say that about someone who plays for UMass? Not very often, if ever.

Not even the best college basketball programs in the nation have NBA prospects every year. But you have one playing at the Mullins Center. Right in your backyard.

Rob Greenfield

There are only six players in UMass history to play in the NBA. Julius Erving played 35 games for the Minutemen and graduated in 1972, leaving for the American Basketball Association's Virginia Squires.

Erving played for the Squires for two years, averaging 27.2 points per game before signing with the New York Nets in 1974 and eventually moving on to the NBA's Philadelphia 76ers in 1976, where he stayed for the rest of his career.

Erving is obviously the most successful UMass basketball player in history, followed by the likes of Al Skinner (who played with Erving on the New York Nets in 1974 and 1975) and Marcus Camby.

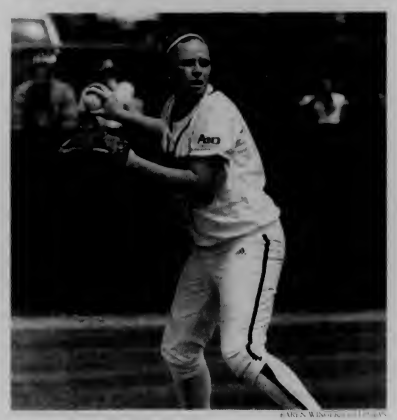
Camby has led a tumultuous NBA career after leaving UMass in the wake of a financial scandal and entered the draft tabbed as a long-term impact player.

The Toronto Raptors drafted Camby for the 1996-97 NBA season and he averaged 14.8 points per game, the most he has averaged for a single season in his career. It was on to New York for four years and Denver for another four, but Camby has never really achieved the popularity and widespread admiration that he enjoyed as a Minuteman.

UMass star forward Lou Roe

See GREENFIELD on page 10

UM has solid start to season



Junior Stacy Cullington hit the first home run of the season for the Minutewomen. The middle infielder hit five homers last year.

BY JEREMY RICE
COLLEGIAN STAFF

There were plenty of storylines heading into the Massachusetts softball team's opening weekend in San Diego. The Minutewomen entered Friday's game against UC Santa Barbara as the No. 23/24 team in the country.

They broke into the polls late last season when they swept through the Women's College World Series Regionals at home and came one game from reaching the WCWS for just the fourth time in the program's history.

UMass Softball

They have a young pitcher who's still learning. They have another young pitcher just breaking in. And their best offensive player from last year drew a mountain of attention over the offseason and comes in with high expectations surrounding her.

UMass has plenty on its plate, and the season has barely begun.

MOLLICA DOING IT ALL

Sophomore Whitney Mollica certainly set the bar high for herself last season. The third baseman made it look easy, winning the Atlantic 10 Rookie and Player of the Year awards — the first player ever to achieve the feat.

She led the Minutewomen in nearly every offensive category and led the A-10 in a number of them as well.

She started every game for the Maroon and White, finishing with a .394 batting average, 12 home runs and 61 RBIs. She was tops for the Minutewomen in batting average, slugging percentage, RBIs, doubles, triples, home runs, total bases and sacrifice bunts.

She earned All-America honors and was featured in Sports Illustrated's "Faces in the Crowd" during the summer. Then she was added to the Player of the Year watch list and was a preseason All-American this winter.

UMass coach Elaine Sortino has never been a fan of seeing

See SOFTBALL on page 9

Senior Stephane Lasme had 18 points, 12 rebounds and 11 blocked shots in Thursday's win over Rhode Island at the Mullins Center.

Losing is only answer for Pierce, Celtics

Take your pick Boston, Greg Oden or Kevin Durant?

Those will be the two choices in June if everything goes as planned for the Celtics organization.

"Green 17" took on a whole new meaning after Friday night's loss to the New Jersey Nets. In a phrase that used to refer to the franchise's quest for World Championship No. 17, the Celtics have gone the opposite direction with its most recent 17th and 18th straight losses.

Danny Picard

Boston is now the worst team in the NBA at 12-38, just one less win than the Memphis Grizzlies.

But that's the good news.

The bad news is that Paul Pierce has decided to return from his uncharacteristically long layoff. Pierce went down after the Dec. 20 loss to the Golden State Warriors with a left foot injury. During the 23-game span in which the Celtics' captain was donning nothing but street clothes and a smile, Boston went 2-21.

That's including the game he missed last Tuesday against the Detroit Pistons. Pierce hopped on a plane back to Beantown because of "swelling in his left elbow" and a "low-grade fever."

Now it's being reported that he injured his hip in Sunday night's heartbreaking loss to Minnesota. And whether or not he misses more time because of it may lead to accusations that "the Truth" is telling anything but.

I'm not suggesting that he's faking the latest set of injuries. But the best thing that has happened to Doc Rivers' squad is Pierce being out. Not only are the kids able to get minutes and experience, but the odds of obtaining that coveted No. 1 pick are increasing.

I know some of the thoughts that are running through your head: Len Bias, Tim Duncan, "odds are good but not great." Drafts of the past are not something that has graced the

See PICARD on page 10

Paul Pierce and the Boston Celtics currently hold the worst record in the NBA. The Celtics went 2-21 while he was out with a foot injury.

Not Published

[redacted]

MINUTEMEN TRAVEL TO THE BRONX | PAGE 10

TAIKOZA SET TO HAMMER FAC | PAGE 5

THE MASSACHUSETTS
DAILY COLLEGIAN

NEW ENGLAND'S LARGEST COLLEGE DAILY EST 1890

WINDY : HI: 19 LO: 7 | WWW.DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM | THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 15, 2007

Student tuition and fees to increase in next year

By Eric Athas
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts Administration and Finance Committee gave the green light yesterday for next year's proposed student charges, including a 3.4 percent increase in mandatory fees and tuition, according to a press release.

The Administration and Finance Committee voted on the proposal yesterday and the full Board of Trustees will vote on the proposal on March 14.

During the 2006-07 academic year, the total cost, including room and board, for a resident of Massachusetts to attend UMass Amherst is $16,584, and $26,306 for non-residents. The proposed increase would bump those numbers up to about $17,399 for residents and $26,977 for non-residents.

Money generated by the increase will be used to help fund "utilities and energy, debt service and capital improvements, need-based financial aid, student-life programming, salaries and fringe benefits, and new faculty," states the Student Charges report from yesterday's meeting. Some of the revenue will also be used to provide further aid for students who qualify.

The press release also states that part of this fee hike is a result of the state's funding cuts from earlier in the decade. UMass received funding increases from the state over the past three fiscal years, but "its current-year (Fiscal 2007) state appropriation of $443 million is still lower than the appropriation was in Fiscal Year 2000, when the University received $454 million."

"Our state and our University both need to get their priorities straight," said UMass Student Government Association President Elvis Mendez in a press release. "While Massachusetts now spends more on its prisons than on public higher education, our university administrators are busy giving themselves raises while they tell us that as students, we can handle hundreds of dollars in tuition and fee increases every year."

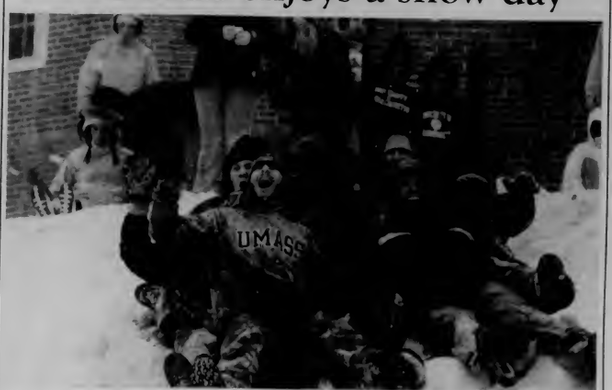
The Student Charges Report states, however, that the University's goal is to limit the increase in mandatory charges to no more than the state's inflation. According to the press release, President Jack M. Wilson's proposed student charges increase does not rise above the local inflation rate of 3.6 percent.

While the University's proposed increase of 3.4 percent is not pleasing for members of the Student Government Association, other schools around the nation could be dealing with much higher charges increases. The University of California system could have a seven percent increase and at Arizona State University, the increase could be as high as 10.4 percent.

At yesterday's meeting, it was also noted that UMass met 91 percent of financial need for students during the 2006-07 academic year. This rate is the highest for any of New England's public university systems.

Eric Athas can be reached at editor@dailycollegian.com

UMass enjoys a snow day



Students spent the day sledding down a hill near the Central Residential Area, after the University of Massachusetts cancelled classes due to the snow which began falling late Tuesday night, and continued throughout the day, yesterday.

UMPD charges 12 more students in riot

By Eric Athas
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts Police Department has filed criminal charges against 12 additional students in connection with the Dec. 15 Southwest riot, according to a press release.

The charges were filed in East Hampshire District Court this morning and more charges against students could be coming, according to a UMass News and Information press release. The names of the students have not yet been released.

The incident occurred following the UMass football team's 28-17 loss to Appalachian State on Dec. 15. After the conclusion of the game, about 1,800 students gathered in the Southwest plaza. Several police officers were injured during the riot and about $100,000 in damage resulted.

The new charges come following an investigation by the UMPD that began immediately following the December incident. Up to this point in the investigation, "55 cases have been completed. Five students have been expelled, 28 suspended and 22 received deferred suspensions. Eight students have been removed from university housing as part of their discipline," states the press release.

The police used a variety of resources to identify new suspects. According to the press release, the UMass police, "built cases by reviewing residence hall entryway video, video and photos from student cell phones, video from cameras mounted on the exteriors of buildings, cell phone records, residence hall swipe-card records, state Registry of Motor Vehicles documents and written statements from witnesses."

In January, Deputy Chief Patrick Archbald said his investigation unit also used images students submitted from Facebook.com and MySpace.com. He said many students came forward with information regarding this case.

"The vast majority of UMass Amherst students do not participate in this type of activity," said spokesman Edward J. Blaguszewski. "And we want to thank the many students who came forward to help our police identify those who were involved."

Eric Athas can be reached at editor@dailycollegian.com.

Rising textbook costs leave students in debt

CD-ROMs, additional book materials add to soaring prices

A press release issued by MassPIRG declares that textbook publishers not disclosing exact prices to professors contributes to the high costs for students.

By Jennifer Hishon
Collegian Staff

The average college student knows that upon graduation they are facing a seemingly endless array of loans that will take years to pay off, and with the increasing costs of tuition, many are asking why they must pay outrageous sums for textbooks.

Every year students are forced to shell out hundreds of dollars for textbooks they will only use for one semester. After college, graduates are forced to struggle with loan payments along with the cost of living.

According to MassPIRG – a statewide non-profit nonpartisan public interest organization committed to environmental protection, good government, and consumer rights, the average student will spend nearly $900 each year just buying textbooks. A press release issued by MassPIRG declares that one of the reasons for high prices on textbooks is because the publishers do not disclose the exact prices to the professors assigning the textbooks to their classes.

One problem is that most of the staff claims they would take prices into consideration when assigning books for classes. Another cause of soaring prices is the practice of bundling textbooks, where additional materials like CD-ROMs come with the textbooks, even if they aren't mandatory for the class.

In addition, the most com-

See TEXTBOOKS on page 3

SOM club teams with airline

American Airlines' University of Massachusetts student representative, John Williams, gave a presentation about the opportunities of interning with the airline to a room of students at UMass' Isenberg School of Management.

By Alana Melanson
Collegian Staff

The recent collaboration with American Airlines was once again the topic of discussion at Tuesday's University of Massachusetts Marketing Club meeting.

The airline's University student representative, John Williams, gave a presentation about the opportunities of interning and working with American Airlines for a full room of curious students in the Isenberg School of Management for the second day in a row.

Thanks to Williams' role as student representative for the company, he was able to help the Marketing Club establish American Airlines as their corporate sponsor, a partnership sure to open up many internship and job opportunities for UMass marketing majors. The advisor of the club, marketing Professor Charles Schewe PhD, also has a son who works for the airline.

For UMass marketing majors, this collaboration means they have a chance at securing one of several possible jobs and internships available around the country, including locations such as Woburn, Mass., where the company's Eastern Division Sales & Marketing office is located, as well as New York, Chicago, Los Angeles, and the airline's home base offices in Dallas and Fort Worth, Tex. American Airlines also offers its employees and interns considerable travel benefits. At the end of the semester, students from the Marketing Club will also get the chance to tour the Forth Worth offices and meet high ranking members of the company.

According to Schewe, the benefits of partnering with American Airlines "can only grow as this project grows." He also noted that the way the School of Management students have been acting and dressing is a sign of their commitment to success.

For the entirety of this school year, Williams is the airline's student representative at UMass, working to "increase brand loyalty and brand awareness," he said, through athlete sponsorship and working with various groups on campus to make better group discounts available to them when they need to travel.

"The best way to reach a large group of diverse people is at

See MARKETING on page 3

Students react to high costs

By Melissa Toulouse
Collegian Staff

Students at the University of Massachusetts are responding to a recent report that reveals the publishing industry is using tactics to inflate the prices of textbooks.

Many students at UMass are paying between $300 and $1,200 for textbooks each year. The recent MassPIRG report cites the methods the publishing industry uses to spike prices.

"Many students are already really struggling to pay their way through college," said Rasheda Vereen, a student with MassPIRG at Amherst College in a recent press release. "The last thing they need is to shell out hundreds of dollars more each year to buy textbooks."

But hundreds of dollars is often what UMass students are forced to pay. Junior kinesiology major Theodore Slowik spent $800. Sophomore sport management major Justin LaFleur spent $300. Junior hospitality and tourism management major Monica Francis spent $900. And they all said they spent too much.

"I went online to look for my books this semester because I was just so irritated with how much I spent last semester," said sophomore english major John Terzenbach. He spent $450 in

See PRICES on page 3

Local businesses lose liquor licenses

By Jamie Mason
Collegian Staff

The state Alcoholic Beverages Control Commission (ABCC) suspended the liquor licenses of four Amherst area businesses for violations which occurred last year, according to an article in The Sunday Republican.

University Liquors, located at 6 University Ave., received an eight-day suspension, which will take affect Feb. 21 to 28, said Rita Petel, the owner.

"IDs are becoming better and harder to catch. According to our list and the machine the ID was real," Petel said. When the customer left the business they were stopped in the parking lot by ABCC, where the real ID was given showing the customer to be underage, Petel said.

University Liquors plans to close their business during their suspension.

"We are doing the best job that we can," she said. "We take away a lot of fake IDs and don't give them back, we are very strict."

This was University Liquors second liquor violation, the first was in 2003 and resulted in fines, not suspension, said Petel.

Arigato Sushi, 11 N. Pleasant St., will have its license suspended for two days, from Feb. 28 to March 1, said an employee who refused to release his name.

"A part-time worker served alcohol without checking an ID, by mistake," said the employee, who escorted The Daily Collegian reporter out of the restaurant after the interview, and demanded the article not get published.

This was Arigato Sushi's first offense and according to the employee, "it's not fair, we are disappointed. Everyone here checks ID."

Delano's, located at 57 N. Pleasant St., was suspended for the fourth time, for six days after a minor was found in possession of alcohol, according to the Republican's article. Delano's will have their liquor license suspended from Feb. 21 to 26, according to the Republican article.

The Moan and Dove, 460B West St., received a four day suspension after it was determined that alcohol was sold to a minor, according to the Republican's article.

Delano's and the Moan and Dove could not be reached for comment.

According to the Republican's article, the ABCC conducted sting operations in November and December of 2006.

Stings are conducted, as stated on the ABCC Web site, "to address the problem of sales to persons under the age of 21."

Jamie Mason can be reached at jlmason@student.umass.edu

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN
CXVII
ISSUE 84

113 Campus Center University of Massachusetts Amherst, MA 01003
• 413-545-3500 •
• Fax 413-545-3699 •
www.dailycollegian.com

EDITOR IN CHIEF Eric Athas
MANAGING EDITOR Rob Greenfield
BUSINESS MANAGER Dan Conti
PRODUCTION MANAGER Amanda Allen
NIGHT SUPERVISOR Sheryl Wolnik
ADVERTISING MANAGER Jaimeson Porter
ADVERTISING PRODUCTION Molly Eggleston
ARTS & LIVING EDITOR Morgan Rousseau
COMICS EDITOR Adam Seagrin
EDITORIAL EDITOR Tucker Merrick
NEWS EDITOR Matt Bellfreau
SPORTS EDITOR Danny Picard
SPORTS EDITOR Jon Pelland
CIRCULATION MANAGER Jeff Perez
FINANCE MANAGER David Valade
ASSISTANT OPERATIONS Linda Wallack
ASSISTANT ADVERTISING Nicole Puddester
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Tim McCall
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Sydney Towne
ASSISTANT NEWS Anna Dolfantis
ASSISTANT NEWS Nicole Boonjakuakul
ASSISTANT EDITORIAL Brendan Hall
WEB EDITOR James Hale
PHOTO EDITOR Toan Trinh

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN IS PUBLISHED MONDAY THROUGH FRIDAY DURING THE UNIVERSITY OF MASSACHUSETTS' CALENDAR SEMESTER. THE COLLEGIAN IS INDEPENDENTLY FUNDED, OPERATING ON ADVERTISING REVENUE. FOUNDED IN 1890, THE PAPER BEGAN AS AGGIE LIFE, BECAME THE COLLEGE SCENE IN 1901, THE WEEKLY COLLEGIAN IN 1914 AND THE TRI-WEEKLY COLLEGIAN IN 1956. PUBLISHED DAILY SINCE 1967, THE COLLEGIAN HAS BEEN BROADSHEET SINCE JANUARY 1994. FOR ADVERTISING RATES AND INFORMATION, CALL WEEKDAYS BETWEEN 8:30 A.M. AND 3:30 P.M.

PRODUCTION CREW
On staff today

NIGHT EDITOR
Sheryl Wolnik

COPY EDITOR
Nicole Boonjakuakul

PRODUCTION SUPERVISOR
Chris Martin

College newspapers defend printing of satirical material

BY SHARI RABIN
THE DAILY FREE PRESS (BOSTON U.)

BOSTON — Several college newspapers have responded to public outcry and university-administrative action after printing satirical material that modeled delicate subjects, such as race and rape, ultimately raising questions about limitations and responsibilities of college newspapers.

College publications, including The Recorder at Central Connecticut State University, The Daily Princetonian at Princeton University and Dartmouth Review at Dartmouth College have all recently issued apologies after coming under fire from school administrations and campus communities for publishing pieces in bad taste.

The most recent case happened last week, when The Recorder's opinion editor John Petroski extolled the "magical" nature of rape in an op-ed piece titled "Rape Only Hurts If You Fight It" in the weekly paper's Feb 7 edition. Petroski said the piece was meant to satirically mock sensationalism in the press, but there has been a negative campus-wide reaction, including a condemning letter from the university's president. Petroski was demoted in the fallout from the incident.

Petroski circulated a statement to students explaining he wrote the column to "point out that people don't give a damn about anything in a paper besides something they can rally around," although he added he should have used a less "touchy" topic and apologized to those who he offended.

The Princetonian's Jan. 17 mock editorial, penned in the voice of a fictitious Asian Yale freshman complaining of racial discrimination at the university, drew the ire of on-campus Asian student groups and garnered national media attention.

The editors claimed they had only intended to ridicule racism by exaggerating stereotypes.

"At its worst, the column was a bad joke," the newspaper's editorial board said in a note to readers Jan. 19. "At its best, it provoked serious questions about race, fairness and diversity."

Current Princetonian Editor-in-Chief Kavita Saini said she would not comment on the paper's original decision to print the piece because that was the decision of the previous editorial board, helmed by then-Editor-in-Chief Chanakya Sethi.

Ron Smith, author of Groping for Ethics in Journalism and journalism professor at the University of Central Florida, said incidents such as the one at Princeton illustrate a societal problem that reaches far beyond ethical lapses in student journalism.

"Reporters and editors should be aware of the needs and sensitivities of their communities," he said. "I am leery of the argument that writing something sexist or racist is the best way to promote intelligent discourse on racism or sexism in our society."

Smith said he hopes students are simply revolting against political correctness – and not expressing real racism and sexism – and hopes "the wiser voices [will] shame the stupid."

Boston University sociology professor Daniel Monti, who teaches a course about race and ethnic relations, said racial controversies are relatively commonplace.

"Our sensitivity to real and imagined slights is a sign of just how much we've learned to soften our language when we speak of persons whose race, gender or ethnic background are different from our own," he said in an e-mail.

Angry responses and outrage only magnify the effect of offensive statements, he added.

"Provocative writing should not be condemned simply because it accomplishes that which it was intended to do in the first place," he said. "Condemn it for sloppy logic and a lack of evidence, not because it angers you."

U.S., Britain rank last in child welfare in industrialized world

BY DAVID MCHUGH
ASSOCIATED PRESS

BERLIN — The United States and Britain ranked at the bottom of a U.N. survey of child welfare in 21 wealthy countries that assessed everything from infant mortality to whether children ate dinner with their parents or were bullied at school.

The Netherlands, followed by Sweden, Denmark and Finland, finished at the top of the rankings, while the U.S. was 20th and Britain 21st, according to the report released Wednesday by UNICEF in Germany.

One of the study's researchers, Jonathan Bradshaw, said children fared worse in the U.S. and Britain – despite high overall levels of national wealth – because of greater economic inequality and poor levels of public support for families.

"What they have in common are very high levels of inequality, very high levels of child poverty, which is also associated with inequality, and in rather different ways poorly developed services to families with children," said Bradshaw, a professor of social policy at the University of York in Britain.

"They don't invest as much in children as continental European countries do," he said, citing the lack of day care services in both countries and poorer health coverage and preventative care for children in the U.S.

The study also gave the U.S. and Britain low marks for their higher incidences of single-parent families and risky behaviors among children, such as drinking alcohol and sexual activity.

Britain was last and the U.S. second from the bottom in the category focusing on relationships, based on the percentage

See UNICEF on page 3

Romney announces aspirations to run for president in 2008

To win the Republican nomination, Romney will have to overcome Senator John McCain (R-Ariz.) and former New York City Mayor Rudy Giuliani.

BY ALESE BAGDOL
MICHIGAN DAILY (U. MICHIGAN)

DEARBORN, Mich. — Standing in front of symbols of a 1954 American Motors Rambler and a 2006 Ford Escape Hybrid, symbols of Michigan's past and present, former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney announced his candidacy for president Tuesday at the Henry Ford Museum.

Romney likened Henry Ford's influence on the auto industry to his own potential to revitalize America.

"This place is about innovation – innovation and transformation – which have been at the heart of America's success," Romney said. "If there ever was a time when innovation and transformation were needed in government, it is now."

To win the Republican nomination, Romney will have to overcome the public's familiarity with bigger names like Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and former New York City Mayor Rudy Giuliani. McCain and Giuliani have both taken the initial steps toward a White House run in 2008. Romney will face the challenge of being from one of the nation's most liberal states, though he has distanced himself from Massachusetts since announcing he wouldn't seek a second term as governor.

In an e-mail to Michigan Republicans last month, Romney's brother Scott, a trustee at Michigan State University, quoted Romney calling Michigan his home.

Mitt Romney emphasized his Michigan roots in his speech.

"I always imagined that I would come back to Michigan someday," he said.

Romney's first run for elected office came in 1994, when he failed to unseat Massachusetts Sen. Ted Kennedy. After running the Salt Lake City Winter Olympics in 2002, Romney returned to Massachusetts and run for governor.

University of Michigan senior Rob Scott, the chair of the university's chapter of the College Republicans and a Romney supporter, said Romney chose a fitting location to announce his bid for presidency.

"Coming to Detroit, with all the problems the auto industry is having right now, is a good way for Romney to show his strength on the domestic front," Scott said.

Scott said the College Republicans as a group don't back any one candidate in the primary and that his support for Romney is personal.

Romney, who grew up in Bloomfield Hills, Mich., and attended the prestigious Cranbrook Kingswood School there, sought to distinguish himself from the other potential candidates by emphasizing his distance from Washington politics.

"I do not believe Washington can be transformed from within by a lifelong politician," Romney said. "There have been too many deals, too many favors, too many entanglements -- and too little real-world experience managing, guiding, leading."

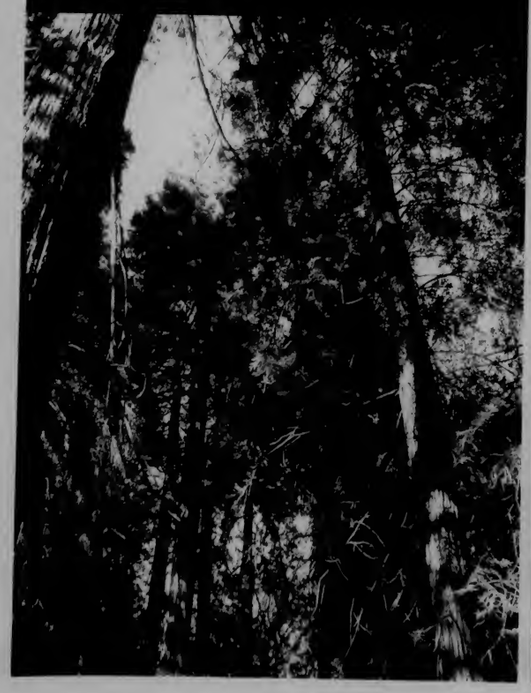
Romney is a former venture capitalist who founded the Boston-based Bain Capital, where he helped start the office-supply giant Staples.

His father, former Michigan Gov. George Romney, mounted his own bid for president in 1968, but he lost most of his support after attributing his initial support for the Vietnam War to "brainwashing."

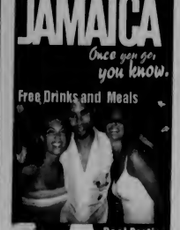
The elder Romney headed American Motors before being elected governor in 1962. Mitt Romney's mother, Lenore, ran for the Senate in 1970, but lost.

February 15, 2007
Campus Center Auditorium
7:00 PM

John Muir, the Sierra Club, and the Bible:
Exploring the Ecological and Ethical Foundations for the American Conservation Ethic



SPRING BREAK '07
JAMAICA
Once you go, you know.
Free Drinks and Meals



Pool Parties

Beach Parties

Jamaica has it all.
Let us show you the way:
Sun Splash Tours
800.426.7710
www.sunsplashtours.com
Student Travel Services
800.648.4849
www.ststravel.com

If You've Got a Plan We've Got a Van!
Insurance Replacement Rates
FREE PICK-UP
POTTER'S
AUTO & TRUCK RENTAL
• Direct Billing to Insurance Company
• Locally Owned & Operated
• 7 & 15 Passenger Vans
• UMass Purchase Orders, MHEC Rates
Potter's Collision Repair
Collision Repair & Glass Replacement
at North Amherst Motors
78 Sunderland Rd., North Amherst, MA
(413) 549-RENT (7368)
www.pottersauto.com
(One mile North of UMass - on bus route)

UNIVERSITY OF MASSACHUSETTS BOSTON
UMASS
study the world up close summer 2007 international programs programs in
• amsterdam
• belize
• the caribbean
• china
• ireland
• mexico
• paris

ccde.umb.edu/international 617.287.7913

MassPIRG aims to lower textbook prices

TEXTBOOKS from page 1

monly bought textbooks have new editions published every three years, thus explaining the vast increase in price. Worldwide, the United States seems to charge more for textbooks, generally charging 20 percent more than in the UK. In order to solve this problem, MassPIRG has taken steps to pass legislature that will reduce the costs of textbooks.

One piece of legislation is the Affordable Textbooks Bill which, according to MASSPIRG representative Molly Chafetz, "will require that publishers make textbooks available without being bundled, and disclose prices to professors."

While waiting for the legislation to pass, MassPIRG urges that publishers produce new textbook editions only when they are necessary for educational purposes, and offer faculty and students the option to purchase textbooks unbundled.

U.S. finishes last in study's health and safety category of children who lived in single-parent homes or with stepparents, as well as the percentage that ate the main meal of the day with their families several times per week. That category also counted the proportion of children who said they had "kind" or "helpful" relationships with other children.

UNICEF from page 2

The report's authors cautioned that the focus on single-parent families "may seem unfair and insensitive" and noted that many children do well with one parent.

"But at the statistical level there is evidence to associate growing up in single-parent families with greater risk to well-being – including a greater risk of dropping out of school, of leaving home early, poorer health, low skills and of low pay," the report said.

On average, 80 percent of the children in the countries surveyed live with both parents. There were wide variations, however, from more than 90 percent in Greece and Italy to less than 70 percent in Britain and 60 percent in the U.S., where 16 percent of adolescents lived with stepfamilies.

Bob Reitemeier, chief executive of The Children's Fund charity in Britain, said the UNICEF report also showed that less than half of British children reported good relations with their peers.

"That really jumped off the page," he said, citing concerns about the competitive, ratings-based school environment in Britain and higher reported incidences of bullying and fighting. "The environment for these young people is quite negative."

The study ranked the countries in six categories, based on national statistics: material well-being, health and safety, education, peer and family relationships, behaviors and risks, and young people's own subjective sense of well-being. Both the U.S. and Britain were in the bottom two-thirds of five of the six categories.

The U.S. finished last in the health and safety category, based on infant mortality, vaccinations for childhood diseases, deaths from injuries and accidents before age 19, and whether children reported fighting in the past year or being bullied in the previous two months.

Britain finished at the bottom in behaviors and risks, which considered factors such as the percentage of children who had breakfast, ate fruit regularly, exercised, were overweight, used drugs or alcohol, were sexually active or became pregnant.

Both the U.S. and British governments criticized the report.

Wade Horn, an assistant secretary at the Department of Health and Human Services, said the study's standard of measuring poverty differed from that of the United States.

Students react to book prices

Bookstore personnel deny 'under-the-table agreements' between publishers and stores

PRICES from page 1

the fall semester and $200 in the spring.

According to the report, the high price of books can be traced back to the publishers of the textbooks themselves. One tactic the publishers use to drive up the price of books is 'bundling.' Bundling is the process of shrink-wrapping extra materials, such as CD-ROMS or workbooks, to the text. This process happens to about half the textbooks on the shelves. The report also found that many professors can't order the textbook without the additional materials, even when they don't plan on using them in class. On average a textbook that has been bundled costs 10 percent more than its unbundled counterpart.

Bundling is just one of the tactics publishers use to raise textbook prices.

"I've definitely been aware of the fact that I'm getting ripped off," Terzenbach said. "Having had to buy textbooks for two years now, I kind of understand that publishers and bookstores are kind of running monopolies."

Phill Olsen, Store Director for the UMass Textbook Annex as well as the Campus Store, wants students to understand that there are no under-the-table agreements between publishers and the University Store or Textbook Annex.

"Typically the store has very little contact with sales representatives; sales representatives would be speaking with the faculty directly," said Olsen. "And then it's up to the University store to order course materials that we are directed to by the faculty members."

However, the report said that publishers don't provide clear information about their prices to faculty. MassPIRG found that 94 percent of faculty surveyed would take cost into consideration when choosing the textbooks, but many don't know how much the textbooks actually cost.

Despite this unnerving report, few are actually surprised by the findings.

"I spent too much on my books, but it's not surprising to find out they jacked up the prices," said sophomore psychology major Vanessa Kenyon. "I guess they just want to make a profit off of them."

A profit was certainly made off of Kenyon, who spent $1,200 this year alone on textbooks.

Any successful business needs to make a profit, but at what cost to its customers?

MassPIRG found that textbooks are being sold at four times the rate of inflation; whereas the prices charged for all finished goods has only increased 14 percent since 1994 and the wholesale prices charged by textbook publishers has increased 62 percent in the same amount of time.

"It's pretty scary people spend so much on textbooks," said UMass English professor James Freeman. "I am constantly outraged at the way people are taken advantage of when it comes to things they need, like textbooks or medicine."

But Freeman was also not surprised by the report.

"This is the way for publishers to make up for uncertainties in other ventures," Freeman said. "For example if they publish fiction books they're not sure if they will sell. But if they specialize in textbooks, they know that people will buy them because there is a market for it."

MassPIRG has revealed these tactics practiced by the publishers but many are skeptical about what can be done.

Terzenbach sums it up.

"There is only so much that can be done here. It's about addressing the higher ups, and even then you probably can't get past the publishing company."

Snow finally arrives in Massachusetts

BY ADAM GORLICK
ASSOCIATED PRESS

CHARLEMONT, Mass. — It finally felt like winter in Massachusetts Wednesday, with the season's first storm dumping enough snow, sleet and freezing rain to close schools, cancel flights and complicate some Valentine's Day plans.

But the storm also was good news for outdoor enthusiasts and businesses who have felt cheated by Mother Nature for most of the winter.

"This is what I live for," said Win Whitcomb, a 44-year-old doctor from Hatfield who took the day off to ski with his wife at Charlemont's Berkshire East ski area. "We've had a long drought this winter, and having a day like today is the best."

And with the upcoming three-day Presidents Day weekend that kicks off a week of school vacations, ski areas and snow parks across the state were hoping to make up for some dollars lost during winter's warm start followed by an ice-cold but snowless stretch.

"You couldn't have asked for better timing with this," said Tom Meyers, the marketing director at Wachusett Mountain ski area in Princeton. "It's almost as if Mother Nature is trying to make amends a little bit. She'll beat you when you're down, then say 'here you go.'"

But not everyone saw it that way.

The storm that swept across the state forced Boston's Logan International Airport to close for an hour and 20 minutes, and more than 130 of the airport's 1,100 daily flights were canceled. The speed limit on the Massachusetts Turnpike was lowered to 40 mph, Route 99 in Chelsea closed because of flooding and state police reported several cars spinning off the road.

Western Massachusetts bore the brunt of the storm, with Berkshire, Franklin, Hampden and Hampshire counties expecting between a foot and 2 feet of snow. Blizzard warnings were issued for Berkshire and Franklin counties through 6 a.m. today, and the region was pelted with a mix of snow, sleet and freezing rain.

The forecast for more eastern parts of Massachusetts were less dire, with central and northeast areas expected to get from four inches to a foot of snow mixed with sleet and freezing rain. A gale warning was posted for the waters off Massachusetts, with seas expected to build to 6 to 9 feet, and snow was not expected to taper off until yesterday evening.

Still, many weren't impressed by the storm's intensity.

"New Englanders, come on, they're tough-skinned," said Stan Harris, 52, who was salting a sidewalk in downtown Beverly. "This is old hat for us. This is nothing that's going to bother many people."

The storm did make a mess of some Valentine's Day plans, with flower deliveries slowed and restaurant owners wondering if couples would decide to cozy up at home rather than risk the roads for romance.

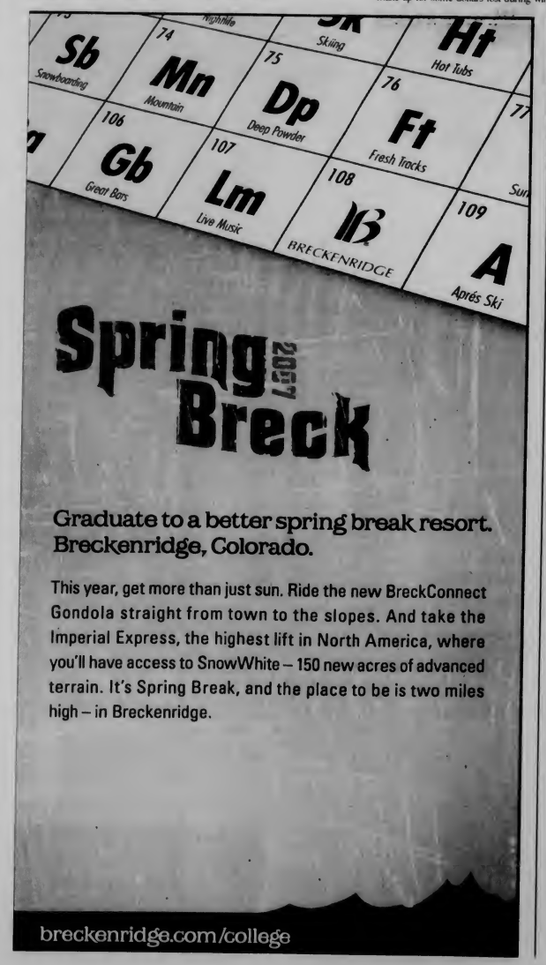
Airline to expand program

MARKETING from page 1

sporting events," Williams said. American Airlines was the exclusive corporate sponsor of UMass' Homecoming 2006 festivities, at which it presented two free round-trip tickets to one lucky student. The company has also been advertising at basketball and hockey games, and will occasionally give out free airline tickets at particular events. There are also plans to award one student going abroad a free round-trip ticket to his or her chosen destination, provided that the student keeps a travel log throughout the semester on the American Airlines Web site.

Next year, American Airlines is increasing the number of schools at which it has student representatives from 22 to 122, and Massachusetts will become the state with the most represented colleges and universities.

In April, the Marketing Club will also be bringing in other experienced business professionals to speak at their meetings, such as executives from Baskin Robbins and the New England Patriots.



Sb
Snowboarding
Mn
Mountain
Dp
Deep Powder
Ft
Fresh Tracks
Ht
Hot Tubs
Gb
Great Bars
Lm
Live Music
Skiing
Nightlife
Après Ski
BRECKENRIDGE
Spring Break 2007
Graduate to a better spring break resort. Breckenridge, Colorado.
This year, get more than just sun. Ride the new BreckConnect Gondola straight from town to the slopes. And take the Imperial Express, the highest lift in North America, where you'll have access to SnowWhite – 150 new acres of advanced terrain. It's Spring Break, and the place to be is two miles high – in Breckenridge.
breckenridge.com/college

UMass Amherst Fine Arts Center Series Spring 2007

WHERE IMAGINATION MEETS INNOVATION

DBR & THE MISSION
Thursday, February 15 at 7:30 PM
Bowker Auditorium
Seamlessly blending funk, rock, hip-hop and classical music, DBR & THE MISSION is a revolutionary blend of an amplified string quartet, DJ keyboards, bass, drums and laptops. DBR is a classical-urban ambassador for the iPod generation.

Sponsored by Advocate, Jaster Pope Frazier Architects
Funded in part by the Expeditions program of the New England Foundation for the Arts

Natalie MacMaster
Wednesday, February 28 at 7:30 PM
Concert Hall
Natalie MacMaster is one of Canada's biggest stars and a fiddling, singing, and step-dancing fireball on stage. She never fails to bring down the house.

Sponsored by Recorder, Coca-Cola, Valley Kids

Joffrey Ballet
Monday, March 5 at 7:30 PM
Concert Hall
For pure breathtaking beauty of the otherworldly sort, Joffrey is unmistakable. The company will perform Les Presages, Deuce Coupe, and The Green Table, one of the most powerful and important anti-war statements ever created for the stage.

Sponsored by Easthampton Savings Bank, Realty World Sawicki, 88.5 WFCR

TICKETS ARE ON SALE NOW!
TICKETS ARE ONLY $7-$10-$15 FOR FIVE COLLEGE STUDENTS
UMass Amherst FINE ARTS CENTER
CALL 545-2511 OR 1-800-999-UMAS WWW.FINEARTSCENTER.COM

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

EDITORIAL OPINION

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 15, 2007

"I may not agree with what you say but I will defend to the death your right to say it." Voltaire

EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Why Obama will win

Matt Giancola

The campaign for the presidency has started uniquely early. There are a number of reasons for this. The field is more wide open than it has been in decades, as there is no president running for re-election or a vice-president running, and both parties have a multitude of candidates who think that this is their year to get the government's biggest job.

But there is only one man fit for the position.

There are a number of Democrats running who are certainly qualified for the job. After eight years of the horrendously incompetent Bush and Cheney, John Edwards, Hillary Clinton, or Bill Richardson would all be refreshing.

Richardson is the governor of New Mexico, has many years of foreign policy experience and was the Secretary of Energy, a sector that will only gain importance in the coming decades. Edwards brings important domestic concerns to the table that are very often overlooked. He has been focusing on America's poor and how to rectify the huge income inequality that plagues our country. He has also set up a community service program through his campaign that allows supporters to take action and help those in the community.

None of these Democratic candidates will become president however, and the Republican candidates have challenges as well. There is only one candidate who is capturing the minds of the public, who has the vision to lead the United States away from the failed policies that President Bush led us into, and can win both the primary and general election.

That candidate is Barack Obama.

Hillary Clinton, the current frontrunner for the Democratic nomination, is vulnerable on a number of fronts. Her support for the Iraq War has hurt among party activists. She still will not apologize for her vote to authorize the President to take us into this bloody and unnecessary war. Though Obama was not in the Senate when the votes for the war were cast, he has been against the war from the beginning.

He could have worked anywhere. Instead, he chose to help the people that needed it most.

In 2002, before the invasion, he gave a speech in Chicago outlining the reasons why the United States should not invade Iraq. Had we followed his advice, we would not be in the dire situation we are now in; we could have focused our energies on fully destroying al-Qaeda, disarming North Korea and engage Iran diplomatically. Instead we are left in the middle of a civil war – a training ground for Jihadi terrorists. Not only would Senator Obama not have taken us in, but he also has a plan on how to get us out that involves redeployment. This approach takes the military out of harm's way but leaves them with the ability to act should the Iraqi government fall to insurgent forces.

It is not simply his foreign policy that makes him an attractive candidate to Democrats. His message of hope and overcoming obstacles that keep our nation down is a message that we have been in dire need of. Yes, he is the first African-American to have a real chance at winning the election, but his attractiveness is in his words, not his skin color.

He speaks to the best in people, to bringing the country together. In his electrifying 2004 Democratic Keynote Address, he stated, "Hope in the face of difficulty, hope in the face of uncertainty, the audacity of hope: in the end, that is God's greatest gift to us, the bedrock of this nation, a belief in things not seen, a belief that there are better days ahead."

And he has seen much suffering in his life. Working as a community organizer in inner-city Chicago after college, he saw the suffering of a people too often forgotten by their leaders. He toiled to get public housing inspected and cleaned, to get the police to sit down with the people – anything that would impact lives, whether they are small gestures showing that someone still cares, or new policies. After graduating Harvard Law with a stint as president of the Harvard Law Review, he became a civil rights lawyer, returning to inner-city Chicago.

He could have become a high-priced lawyer He could have worked for a wealthy corporation. He could have worked anywhere. Instead, he chose to help the people that needed it most.

Voters have a lot to weigh in this election Do they want an opportunist who will not recant on a failed war, or are they looking for something else – a meaningful, charismatic candidate who represents the best aspects of this country.' With more than a year to go before the election, there is already a Facebook group with more than a quarter-million supporters. This is a staggering amount of support from an age group that apparently never votes.

We need to move away from bungling Republican rule; Senator Obama represents the hope that resides in us all – that better days are ahead.

Matt Giancola can be reached at mgiancol@student.umass.edu

WRITE LETTERS TO THE EDITOR!

MAKE YOUR VOICE HEARD.

(550 WORD LIMIT)

Send letters to:
editorial@dailycollegian.com

The UMass to be proud of

Greg Collins

Last Friday the Mullins Center represented something which few colleges in this area, and many throughout the country, are unable to claim as their own. On Feb. 9, 2007, the No. 17 UMass men's hockey team played Boston University in a crucial conference game, and the jubilant atmosphere exhibited by spirited Minutemen fans was a remarkable sight to experience.

The stands were crammed by countless students, many of whom proudly wore the "Whiteout" t-shirts distributed to publicize the game. Besides the traditional student section near the UMass team bench, other areas of the arena were filled with students, such as the stands behind both goalie nets. It was as if the influx of Minutemen fans surrounding the rink created a force field from which the BU players would never be able to escape.

The behavior and actions of fans during the UMass–BU hockey game was drastically different.

The crowd, emulating the rambunctious spectators of the Roman Coliseum, was roaring from the game's inception. While a few non-traditional cheers by UMass fans were arguably inappropriate, most were suitable for the competition's intense atmosphere. During the entire game, deep chants of "Let's Go UMass!" reverberated throughout the arena like powerful waves providing the momentum for a warship heading into battle.

And what a battle it was. When UMass scored a goal to cut the BU lead to 2-1 in the second period, the student section behind the Terriers' goal at the time exploded into a thick roar and continued to heckle the BU goalie for the rest of the period. No one knows whether we actually rattled him, or if he even heard us, but there is no shame in thinking that we did, even just a little.

Of course following the goal, cheers continued with one section yelling, "U" and the other yelling "Mass," each group trying desperately to out-scream the other and thus creating an impromptu contest to see which section had the more devoted fans (it ended in a well-fought-out draw).

The most noticeable vibe emanating from the passionate Minutemen fans was the sense of unity expressed every time there was a shot on goal by a UMass player. A collective groan would rise up like smoke whenever a shot was missed, but when the Minuteman goalie made great saves, each fan would spring to his or her feet and cheer in appreciation of his efforts.

Yet it's important not to exaggerate the gravity of athletic events within the context of life. There are obviously far more horrific things that occur than losing a game, but it is equally as crucial to recognize its significance within the context of representing a university – one which takes pride in its athletics and academics.

UMass was criticized justifiably for the riots following the football team's Division I Championship loss, when the poorest qualities of the university's students manifested themselves on campus. However, the behavior and actions of fans during the UMass-BU hockey game was drastically different. It showed that the energy and enthusiasm of our student body can be transformed into an incredibly powerful and uplifting spirit.

Furthermore, it opposed the previous playoff football game against the University of New Hampshire, when students were rightfully condemned for their inappropriate behavior. Essentially, the hockey game represented the greatest characteristic in which UMass students and faculty should take enormous pride in regard to school spirit.

This characteristic was the harmony in which the vast majority of Minutemen fans were standing and cheering for one distinct purpose. At the end of the hockey game, both young and old UMass followers were on their feet furiously clapping their hands and practically willing the Minutemen to score a goal to tie the game. The issues of schoolwork, relationships and DC food – and even on a deeper level, differences in race, ethnicity, political preference or religious affiliation – were transcended by the common goal of every Minutemen fan to contribute, even in the smallest way, to help UMass win the game.

In an anticlimactic turn, for both this column and the game, the Minutemen did not win. Yet every UMass fan who attended the game, as well as its players and coaches – all representing different backgrounds and interests – sacrificed their time and energy in an exemplary fashion to contribute to a cause, within the context of sport, greater than oneself. Rather than striving to act wildly for no apparent reason, when Minutemen fans are devoted to this singular purpose during a sporting event, it reveals the enduring spirit of a university of which we all should be proud.

Greg Collins from now on will write on Mondays. He can be reached at gcollins@student.umass.edu.

Making the right decision

Ben Duffy

Editors' Note: This column originally appeared on Feb 14. It is being republished due to the lack of circulation yesterday.

The easiest way to tell the difference between a liberal and a leftist is that a liberal cheers against his country only when a Republican is in the White House, while a leftist cheers against his country all of the time.

Take the 1999 Kosovo War, for example. If you'll remember correctly, the man in the White House at the time was Bill Clinton, a man who liberals believed could do no wrong. The Clinton State Department was unable to rally the UN Security Council to support the operation, so Clinton simply went ahead with it over international objections. The veto-wielding Russian Federation would have squashed any such mission to Kosovo if it had been given the chance, and it continued to protest the operation until its end.

If you believe that all military actions must be explicitly sanctioned by the almighty United Nations, you'd have to conclude that the Kosovo War was illegal under international law. So if the war in Kosovo was illegal, does that make Clinton and his administration "war criminals?" If you ask a liberal that question, he will say no. Ask a leftist, and he will say yes.

Therein lays the difference between a liberal and a leftist. Liberals are constantly contradicting themselves, and it's quite easy to prove that they lack any true principles. Their appraisal of any particular action hinges on who's doing it. The good guys (Democrats) are always right, and the bad guys (Republicans) are always wrong. Simply change the party in power, and liberals will change their minds on just about everything.

Leftists on the other hand, are a lot more consistent. They're consistently wrong, venomous, anti-American and misguided, but at least they're consistent. No matter who is in power, you can expect the leftists to take to the streets denouncing this guy or that guy as a "war criminal."

Liberals did not seem bothered by the lack of a UN mandate in 1999. By 2002, however, the approval of the UN was deemed absolutely imperative. President Bush went to the UN and pleaded his case to a corrupt international body. He finally secured UN Resolution 1441 with the unanimous consent of all 15 nations in the UN's governing Security Council. It clearly stated that Iraq was in material breach of its 1991 ceasefire, as well as 16 subsequent resolutions, and that Iraq had one final chance to come clean with UN inspectors. Iraq failed to do so.

Liberals did not seem bothered by the lack of U.N. mandate in 1999. By 2002 however, the approval of the U.N. was deemed absolutely imperative.

Suddenly, some UN member states got cold feet. They had seemed so forceful with their ridiculous 17th resolution. But when you've cried wolf 16 times, people like Saddam Hussein don't take you seriously anymore.

That's doubly true when Saddam has key members of the UN and UN member states on his payroll through the Oil-for-Food Program. While all opposition member states claimed that they were against the war on principle, there is ample evidence that the real reason they wanted the dictator in power was because of monetary interests related to oil and weapons trading. The opposition members of the UN Security Council didn't oppose the war because Saddam lacked weapons of mass destruction but because they were on his payroll. In any case, 500 WMDs have been found in Iraq since 2003.

Bush went ahead with the war anyway. Was it illegal? Perhaps, but I don't really care. I oppose any attempt to turn over our national sovereignty to the UN, especially in its current state. If the Iraq War has proven anything, it's the incompetence and corruption of that international body. They were wrong about Kosovo, and they were wrong about Iraq. In both cases, disreputable member states such as Russia, China and France tried their best to shelter the despots Milosevic and Saddam. Study the history of the UN for awhile and you'll find that sheltering despots is what they do best.

I sometimes wonder if this entire mess in Iraq could have been prevented if Saddam had actually believed that the UN meant business. What if the UN had acted after the first resolution? What if they hadn't taken bribes? Could this have been resolved peacefully?

For all of you liberals out there who say that this war in Iraq is illegal, I say go arrest Bill Clinton. Arrest Wesley Clark, the supreme NATO commander in Kosovo and hero of the Democratic Party's left-wing. Once they're being taken away in handcuffs, we can discuss what to do with Bush and Rumsfeld. And to all of you leftists who say the same thing, I would say that the legality of the war is debatable, even if it is an incredibly stupid debate. The important point is not whether we did the legal thing, but whether we did the right thing.

Lack of a UN mandate may make a war "illegal," but it doesn't make it unjust, and it certainly doesn't mean that the war lacks the "unique legitimacy" that Kofi Annan is always talking about. The "unique legitimacy" we seek can never be procured from a body as illegitimate as the UN.

Ben Duffy writes on Wednesdays. He can be reached at bduffy@student.umass.edu

DO YOU LIKE TO DRAW COMICS?

SHOW OFF YOUR ARTWORK!

Send an e-mail to:
editorial@dailycollegian.com

iGive up with UMass

S.P. Sullivan

I suppose I'm a bit of a Luddite.

And I know what you're thinking. No, I'm not showing off my ability to utilize the Microsoft Word thesaurus, which I hate, because I'm a Luddite. Luddite is a word I picked up from author Kurt Vonnegut,who explains that Luddism was a social movement of English textile workers put out of work by the textile machines that were supposed to make everyone else's life more convenient. It has come to refer to anyone who fears or distrusts technology.

I – like a lot of UMass students, I'm sure – wasn't sympathetic to Luddism until I met SPIRE and its evil contemporaries OWL, Web CT, and Course Compass. What the hell happened to pen and paper, or printer and paper for that matter?

Of course, technology does have its benefits when used responsibly. E-mail, offered to all students and faculty through the university, is a convenient way to get in touch with professors, classmates and campus offices and services; just hope that your information doesn't find its way onto Google.

An ".edu" e-mail address also means that you're welcome on Facebook. Congratulations, you've become a member of a prestigious club whose membership is limited only to high school and college students, employees of large corporations, advertisers, anyone invited by a current member of Facebook and anyone else Rupert Murdoch sees fit. Once a student finds their way onto Facebook, they are welcome to meet and greet other UMass students and avoid eye contact when they pass them at the Student Union or Dining Commons.

SPIRE is a handy way to access grades, housing information and, of course, schedule classes. But make sure you didn't miss that meningitis vaccination and paid that $20 parking ticket before you commit yourself to scheduling. An inattentive scheduler could find themselves with a hold on their account, taking precious minutes away from the scheduling process that could take days.

Does one need to discuss literature on the WebCT message board when there are perfectly good human beings in that classroom of yours?

Registering for classes via SPIRE is certainly better than its alternative. Most UMass students have heard the horror stories from older generations about class registration in the years B.G. (that's Before Gates, of course).

Having to wait in line in a stuffy gymnasium or auditorium only to find out that one's desired class is full doesn't sound like the ideal way to spend an afternoon. But neither does banging one's head against the keyboard of the ridiculously overpriced Macbook one had to purchase because PCs are fraught with viruses and only cavemen don't have computers. There are certain things that will never reach the desired level of efficiency. Having thousands of students light over a couple hundred classes in a period of a few days is one such thing.

WebCT is supposed to save students from spending large quantities of hard-earned cash on books from which only selections would be read. Don't buy the book, goads WebCT, let's see what your printer's got. Suddenly those 100 free pages a semester offered by the library don't seem like quite enough, and ink cartridges don't last like they used to.

It's also highly convenient to do math homework via the Internet, but perhaps excessively so. MyMathLab, offered by Course Compass, allows students to do their math homework online, as long as they have a Mac and not a PC; as long as they have Internet Explorer and not Safari or Firefox; as long as they have pen and paper handy to do scratch work. Redundancy never came so expensive, at $45 for an access code.

One might ask why in the world someone would be cynical or otherwise skeptical about the wonders of modern technology. The answer would be that it's not clear that all of the aforementioned "advances" have advanced anything, or are even at all necessary.

Does one need to discuss literature on the WebCT message board when there are perfectly good human beings sitting in that classroom of yours? If a Math 100 student scribbles out the answers to their homework on paper in ten minutes or less, is it an advancement to spend the next half hour trying to figure out how to make exponents with the conventions of a standard QWERTY keyboard? And aren't you Googling the answers to that OWL quiz anyway?

These are important questions, which lead to an even larger one. The common cliché is that too much of a good thing is no good at all. Doesn't it follow then, that too much convenience can prove inconvenient? Personally, I'm willing to sacrifice a little bit of this modern technology – and a little bit of my time – for a little stability. It's not very pleasant vesting one's grades and one's sanity into the hope that SPIRE isn't down and that expensive laptop won't crash the day before the final.

What's the rush? Take the walk to your professor's mailbox; leave the dorm room once in a while. Most importantly, stop kidding yourself that your time is so incredibly important. Vonnegut himself warns his readers, "We're here on Earth to fart around, and don't let anybody tell you any different."

SP Sullivan can be reached at spsulliv@student.umass.edu

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

ARTS & LIVING

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 15, 2007

ARTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Japanese past-time to slam FAC

Taikoza thundering to UMass

Taikoza is a Japanese art-form that incorporates traditional folk dancing.

By Diana Ludek
Collegian Correspondent

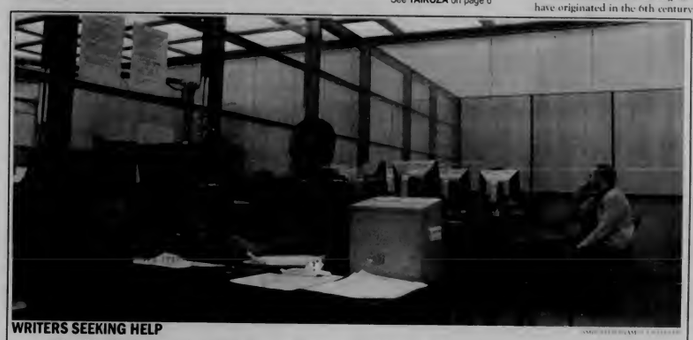
A chance to experience Taikoza, a Japanese drum and dance group, is this Friday at 7:30 p.m. in the Fine Arts Center Concert Hall at the University of Massachusetts. A group supported by East Winds Incorporated, an organization who brings Asian arts to the community and to New York schools, Taikoza fuses the ancient Japanese art of Taiko with a variety of flutes, stringed instruments, and hand held percussion. Japanese folk dancing completes the performance, creating a highly visual musical experience.

Taiko, roughly translated as "big drum," has a variety of meanings. It typically describes a large, wooden drum constructed from hollowed out zelkova wood skinned with rawhide on each end. Taiko can also be used to describe other kinds of drums and the art of drumming itself. Taiko drums can reach lengths of six feet and weigh over 300 pounds each.

Taiko's historical roots extend as far back the 6th century. It is believed to have originated in the battlefield as a tactic to frighten and discourage the enemy.

See TAIKOZA on page 6

Some drums can be as large as 300 pounds and over six feet in height. The Taikoza performance is said to have originated in the 6th century during times of warfare.



WRITERS SEEKING HELP

The UMass Writing Center, located in the Learning Commons of W.E.B. DuBois Library, opened its doors for the spring semester on Monday, and is available to help students with their writing skills. UMass junior Jacob Sadeck, front, has worked at the Center since last semester.

Recent novel shows frog life

By Theresa Reilly
Collegian Staff

The choices a frog has to make are a lot harder than one might realize. Author J.C. Michaels tells a tale of a two-footed frog in his first novel attempt, Firebelly. The book takes the reader on an adventure from a frog's early tadpole years to the most defining moment in life.

FIREBELLY

BY J.C. MICHAELS

ALL AGES

GRADE: B+

According to the author, the idea for the book was inspired by real life events. "This story just presented itself," said Michaels. The first two parts of the book are taken directly from the events that happened with Michaels' daughter, her pet frog and Michaels himself. While in Nepal, Michaels wrote this short story, which became the beginning of Firebelly.

"It was just going to be a short story," said Michaels. After writing the first two parts, he saw a potential for a much deeper story and created the third part, where he presented another main character.

The book surrounds a 10-year-old girl named Caroline and a teenager named Claire who are effected by a small amphibian in ways that they don't even realize. Caroline confides in her pet frog, who she names MP (Missing Pieces), about the struggles of being a child with divorced parents, while Claire, a rebellious teenager, is saved by a single hop from the frog she names Empy (for empathy.)

See FIREBELLY on page 6

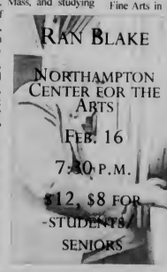
Noho to greet legendary pianist

Ran Blake to wrap up 'A World of Piano' Jazz series

By Brad Farberman
Collegian Staff

Following performances by Matthew Shipp and Cooper-Moore earlier this month, the Northampton Center for the Arts' "A World of Piano" series will conclude this Friday with a solo piano concert by Boston-area legend Ran Blake. Tickets are $12, or $8 for students and seniors. The show begins at 7:30 p.m.

Blake, 71, has led a life in music. After completing his B.A. at Bard College, doing time at the School of Jazz in Lenox, Mass, and studying with the likes of Oscar Peterson, Mal Waldron and Mary Lou Williams, Blake recorded his first album, "The Newest Sound Around," in 1962 (the LP also featured vocalist Jeanne Lee). To date, Blake has recorded more than 30 albums as a leader, for famed labels like RCA, Soul Note, ESP and hatOLOGY.



In 1959, Blake was working a "low level position" at Atlantic Records in New York so he could be close to Ray Charles, vocalist Chris Connor and the Apollo Theater. At Atlantic, he ran into Gunther Schuller who had been recording with Eric Dolphy, Bill Evans and Ornette Coleman. When Schuller, an early advocate of Blake's, was appointed president of New England Conservatory in 1967, he brought Blake onboard the following year.

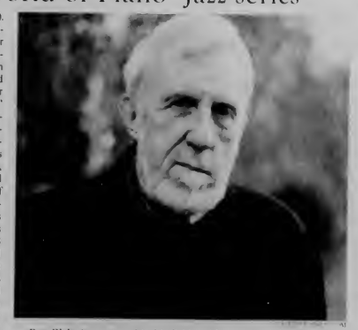
In 1973, Blake was asked to chair what was then called the "Third Stream Department" ("third stream" referring to a genre characterized by its combination of classical and jazz aesthetics; today, the department has been renamed the "Department of Contemporary Improvisation" to reflect a broader range of influences). Today, Blake still chairs the department and has mentored any number of important, contemporary performers, like Don Byron, Shipp and John Medeski (of Medeski, Martin and Wood), who wrote the liner notes for Blake's latest disc, "All That Is Tied."

Blake's career highlights are varied. As a performer, Blake has performed in the U.S. and internationally for more than forty years. He has appeared at the Monterey Festival, Antibes Music Festival, Montreal Jazz Festival and the Museum of Fine Arts in Boston. He was awarded the prestigious MacArthur "genius grant" in 1988 (John Zorn and Regina Carter were both awarded this grant in 2006) and the Guggenheim Fellowship in Music Composition in 1982 and 1988. He has recorded with a number of legendary saxophonists like Steve Lacy, Houston Person, Clifford Jordan, Ricky Ford and current Wesleyan University professor Anthony Braxton.

However, his slow, haunting music owes more to various film scores than the legacy of jazz. Admittedly, he is a fan of pianists like Thelonious Monk and Duke Ellington, but Blake draws most of his inspiration from films that fall under the "film noir" blanket, like Robert Siodmak's The Spiral Staircase, and the work of director Claude Chabrol and Alfred Hitchcock, even going so far as to dub his sound "noir music," according to The Boston Globe.

Blake will next perform on March 25 at the Brookline Library in Brookline, Mass., in celebration of the library's 150th anniversary. In August,

See BLAKE on page 6



Ran Blake is renowned in his field and has performed for over forty years of his life. He has also recorded with a number of famous musicians like Clifford Jordan, Ricky Ford and Steve Lacy.

Blake's next performance is on March 25 at the Brookline Library in Brookline, Mass. as part of its 150th anniversary celebration.

Love in movies give some false illusions

By Stephanie McPherson
Collegian Columnist

"All you need is love," right? At least that seems to be the overlying message in not only films of today, but in many movies since the beginning of filmmaking.

According to the American Film Institute, the number two movie of all time is Casablanca, the classic story of simply-not-meant-to-be lovers, which coined the phrase "here's lookin' at you kid," and the lament "of all the gin joints in all the world..."

Year after year, movie after movie is released centered on the pining and whining of unrequited love, or the ecstasy of ending up with the one that you want. They range from comical (the famed diner-orgasm scene from When Harry Met Sally) to tragic (who can forget Ewan McGregor's sob at the end of Moulin Rouge?) Some are great, like the British made, wonderfully acted Love Actually, and some are simply terrible, for example, Hope Floats. Cartoons aren't even safe. Some of Disney's most famous animated films involve the difficulties lovers face in their attempts to overcome obstacles, be it a mermaid in love with a human hunk, or a cindered-covered servant girl lusting after a prince.

But what have we gotten from all these movies, other than the obvious fact that falling for a prince is the way to go? Have all these love-based movies provided America with an unrealistic and potentially disappointing view of love?

It seems as though people base their expectations for falling in love on characters and relationships they see in movies. Films provide guidelines to how love should be – complete with magic and fireworks. For those of us who have never had this 'true love' for ourselves.

As Ben Sharton, a sophomore at UMass says, "I've never had any experience with real love, so all I have to base it on is stuff from the movies." The two most common and most sought after relationships seem to be a growing love between friends, and the meant-to-be couple who are in love from the start.

The friends-to-lovers ideal seems the most popular, which points back to the classic example of When Harry Met Sally. Sally and Harry first meet on a road trip from Chicago to New York City where they part ways. The two meet up again years later and become best friends, eventually falling in love. Alicia Beane, and undergrad at Southern New Hampshire University, says that her ideal relationship would mirror that of Harry and Sally because, "there is a past between them, and it seems like that is the way [love] should be."

The well known love at first sight isn't highly regarded. Amanda Lund, a freshman at UMass says that kind of love "seems superficial;" more of a lust at first sight.

However, Elana Williams, a UMass political science major, believes that

See LOVE on page 6

A medley of instruments are in the Taikoza show. In addition to drums, the performers play stringed instruments as well as flutes.

Taikoza tours to UMass

Fans prepare for drumming night of fun

TAIKOZA from page 5

Taiko was also a staple of religious practices and harvest festivals; its thunderous roar used to entertain the gods and drive away disease and malevolent spirits.

Those in attendance at the show will experience the rich musical tradition of the Land of the Rising Sun through a variety of musical instruments. The show promises to whisk the audience away on a musical tour of Japan and its seasons, with the thundering pulse of the Taiko and a 200 pound Odaiko, the trills of bamboo flutes, and the melodious sounds of a 13-stringed six foot instrument known as a koto.

Some original members of Ondekoza, a group responsible for the Taiko renaissance of the 1960s, came together in 1995 to form Taikoza. The group consists of six musicians and one classically trained Japanese folk dancer. Four Taiko players — Marguerite Z. Bunyan, Malika Yasuko Duckworth, Masayuki Mizunuma, and Chikako Saito — are joined by the talents of flute and shakuhachi player Marco Lienhard, koto player Masayo Ishigure, and dancer Momo Suzuki to create a truly unique performance.

Taikoza has also appeared on the History Channel and The Last Samurai DVD set. Taikoza's latest CD, "Beginnings" was nominated in the Best Asian Ethnic Language Album category for 2004's Just Plain Folks Music Award.

Chris Galardi, 19, a sophomore at the University of Massachusetts, is excited to see Taikoza perform for a second time.

"They performed at my high school in 2004. The group is very talented and the performance is very captivating. It's not one of those situations where they put a culture behind a glass case for you to observe," Galardi also mentioned an interactive element of the Taikoza show.

"They have people come on stage and teach you how to drum. I was invited up and it's really, really hard," he said.

Tickets are available at the Fine Arts Center Box Office and cost between $7 and $15 for Five College Students and youths 17 and under. General admission tickets are available from $15 to $25.

Diana Ludek is a Collegian Correspondent, and can be reached at Dludek@student.umass.edu.

TAIKOZA

FINE ARTS CENTER

FEB. 16

7:30 PM

Love inspired flicks spark romance needs

LOVE from page 5

an "interest at first sight" is more than highly probable, as is the case in The Notebook. Allie and Noah, two young adults from vastly different social circles meet one fateful summer in the south. After an initial meeting in which Noah expresses his desire to be with an uninterested Allie, they quickly grow to love each other, and it is a love that lasts their whole lives through. This was Elana's ideal relationship: "it's beautiful" she laughs. "It's not based purely on lust, like love at first sight is, and it's not idealistic, like some people might think. It's possible, and it happens."

When asked if movies have altered their views on love, the overwhelming answer was "yes." According to Alicia, movie goers "wish what has happened in the movies will happen to [them], because [movies] can make it perfect, since real life isn't." The movies make love look so wonderful — it seems as though it is necessary to life.

"I've come to idealize it as the one thing that I want more than anything because of how movies make it so beautiful, especially old movies...it's made me want it more than riches or power or fame," said Alicia.

Not everyone is so easily affected, however Amanda's favorite love movie is Casablanca, but it isn't because of the scenes between Humphrey Bogart and Ingrid Bergman. It's because "he lets her go, he knows that Victor Laszlo is better for her. I don't really like movies with happy endings...they always end at the peak of happiness, and everything has to come to an end." When asked if she believed movies altered her view on love, Amanda simply stated, "They're just movies."

Believe in movie-love or not, it is everywhere, especially at this time of the year – barely post Valentines Day. Movie theaters are flooded with so-called "chick flicks" and other movies about love, like Because I Said So, Catch and Release, and Music and Lyrics, which was released yesterday. Each movie has a different plot and different characters, but they all seem to leave us with the same idea. As Elana says, "Movies make love seem like once you attain it, it's the one thing that makes you happy."

But, love it or hate it, want it or need it, Hugh Grant says it best in Love Actually : "Love actually is all around." We can't escape it, so we might as well embrace it.

Stephanie McPherson is a Collegian Columnist, and can be reached at smcphers@student.umass.edu.

'Firebelly' for any age

J.C. Michaels' book tells story through frog

FIREBELLY from page 5

While the first two parts are clearly meant for children, the third part of the novel presents the adult element of the story. The inner workings of Firebelly are played out here. This part of the book constantly changes from first to third person to help the reader fully grasp the situation.

In the book the frog starts off in various warm containers where he is well fed but ends up on the floor of a car, cold and hungry. His physical imperfections (having only two feet) hinder his abilities and would realistically leave him helpless in the outside world. His only weapon of defense is his red belly.

Firebelly toads are native to Asia and are one of the only kinds of frogs whose tongues do not extend beyond their mouths. When these toads become frightened or scared they roll onto their backs and display their vibrant red stomachs, hopefully stunning their predators.

Since the Firebelly toad in the story spends the majority of his days inside his comfortable cage, he finds no reason to use this scare tactic. In fact, he doesn't even realize he has this ability until years after living with Caroline.

The power of the novel comes from the frog's ability to make the people he encounters feel comfortable enough around him to share their secrets. The reader is able to gain knowledge of the other characters through their confessions to Firebelly.

Caroline, for example, shares her fears and troubles of dealing with her divorced parents. She expresses her desire to have her parents reunite so that she doesn't have to move her things back and forth.

"I think teenagers can relate quite a bit to Claire," said Michaels.

Claire, the potentially older version of Caroline, is seen through the eyes of not only Firebelly, but also the narrator. There are parts of Claire's story that cannot be told through Firebelly. Claire's conversations with her school counselor tell her deepest secrets that even the frog doesn't have the privilege of hearing.

Claire's existential battle with herself can be heard in an Avril Lavigne song from her album "Let It Go." "[Lavigne] talks about wanting to know if love is enough," said Michaels. Claire similarly struggles with the ideas of social norms and the meaning of life. She wishes to find the true meaning of life, not the meaning with which society presents her. "It's about viewing the world from your own point of view," said Michaels.

Along with Claire, Firebelly deals with a different problem that at times seems to relate to her own. Firebelly is forced to make an important decision about his life. The only way to make one's life mean something, according to Firebelly, is to affect someone else's life.

"Firebelly," author, J.C. Michaels.

This book is an easy read for all ages, starting at about age eight. The very beginning of the book starts with three primers for the three age groups: children, teenagers and adults. These primers are meant to get the reader in the correct state of mind for the various ideas the book presents. Depending on which primer you read, you could get an entirely different view of the book, so choose carefully.

Teresa Reilly is a Collegian Staff writer and can be reached at treilly@student.umass.edu.

Blake to do Noho

BLAKE from page 5

the pianist will present a week of classes at New England Conservatory with a focus on the work of Chris Connor. One evening class will open to the public. An expanded edition of "All That Is Tied" is available now via download from eMusic.com. The new release includes an additional thirteen songs.

One who is interested in the music of Ran Blake might also enjoy the annual "Magic Triangle" concert series, presented each spring at Bezanson Recital Hall at UMass. This year's season kicks off on February 22 with a performance by guitarist/Pioneer Valley resident Michael Gregory and his trio, featuring bassist Mark Helias and drummer Pheeroan akLaff. An appearance by Michele Rosewoman and New Yor-Uba, a ten-person group, follows in March, and the enduring saxophonist Roscoe Mitchell, from Art Ensemble of Chicago, caps things off with a performance on April 26.

Tickets to these events are $12, and $7 for students. The shows begin at 8 p.m. Previous "Magic Triangle" concerts have featured John McLaughlin, former Five College professor Yusef Lateef, and Hampshire College graduate Mike Ladd.

Brad Farberman is a Collegian Staff writer, and can be reached at Bfarberm@student.umass.edu.

EXTROVERTS WANTED

UMASS AMHERST IS IN SEARCH OF

TOUR GUIDES

1 Lead campus tours for students and families interested in the UMass Amherst Campus.

2 Paid hourly position with a minimum commitment of 5 hours a week including some weekends.

3 Serve as panel speakers, hosts, and tour leaders at on and off campus yield activities such as Open Houses and Accepted Student Receptions.

4 Conduct informational interviews with prospective students and their families.

UMASS AMHERST

To find out more about the position or to pick up an application visit us at the Campus Center Concourse on January 29th & 30th or February 12th - 16th, 2007. Applications are also available at the Visitors Center. Application deadline is February 16th, 2007

LIQUORS 44

Smirnoff 80° 1.75 liter $19.99	Jose Cuervo Cristal Orange & Tequila 1.75 liter $20.99	Parrot Bay Mango-Passion Fruit-Pineapple Coconut 1.75 liter $25.99	Captain Morgan Original Spiced Rum 1.75 liter $25.99
Tattoo 750 mls $13.99	Jose Cuervo Cristal Orange & Tequila 750 mls $17.99	Tanqueray Gin 1.75 liter $29.99	Crown Royal 750 mls $20.99
Kamchatka 750 mls $14.99	Baileys Original Chocolate Mint & Caramel 750 mls $19.99	Belvedere Vodka 750 mls $24.99	Hennessy 750 mls $26.99

DOMESTIC KEGS	1/2 Bbls	1/4 Bbls
Bud	$68.99	$45.99
Bud Light	$68.99	$45.99
Coors Light	$68.99
Miller Lite	$68.99
Keystone Light	$47.99
Pabst Blue Ribbon	$48.99
Natural Light/Ice	$44.99
Busch Light	$47.99

AT THE HADLEY LOCATION
458 Russell St. #9 • Campus Plaza
413-253-9344

Visit us at our other locations:
NORTHAMPTON • 238 King St.
HOLYOKE • 44 Lincoln St.

FULL REDEMPTION AT ALL LOCATIONS

NOT RESPONSIBLE FOR TYPOGRAPHICAL ERRORS

DON'T DRINK & DRIVE

NCAA hopes lie in A-10 tournament

GREENFIELD from page 10

conference games it scheduled besides Louisville," ESPN.com's college basketball editor Andrew Glockner said via email yesterday. "UMass also needed the A-10 to be a bit better than it is."

Teams on the bubble earn their stripes through wins against the Ratings Percentage Index (RPI) Top 50 and Top 100. They also get recognition through tough road wins and neutral-site wins.

And while the Minutemen are 9-5 away from home (6-5 on the road and 3-0 at neutral sites), that record just won't cut it with the selection committee without some big wins against the RPI's Top 50 or some ranked opponents.

ESPN's Andy Katz, who has been an advocate for Travis Ford's Minutemen, believes that the Minutemen didn't do enough to get an elusive at-large bid.

"I thought [UMass] had to win at least two of their big games," Katz said in email. "They won one."

Katz is referring to the four-point win over Louisville on the road, Rick Pitino's bunch was victim to some sharp shooting from the Minutemen, but that win didn't turn out to be the attention-grabbing "W" that UMass needed.

Louisville isn't in the Top 50 in RPI despite its membership in the Big East conference and its recent drubbing of Pittsburgh, and the Cardinals have been inconsistent creatures this season.

The other big game that Katz mentioned was Kentucky. The Minutemen played the Wildcats at Rupp Arena when UK was not ranked but flirting with the Top 25.

UMass lost that one, 82-68, and a win over a good SEC opponent would've looked nice and shiny on a resume come March.

Kentucky, Pittsburgh and Boston College are all in the RPI Top 20, and all were on the Minutemen's schedule this season. The Eagles beat the Minutemen at the Mullins Center by 11, the Panthers beat UMass by 17 and Kentucky won by 14.

They're understandable losses to very good teams, but UMass needed one victory of those three games to make a splash. Conference losses to Temple and Rhode Island don't help, simply because of the Atlantic 10's regular-ness.

But all is not lost. UMass has a shot to win the A-10 Tournament in Atlantic City, although it will be difficult to beat the likes of Xavier and George Washington.

"They've got a great shot to win it on a neutral court in Atlantic City," Katz said.

"I think they have a chance to win the auto-bid," Glockner echoed. "But Xavier is probably the best team in the conference right now."

Agreed. The Musketeers will probably get an at-large bid if they don't win the conference tournament, leaving UMass with just one path to the NCAA's.

This season has been a success for UMass. Having a 17-7 resume is excellent by most standards. But Ford and the UMass faithful won't be satisfied without an invite to The Big Dance.

Katz believes that this season was a significant improvement over the 2005-06 campaign.

"[This season] was a definite step in the right direction," Katz said. "As long as Travis Ford stays and continues to build instead of bolting."

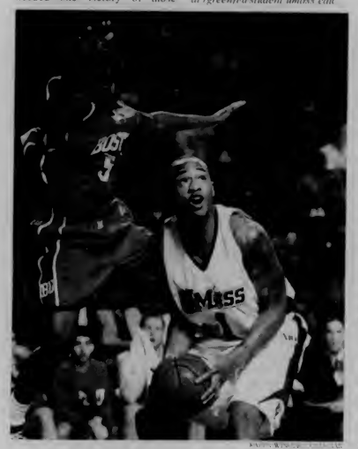
It will be difficult for Ford to regroup after the graduation of Stephane Lasme, Rashaun Freeman and James Life – the team's three top scorers. But Ford will do it with some extra hop if UMass can muster a late-year run into the madness.

It is clear that the Minutemen's fate rests in Atlantic City. UMass is playing for a rank in the conference tournament so they'll have an easier path to get to Xavier, GW, or Rhode Island in the later rounds.

There are only a couple of weeks left until we find out how serious the Minutemen are about getting into the postseason. Xavier ousted UMass in the first round of last year's A-10 Tournament and went on to win it, receiving the automatic bid to the biggest basketball tournament on the planet.

UMass wants to reverse the roles this time around.

Rob Greenfield can be reached at rgreenf@student.umass.edu.



Senior Rashaun Freeman and the Minutemen must win the Atlantic 10 Championship if they want to head to the NCAA Tournament.

UMass travels to Fordham

Sophomore Chris Lowe (left) is fifth on the team in scoring with 6.5 points per game, and is second with 90 assists on the season.

M. BASKETBALL from page 10

The Rams (13-10, 6-5 A-10) are currently on a three-game losing skid, with the latest coming in a 72-68 loss to Charlotte on Saturday.

Fordham is led by junior guard Marcus Stout. Stout is the team's leading scorer, averaging 15.1 points per game. He also leads the team with 60 3-pointers and 40 steals on the year.

While their record may not show it, the Rams boast the best scoring defense in the A-10. They allow an average of 62.6 points per game. UMass ranks eighth in that category, allowing 69.5 points per game, but its offense comes into the game as the second-best in the conference. The Minutemen average 77.2 points per contest.

That, however, didn't help much on Sunday, as the Maroon and White scored 89 points against Temple but still lost, 98-89, three days after one of the biggest wins of the season.

"We did no wrong against Rhode Island," Freeman said. "But to an extent, our team doesn't handle success very well. We got a huge lesson on that last Sunday."

The Minutemen dropped out of first place with the loss to the Owls. They are now one game out of first, behind Rhode Island (16-1[illegible], 9-1 A-10) and Xavier (15-7, 8-3 A-10).

If there were any bright spots in Sunday's loss, it was the play of junior Gary Forbes. Forbes scored a career-high 31 points against the Owls, marking the first time a UMass player dropped 30-plus in a game since Freeman scored 31 of his own against St. Bonaventure in 2004.

The transfer from Virginia also recorded his second double-double of the season in the loss with 14 rebounds. His first came on Feb. 3 against Richmond (16 points, 16 boards). Forbes was one rebound shy of the same feat in Thursday's win over URI, in which he finished the game with 22 points and nine rebounds.

Forbes was brought to UMass to put up these numbers all season, and for whatever the reason he's starting to shine now, his late-season surge makes for perfect timing.

"Gary is playing his best basketball at the right time," Freeman said. "Instead of having a two-headed monster with me and Stephane, now we have a three-headed monster. Gary has a lot of confidence right now, and he's going to go in there and do what he has to do."

The mindset for UMass has to be one game at a time for here on out. With only five games left in the regular season after tonight, the battle for a top seed in the A-10 tournament is all that needs to be focused on. An at-large bid may be out of the question, but leaving Atlantic City with another pair of dancing shoes is the next best thing. And it starts in the Bronx.

Danny Picard can be reached at dpicard@student.umass.edu

Curry remains solid in goal for Terriers

HOCKEY EAST from page 10

It had more quality scoring chances but could not put the puck past BU goaltender John Curry.

The senior goalie played a near-perfect game, surrendering only one score to Gerbe in the second period. Curry is the main reason why the Terriers are in second place in the conference, despite being fifth in team offense.

His goals-against average (1.73) and save percentage (0.937) are second in the league for conference games. Without a doubt, the Minnesota native is currently playing the best hockey of any goaltender in Hockey East, and perhaps the country.

If you consider both HEA and non-conference games, Curry has the second-best save percentage and third-best goals-against average in the nation.

Only senior David Brown of No. 1 Notre Dame (24-5-3) has slightly better numbers than Curry and he has led his team's surprising charge up the rankings and the CCHA standings.

The victory also placed Curry into more serious consideration for the Hobey Baker Memorial Award. Although it is rare for a goalie to win the honor, this year's college hockey season lacks any standout contenders, making Curry a significant possibility.

MAINE JUMPS TO FOURTH

With its starting goalie lost to injury, No. 5 Maine (19-8-2, 12-8-1 HEA) needed a strong performance from Dave Wilson in net. The freshman proved he could ably replace sophomore Ben Bishop, who was hurt in a collision with a UNH player the week before.

Wilson led the Black Bears to a pair of home-ice victories against No. 16 Vermont (15-11-4, 10-7-4 HEA), allowing them to move past the Catamounts and No. 19 Massachusetts (13-10-5, 10-8-3 HEA) in the standings. Giving up only one goal on 64 shots in the two games, Wilson earned HEA Rookie of the Week honors.

In the second game a 1-0 Maine victory, a scuffle broke out between three members of each team – Viktor Stalberg and Torrey Mitchell of Vermont, and Josh Soares and Michel Leveille of Maine, were each assessed the three penalties of roughing, unsportsmanlike conduct and hitting after the whistle.

However, the players timed the fight correctly, having only to spend the last 18 seconds of the game in the penalty box. No. 3 UNH (22-5-1, 17-3-1 HEA) scored five power play goals in two games against Merrimack (3-21-4, 3-16-2 HEA) last weekend. The Warrior penalty kill now ranks last in the conference, operating at less than 84 percent efficiency. The special teams unit had been number six in Hockey East and was one of the reasons for the team's improved play over last season.

New Hampshire's Mike Radja scored a goal and an assist in each game of a home-and-home series sweep over Merrimack.

SUMMER CAMP COUNSELOR ON CAMPUS INTERVIEWS FOR PREMIER GIRLS CAMP IN THE BERKSHIRES

Positions available for talented, energetic, and spirited students who love working with kids. Live in a bunk and teach one of the follow activities: All Team Sports, Individual Sports such as Tennis & Golf, Waterfront & Pool Activities, Art, Dance, Theater, Gymnastics, Newspaper, Rocketry, Radio and more. GREAT SALARIES, room, board and travel. Camp runs June 16th - August 11th.

Apply On-line Now!
www.campdanbee.com
For Further Information: 1-800-392-3752
ginger@campdanbee.com

Interviewers will be on campus TODAY at the "Summer, Co-Op and Internship Fair" in the Lincoln Campus Center, from 10 am - 3 pm.

CAMP DanBee

Start Thinking About Tanning Now!
COUPON EXPIRES MARCH 12
10 Session Package
3 Tans forFree
Specials: Sundays $5 Tan
HAIR EAST salons
• Relaxing Environment • Friendly Staff • Beds with Surround Sound • hours: m-f 10-8 Sat. 10-5 Sun. 12-5

SKYPLEX
SPRINGFIELD'S HOTTEST NIGHTCLUB
3 CLUBS & 3 DJ'S ALL UNDER ONE ROOF!!!
LA & NYC NIGHTLIFE COMES TO SPRINGFIELD
Thursday - 18+ College Night "Hot Body Contest"
Friday - 18+ "Underground Electronic Dance Party" Downstairs
"Top 40" Upstairs
Saturday - 21+ "Party VIP Style"
WANTED: HIP YOUNG PROMOTERS/HOSTS • Earn $$$$
Calling all DJ's
Do you do campus and house parties? Looking for a chance to work at the HOTTEST Nightclub? Here's your chance to become a Club DJ! Signup online at www.info.skyplex.us
18+ $2.00 off admission before midnight with this ad
21+ FREE admission before midnight with this ad
code:umass
10 Stearns Square Springfield, MA 413-827-9000

Solid defense, little success for Fordham

A-10 BASKETBALL from page 10

OFFENSIVE TROUBLES

It's one of the mantras that holds true in all sports: offense may win you games, but defense wins you championships. The Fordham Rams (13-10, 6-5 A-10) have been able to hold up one end of the bargain this season, ranking as the top defensive team in the A-10. But for all of their defensive prowess, they've had a tough time winning games as of late, due to a lack of offensive aptitude.

Fordham is holding conference opponents to just 60 points a night and is limiting A-10 foes to just 41 percent shooting from the field, which was the reason why, despite ranking second to last in scoring, Fordham was able to get off to a 6-2 conference record.

However, the Rams are now riding a three-game conference losing streak, averaging just over 52 points in those three losses. In fact, Fordham was able to hold Rhode Island to just 45 points earlier this season but still lost by a point.

LOOKING TO THE FUTURE

It hasn't been the kind of season any team wants to have, but the La Salle Explorers know they have a bright future if the play of their freshman guards is any indication.

The league office announced Sunday that La Salle guard Kimmani Barrett was named A-10 Rookie of the Week after averaging 13.7 points on 13-of-20 shooting from the field in three losses. Fellow freshman guard Rodney Green has earned A-10 Rookie of the Week honors three times this season.

Temple's Dionte Christmas earned a league-leading fourth A-10 Player of the Week after averaging 24 points on an impressive 60 percent shooting from the field in two wins over Richmond and La Salle. The same day Christmas was recognized by the A-10; he had 30 points against conference rival UMass despite playing with 17 stitches on the webbing between the third and fourth fingers of his left hand. Temple's biggest asset is leading the league in scoring, averaging 22 points, and is fourth in the conference in field goal percentage (51.2). . . Christmas shared A-10 Player of the Week honors with Minuteman and shot-blocking dynamo Stephane Lasme. The senior forward earned the honor after recording his historic third triple-double of the season against Rhode Island in a 77-55 win at the Mullins Center. Lasme had 18 points, 12 rebounds and 11 blocks in the winning effort, and is currently tops in the nation in shot-blocking (123). For the season, Lasme is averaging 13.5 points, 9.5 rebounds and just over five blocks a night.

Kevin Dooley can be reached at kdooley@student.umass.edu.

Saint Louis' Luke Meyer was one of 1,170 student-athletes named to the 2006 Commissioner's Honor Roll for having a grade point average of 3.5 or better. Commissioner Linda Bruno announced on Wednesday. Meyer is fourth on the team in scoring with 9.5 points per game.

Xavier's Amber Harris was named Rookie of the Week in the Atlantic 10 for the 10th time Monday after averaging a double-double over the Musketeers' two games, recording 18.5 points and 12 rebounds per game.

Colonials and 49ers collide

GW tries to end Charlotte's 22-game home winning streak

BY JOE MELONI
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Thursday night in Charlotte, N.C., two winning streaks will collide when the No. 8 George Washington Colonials (21-2, 10-0 Atlantic 10) — who have won 14 straight games — travel to Halton Arena for a showdown with the Charlotte 49ers (17-8, 8-2 A-10), who boast a 22-game home winning streak.

Charlotte hasn't lost at home since Dec. 5, 2005 when Old Dominion beat the 49ers. Since 2001, the 49ers are 67-10 in front of their hometown fans.

The 49ers began A-10 play with five straight wins but dropped two of their last five. On Jan. 26 in Kingston, R.I., the 49ers fell to Rhode Island (6-18, 4-6 A-10), 91-78, and in their last time out, Charlotte dropped a close contest to the Saint Joseph's Hawks (14-10, 6-4 A-10), 67-58.

Charlotte could very easily be tied for first in the conference with GW and Temple if they defeated URI and St. Joe's. Neither of which is in the midst of a good season, although the Rams have been tough at home.

Although the 49ers posted a 1-1 record in last week's play, junior Sabrina Gregory performed admirably for coach Amanda Butler. The guard averaged 15.5 points, four rebounds and three assists during the week. Her calm demeanor in the backcourt stabilized the 49er offense, and this will need to continue if Charlotte plans to defeat both Temple and GW this week.

FRESHMAN LEADS XAVIER

Coaches rarely expect freshman to step in immediately and contribute to a team's success. But Xavier rookie Amber Harris is no ordinary freshman, and this hasn't been an ordinary year for the Indianapolis native.

Harris leads the Musketeers (19-7, 7-3 A-10) in points per game (16.5), blocks (97) and total rebounds per game (8.5).

Last week, the Musketeers won both of their contests — a 28-point throttling of Dayton (9-16, 4-6 A-10) and a 13-point victory at St. Joe's.

In Xavier's win against Dayton, Harris poured in 21 points and grabbed 13 rebounds to go along with her five blocks. Senior guard Suntana Granderson added 19 points on 6-of-12 shooting for the Musketeers. Also, sophomore Jerri Taylor came off the bench with 11 points. Xavier's win over the Flyers marked the ninth straight victory over Dayton for the Musketeers.

Granderson was the star against St. Joe's, scoring 28 points on 8-of-14 shooting — including 4-of-5 from 3-point range. Harris tallied 16 points and senior forward Joei Clyburn notched 19 points off the bench. Xavier's bench players' ability to score points has been key to the Musketeers' success all season.

Harris' week netted her A-10 Rookie of the Week honors for the 10th time this season.

TWO IN A ROW

For the second consecutive week, GW guard Kimberly Beck received the A-10's Co-Player of the Week Award.

In the Colonials two games — both wins — Beck averaged 12 points, five assists and 4.5 steals. The senior guard's leadership is a large reason why the Colonials currently occupy the No. 8 spot in the Associated Press/ USA Today poll.

In the two games, she played an average of 27 minutes and turned the ball over just once. A 10-1 assist-to-turnover ratio is remarkable at this level.

The Colonials won both of their games, both played at home, by at least 30 points.

Against Duquesne (7-16, 2-8 A-10), on Feb. 8, the Colonials took a 12-point lead into the locker room only to outscore the Dukes by 18 in the game's second half.

On March 11, GW led St. Bonaventure (13-12, 3-7 A-10) 44-17 at the half and went onto a 75-41 win. Junior Sarah-Jo Lawrence and senior Kenan Cole both scored 15 points to lead the way for GW.

Four Colonial players ended the game in double figures — Beck and sophomore center Jessica Adair, who fouled out midway through the second half, each scored 11.

Sharing the award with Beck is Saint Louis senior guard Tyler McIlwraith. She averaged 22.5 points in the Billikens' (11-13, 3-7 A-10) two wins last week.

On Feb. 8, the Billikens defeated St. Bonaventure 92-86. McIlwraith scored 26 points, including a school record 14 free throws, to lead the Billikens. Freshman guard Theresa Lisch added 22 points on 5-of-14 shooting and 11-of-14 from the charity stripe. Saint Louis' 92 points set a school record for points in A-10 play.

McIlwraith scored 19 points and handed out nine assists in Saint Louis' second win of the week, a 90-70 win over Fordham (3-22, 1-10 A-10). Lisch played very well again for the Billikens, scoring 14 points. Freshman forward Maggie Hennegan added 14 points and 17 boards for SLU.

If Saint Louis plans to continue its success then it will need to defeat the conference's top two teams. The Billikens travel to Philadelphia on Thursday to take on Temple and welcome GW to the Bauman-Eberhardt Athletic Center on Feb. 18.

ALL THE MARBLES

The showdown between undefeated Temple and GW for the final game of the season is still a possibility. Both teams play Charlotte this week and if they can both get past the 49ers, then the situation will be even more likely.

Joe Meloni can be reached at jmeloni@student.umass.edu.

A-10 Basketball

Attention First-Year Students:
Have you completed MyStudentBody?
It's easy, interesting ... and required for all first-year students. To avoid a registration hold, you must take and pass the course no later than Monday, March 12th. For instructions, go to the University Health Services website,
www.umass.edu/uhs
Center for Alcohol and other Drug Abuse Prevention

CANCUN, ACAPULCO, NEGRIL, MOBAY, NASSAU, S. PADRE, FLORIDA, CRUISES, AND MORE!
Join the Party!!!
SPRING BREAK
STS STUDENT TRAVEL SERVICES
STS Flight Finder™
Save Hundreds on Spring Break Packages!!!
Search airfares to Mexico and the Caribbean and save up to $300 per person. Best Deals Guaranteed!
1.800.648.4849
www.ststravel.com

Citizens of humanity
YOUR FAVORITE JEANS.
ZANNA
downtown Amherst

ASIAN ARTS & CULTURE PROGRAM
Taikoza: Japanese Taiko Drums & Dance
FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 16
Taikoza is a Japanese Taiko drum and dance ensemble that uses the deep and powerful rhythms of the Taiko drums, stringed instruments, metal percussion and bamboo flutes to create an electrifying energy and a highly visual musical art form. Drawing from Japan's rich tradition of music and performance, Taikoza has created an original and high-energy sound that transcends national boundaries.
Concert Hall at 7:30pm
Tickets: $25, $20, $15.
Youth 17 & Under and Five College Students $15, $10, $7
www.taikoza.com
UMASS AMHERST
www.fineartscenter.com/asian 1-800-999-UMAS or 545-2511

HERE'S THE PLAY
Grab a Daily Collegian.
Turn it over.
Get the BEST UMass sports coverage.
BREAK!!

Tired of the Dorms?
IT'S NEVER TOO EARLY TO LOOK FOR AN APARTMENT WITH LINCOLN REAL ESTATE
Lincoln Real Estate
25 N. Pleasant St.
253-7879
www.amherstlincolnrealty.com
Now accepting applications for June 2006

Seven O's
EVERY WEDNESDAY:
♦ KARAOKE ♦
EVERY THURSDAY:
♦ OPEN MIC ♦
♦ LIVE MUSIC ♦
FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 16TH, 2007:
80 PROOF
SATURDAY FEBRUARY 17TH, 2007:
FOUR ON THE FLOOR
♦ STUDENT BAND WANTED ♦
ROUTE 116, 330 AMHERST RD SUNDERLAND, MA 01375 (413) 665-6788
3 PM TO 1 AM M-F
1 PM TO 1 AM SAT&SUN
NEXT TO CLIFFSIDE APTS.

Free Delivery to UMass Menu Online @ andiamo.cc

			3			8	1
	9					7
2	8	4				3
8	4		9			5	2
				3
	3	9			5		6	7
		8				6	7	9
		7					3
	6	3			7

ACROSS
1 Hilo hello
6 Hereditary social group
11 Mormon letters
14 Unconscious states
15 Shalaf and Epps
16 Bullpen stat
17 Bad deeds
18 Composition for nine
19 WWII soldiers
20 Temporary routes
22 Stiff leis hais
24 Kills, old-style
26 Gene of callers
27 Flow out
30 Corn units
31 Dog tags
32 Love of money
34 Repeaton
39 Intestinal tortsude
40 Opposition reminders
41 Solitary
42 Figurine
44 Program choices
45 Tolkien's talking tree
46 Hosiery shade
48 Guinness Book suffix
49 Zodiac sign
52 Shrewd
54 Article of clothing
56 Most rich
60 Writer Levin
61 Eagle's nest
63 English ruling dynasty
64 Court call
65 Light haircuts
66 "Frasier" pooch
67 Before, in verse
68 Dove and Ivory
69 Bargains

DOWN
1 Made a hole in one
2 Valentine word
3 Leave out
4 Saintly glows
5 Took for granted
6 Do the boa thing
7 Latin I lesson word
8 Uses emery
9 Sequoia or sycamore
10 Era of "CHiPs"
11 On the up-and-up
12 Paint additive
13 Pert
21 Small inlet
23 Ado
25 Stuff of wills
27 Breakfast choice
28 Very dry, as champagne
29 Second of a series
31 Apr. addressee
33 High regard
35 Upright stance
36 Actress Skye
37 Burden
38 Brooding place
40 Harden
43 Defeats an incumbent
44 Changed
47 Regret
49 Nimble
50 Less common
51 Really angry
52 Open courtyards
53 Practice piece of music
55 Actor Franco
57 Icelandic saga
58 Begrime
59 Vichy veep
62 Little devil

Find all of today's puzzle solutions online!
WWW.DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

The Moan and Dove
going out downtown is so 90's
themoananddove.com
460 West St. • Rte. 116
Amherst, MA • 256-1710
3pm 'til 1am every day

QUOTE OF THE DAY

"The best love is the kind that awakens the soul and makes us reach for more, that plants a fire in our hearts and brings peace to our minds, and that's what you've given me. That's what I hope to give to you forever."

-Ryan Gosling in "The Notebook"

THE FAMILY MONSTER BY JOSH SHALEK

A COLLEGE GIRL NAMED JOE BY AARON WARNER

GOSH! CAN'T YOU TWO FIND ANYWHERE ELSE ON CAMPUS TO MAKE-OUT OTHER THAN THIS DORM?! I HAVE TO LIVE HERE, TOO, YOU KNOW.
WE COULD GO BACK TO MY PLACE, BUT THAT JUST SOUNDS LIKE A CHEAP PICK-UP LINE.
FORGET IT. I'LL FIND SOMEPLACE ELSE TO GO.
DO YOU WANT TO GO BACK TO MY PLACE?

WELCOME TO FALLING ROCK NATIONAL PARK BY JOSH SHALEK

Melissa sure sleeps a lot
She's a cat
When does she sleep?
Mostly sometimes midday. It depends
Not specific enough. What about when she's awake? Do you know when she hunts?
Why obsess over Melissa's every instinct? I need to learn as much as possible because one of these days she will try to eat me

PAUL BY BILLY O'KEEFE

WAIT, YOU GOT ME A LADY GROOMING SYSTEM WWW?!
SHARE ME THE DETAILS. SOUNDS LIKE SOMEONE'S GOT A CRUSH, THOUGH
WELL IF THAT'S TRUE, HANG ON THERE. I HAVE NO IDEA WHAT HAPPENED BUT IT CAN'T BE GOOD IF THIS IS THE END RESULT
YOU'RE WELCOME. BY THE WAY HAPPY VALEN—
AH, IT'S A LONG STORY I DID IT TO SPITE THIS GIRL WHO WORKS AT THE STORE I BOUGHT IT FROM YOU'RE DARN RIGHT SOMEONE DOES AS IN SHE HAS ONE ON ME
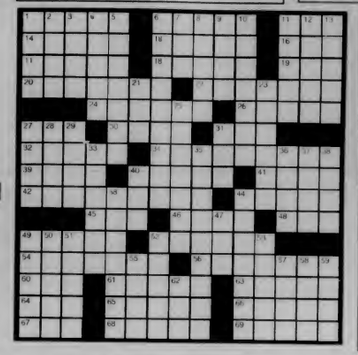
DON'T YOU DARE MAKE THIS ANY WEIRDER.



Submit your comics!
collegiancomics@gmail.com
Yep, this is the Valentines edition. Why waste such beautiful work?

HOROSCOPES

aquarius JAN. 20-FEB. 18
You are perfect from head to toe, even with that boil on your neck.

pisces FEB. 19-MAR. 20
Hold your horses my little lamb chop, you better bring gum with you tonight.

aries MAR. 21-APR. 19
You are highly desirable, like an elf without the weird ears.

taurus APR. 20-MAY 20
All this snow has created perfect conditions for Yetti hunting.

gemini MAY 21-JUN. 21
Tonight is a perfect chance to try out your newest move: The Gasping Chameleon!

cancer JUN. 22-JUL. 22
You're more smooth than a Barry White CD covered in chocolate milk.

leo JUL. 23-AUG. 22
You have found a partner that completes you as lamb does to tunafish.

virgo AUG. 23-SEPT. 22
Step 1: Buy a big box of chocolates. Step 2: Eat until you yuke a fat chunk.

libra SEPT. 23-OCT. 22
A rose in no way represents your capacity for love. Try a cactus.

scorpio OCT. 23-NOV. 21
Use the free time throughout your day to show the peasantry your fancy new hat.

sagittarius NOV. 22-DEC. 21
How quickly snow angels become snow karma sutra.

capricorn DEC. 22-JAN. 19
Asking someone, "Where do babies come from?" is not an effective pick up line.

Chicago Pizzaria
Free Delivery!
PIZZA - CALZONES - SUBS - WRAPS
SALADS - PASTA - DINNERS
RIBS - SEAFOOD - SLICES
PARTY SIZE PIZZA NOW AVAILABLE!
CALZONE SLICES...LIKE NO OTHER!
NOW OPEN FOR LUNCH!
HOURS
Sun-Wed: 11am-2am
Thurs-Sat: 11am-3am
Order For DELIVERY or PICK UP
(413) 549-6073
150 Pleasant St. Next to Pottersville Amherst, MA

MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN MARKETPLACE

ANNOUNCEMENTS

Global Express Tours Spring Break Montreal Party Weekends from $99 Complete bus, hotels, & clubs. Montrealexpress.net 781-979-9001

Valentine's Day Gift to You! FREE! Workout plans, Nutrution Guides, Exercise Plans, Diet Analysis PLUS! Find Local Gym Singles HOMEANDCAMPUS.COM

APARTMENTS FOR RENT

Hobart Condos 3 bedroom, hardwood floors, study area in basement. Cable telephone Internet access) in all bedrooms and study. NOW SHOWING for JUNE and SEPTEMBER. NO FEES. www.amherst-lincolnrealty.com 253-7879

APARTMENTS FOR RENT

2Br apartment for rent by bus stop. $925+ Utilities. 301-938-0038

EMPLOYMENT

The $10 Internet Business. 7-Minute Movie Shows How. www.crazymarket-ingideas.com or call 1-800-693-6897 code: MLMSECRETS

Work Online at Home 23 people needed immediately.Earn PT/FT income. Apply FREE online and get started! 800-807-5176 www.wahusa.com Enter Ad Code 9053

Winter/ Spring positions available. Earn up to $150 per day Exp not required. Undercover shoppers needed To Judge Retail and Dining Establishments. Call 800-722-4791

EMPLOYMENT

Rent us your ears! Listening Experiments $10/hr English must be your first language. Email: phonetics_lab@linguist.umass.edu voicemail: 545-6837

Become a summer orientation counselor and make a difference in the lives of over 4000 new students. Additional information and applications can be found at www.umass.edu/newstudent/contact/student-jobs/counselor The application deadline is February 16, 2007

Dell Campus Reps Needed Promote a top 30 company to gain real-world business & marketing experience! www.repnation.com/dell to apply.

EMPLOYMENT

Bartending $300/day potential. No experience necs. Training provided. 1-800-965-6520 ext.162

HOUSE FOR RENT

Northampton Cathedral ceiling, skylites, hardwood floors, 4-5 bdrms. 9/1 $1950. 413-730-6660

SERVICES

Call Someone who really cares. Birthright of Amherst Area 549-1906, 1800-550-4900 24 hour hotline Free Pregnancy test 233 N. Pleasant St. Amherst www.birthright.org

Pregnancy Testing, HIV Testing, Birth Control, and Emergency Contraception. STI Screening and Treatment. Affordable and confidential. Tapestry Health, 27 Pray Street, Amherst. 548-9992. www.tapestryhealth.com

SERVICES

Celebrate Valentine's Day by knowing your status! FREE ANONYMUS HIV RAPID TESTING FEB 14th UMass Campus Center 9am-3pm Smow date March15th Questions: Call Bob at 413-747-5144 www.tapestryhealth.com

TRAVEL

Global Express Tours Spring Break Montreal Party Weekends from $99 Complete bus, hotels, & clubs. Montrealexpress.net 781-979-9001

WANTED

EGG DONORS NEEDED $10,000 (Plus all expenses) We are seeking women who are attractive, under the age of 29, SAT 1300+ (math+verbal), Physically fit and maintaining a healthy lifestyle. If you have a desire to help an infertile family and would like more information please contact us. Email: Darlene@aperfectmatch.com www.aperfectmatch.com 1-800-264-8828

WANTED

submit your classified online! visit www.daily collegian.com

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

SPORTS THURSDAY

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 15, 2007 SPORTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Battle in the Bronx

UM tries to get back on track at Fordham

By Danny Picard
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts men's basketball team didn't do itself any favors by losing to a sub-par Temple team on Sunday, just three days after it moved into first place for the first time since 1998 with a win over Rhode Island.

The Minutemen (17-7, 7-3 A-10) have spent the last three days trying to restore confidence and re-focus on the task at hand. With all the hoopla about ESPN.com referring to UMass' chances of an at-large bid as being "almost nil," there is plenty of work to be done in preparation for the A-10 Tournament.

And it starts tonight with Fordham.

"We tried to get our focus back and realize our season is far from over," senior captain Rashaun Freeman said. "We do have a good record, and we can have a better record if everyone has the same mindset and know how important this game is [tonight].

"Our problem is that we're worrying about having to win every game for the tournament," Freeman added. "But that's not what it's about. If you're focusing on that, you're not going to be able to focus on the team that you're playing."

UMass travels to the Bronx to take on the Fordham Rams this evening at 9 p.m. The game will be nationally televised on ESPN2.

See M. BASKETBALL on page 7

Automatic bid only option for UMass

Rob Greenfield

This is a somewhat obvious sentiment at this stage in the Massachusetts men's basketball team's season, but as the shadow of a looming March continues to grow, it seemed appropriate to set this straight.

UMass has only one way of making the NCAA Tournament: Atlantic City. The Minutemen have to win the Atlantic 10 Tournament, or captains Rashaun Freeman and Stephane Lasme will have played their UMass careers without sniffing the rarified March Madness air.

The Minutemen entered this trek through college basketball with a powerful out-of-conference schedule and a revamped squad with junior transfer Gary Forbes, freshmen Tiki Mayben and Ricky Harris ready to make an immediate impact.

But the season destined for stardom hasn't really shaped up that way. The Minutemen have a solid 17-7 overall record with a similarly respectable 7-3 conference record.

Both of those marks are a significant improvement from last season's 13-15 record – but they aren't glamorous enough to get a prestigious at-large bid into the NCAA Tournament.

"UMass needed to win a couple of the high-profile non-

See GREENFIELD on page 7

Senior guard James Life recorded six points in Sunday's loss to Temple. He is currently third in the league in 3-point shooting this season, averaging 2.75 baskets from behind the arc per game. Life is seventh in the A-10 in 3-point field goal percentage at 41 percent.

Temple's Dionte Christmas was named A-10 Co-Player of the Week with UMass' Stephane Lasme. The Sophomore leads the Atlantic 10 in scoring with 22 points per game. He netted 16 points, two rebounds and an assist in last night's 77-72 loss to La Salle.

McGuirk lifts BU over BC in Beanpot

By Michael King
Collegian Staff

Hockey is a sport that is decided by the slimmest of margins. Monday's Beanpot final between No. 7 Boston University (15-5-8, 11-4-7 Hockey East) and No. 13 Boston College (16-10-1, 12-8-1 HEA) proved just that. The Eagles played a more complete game but failed to lay claim to the title again.

BU clinched its third consecutive Beanpot and 28th overall on Brian McGuirk's first goal of the year, six minutes into overtime. Sophomore John McCarthy won the face-off in the offensive zone and flipped the puck to McGuirk. The junior forward launched a perfect wrist shot over the left shoulder of BC goalie Cory Schneider. The puck barely missed the crossbar and fell into the net for the game-winner.

Both teams played a highly physical game, with referee Tim Benedetto forced to dole out seven penalties for each team. However, even with that significant number of calls, the Hockey East official appeared reluctant to become the deciding factor in a game of such magnitude.

Hockey East

For instance, BU defenseman Eric Gryba could have easily been called for a roughing penalty with 3:34 left in the third period. The freshman slammed BC forward Nathan Gerbe into the boards after the sophomore failed to skate down an iced puck in the BU zone.

The officials failed to react, even though the hit was clearly after the whistle, and Gryba's only apparent motivation being that he has a nine-inch and 55-pound advantage over the BC winger.

Although the Terriers finished with more shots on goal in the extra period, BC dominated the overtime.

See HOCKEY EAST on page 7

BU's Brian McGuirk scored the game-winning goal in overtime in the Terrier's third-straight Beanpot Championship Monday night.

Atlantic 10 battle doesn't live up to hype

George Washington no match for Xavier in 87-58 blowout

By Kevin Dooley
Collegian Staff

Atlantic 10 fanatics had their battle between two of the conference's elite clashed on their collective calendars when the schedule came out. The Xavier Musketeers (15-7, 7-3 A-10) and the George Washington Colonials (15-7, 6-4 A-10) were predicted to be two of the top contenders teams in the conference for the 2006-2007 campaign. Last Saturday's matchup between the two schools shaped up to be a game one should've taken notice of as each team was have a shot to take the Atlantic 10 Championship in Mexico.

Unfortunately for fans, this game, which was one of the few A-10 battles to grace the airwaves of ESPN or ESPN2 this season, didn't live up to the pre-game hype as the Musketeers handed it to the Colonials, on their home court nonetheless, 87-58. The Colonials are now in the midst of a three-game losing streak coming into Wednesday night's crucial contest with the Saint Joseph's Hawks (14-10, 6-4 A-10) in Philadelphia.

Everyone got into the scoring mix for Xavier Saturday, as seven Musketeers registered at least eight points. Junior guard Stanley Burrell led all scorers with 17 points, while senior forward Brandon Cole contributed a career-high 16 points in the winning effort. Drew Lavender dished out 7 assists along with 15 points.

A-10 Basketball

Xavier shot 52.9 percent from the field while holding the Colonials to just 42 percent shooting.

To add insult to injury, Xavier snapped George Washington's impressive 24-game home winning streak. The streak dated back to two seasons ago when the Colonials fell to the Hawks on March 1, 2005. George Washington had the fifth-longest home winning streak heading into the game.

But more important for Xavier, snapping GW's home winning streak also meant picking up a much needed conference win, as the Musketeers moved a game and a half ahead of GW in the conference standings and are now tied with the Rhode Island Rams (15-10, 8-3 A-10) for first place in the conference prior to Wednesday night's slate of games. Xavier and Rhode Island will tangle Feb. 21st in Xavier. UMass (17-7, 7-3 A-10) lost sole possession of first place after losing to the Temple Owls (11-12, 5-5 A-10) in Philadelphia last Sunday.

To say both Xavier and George Washington have been inconsistent in conference action would be an understatement. Heading into the season, both teams were expected to peel off the parity label the A-10 has been stuck with lately. But prior to Wednesday, the two schools have seven A-10 losses combined and are struggling to beat teams they're supposed to take care of.

In fact, the A-10 is a shining example of parity this season, as each team in the conference has three or more losses in conference games with over two weeks remaining in the regular season. With the exception of basement dwellers St. Bonaventure, LaSalle and Richmond, every team in the conference has notched at least five wins. In two of the prior three seasons, two teams – George Washington, and Saint Joseph's – went undefeated in conference action. The last time every member of the conference had three or more losses came during the 1998-1999 campaign.

Xavier is the only member of the conference with a winning margin of 12 points, and Richmond is the only team losing its conference games in double digits this season (-11).

See A-10 BASKETBALL on page 8

MINUTEMEN TOP RAMS | PAGE 10

PROFESSOR DISPLAYS WHIMSY | PAGE 5

THE MASSACHUSETTS

DAILY COLLEGIAN

NEW ENGLAND'S LARGEST COLLEGE DAILY EST 1890

WINDY : HI: 27 LO: 13 WWW.DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 16, 2007

Former UMass president dies

John W. Lederle, 94, passes away in Florida

By David Humphreys
Collegian Staff

Former University of Massachusetts president John W. Lederle, 94, passed away earlier this week. Lederle, who expanded UMass' once small agricultural campus into the major research university it is known today, died Monday.

Lederle's term as president of UMass brought the addition of almost 50 new buildings, tripled student enrollment, and quadrupled operating budget and faculty positions.

"The entire University of Massachusetts community is saddened to learn of the death of former UMass President John W. Lederle. His leadership... brought growth and expansion to... [UMass] Amherst. The university's current strength as a national educational and research leader is a tribute to his commitment to the University of Massachusetts decades ago," said current UMass president Jack M. Wilson.

Included in the programs started during Lederle's tenure are overseas programs in Italy, Germany, France, Spain, and England, the Committee for the Collegiate Education of Black Students, the Polymer Research Institute, and collaboration among the five colleges, according to a press release issued by the UMass News Office. Also included in his legacy to the campus are a public radio station and the university press.

Always a man of education, Lederle earned hisbachelor's, master's, law degree, and doctorate at the University of Michigan. Following his success as a student, he worked at Brown University as an assistant dean and professor of political science from 1941 to 1944.

Upon returning to the University of Michigan in 1944, Lederle occupied many different academic roles. In 1960, Lederle was inaugurated president of UMass.

During his time at UMass, among his many accomplishments, Lederle received honorary doctorates from Boston University, Northeastern University, Holy Cross College, Lowell State College, Hokkaido University in Japan, and Amherst College.

See LEDERLE on page 2

Former UMass President John W. Lederle contributed 50 new buildings to the campus and increased student enrollment and faculty positions.

Vice Chancellor gets feedback on proposal by using Facebook

By Anna Dollantis
Collegian Staff

A student group was created on the Facebook.com social network Monday, at the request of University of Massachusetts Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs and Campus Life Michael Gargano, in an effort to elicit student feedback concerning the proposed changes to the University's academic calendar.

The current academic calendar at UMass runs from the day after Labor Day until December 23, and the spring semester runs from January 29 to May 24.

"We want to reduce the long winter session. We want a calendar that matches the calendars of our friends at universities that have the characteristics of an earlier September start, an earlier December finish, an earlier January start, and a very early May completion," wrote sophomore Communication Disorders major Caroline Moss, creator of the group.

The "Gargano's Official Petition for a New Academic Calendar," group was created when Moss, a student receptionist at the Vice Chancellor's office, was approached by Gargano to offer a personal opinion on the calendar. "He asked me what I thought the best way to reach all the students within a week's time would be. I suggested a Facebook group in lieu of a petition and he said, 'go for it,'" said Moss.

UMass Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs, Michael Gargano.

According to Gargano's update report for the Five Colleges, the fall semester would begin the Tuesday after Labor Day and end (including exams) on December 23. The spring semester would begin around January 15, and graduation would be no later than the second weekend in May.

"Almost all of the universities where we compete for students have earlier start dates for the fall and spring. Generally they start before Labor Day or immediately after

See GARGANO on page 2

Online books are 'the future'

UMass professor creates free online textbook

By Kevin Foley
Collegian Staff

College students spend an average of $900 a year on textbooks, according to a MassPIRG study. This figure is forcing some to look for alternatives such as buying used books or using library reserves. Robert Moll, a computer science professor at the University of Massachusetts Amherst, says the answer is online.

"I think [online textbooks] are the future. I think it's coming," Moll said. "You can carry a laptop now that's lighter than a book you can buy."

Moll's online book, JAVA – An Introduction to Java Programming, is used as the textbook for Computer Science 121 – An Introduction to Problem Solving with Computers, at no cost for students. "It will remain free at UMass because we will insist that the publisher make it free for Massachusetts state colleges," Moll said.

"Major book publishing companies will also benefit from the online versions of books," said Moll. "There is no production cost, no distribution cost and they don't have to sell them through a bookstore."

Saffiran Vomzomer, program director for MassPIRG, thinks that online books are only one small part of a large selection of alternatives to expensive textbooks. "Online books are something that we've looked at, but right now only a small percentage of students are utilizing them."

"Often publishers put restrictions on online books that make them impractical for students to use, such as putting a limit to the amount of times they can view the book," Vomzomer said.

Instead of online books, Vomzomer believes that a more conventional method of supplying affordable textbooks should be used. "Right now we should be doing everything we can to make the used textbook market more vibrant."

"Publishers are extremely fearful of a secondary book market," said Moll. "If a student sells a book to his friend, or back to the book store, the publishing company doesn't make any money off of that. You don't have that problem with online books."

See ONLINE on page 2

Students react to UMass' newly-passed tuition hikes

By Cara Grannemann &
Eden Unver
Collegian Staff

The buzz around the University of Massachusetts campus isn't all about riots and snow days – it is about the daunting, newly-passed tuition increase for the 2007-2008 semester. Although UMass is known to have one of the lowest college tuitions in the state, students will soon feel a financial sting.

Many students are surprised at the tuition increase, believing money from increases in the past has been misused.

"When we checked this year, he [Chancellor Lombardi] took the money that he promised away and instead, reduced the student-teacher ratio," said president of the Graduate Student Senate Jeff Napolitano, in a previous Collegian article. "He cried 'poor' and said we didn't get enough money from the state, but we have to use the money to repair buildings instead."

Construction seems to be a never-ending project around campus, and according to some students, is not a productive use of their tuition.

"I am a little upset about it [tuition increase] because I think it will be going to the 'New Dirt' buildings that I will never use," said junior Lindsay Carvalho.

Other students have commented on the recent increase of police presence on campus, saying it is not a wise way to spend the money.

"How does the University believe it is justifiable to have eight cops for a 400-person party, but only one professor for a 500-person class?" SGA president Elvis Mendez said in a recent Collegian article.

UMass has long prided itself on affordable, quality education, but with rising student costs, it is unknown how long that reputation will last.

"[I came here because of] the price. A lot of people come here because it is more affordable," said freshman Max Rudenstein. Fellow freshman Jacob Gilbert agreed, saying, "[I came here] because I could not afford other schools."

According to a press release from the UMass News Office, the money from tuition increases will be partially allotted to student financial aid. Yet the press

See TUITION on page 2

Parents convicted for caging kids face 2 years in prison

Michael, left, and Sharon Gravelle each face eight felony and 16 misdemeanor charges for allegedly forcing some of their adoptive special needs children to sleep in cages.

By Thomas J. Sheeran
Associated Press

NORWALK, Ohio – A couple who forced some of their 11 adopted, special-needs children to sleep in wire-and-wood cages were sentenced to two years in prison Thursday, after the parents insisted they were only trying to keep the kids safe.

Two of the children, however, said in statements read in court that they were treated harshly while they lived with Sharen and Michael Gravelle. One wrote that they should be imprisoned "for as long as my siblings had to be in cages."

Sharen Gravelle told the court the children were never confined as punishment but rather to protect them, including a child who wanted to jump out a second-floor window.

"Would you prefer that we let them jump? Either way, we'd be here. The difference is they're still alive," she said in a tearful, 26-minute statement.

Gravelle blamed social services officials for not helping her and

See CAGE on page 2

Judge orders new DNA test

By Matt Sedensky
Associated Press

DNA sample be taken from Anna Nicole Smith's body Thursday as he heard often fiery arguments in the fight over the former Playboy Playmate's remains and custody of her infant daughter.

The swab of Smith's cheek was to be taken in the afternoon, despite the objections of attorneys for her longtime companion, Howard K. Stern, and her estranged mother, Vergie Arthur, and testimony from the medical examiner and DNA experts that such an additional sample was likely not necessary.

Circuit Judge Larry Seidlin said he wanted to make sure all samples were taken before Smith was buried, so her body wouldn't have to be exhumed.

"When we bury her, I want it to be forever," he said in the second day of an emergency hearing.

Smith, 39, died Feb. 8 after collapsing at a Florida hotel.

As the proceedings dragged on, investigators in the Bahamas went into a mansion that Stern and Smith shared, though the officers declined to say why they were there. Stern filed a burglary report claiming a computer, home videos and other items were taken from the house after Smith's death.

Stern claims he is executor of Smith's will and wants to have her buried next to her son in the Bahamas. Arthur wants her daughter buried in her home state of Texas.

"She sits here today to take her to Texas and put her in the ground all alone – and it's sad and it's sick," Stern's lawyer, Krista Barth, told the judge in attacking Smith's mother.

Arthur's attorney, Stephen Tunstall, said his client "wants to take her home to Texas to bury her with the rest of her family." Arthur wiped tears away outside an elevator during a break in the proceedings.

Photographer Larry Birkhead hopes DNA taken from Smith will help prove he fathered the for-

Anna Nicole Smith, 39, died Feb. 8 after collapsing in a Florida hotel.

See SMITH on page 2

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN
CXVII
ISSUE 85

113 Campus Center University of Massachusetts Amherst, MA 01003
• 413-545-3500 •
• Fax 413-545-3699 •
www.dailycollegian.com

EDITOR IN CHIEF Eric Athas
MANAGING EDITOR Rob Greenfield
BUSINESS MANAGER Dan Conti
PRODUCTION MANAGER Amanda Allen
NIGHT SUPERVISOR Sherel Wolnik
ADVERTISING MANAGER Jameson Porter
ADVERTISING PRODUCTION Molly Eggleston
ARTS & LIVING EDITOR Morgan Rousseau
COPIES EDITOR Adam Stagin
EDITORIAL EDITOR Tucker Merrick
NEWS EDITOR Matt Belliveau
SPORTS EDITOR Danny Picard
SPORTS EDITOR Jon Pelland
CIRCULATION MANAGER Jeff Penti
FINANCE MANAGER David Valade
ASSISTANT OPERATIONS Linda Wallack
ASSISTANT ADVERTISING Nicole Poddester
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Tim McCall
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Sydney Towne
ASSISTANT NEWS Anna Dolianitis
ASSISTANT NEWS Nicole Bowsjakunkul
ASSISTANT EDITORIAL Brendan Hall
ASSISTANT SPORTS Jeremy Rue
WEB EDITOR James Hale
PHOTO EDITOR Toan Trinh

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN IS PUBLISHED MONDAY THROUGH FRIDAY DURING THE UNIVERSITY OF MASSACHUSETTS ACADEMIC SEMESTER. THE COLLEGIAN IS INDEPENDENTLY FUNDED, OPERATING ON ADVERTISING REVENUE. FOUNDED IN 1890, THE PAPER BECAME KNOWN AS ALMA LITERIS AND THE COLLEGE SIGNAL IN 1903, THE WEEKLY COLLEGIAN IN 1914 AND THE THE WEEKLY COLLEGIAN IN 1956. PUBLISHED DAILY SINCE 1967, THE COLLEGIAN HAS BEEN BROADCAST SINCE JANUARY 1994. FOR ADDITIONAL RATES AND INFORMATION, CALL (800)-LAST-WORD BETWEEN 8:30 A.M. AND 3:30 P.M.

PRODUCTION CREW
On staff today

NIGHT EDITOR
Sheryl Wolnik

COPY EDITOR
Courtney Souza

PRODUCTION SUPERVISOR
Chris Martin

If you see news happening, call us at 545-1809 and snap a photo with your cell phone, then send it to news@dailycollegian.com

UMass remembers former president

LEDERLE from page 1

Between 1958 and 1986, Lederle also served as a member of various committees and boards. Included in his civic career, Lederle served as a member of the Board of Trustees of the Clarke School for the Deaf, a member of the executive committee of the National Association of State Universities and Land Grant Colleges, member of the Board of Trustees of Hampshire College chairman of the Advisory Commission of the Massachusetts Board of Higher Education, and chairman of the National Conference of Directors of Bureaus of Government Research.

In 2005, Lederle reflected that he was very proud of gaining an increase in state funding for UMass during his term as its president.

"Our progress in the 1960s meant going to the governor and the legislature year after year with larger and larger budget requests for construction and facility expansion, not only in Amherst, but later in Boston and the UMass medical school in Worcester. Once, the Senate president in my presence remarked, 'I hope facetiously, that I had taken more money out of the state treasury than any other man in history,'" Lederle was quoted as saying in the press release.

The Lederle Graduate Research Center, dedicated to him in 1983, best represents the monumental changes Lederle brought with him in 1960 to the UMass campus. His commitment to excellence and education can still be seen anywhere on campus today.

David Humphreys can be reached at dhumphre@student.umass.edu

Students feel left in dark after tuition increase announced

TUITION from page 1

release also stated that UMass students will receive $402 million in financial aid this year alone – only $74.8 million of that from the University.

As fees increase, many students feel they might be left in the dust.

"It kind of sucks ... I am working on getting money from Commonwealth College scholarships. I have been trying to get a job here, but I have been less than successful," said Gilbert.

Students not as directly affected by the increase still feel the pinch within their families.

"It does not affect me so much personally, but it affects my father and my whole family. It's just there are so many things he will have to pay for," said Carvalho.

As fees increase, in-state and out-of-state tuitions will become more alike. According to numbers in yesterday's article, in-state students will have an increase of approximately $815, while out-of-state students will pay approximately $671 more.

While some students seemed informed about where their tuition money is spent, others replied with blank, confused stares.

On Feb. 8 many of those informed seemed to be unhappy enough about the administration's distribution of money to brave freezing temperatures and rally outside the campus center, while less concerned students remained cozy and warm inside the Bluewall.

The high quality of education for a lesser price has attracted many high-ranking students across Massachusetts and the United States. These increases may be a factor in future student enrollment, turning our previously recognized academics and tuition in for a less attractive UMass.

Gargano wants calendar change

GARGANO from page 1

Labor Day for the fall and for the spring semester around January 12 or 14. The proposed change in dates will enable the Amherst campus to be more competitive," said Gargano in his proposal.

Gargano cites the academic calendar and the late final exam date as a serious obstacle to the students hoping to obtain employment or internships over the summer. "Students at competing universities complete the spring semester around May 10 and can start their internship by May 17; this is appealing to the employer. Due to our late schedule, UMass Amherst students cannot start until June," he said.

Students have been reacting favorably to the Vice Chancellor's proposal. "I fully support the change in the academic calendar because of the difficulty students have in finding jobs during both summer and winter break," said junior History and Psychology major, Kristina Winterbottom.

"Compared to many other large universities, UMass has an extremely long winter break, averaging about 1.5 weeks longer than others. We also start our summer vacation much later," wrote Moss.

Several steps are required to change the academic calendar. The Calendar Sub-Committee of the Academic Matters Council of the Faculty Senate would review the proposal, consider the benefits and detriments of the proposed change, and offer suggestions. The report would then be reviewed by the full Faculty Senate, the Provost, the Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs, the Deans, and ultimately, Chancellor John V. Lombardi.

The University anticipates that a decision will be made by late spring, and the new calendar would be put in place in the fall semester of the 2008-2009 academic year.

"I definitely support a change to the academic calendar," said sophomore Music Education major Jack Byrne, "I'm always bored about halfway through Christmas break anyway...and that's always the point where my mom starts nagging at me to get a job."

"Some advantages would be that job opportunities would be easier to come by, as many of them are on a first come/first serve basis. Disadvantages might be for people who want to take classes over winter session. It seems like this new calendar would make taking classes during the winter really hectic," said Byrne.

Implementing the calendar change, however, would allow the University to begin offering four-week courses during the summer term, according to the proposal. "Currently, students arrive for the fall semester on Sunday, September 3, and classes begin Wednesday, September 6. The campus is fully prepared and functioning to welcome students back. There would be a cost savings to start classes on the first Monday in September. This consideration applies to the spring semester," read the proposal.

The proposed change would also allow for a "two week cushion" for the completion of summer renovation projects on the UMass campus. "The current schedule with a May 31 graduation date does not provide much flexibility to complete the projects and to factor in weather-related construction delays," read the proposal. An earlier graduation date would also provide more planning time for the New Students' orientation for incoming freshmen, according to Gargano.

"[Gargano] is proposing this new academic calendar for the benefit of the student, so I think he just wanted to make sure students felt strongly about this issue, which now, we can see they do," said Moss.

The Facebook group has grown to include over 2,000 members in four days, and has received over 75 postings on its discussion board.

Anna Dolianitis can be reached at adoliani@student.umass.edu.

Professor introduces online textbook to lower student costs

ONLINE from page 1

Online books aren't perfect, according to Moll. "You can get lost in an online book just as easily as a paperback, but you have a lot of tools at your disposal." His online programming book contains embedded questions to help students understand the course material. "It makes students better readers and better absorbers of technical material when they read a little bit and answer a question about it," he said. "Pedagogy ought to trump technology."

In a fall 2004 class, Moll used a hardcover textbook. "Only 65 percent of the kids passed the final," he said. "The next fall, I used the online book and 85 percent of the kids passed the final."

Although Moll believes the book is effective, he also recognizes that it wasn't easy to make. "The making of my book was done with the help of $500,000 in grants from the National Science Foundation," he said.

There are some technical problems that come along with using an online textbook, according to Moll. "There have been minor glitches," he said. "My experience with the tech side has been pretty good though."

The Web site, www.textbookrevolution.org, offers roughly 500 online textbooks for free. The site was created by a Northeastern student for the purpose of offering a no-cost alternative for textbooks.

The site is scheduled to be redesigned in 2007, with the hope of offering over 1,000 textbooks by the end of the year.

Anna Nicole's death causes stir

Florida judge Larry Seidlin ordered another DNA sample be taken from Anna Nicole Smith as lawyers battled over her body, which in life has won her fame and a stake in a billionaire's fortune.

SMITH from page 1

mer centerfold's 5-month-old daughter, Dannielynn, who could inherit millions.

The judge has said the dispute could be lengthy. The hearing, which began Wednesday, stretched into the afternoon Thursday and was to continue Friday.

Debra Opri, an attorney for Birkhead, said earlier in a news release that she was satisfied DNA samples would be provided by Florida authorities. Opri has said Smith's DNA is needed to connect her with Dannielynn, and to help prove there was no baby switch.

Prince Frederic von Anhalt, the husband of the actress Zsa Zsa Gabor, has said he had a decade-long affair with Smith and may also be the father. He filed legal documents Thursday in California seeking a DNA test to determine if he is the father of the baby.

Smith's body remained at the medical examiner's office, and Seidlin said it would stay there. "This body's not leaving Broward County till I make the ruling."

Smith was the widow of Texas oil tycoon J. Howard Marshall II, whom she married in 1994 when he was 89 and she was 26. She had been fighting his family over his fortune since his death in 1995.

A judge in the Bahamas issued an injunction Tuesday preventing the baby from being taken out of the country until the custody case is resolved.

Arthur wants to be named guardian of her granddaughter and sought the order because she feared Stern would take the child from the Bahamas, her lawyer said.

Parents charged in child abuse case plan to appeal convictions her husband, Michael, control the destructive behavior of some of the youngsters.

CAGE from page 1

The children, who suffered from problems such as fetal alcohol syndrome and a disorder that involves eating nontood items, ranged in age from 1 to 14 when authorities removed them in September 2005 from the Gravelles' home in Wakeman, about 60 miles west of Cleveland. They were placed in foster care in fall 2005 and the couple lost custody last March.

Sharen Gravelle kept her head down taking notes while the judge read the sentences. Michael Gravelle sat back in his chair, holding his face in his left hand.

Each could have received up to five years in prison for each of the four felonies they were convicted of in December. They also were convicted of seven misdemeanors.

Michael Gravelle, his face red and his voice rising, told the judge he and his wife "felt we were being led by the Lord" when they decided to bring the first child into their home. He said problems began when they took in a group of siblings with an array of behavior and emotional problems.

"What do you do with these kids?" Michael Gravelle asked. "I prayed constantly for the answer."

He said the enclosures resulted from the suggestions of a social workers, who recommended strict rules to improve the children's behavior.

"I'm begging you," Michael Gravelle told the judge. "I do not deserve jail."

The two children whose statements were read in court, a girl and a boy, were in the courtroom Thursday. The boy wrote that he was "thankful that part of my life is behind me."

He said of his new foster parents, "Because of them I don't have to steal food. I can use the bathroom whenever I want. Never again will I have to sleep in a box."

The girl's statement said Sharen Gravelle treated the children more harshly than her husband did.

"Mom, you walked around like you were God, then whenever you did go places you were Mother Teresa taking in the poor black kids that no one wanted," she said.

The girl said the Gravelles "are grown adults who know the difference between right and wrong. So I ask that they get as much time in jail for as long as my siblings had to be in cages."

The Gravelles have said they will appeal their convictions. The judge allowed them to remain free on bond pending the appeal.

The couple has said they needed to keep some of the children in enclosed beds with alarms to protect them from their own dangerous behavior and stop them from wandering at night.

Long-shot bill would dry Mass. state college campuses

By Bobby Cummings
The Daily Free Press (Boston U.)

BOSTON — Looking to curb what he identifies as safety issues related to growing alcohol abuse by college students, a Massachusetts lawmaker has introduced a bill into the State House that would ban alcohol – even for students over 21 – at all state colleges and universities, although he said the bill is unlikely to pass.

Rep. Frank Hynes (D-Marshfield), who proposed a similar measure that failed in 2001, said student drinking has become even more prevalent since he first filed the bill. Hynes identified binge drinking as a worsening trend and said alcohol-related incidents, including students' deaths and the rape and abuse of female students, prompted him to file the bill.

"Drinking is no longer confined to weekends," he said in an email. "Weekends are now beginning on Wednesday nights."

The bill, expected to draw fire from college students, has also been questioned by state college officials.

Hynes said some college officials have argued alcohol should not be banned because students must learn how to handle the newfound freedom that comes with the college experience.

"Such destructive behavior should not be tolerated under any circumstance," he said. "Most college undergrads are under 21 and are thus violating the law if they choose to drink."

Peter Chisholm, director of External Affairs at Framingham State College, said although the university's administration has not considered the proposal, he was sure such a bill would affect the climate on university campuses.

"I think the goal can be achieved administratively," he said, "but in light of actions that have taken place on some campuses, I can understand why [Hynes] filed the legislation."

Chisolm said he expected students – especially those over 21 – would also oppose the bill.

David Ostroth, vice president of Student Affairs at Bridgewater State College, said implementing a law to curb underage drinking would not be any more effective than the existing university policies.

"Some students who would violate the [school] policy would violate the law as well," he said.

Representatives from several other state colleges would not comment on the bill because they were not familiar with its specifics.

New WORLD Theater

365 DAYS PLAYS

UMass Amherst FINE ARTS CENTER
www.fineartscenter.com

365 Days/365 Plays by Suzan-Lori Parks
New WORLD Theater presents Week #15 in the series, Feb. 22, 23 & 24, 2007 at 8 pm and Mount Holyoke College Department of Theatre Arts presents Week #16 of the series March 2 & 3 at 8 pm and March 4 at 2 pm. All shows at Rooke Theater, Mount Holyoke College.

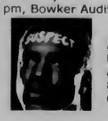
• Special Event
2007 ANNUAL RAND LECTURE: Suzan-Lori Parks. March 5th at 4:30 pm, Rand Theater. Presented by Univ. of MA Department of Theater

Duurbaar (unstoppable)
by Ananya Dance Theatre
March 14, 2007
8 pm, Bowker Auditorium



Disposable Men
by James Scruggs
April 19 & 20, 2007
8 pm, Northampton Center for the Arts

Tickets available at FAC Box Office, 545-2511. For more info about the shows visit our website or call NWT at 545-1972

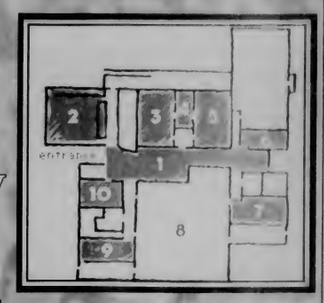
www.newworldtheater.org

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

THE CAMPUS SCENE

A WEEKLY LOOK AT THE UNIVERSITY LIFESTYLE

Carle inspires very education-hungry children



By Melissa D'Amico
Collegian Staff

Many people, at one point or another in their lives, wish that they could go back to the days of their childhood. Lunch boxes, finger paintings, and picture books, always seem like the perfect alternative to stressful jobs, thesis papers, and all-night study sessions. A walk through the Eric Carle Museum of Picture Book Art will fill you with childhood memories, making you feel just like a kid again. "From The Very Hungry Caterpillar," to "10 Little Rubber Ducks," the work and illustrations of Eric Carle will lead to the greater appreciation of picture book authors.

Founded in part by Eric Carle, the celebrated author and illustrator of more than 70 books including "The Very Hungry Caterpillar," "Brown Bear, Brown Bear What Do You See?," and "Do You Want to Be My Friend?," The Eric Carle Museum of Picture Book Art is the first full-scale museum in this country devoted to national and international picture book art.

Carle and his wife, Bobbie, wanted the museum built with the desire to celebrate the art that we are first exposed to as children. Through the further discovery of images that are familiar and adored, it is the Museum's goal to provide an "enriching, dynamic, and supportive context for the development of literacy and to foster in visitors of all ages and backgrounds the confidence to appreciate and enjoy art of every kind," according to the museum's Web site.

In order to fully appreciate and understand the importance of art and illustrations within picture books and within the lives of young children, it is important to understand exactly what a picture book is. While many people may believe that a picture book and a story book are the same thing, most writers and illustrators believe differently.

A picture book is a book in which the illustrations play a significant role in telling the story. It has been said by artists such as Uri Shulevitz, that picture books only use words to tell what the pictures cannot show. However, a story book is a book in which the story is told and meant to be understood using words, while the illustrations are used to amplify the words.

Upon entering the Museum, visitors are greeted by four, brightly colored, wall size canvases painted by Eric Carle. The vibrancy of the canvases brings life to the otherwise simple hall.

The Museum's exhibits are shown throughout its three main galleries. Currently located in the West Gallery is the art of Eric Carle, entitled "Eric Carle Picture Writer."

The pieces shown throughout "Eric Carle Picture Writer" show the sources of some of Carle's stories, as well as show his greatly admired collage technique. A section of the exhibit shows the preliminary stages Carle goes through during the creation of his books. This exhibit also features some examples of Carle's non-book art, as well as pieces from the Museum's permanent collection.

Walking through the exhibits, it is noticeable that the artwork is hung lower compared to many other museums. Much of the museum's work is purposely hung low to allow visitors of all ages to enjoy.

The Central Gallery is currently showing an exhibit by Richard Yarde entitled "Stompin at the Savoy." Richard Yarde is one of the most notable watercolor painters working in America. "A passionate lover of music and dance, he has found inspiration many times in the irrepressible energy of the Savoy Ballroom, which from 1926 to 1958 was home to some of the greatest dancers and musicians of the swing era," according to the museum's Web site.

Yarde began working with author Bebe Moore Campbell to develop his first children's book. The book tells the story of a little girl, Mindy, who does not want to perform her dance recital until after she experiences the Savoy Ballroom. Richard Yarde lives in Northampton and is a professor of art at the University of Massachusetts. This exhibit will be open for viewing until April 29, 2007.

The third gallery within the museum, the East Gallery, is currently showing the work of Quentin Blake, entitled "The Theatre of the Page." Blake, a greatly celebrated British writer and illustrator, has created hundreds of books. He is admired both for his own books, as well as his work with Roald Dahl, beginning in 1978 for "The Enormous Crocodile."

Within the East Gallery, the exhibition represents a variety of aspects of Blake's style, his creation process, as well as some of his collaborations. Some of these works include "Mr. Magnolia," many of the Roald Dahl books, "The Green Ship" and "Michael Rosen's Sad Book." The exhibit also includes works by Honoré Daumier, George Cruickshank, and Pablo Picasso, as a way to reflect the artists who influence Blake's work. This work will be on exhibit until March 11, 2007.

The Museum's galleries are not the only opportunity for visitors to celebrate storybook artists, and relive memories of their childhood. The Museum is also home to a reading library filled with storybooks for children, and visitors of all ages are welcomed to enjoy books on their own, or during a scheduled story time reading.

The Museum's auditorium also holds a variety of performances, film screenings, and lectures throughout the year. Currently showing in the auditorium until March 31 is "Welcome to the Carle," a film about the Museum and how to get the most out of your visit.

Also showing in the auditorium from February 19 through February 22 is the Pioneer Valley Performing Arts Children's Theater's adaptation of "How Tom Beat Captain Najork and His Hired Sportsmen." This is a book originally written by Russell Hoban and illustrated by Quentin Blake that tells the story of Tom, a boy who spends his time fooling around. His Aunt Fidget Wonkham-Strong believes that Tom does too much of this, so she gets Captain Najork and his hired sportsmen to teach Tom a lesson.

The Museum's Art Studio is an area where visitors of all ages are encouraged to come and create their own story book art. The activites within the studio change throughout the year, to incorporate the different exhibits, but all are meant to inspire fun and appreciation of art through their creation. Currently in the studio, until February 25, the activity is called "The Magic of Quentin Blake."

The Two Sister's Café offers an area for visitors to relax and recharge during their visit to the museum. From sandwiches to baked goods, there is something for everyone to enjoy. Picnic tables found in the orchard outside are the perfect area to have a family picnic during the warm weather. Also, the Museum's gift shop has a variety of children's books and other gifts to enjoy after your visit.

So, whether you love art, story books, or just want to feel like a little kid again, the Eric Carle Museum of Picture Book Art is a place to enjoy and appreciate it all.

The Museum, located at 125 West Bay Road in Amherst, is open 10 a.m. to 4 p.m. Tuesday through Thursday, 10 a.m. to 5 p.m. on Saturday, and 12 p.m. to 5 p.m. on Sunday. More information on admission and events can be found at the Museum's Web site, www.picturebookart.org.

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

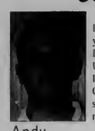
EDITORIAL OPINION

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 16, 2007

"I may not agree with what you say but I will defend to the death your right to say it." Voltaire

EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Going way too far



Andy Smith

Sometimes things happen in college that just makes you scratch your head. For example, the December Southwest riot. The University of Massachusetts lost the Division I-AA National Football Championship, so students broke stuff intentionally. It really doesn't make sense.

Then there are other things that college students do that seem uncalled for, but are done rather innocently.

Take the recent story of Macalester College in St. Paul, Minn. The school made national news over the weekend when two students decided to take a party theme a little too far. Upon hearing the theme of the party was to come dressed "politically incorrect," one student showed up at the January 16 party dressed as a Ku Klux Klan member and the other wore a blackface with a noose around his neck. That's too politically incorrect if you ask me.

I know those two were probably trying to have fun and get a laugh out of their friends, and maybe they succeeded. I doubt they had any intention of making national news for their costumes. However, they crossed the line between having a joke and taking something too far. To come to a party dressed as a person of a different skin color or ethnic background is one thing, but to represent a time of ignorance and bigotry is another.

Unfortunately, we live in a world where racial inequality is still a prevalent issue. Every February, Black History Month, our society is reminded that at one time racial disparity and segregation were commonplace. For the record, I have never once looked at a person of a different skin color or ethnic background and found them to be inferior to me in any way. In fact, I live for the day when this issue is put to rest and we never have to talk about it again. I cringe when I hear about race being involved in any issue in society.

The recent Super Bowl had gigantic implications that went beyond the National Football League. Ninety million people were able to watch two black coaches and see that they too are able to take their team to a level beyond mediocrity. Hopefully in the years to come, more black coaches can play in the most watched game of the year so it doesn't have to be a big deal anymore.

Every time progress seems to be made with racial issues, something comes along and takes it away.

Then there is the story of Barack Obama, Senator of Illinois. Recently, he announced his candidacy for the 2008 Presidential Election. So much is made about not having a woman president or having a black president. Now both he and Hilary Clinton are in the running, with the public saying they both have a legitimate chance to win. Without getting into a debate on political issues, here's hoping he wins (Note: I am strictly independent and refuse to align myself with either party). Then all the talk of not having someone other than a white man in office can be put to rest.

The point is this: Every time progress seems to be made with racial issues, something comes along and takes it away. Something as simple as two college kids showing up to a party at a small, 2,000-person school in St. Paul, Minn. can have a national influence on racial issues. It is unfortunate that those two did not think that what they were wearing was taking it too far. There is no doubt that they did not show up to the party with the intention of making news, but somewhere, something or someone has to give. Someone has to let morality take over and tell one of those two, "Hey, you really should change into something else."

It might not be as funny, but racial inequality is not funny at all. It is a shame that we are still talking about this today. I understand it is our history, but I thought the whole point of learning about history was so we don't make the same mistake twice.

Unfortunately, Macalester isn't the only school where things like this are taking place. According to the Associated Press' initial account of the Macalester incident, Trinity College, Whitman College, Texas A&M University, and John Hopkins University have all had reported parties with racially-devoted themes. Quite frankly, that is too many. It is terrible to think that there have been more racially-motivated things at parties across the country like this one, but they have not been reported. It needs to stop. I know one voice doesn't have a large effect on this issue, but hey, it's progress.

Andy Smith can be reached at asmith@student.umass.edu

An internship not worth pursuing

Brendan Hall

When the effectiveness of the Office of Information Technologies comes up in conversation around the UMass campus, the joke often goes something like this:

This is your computer.

This...Is...Your...Computer...In...The...UMass...Dorms.

But like a good stand-up comedian, OIT just keeps on building and building up to bigger and bigger laughs. The latest guffaw goes something like this:

In a release dated Jan. 24, OIT announced they will be accepting applications for its annual summer internship program. They will be funding students from nine schools – seven community colleges, UMass-Boston and Alahama State (yes, random) – to "work in a variety of technical positions within OIT" from the first week in July to the last week of August.

A word to those applying: don't.

You're basically working during the least active time of the year. So while crunching numbers and writing new programs is cool and all, you don't get the experience of having to deal with frustrated customers, who never cease to pester by the hundreds come the beginning of every semester. Half the job of any employment is pleasing the people you serve – that's what makes the good companies good. You won't learn anything about people skills at this internship.

You won't learn anything about people skills at this internship.

Seriously, OIT, you're already spreading yourselves thin as it is. Give yourselves a break.

Many people will tell you OIT is below-par at customer service. Call in with a complaint about your computer – say, it's all virus-ed up – and you'll be lucky to hear from them in a week. Kiss that paper goodbye. Call in with a question on how to fix something yourself on the computer, and you'll likely speak to somebody just as confused as you.

Or worse, they tell you they can see you in a week at earliest.

As for the system itself? Let's just say, if there's a serious problem out there infiltrating systems, there's a good chance OIT is in the thick of it. Some call it a glitch; others call it a nuisance. In each of the six semesters I lived on campus, my computer had a serious problem – including three crashes – when using their network.

A few highlights:

Fall 2003: Literally takes anywhere from one to three minutes to click a mouse. My roommate jokes that I have "the molasses virus."

Spring 2004: Some 17-year-old kid creates this master virus from his house in Germany that infiltrates a couple of big companies, and some college campuses. Infected computers shut down automatically every five minutes. Naturally, OIT catches it, and anybody whose computer wasn't up to date got hit. So of course, half of the campus gets wiped out.

Spring 2005: My computer crashes less than five minutes after logging into the network – and I had just gotten the thing fixed.

In all three of the above cases, I was either told I couldn't be seen for a week, or I was given a CD-ROM with software updates. That might help, but when your computer just went to Hooverville, getting a mere disk feels like the medical equivalent of a Motrin tablet for a broken leg.

A week doesn't help when you've got OWLs, labs, and papers to worry about.

Spring 2006: My roommate's laptop howls like a wounded hyena. And while I report no problems with my PC – alright, so there was one semester I was fine – as soon as I plug it in at my home, my motherboard fries.

Of course I blame OIT for that last one, too.

Wouldn't you?

OIT continues to have problems today. One of my colleagues' math classes offers a computer program for doing homework. Problem was, the program was only compatible with PCs, so those with Mac's had to wait until OIT set some up on the Mac's in the library. They finally got it done last Monday – conveniently, hours before Add/Drop ended.

As far as email goes, there is no middle ground with that little status thing whenever you're checking mail on your state-of-the-art OIT account. It's either "A-OK" or "Serious virus is about to slam the system again, grab two of every species." No in-between. Talk about suspense.

Now let's give OIT some credit here. Other than that bi-annual thriller, nobody (including me) seems to have a problem with the email system here. The guys at OIT work just as hard as you or I, field more complaints than a Michael Richards standup routine, and they really seem to love what they do.

But whatever it is you people do, keep it a secret.

Please.

Brendan Hall is a Collegian editor. He can be reached at editorial@dailycollegian.com

UMass awards show

Andrew Freeman

Editors' Note: This article originally appeared Feb. 14. It is being republished due to the lack of circulation Wednesday.

Good evening, and welcome to the first annual University of Massachusetts Awards Show. Tonight we will honor the students, administrators, and professors who have turned in the best performances of the past year.

Tonight's celebration begins on a somber note. Last week, celebrity, model and former centerfold Anna Nicole Smith died. Some people might argue that she did not deserve to be covered around the clock by the media, having never accomplished anything. Others would argue that it is better that she be covered than not.

No matter what you think, her life presents an inspiring message to the young girls of America: you don't have to be smart or hardworking to succeed if you are attractive and act stupid. For that reason, this award show is dedicated to her, and to all the young women who want nothing more than to marry rich octogenarians, drink to excess, and die young. Someday, you too could distract America from its foreign quagmires.

Best Adapted Screenplay

Early this semester, students on campus awoke to discover a surprising notice upon their doors. The yellow flyer contained a letter from an anonymous member of the UMass community who claimed to have participated in the December riots. In a tear-jerking prose the student apologized for his actions: "I have betrayed my parents... I have betrayed every teacher that wrote recommendations as to my personal integrity... I should have known better."

Without revealing any specific actions of the student, his name, or any other evidence to prove he exists, the flyer has halted the epidemic of rioting.

The letter has had a profound effect on the community, witnessed by the absence of any riots since its release. Without revealing any specific actions of the student, his name or any other evidence to prove that he exists, the flyer has halted the epidemic of rioting.

Best Actor

Many talented individuals competed for the prestigious Best Actor award. From accomplished students and professors to not so accomplished administrators, outstanding performances were the norm. In such an atmosphere of achievement, only the truly stellar could rise to the top.

The winner of the 2006-07 UMass Best Actor award is the student Brian Marquis. While all too many students care little for their grades or academic experience, Mr. Marquis cares deeply about it. He cares so deeply, he has sued the University over a C he received in Philosophy 161, which he feels will jeopardize his chances of getting into law school.

Displaying his acute feel for drama, Mr. Marquis is suing UMass on not one, not three, but fifteen counts. These include violation of his rights in the first amendment (freedom of speech, expression, etc.) and the 14th amendment (equal protection), breach of contract, and intentional infliction of emotional duress, among many others.

Like any good actor, Mr. Marquis' vivid imagination shines through in his performance. He makes us feel that he is being oppressed by the C. One can truly envision his rights being violated. The riot police are serving notice of the C, and are locking him away in prison and ultimately expelling him from the University. We congratulate Mr. Marquis, and wish him luck in his future endeavors; hopefully the legacy of the C will not hold him, his children or his children's children back.

(Special section for lawyers: as always, the views expressed in this editorial do not reflect those of The Daily Collegian. The author of this piece is dirt poor and so is his employer.)

Best Picture

While sequels are rarely as strong as the original, "UMass II: The New Dirt" goes against the grain. It continues its predecessor's commitment to inconveniencing students, while laying the foundation for future debacles. Unfortunately, no one responsible for "The New Dirt" could arrive in time to receive the award, having apparently gotten lost because of construction. Next fall, look for the franchise's newest entry: "UMass III: Newer, Dirtier," in which all dorms become freshmen-only, Southwest is converted into a state penitentiary and a moat is built around Whitmore to "improve communication."

Another nominee, "December, 2006: A Riot Odyssey," disappointed audiences, particularly those familiar with the franchise's productions in 2003 and 2004. Despite the revelers' energy and drive, and their hundreds of thousands of dollars of property damage, the event suffered in comparison to previous years. Where was the passion that led rioters to flip over cars in 2003? Where was the nuance of a student jumping off the roof of the Berkshire DC? The only accomplishment was that substantially more students were arrested than in previous riots, and the police are still looking for more.

Thus concludes the 2006-07 UMass Awards Show. Let us end with the wise words that are the motto of this institution: "By the sword we seek peace; but peace only under liberty." Hopefully, the future may bring us a campus that is more peaceful, and more free.

Andrew Freeman writes on Wednesdays. He can be reached at adfreema@student.umass.edu.

EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

DURING A PASSING STAR AMONG UTILITY COMPANY EXECUTIVES IN SHAPE OFTEN GOES COMTRY GOING TO THE TOP OF SCENIC SHOW-OFF PEAKS.
WHAT A RELIEF NATURE'S EXQUISITE SILENCE. NOBODY TRANSGRESSES ABOUT...
—OLE HALL WATERWORKS!

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

IN RESPONSE TO McGILLEN

This is in response to Adam McGillen's article published last Thursday addressing Vice Chancellor Gargano's email concerning the devaluation of our academic degrees due to campus rioting. While perhaps being well intentioned, his hostile position against Mr. Gargano, and mainly his argument that riots have no effect on our degrees, is pure nonsense, and could not be further from reality.

What Mr. McGillen is effectively saying is that the reputation of an institution as a whole cannot be tarnished by a group of marginal individuals, making everybody look bad. This makes plenty of sense, considering the millions of dollars that corporations spend each year on P.R. campaigns and damage control. And for what? Nothing! How silly of them. What value lies in a diploma from Harvard, Oxford or other great schools? Why is it that so many students (and parents) fret over admission to get into the "right" schools each year? I can assure you its based on more than the fine education those institutions provide. Many consider other small things like reputation and prestige, which often matter more to employers than any real learning that took place. It's not a mystery that one has better chances in getting a good job coming out of an Ivy league than out of a state or community college. Whether or not that is fair or ethical is another question, but the fact that institutions cradle a certain amount of non-objective reputation stands true.

Although I admire Mr. McGillen for his wishful thinking in which no innocents get penalized for the actions of others, I'll take the other, albeit, realistic side. Ideally, only the rioters would be punished for their actions, but unfortunately, society works in other ways, and undoubtedly all students will be affected. Employers, institutions, and the public will have a lower opinion of all UMass students, not just the ones rioting. Our transcripts do not come with an explanation that describes our individual innocence in such acts. The mere fact that those degenerates, who destroyed school property in the name of sports, beer, or whatever else, even attend UMass will say plenty about our school to employers. And yes, you certainly do have the right to demand payment for the lowered value of your degree after the riot, but it would be far more decent for the individuals responsible to pay the difference since they, not the University, are the ones who smeared it.

Your friend who suggested this argument seems to need a tip-off on what the business world calls "intangible assets." Indeed, these are real world things that corporations keep on their balance sheets to account for such intangibles as: copyrights, patents, trademarks, and goodwill among others. All of them add significant value to companies without having objective monetary value.

Mr. Gargano is not using a "scare tactic" against anyone. He is merely stating the reality of the situation, and whether or not one accepts it is their choice.

Gary Barmin
UMass Student.

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

ARTS & LIVING

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 16, 2007

ARTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Local band Sonic Youth rocks for charity

Alternative school benefits from parents' performance

BY COREY CHARRON
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The significant amount of snow that closed most Western Massachusetts schools on Wednesday stopped some people from attending Sonic Youth's sold out fundraising concert for the Greenfield Center School, which band members Thurston Moore and Kim Gordan's daughter attends. The brave crowds who made the trek to Northampton on Valentine's Day were rewarded for their courageous efforts with an impressive show from the hometown favorites.

The Academy of Music was about two-thirds full at the start of Sonic Youth's crisp hour and a half set. The venue was very cozy for a concert, especially considering the harsh weather conditions outside. The show started out as a sit-down affair, with people scattered around the theater, but shortly after it began Moore invited the crowd to gather and stand closer to the stage.

Composed of fifteen songs, the set-list contained a little bit of everything in Sonic Youth's discography, going back as far as "Shaking Hell," from 1983's "Confusion is Sex," to "Shizophrenia," from 1987's "Sister." Much material was taken from last year's "Rather Ripped," including the first two songs of the night, "Incinerate," and "Reena."

Moore and Gordan took turns on vocals most of the show, while guitarist Lee Renaldo took over on "Rats," from "Rather Ripped," and "Eric's Trip," from "Daydream Nation." Gordan, wearing a sparkly pink and silver dress in good Valentine's Day cheer, provided inspirational dance moves to coincide with her typical raspy vocals.

Mark Ibold, former bassist of Pavement and new touring member of Sonic Youth, wore an Awesome Colors t-shirt, a band that was unable to attend because of illness. Moore invited drummer Allison Busch onstage during a guitar string change, as she was the only person of the power trio not sick, and talked to her about her elementary school in Flint, Mich.

Moore, the guitar aficionado and overall impressive showman, highlighted the night with his intricate style of playing and performing. Every note and movement was premeditated and executed perfectly and smoothly, not a surprise considering the amount of shows Moore has participated in.

The dichotomous sides of Sonic Youth were showcased throughout the night and can be best summarized in the song "Do You Believe in Rapture," from "Rather Ripped."

See SONIC on page 6

Sonic Youth will be honoring tickets from those people who were unable to attend Wednesday's show due to inclimate weather at their next performance on Saturday in Providence, R.I.

Professor brings quirky art to campus

Exhibit shows off whimsy and electronically genius designs

Jeremy Boyle is a new professor in the UMass art department, but he is also a musician with the band Joan of Arc and is an artist.

BY ANTHONY DAVID RUFLI
COLLEGIAN STAFF

If you hurry, you still have time to check out one of the most interesting art exhibits the University of Massachusetts has featured in quite some time. Jeremy Boyle's exhibit of "enigmatic and whimsical sculpture installations" will be on display at the Herter Art Gallery until Friday, Feb. 23. It is entitled "S/T."

The exhibit has a wide variety of different types of art, including sculptures, carvings, drawings, and electronic gadgets. Some of the most interesting pieces include a self-playing guitar, extraordinarily complex hand drawings, intricate sculptures, and enigmatic enamel squares. There are also fascinating wooden carvings, various DVD-related gadgetry items, and an electronic minute-timer that is guaranteed to scare a year off of your life if it catches you off-guard.

Boyle is a newly appointed assistant professor in the art department at UMass. He has shown his work in many major cities throughout the United States, including New York City, Los Angeles, Miami, and Pittsburgh, his hometown.

"Questions are posed and rarely resolve in answer – the motivation simply to uncover the next site of inquiry and energize the process," Boyle said, in an attempt to explain his unique form of art.

Aside from being a professor and an artist, Boyle is also a talented musician. He is one of the founding members of the Chicago-based band Joan of Arc. His music has been released in many countries.

He has won a variety of prestigious awards, including the PA Council on the Arts Fellowship in 2003, the Heinz Creative Heights Award in 2004, and the Sprout Fund Seed Award in both 2005 and 2006.

Boyle claims that his "background and interest in engineering and music" inspired him to create his odd yet clever pieces of sculpture and electronics. He said that his method of operation is "placing elements together, seeking similarity and conversation in unexpected places." His creativity certainly shows in the selection of items he has on display in the Herter Art Gallery.

After UMass, Boyle's next art exhibit will be shown at The Ohio State University and is entitled "An Exhibition in Conjunction with the Symposium: Technology Expanding the Horizon a Reinterpretation and Investigation of the Landscape."

All are welcome to view Boyle's "S/T" exhibit. It will be at the Herter Art Gallery through Friday, Feb. 23. It is free and open to the public, and it will certainly catch your attention.

Beyond traditional art pieces, Jeremy Boyle's Herter Art Gallery exhibit features a self-playing guitar and other electronic sculptures.

Roberts reads his prose downtown

Andrew Roberts is a Juniper Fellow at UMass and is also a coordinator of the Juniper Summer Institute for Young Writers in Amherst.

BY ALEX BUTLER
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Those involved with creative writing or poetry on campus will be interested in Friday's poetry reading at Amherst Books. Andrew Michael Roberts, a professor of creative writing, will be reading from his new collection of prose poems. Seth Parker, a fellow poet and editor of "Skein Magazine" will also be reading.

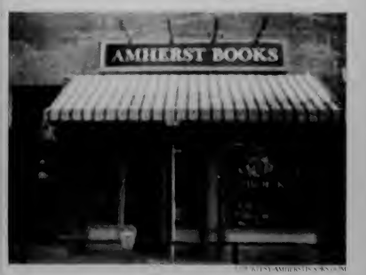
Roberts' "Give Up," is the newly released chapbook from Tarpaulin Sky Press. The book's collections, according to Poets.org, "have gathered together as if trying collectively to defy the book's title in their persistent search – at times frantic, naïve, misdirected – for what's been forsaken or lost or given foolishly away and by now is likely out of reach."

Roberts is a Juniper Fellow at the University, where he also coordinates the I Mass Visiting Writers Series and the Juniper Summer Institute for Young Writers. The summer program gives young writers, for a week each June, the chance to become involved with intensive workshops and to enhance their craft. The aforementioned Visiting Writers Series presents emerging artists and established writers of poetry and prose.

Along with these programs, Roberts also teaches creative writing and "Wish You Were Here! Adventurous in Full-Catastrophe Postcarding," an English class which tries to capture the art world in postcard form.

His recent works are also featured in many literary collections, including "Tin House," "The Iowa Review," "LIT," "Gulf Coast," and "The Mississippi Review."

The reading is being held at 8 p.m. tonight in Amherst Books.



Amherst Books hosts Andrew Roberts as he gives a reading from his latest book "Give Up," which is a collection of his prose poetry.

SOURCE

(the sors) n. key to discovering the weekly happenings of New England

Friday February 16

ART

Museum of Art at Smith College

A large Javanese stone Buddha from the late 8th or early 9th century is on extended loan to Smith College Museum of Art from a private collection. The figure, seated in meditation, is an example of a Buddhist sculpture from the flourishing period of the Sailendra dynasty of Central Java. With its impressive mandorla (encompassing halo) and large lotus pedestal, the Buddha is carved from the dark volcanic stone typical of central Java, capital of the Sailendras, who built many splendid Buddhist and Hindu temples. This sculpture probably represents Amitabha Buddha, the Buddha of the western direction and one of the five cosmic Buddhas.

MOVIES

Cape Cod Lounge at UMass

At 9 p.m. Casino Royale will play at UMass. This Bond takes us back to the beginning. James has a freshly stamped 00 status and he is going to establish the reckless style that will make him famous. 007 needs to find all aces in a high stakes poker game with Le Chiffre at the Casino Royale. Admission is free.

Sunday February 17

MUSIC

Buckley Recital Hall, Arms Music Center at Amherst College

At 8 p.m. selected Pioneer Valley jazz guitarists will perform with students from the Amherst College Jazz Combo program, and then join together in various combinations for a showdown. The concert is a benefit for the Food Bank of Western Massachusetts; tickets are $5 or $3 with a donation of a canned good, and $3 for students and seniors or free with a donation.

Wednesday February 20

BOOK SIGNING AND DEMO

Fiber Art Center at 79 So. Pleasant St., Amherst

From 2 p.m. to 4 p.m. come help local author and needlepunch artist Linda Repasky celebrate the release of her new book "A Passion for Punchneedle." This miniature form of embroidery is easy to learn, yet creates an amazingly rich and lush surface reminiscent of antique hooked rugs. Come in and see Linda's beautifully crafted samples of needlepunch and watch her demonstrate the punching technique. Admission is free.

Weekend of February 22 - February 24

THEATER

Cole Assembly Room, Converse Hall at Amherst College

"The Vagina Monologues" will be performed at Amherst College. Friday and Saturday night's performances will be at 7:30 p.m. and Sunday's show will be at 6:30 p.m. Proceeds will benefit the New England Learning Center for Women in Transition, a non-profit organization that provides services for survivors of rape and domestic abuse, based in Greenfield, Mass. There will be massages, sex toys, gift certificates, and CDs raffled off. Tickets for the raffle are $2. Tickets for the show will be sold at Amherst College in the Keefe Campus Center from 11 a.m. to 1 p.m. Feb. 19-22. Tickets can also be purchased by contacting ACVaginaMonologues@gmail.com. Tickets will be $10 or $5 with a student I.D.

WEEKLY PINUP

BUGS BUNNY FESTIVAL
Amherst Cinema will be hosting a Bugs Bunny Festival ,Feb. 17 - Feb. 25. Original Looney Tunes and Merry Melodies, this Bugs Bunny series features classic favorites such as "What's Opera," "Doc," and "The Rabbit of Seville."
70 min. Rated G. Cartoon / Family
Special Price: $5 per ticket

Band raises money

Kim Gordan played at Amherst Music Academy on Valentine's Day to benefit her daughter's school, the Greenfield Center School.

SONIC from page 5

played halfway through the night. Moore started the piece by playing it everything of a man speaking, then going into a loud noise freakout and finally transitioning into the current song, by Sonic Youth member. The circle of musical influences complete.

"Pink Steam" from "Rather Ripped" ended the first set on a high note. He and came out for the first encore with "Teenage Riot," from "Daydream Nation." Moore introduced what may be the band's most famous song to the children in the crowd. "Call Center School ... sing 'Cassie,' from the same album, was played to much crowd appreciation later in the night.

Surprisingly, the band came back with a third round, playing "Shadow Hotel" and "Expressway to Your Skull" from 1985's "Evol," ending the night's second encore. Members of Amherst's own legendary Dinosaur Jr. also thanked by Moore for coming. One is part of sneakers-obsessed Sonic Youth.

The show's opening band Wooden Wand and Sonic Youth's own bassist Jesse Greenfield came onstage with a few members to think everyone for attending. Much of the crowd consisted of children with their parents in support of the alternative school.

Wooden Wand opened up the show with a half-hour set composed of songs ranging from all of his releases, including his upcoming new album, produced by Sonic Youth's Lee Renaldo. The record is scheduled to be released in May on Moore's "Ecstatic Peace" label.

The performance featured lead singer James Toth on acoustic guitar accompanied by a female vocalist on most of the songs, who Toth jokingly called Janis Joplin. Most of the songs featured interesting, unique, and sometimes political lyrics sung in a nasally tone. The best comparison would be to folk artist Devendra Banhart, whose writing and music are quite similar to Wooden Wand's. Jeff Mangum, of Neutral Milk Hotel fame, could be seen in the vocal mannerisms and lyrical imagery.

Wooden Wand will be the warm-up band for Sonic Youth for the next five dates on tour. That includes their Saturday show in Providence, R.I. at Lupo's at the Strand at which Sonic Youth will be honoring the tickets of anyone who missed their Valentine's Day show because of the weather.

Fashion week brings out best designers

By Matt Dearborn
The Chronicle (Duke)

(U-WIRE) NEW YORK — Trapper hats, winter coats and Chanel purses were plentiful in the streets near Bryant Park last week, as Fashion Week attendees sipped Starbucks and rushed around the city to watch their favorite designers predict what will trickle down to the mainstream population years from now.

The fashionable elite congregated in scores as a plethora – 221 to be exact – of New York Fashion Week designers showed their Autumn/Winter 2007 collections to enthusiastic crowds.

Despite the good cheer, New York Fashion Week (one of four major fashion weeks around the world, the others being Milan, London and Paris), is currently the subject of more than one controversy.

One of these disputes revolves around exactly where Fashion Week will occur in the future; the other is the seemingly ever-present controversy surrounding the weight – or lack thereof – of models. The tents were abuzz with conversations and complaints.

Last fall, Mayor Michael Bloomberg announced that Fashion Week – which generates upward of $180 million annually, according to Bryant Park Corporation – needed to move from its Midtown location, where it has been held for the past 13 years. Residents have been complaining that the Fashion Week tents ruin the ice-skating rink built in Bryant Park every winter.

"It is clear that due to its success, Fashion Week has outgrown the facilities available at Bryant Park," Bloomberg said in an October 2006 press conference. "Fall Fashion Week, which takes place in February, is just around the corner, and we have determined that the search for a suitable home will require further analysis and planning. The City will continue to work with IMG and the fashion industry to locate a permanent home for Fashion Week."

Many argue, however, that moving out of Bryant Park will decentralize Fashion Week and hurt the industry.

"I love the park," French-born designer Alice Ritter told recess, minutes before she showed her collection. "It would be a shame if it moved."

Although location questions were fresh in minds, the main controversy surrounding Fashion Week was the weight of models.

After Madrid and Milan took actions to ban models that were deemed to be "underweight" last fall, the United States has been under similar pressure. As Fashion Week began, protesters emerged outside the tents, holding signs and chanting.

"I'm normal and overweight," said one protester, who wore a hat that said "Fashion Weak" and a full-body sign depicting a skeleton dressed in a bikini with the words "Does this make me look fat?" next to it. "If fashion is for everyone, I want these models to look like me."

Those inside the tents, however, seemed less concerned.

"I don't think there is a problem," said Joe Zee, creative director of Elle Magazine told recess. "It's fashion, and it's glamorous."

Despite the overwhelming support of models, there were still those – mostly those not entrenched in the fashion world – who supported legislation against skinny models.

"These models don't even look like people," said the husband of a dresser in line for the Doo.Ri show. "They look like robots, without any flesh. I can't even look at them."

To a certain extent, these comments were not without merit. One model, who wished to not be identified, picked up a mint and ate it backstage at the Alice Ritter show.

"These things are great," she said. "They fill me up."

The issue of underweight models did not go without official discussion, however. The Council of Fashion Designers of America (headed up by esteemed designer Diane von Furstenberg), held a conference during the week specifically about the issue.

"There should be guidelines but no enforcement (on models' weight)," von Furstenberg said at the conference. She added that many models are naturally skinny, and it would be discriminatory to segregate based on weight.

There were many upsides to the week, however namely the designers, despite the negative press.

Marc Jacobs debuted a different take on fashion with a pared down, slim-silhouetted style for Fall/Winter 2007 at Bryant Park last week.

The collections that stood out of the crowd were the quirky New Zealand-born Karen Walker, known as the Marc Jacobs of her country, and recent CFDA award-winning designer Doo Ri's draping silk jerseys.

The big surprise of the week, however, was Marc Jacobs himself, arguably the most popular and talked-about of the New York designers each season.

Jacobs, who is known for his progressive approach to clothes, toned down his collection considerably this season. Expected to be punk-influenced (as it often is), Jacob's collection was sleek and muted, and looked as though it could move directly to stores, which, for those who follow his trends, is a rarity. The biggest disappointments of the week were the much-hyped Vera Cava and Lela Rose.

Despite the negative attention New York Fashion Week has received, most viewers went through the week blissfully.

"I'm just loving every minute of this," Ritter said. "I grew up dressing dolls. This is a dream for me. This is what I want to do."

EXTROVERTS WANTED UMASS AMHERST IS IN SEARCH OF
TOUR GUIDES

1 Lead campus tours for students and families interested in the UMass Amherst Campus.
2 Paid hourly position with a minimum commitment of 5 hours a week including some weekends.
3 Serve as panel speakers, hosts, and tour leaders at on and off campus yield activities such as Open Houses and Accepted Student Receptions.
4 Conduct informational interviews with prospective students and their families.

UMASS AMHERST
To find out more about the position or to pick up an application visit us at the Campus Center Concourse on January 29th & 30th or February 12th - 16th, 2007.
Applications are also available at the Visitors Center. Application deadline is February 16th, 2007

Minuteman bench takes over after half

M. BASKETBALL from page 10

Neither team could convert on the offensive end, and two 3-pointers from Fordham's Bryant Dunston and Marcus Stout early on gave the Rams a 6-2 lead. Both teams tried to go for the big play early on, but missed lay-ups and dunks went back and forth until the UMass bench alone went on an 11-0 run.

"In the second half we just totally folded," Fordham coach Dereck Whittenburg said. "[UMass] made shots, and we didn't make any shots. We bobbled the ball. We just couldn't make a play."

Freshman Ricky Harris hit a desperation jumper to tie the game at 6-apiece, followed with baskets by Thomas, Milligan and freshman Chris Lowe.

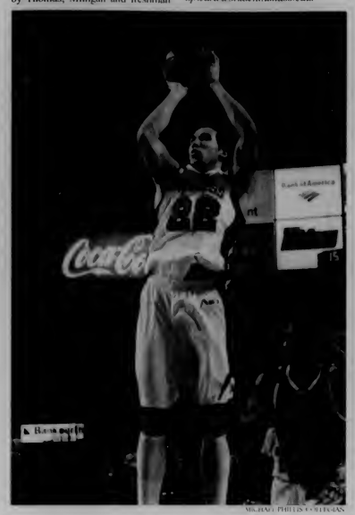
Senior James Life hit a 3-pointer with 7:33 left in the first half, which gave UMass its largest lead in the first 20 minutes at 18-6, but Fordham crawled back into the game and tied it at 26. Life hit another 3-pointer with 1:30 remaining to give the Minutemen a lead they'd never lose.

UMass got the usual double-double out of Stephane Lasme – 18 points and 10 rebounds – while Forbes finished with 11 points.

Dunston (18 points) and Brenton Butler (14 points) were the only Fordham players in double-figures.

The Minutemen had 44 points in the paint, as opposed to the Rams' 14.

Danny Picard can be reached at dpicard@student.umass.edu.



Junior Etienne Brower is averaging 3.3 points and 2.6 rebounds per game. The forward played just one minute last night against Fordham.

URI hosts A-10 Championships

By Kevin Dooley
Collegian Staff

With a combined 11 meets under their belts, the Massachusetts indoor track and field teams travel to Kingston, R.I. this Saturday to compete in the Atlantic 10 Championships. The event will be hosted by Rhode Island.

Coach O'Brien's Minutemen will be competing against nine other A-10 schools, while the Minutewomen take to the track and field against 11 other schools. This weekend's meet will be the last for both the men's and women's teams before the New England Championships, which are to be held the following weekend.

At last year's A-10 Championships, which were also held in Rhode Island, the Minutemen finished fifth out of eight teams, while coach LaFreniere's Minutewomen took ninth place out of 11 competing teams. The Charlotte 49ers' men's and women's teams took first place at the A-10 Championships a season ago.

The Minutemen were in Boston last weekend, where fifth-year senior James Godinho's recorded the school's third best all-time finish in the 400-meter dash. UMass hoping Godinho won't be the only one carrying over his success into today's meet.

"We had 18 seasonal best performances last week at BU so that should give us some momentum for this weekend," O'Brien said.

"Our strengths are in the jumping events and the running events from the 400 meters to the 5000 meters, including the three relays," O'Brien added.

O'Brien's squad will no doubt need to perform well in those events considering they have not fielded any participants in any of the other field events other than the long jump and triple jumps this entire indoor season.

During this week's preparation, O'Brien changed the pre-meet routine around a little bit.

"Our practices have been shorter and we are now focusing on refinement," O'Brien said. "As most coaches say at this time of the year, 'the hay is in the barn and now it is time to harvest the crop'."

The A-10 Championships may be one of senior Erik Hoagland's favorite meets. At last year's A-10 Championships, Hoagland became the first Minuteman to win both the long jump and triple long jump events. Hoagland, who earlier this season broke the all-time indoor long jump record previously held by Ken Adamson, will no doubt be counted on to contribute a good amount of points for the Minutemen come Friday.

There is also little doubt that the 400-meter dash and the long jump competition may be the two events UMass has the best shot of coming out of Rhode Island with first place finishes. Hoagland currently holds the top mark among all A-10 athletes in the long jump competition this season, while Godinho currently ranks second among all A-10 athletes in the 400-meter dash.

On the other hand, the Minutewomen did not enjoy the same success the men's team had at the A-10 Championships a season ago. LaFreniere was blunt in her assessment of her team's performance last season, saying, "I don't think it went great," last year.

One of the few highlights for the Minutewomen in last year's A-10 Championships came when sophomore Kristen Bakanowski repeated as the conference pole vault champion with a leap of 11 feet, 8 inches. Bakanowski's first place finish in the pole vault was the only event in which the women seeded a top-place finisher, but the Minutewomen had a trio of athletes take home third place in their respective events.

Included among that trio of third place finishers was junior Christina DeRosa, whose third place finish in the 5000 meter run at the A-10 Championships last season secured her the fourth-fastest run in school history in that event.

Bakanowski, who suffered a stress fracture on her left foot near the end of last year's indoor season, has been shutdown for both the indoor and outdoor seasons in the 2006-2007 campaign. Freshman Molly Chapin has been representing the team in the pole vault competition this entire indoor season.

Kevin Dooley can be reached at kdooley@student.umass.edu.

UMass plays pair at UVM

Mass Attack looking to move up in Hockey East standings

HOCKEY from page 10

his team is more comfortable inside the confines of the Mullins Center, but he also knows that in order to play at home in the postseason, the Minutemen need to play well on the road this weekend.

"Obviously, we've had a pretty good home record," Anderson said. "It's nice to be at home, but it's another challenge we have to face. And hopefully it's something we won't have to face too often going through the rest of the season. We're pretty much fighting for home-ice [in the playoffs] the last few weeks."

UMass won its only contest at Vermont last season, 2-1, and then split a weekend series at home, winning the first game, 3-0, and falling in overtime of the series finale, 3-2. This year's series is the opposite of last year's, with the early game taking place in Amherst and the late-season weekend in Burlington.

In order to win the series this season, however, the Mass Attack must take two-straight from the Catamounts in their own building. Vermont is just 7-6-1 at home this season, but Gutterson Fieldhouse is notorious for being a tough place to play.

"It's another real good team, that's all," Cahoon said. "Our schedule's full of real good teams. It's a challenge, for sure, but it's not insurmountable."

All of Hockey East seems to be in the twilight zone this weekend, as all four matchups pit teams, which sit adjacent in the standings, against each other. Fifth-place Vermont and sixth-place UMass are no different, and it gives every team in the league a chance to control its own destiny and make a run at the postseason.

"We just need to get points," Cahoon said. "Obviously, the ideal situation is to get four, but the only two we can get are the two on Friday. So we've got to start out trying to get some points Friday night and go from there.

"Everyone's going to be slugging it out. There's no sense trying to figure it out because you could have never predicted what has happened in the last two weeks within the league. You've just got to take care of business one game at a time."

Rink size is something every team in the HEA pays attention to, as it can influence the type of game that develops. Cahoon says his players should be comfortable on Vermont's sheet, which is just five feet narrower than their own inside the Mullins Center.

"It's not so much smaller than our rink," said Cahoon. "It's about the same size as BU's rink, maybe a little deeper in the corners. It might be the best size rink there is out there. I think it's the perfect size hockey rink. The surface shouldn't have any bearing on the outcome of the game."

Jeremy Rice can be reach at jeremyr@student.umass.edu

Freshman Martin Nolet scored his only goal in the season opener against Sacred Heart and has three assists for four points on the year.

Gutterson Fieldhouse rich in history

GUTTERSON from page 10

lege hockey."

But don't tell that to Cahoon and the rest of the Minutemen. This weekend they travel to the rink where they have recorded just two wins since 2002 – with the second coming last season. That victory came in a 2-1 affair with Chris Davis scoring the game-winner.

Cahoon and senior captain Matt Anderson both said the Gutterson atmosphere shouldn't be a problem this weekend, as long as UMass takes care of business.

"The game is played between the glass, between the boards," the coach said. "You just have to block it all out and just play well enough to quiet the crowd down. That's the real key of being the visiting team in these rinks that are real noisy."

"It's an exciting place to play. As long as we keep it between the glass I don't think it's going to play that big of a factor," Anderson echoed.

Cahoon's history with the Gutt goes back a long way. He played his prep-school hockey there in 1968, just five years after it was built, and is very close to some of the major players in UVM-hockey history.

"I've been involved in a lot of games at Gutterson," he said. "I played up there as a prep-school kid and ended up having my jaw redone. I went to Europe with the junior national team afterwards and ended up getting it all infected and having surgery in Europe to get it all squared away.

"So I have real fond memories of that place. I think it was a veterinarian that sowed me up. That brings me back a long ways."

Over his coaching career, Cahoon has also been a part of a lot of big games against UVM at the Gutt. While coaching Princeton, he brought the Tigers to Burlington where they defeated the Catamounts in a best-of-three series for the ECAC Championship.

That was one year removed from UVM's Frozen Four appearance, and St. Louis' final season in Vermont. The losses to Princeton were his final games at Gutterson.

Jon Pelland can be reached at jpelland a student umass edu

Sophomore goaltender Jon Quick is third in Hockey East in save percentage, at .925, behind New Hampshire's Kevin Regan and Boston University's John Curry. Quick's only other appearance at Vermont was a 2-1 victory last year on Nov. 22.

Junior Ryan Durkin placed fifth in the 800-meter run at the UNH Invitational on Jan. 20, and sixth in at the Reebok Indoor Games on Jan. 26.

ASIAN ARTS & CULTURE PROGRAM
Taikoza: Japanese Taiko Drums & Dance
FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 16
Taikoza is a Japanese Taiko drum and dance ensemble that uses the deep and powerful rhythms of the Taiko drums, stringed instruments, metal percussion and bamboo flutes to create an electrifying energy and a highly visual musical art form. Drawing from Japan's rich tradition of music and performance, Taikoza has created an original and high-energy sound that transcends national boundaries.
Concert Hall at 7:30pm
Tickets: $25, $20, $15
Youth 17 & Under and Low Income Students $15, $10, $7 www.fineartscenter.com/asian
UMASS AMHERST
www.fineartscenter.com/asian 1-800-999-UMAS 545-2511

Minutewomen host Musketeers, Dukes

W. BASKETBALL from page 10

to victory tomorrow will come in the form of seniors Loui Hall and Carmien Bruce.

The two Pennsylvania natives are Duquesne's leading scorers registering 327 and 274 points, respectively. and the Dukes' only players to have recorded more than 103 tallies.

Hall, a forward, has racked up a .494 shooting percentage, 19 assists and 22 steals. On top of those strong statistics, her 148 total rebounds and 14 blocked shots are both team highs.

Bruce, a guard, is the runner-up offensively, averaging 11.9 points per contest. In addition to consistently finding nylon, the 5-foot-10 shooting star has accumulated 22 steals, 11 shots blocks and 131 boards.

Despite this duo of juggernauts, the Minutewomen know they have the skills and abilities to catapult them to a 'W.'

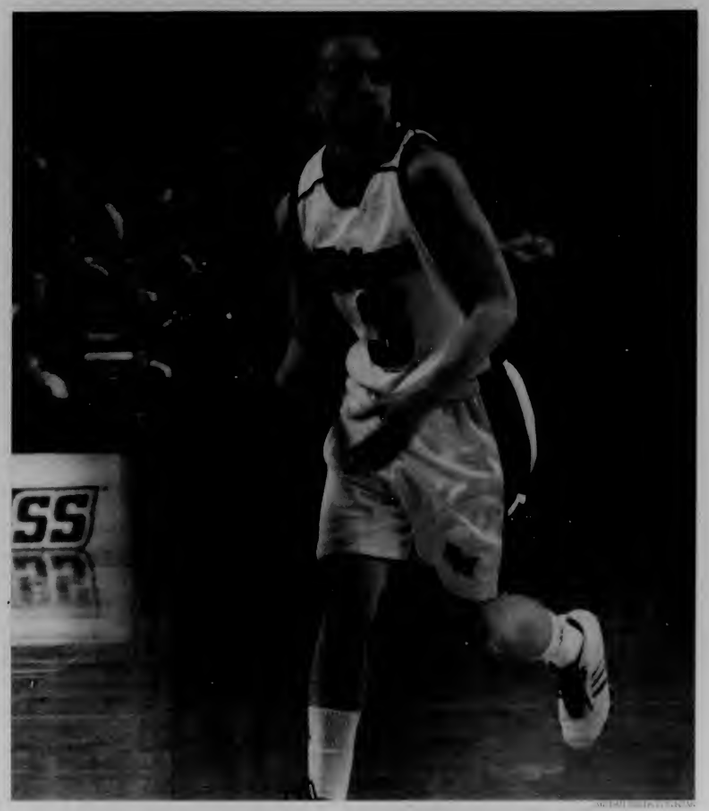
"We just have to play our game. That's what we mostly focused on this week in practice," junior forward, and team captain, Kate Mills mentioned. "If we play well, we're going to be able to accomplish what we want to get accomplished. So, I don't think we're as focused on them as we are on ourselves and what we need to do to take care of business on Friday.

"Last year they took us out of the A-10 tournament in our first game and they also beat us in the regular season too. We're definitely fired up for this game," UMass' leading scorer (391 points) continued. "They haven't won a game on the road yet [or in their last seven games], so we want to keep that streak going and beat them."

Mills' co-captain, junior forward Alisha Tatham, reiterates the words of her partner.

"Marnie goes back to telling us that we did lose to them last year just so that we can kind of keep our intensity and not have a third [consecutive loss] to them," Tatham said. "So, I think we're definitely just going to try to pick up the intensity and try to get a win out of them."

Domenic Poli can be reached at dpoli@student.umass.edu



Sophomore Sakera Young has started 11 of 25 games for the Minutewomen, averaging 2.7 points per game while splitting time with Kim Benton at the point guard position. She ranks fourth on the team in assists, recording a total 54 this season.

Guards complement each other for UM

GUARDS from page 10

"I'm happy she got it back," Dacko said. "She started the season out on fire, and as shooters do sometimes, she got into a slump. But at the same time, there are other things that Kam can bring besides her shot. I think she has to understand that she can create for other people and we want her to really hone in on her defensive skills."

The defensive ability that Dacko wants to see more of from Benton is one of the main reasons why Young has found her way back into the starting five.

"Sakera can really put a lot of pressure on the other teams' guards," Dacko said. "She's somebody who can get some steals and create more easy buckets off of transition because of her defensive presence. She also brings a fast tempo style to our offense and she's getting more and more confident in what she can do."

Despite her long stretch of struggles from the field, Benton is far and away the team leader in 3-pointers made at 44. It's something her fellow counterpart is well-aware of.

"She's a great offensive-minded player and one of the best shooters on our team," Young said. "She's a great shooter and I can penetrate and kick it out to her because she's automatic."

Although she wasn't quite automatic against Rhode Island, she wasn't far off. Her six 3-pointers against the Rams set a new Mullins Center record for any UMass player, and she raised her season's scoring average to 6.4 per game with her career-high 18-point performance.

The accuracy of her shot may have returned, but Benton is still conscious of the fact that her individual defense needs to improve. She'd be well-advised to watch her fellow teammate on the defensive end of the floor.

"She definitely brings a strong defensive presence to the team," Benton said of Young. "She's really quick and defensively she can stop almost any guard. We're pretty much the opposite type of player."

Young's game isn't centered on shooting in the least bit. Benton has attempted 124 three-pointers, while Young has only taken 60 shots total – but rather distributing the basketball to her weapons in the low post, namely junior Kate Mills and senior Tamara Tatham.

They may play differently, but if Benton is knocking down triples and Young is setting up her teammates, it makes defeating Duquesne on Friday that much easier. And that's the one area where they don't differ.

Eli Rosenstadt can be reached at erosenst@student.umass.edu

Sophomore Greg Braun is one of three UMass swimmers who will compete this weekend in the ECAC Championships. Braun shined in the 400-yard medley relay against BU, helping the Minutemen take first overall.

ECAC's on tap for UMass

Three swimmers representing Minutemen prior to A-10s

By Joe Melone
Collegian Staff

Opposing coaches praise Massachusetts men's swimming coach Russ Yarworth for his ability to consistently restock his team with strong swimmers. The Minutemen's roster is so deep that they can't even bring the entire team to next week's Atlantic 10 Championships, so sophomore Greg Braun and freshmen Brendan Jones and Chris Howard will head to Cambridge, Mass. this weekend to swim in the ECAC Championships.

"Unfortunately they weren't selected for the A-10 team but they could probably go there and score points or come close. But we're limited on our roster to 18 people, 17 swimmers and three divers divers count as a third of a swimmer because they compete in less events," Yarworth said. "I'm looking for them to do great swims and set the standard for what the rest of the team will do at Atlantic 10s."

UMass possesses great depth in the freestyle and all three of the swimmers heading to Cambridge will compete in different freestyle races.

Braun performed well in his sophomore season for the Minutemen but didn't do enough to qualify for the A-10 finals. In every freestyle event at the A-10s, UMass has at least two performers. Braun's best finish came as part of the 400-yard medley relay against Boston University.

The current crop of freshmen for the Minutemen has Yarworth excited for the future. He expects Trevor Ziegler, Juan Moliere and Justin Brooks to be key contributors at the A-10 finals but the rest of the class made great progress this season.

Jones' first half was unremarkable, but after winter break, Yarworth knew Jones could turn out to be one of the better swimmers for the Minutemen in the future. His ability to swim both distance and middle distance freestyle events should push him to the top of UMass' depth charts by his senior year.

"Brendan's going to be swimming the 500-[yard freestyle], the 200-[yard freestyle] and the 1,650-[yard freestyle] for us," Yarworth said.

His best finish of the season came in the 1,000-yard freestyle against Boston University on Nov. 11. His time of 10:05.50 was good enough for third – he also finished third at Stony Brook on Oct. 21 in the 500-yard freestyle with a time of 4:59.31.

Jones did receive one honor from the A-10, however, the conference named him to its athletic honor roll – he is a chemical engineering major. A biochemistry major himself while at UMass, Yarworth understands the importance of academics and constantly monitors the progress of his athletes in the classroom.

"I have a size 10.5 shoe and I am not afraid to use it if necessary," Yarworth joked earlier this season.

Howard excels in all freestyle events, his best finish of the season came in the 50-yard freestyle at BU – he registered a time of 22.61 for a third-place finish. Howard can also swim the butterfly quite well, although he didn't actually take part in a race in competition this season, Yarworth is confident that he can succeed.

"Chris is going to swim in the 50-[yard freestyle] and the 100-[yard butterfly] for us," Yarworth said.

The fact that Yarworth can send swimmers to more than one championship meet and expect strong finishes, and even wins, attracts gifted young performers to UMass to swim.

Collegiate sports are just about winning to some people and as much as Yarworth understands that he is here to win. He is also here to help and the growing process of young men, which is why he is traveling 100 miles across the state so that three young swimmers can have a chance to compete and maybe win a race or two.

Joe Melone can be reached at jmelone@student.umass.edu

Braun swims in both backstroke and freestyle races for the Minutemen. He placed fourth in 400-yard freestyle and was part of the 200- and 400- yard medley relays that finished third at Boston College.

CINEMARK
The Best Seat In Town
CINEMARK AT HAMPSHIRE MALL
367 Russell St. 413-587-4233
Schedule for Fri 2/16/07 - Thurs 2/22/07
DIGITAL SURROUND SOUND IN ALL AUDITORIUMS
Purchase Tickets Online @ cinemark.com
Hannibal Rising (R) 1:05 4:10 7:05 10:00
Breaking Dawn (PG-13) 1:00 4:00 7:10 9:55
Norbit (PG-13) 1:35 4:15 7:20 9:50
The Queen (PG-13) 7:15 9:40
Breach (PG-13) 12:50 4:45 7:30 10:05
Bridge to Terabithia (PG) 1:30 4:30 6:55 9:20
Ghost Rider (PG-13) 1:15 3:40 6:05 8:50 10:00 7:00 9:45
The Messengers (PG-13) 1:45 4:55 7:50 10:25
Music and Lyrics (PG-13) 1:20 4:20 7:35 10:10
Night at the Museum (PG) 1:10 4:25
Smokin' Aces (R) 1:25 4:35 7:40 10:15
Tyler Perry's Daddy's Little Girl (PG-13) 12:15 4:40 7:15 9:45
• NO PASSES, NO SUPERSAVERS
Events & Showtimes available at cinemark.com

WWW. DAILYCOLLEGIAN .COM
The Massachusetts Daily Collegian is the best place to find all of your UMass sports coverage
ALL YEAR ROUND

NOW SHOWING FEB. 16 - FEB. 22
amherst cinema
Rules of The Game
BUGS BUNNY FILM FESTIVAL DAILY 11:30-1:00
VOLVER
THE LAST KING OF SCOTLAND
FRI-SUN 2:45 5:15 7:45 10:05
MON-WED 2:45 5:15 7:45
THURS 2:00 4:30 7:30 9:50
Pan's Labyrinth
Fellini's LA STRADA 2/22 7:00 2/25 2:00
413-253-2547

Free Delivery to UMass
Menu Online @ andiamo.cc

								3
4				6		1		7
	7	2			4		8
	4	7						2
1			5		6			9
9						7	6
	3		1			2	7
7		8		3				5
2

QUOTE OF THE DAY

"Let's hug it out..."

-Jeremy Piven in "Entourage"

NATURE By Matt Jarrett

THE FAMILY MONSTER By Josh Shalek

TWO DUDES By Aaron Warner

DUDE! CAN YOU BELIEVE YOU HAVE A GIRLFRIEND?
AND I DON'T MEAN A FEMALE TELEMARKETER THAT HAS TO TALK TO YOU, BUT A REAL LIFE GIRLFRIEND
I KNOW, DUDE. ONE MINUTE I'M NOTHING, AND NOW I'M STILL NOTHING, BUT I HAVE SOMETHING.
NO

WELCOME TO FALLING ROCK NATIONAL PARK By Josh Shalek

ACROSS
1 Paddle
6 Launder
10 Boat canvas
14 Shipboard compartment
15 One woodwind
16 Ready and willing partner?
17 Perceptive
18 Dice toss
19 Front of the calf
20 Strategic withdrawal
22 Boise boy
24 Passe
26 Overdue
27 Furnace waste
30 Joan Collins series
32 Show-biz notable
34 Faithful
35 High-fiber fruit
38 Clicks open
41 Kind of question
43 Former Chinese leader
44 Taylor and Torn
46 Statistical inclination
47 End of a romance
50 Scottish loch
51 Chicago terminal
54 Movie theater
56 Interstellar clouds
58 Sound the horn
62 Shutter strip
63 Java neighbor
65 Time off base
66 Otherwise
67 Omigosh!
68 Come in!
69 Little piggies
70 Freshly moist
71 Violinist Isaac
DOWN
1 Battle mark
2 Walk the carpet
3 Touch against
4 Abundant atmospheric element
5 Prepare to be knighted
6 Having merit
7 Blood classification sys
8 Lonely confinement
9 Maintained
10 Stroll ostentatiously
11 Detest
12 Trojan War epic
13 Comic Bruce
21 Tack on
23 Certify
25 Aardvark tidbit
27 Layer of impurities
28 Singer Horne
29 Furthermore
31 Take to court
33 Beer container
35 Gratis
36 Some roadhouses
37 Pluto and Uranus
39 Chart shape
40 Period since Sputnik
42 Decorative object
45 Slalom
47 Savage sorts
48 In a mess
49 For each
51 Beginning
52 Telephone greeting
53 Humiliate
55 Some slippers
57 In the sack
59 Meal paste
60 At all times
61 Shore bird
64 Jurisprudence
Find all of today's puzzle solutions online!
WWW.DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

G.LOVE & SPECIAL SAUCE
PLUS REDEYE
SAT. FEB. 24 • 8:30 PM
DOORS OPEN 7:30 PM/BALLROOM
Pearl Street Nightclub
30 PEARL ST. NORTHAMPTON
TO PURCHASE TICKETS OR FOR MORE INFO VISIT OUR WEBSITE OR CALL: WWW.IHEG.COM
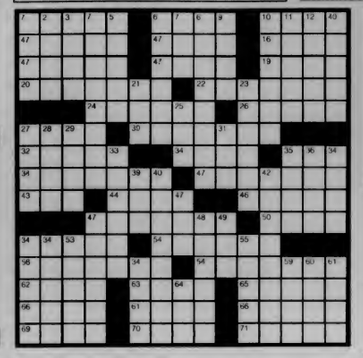
413-586-8686



Submit your comics!
collegiancomics@yahoo.com
Submit your classifieds!
(413) 545-3500

HOROSCOPES

aquarius JAN. 20-FEB. 18
Someone will call you out on picking your nose today. Play it off like you had an itch.

pisces FEB. 19-MAR. 20
You missed Grey's Anatomy last night? You are such a losebag!

aries MAR. 21-APR. 19
Maybe there is no difference between a mountain lion and a puma. Think about it.

taurus APR. 20-MAY 20
Buy snowcone flavoring and eat your heart out.

gemini MAY 21-JUN. 21
Its seems that there is no end to your capacity for boondoggles and ballyhoo.

cancer JUN. 22-JUL. 22
You can only go so many days without replacing your deodorant. I'd say 17, tops.

leo JUL. 23-AUG. 22
You need not apply for any jobs. You're so good they'll come to you.

virgo AUG. 23-SEPT. 22
To pass the time, count how many pairs of Timberland boots you see today.

libra SEPT. 23-OCT. 22
If you want to see the world in a whole different way, learn the alphabet backwards.

scorpio OCT. 23-NOV. 21
You rock the socks off an octopus! In case you haven't noticed, that's a lot of socks.

sagittarius NOV. 22-DEC. 21
Before paper was invented, there was no such thing as a paper cut.

capricorn DEC. 22-JAN. 19
Penguins are very silly animals, but even they work on President's day.

If fame and glamour is what you seek...

comics are where it's at.

collegiancomics@yahoo.com

MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN MARKETPLACE

ANNOUNCEMENTS

Global Express Tours Spring Break Montreal Party Weekends from $99 Complete bus, hotels, & clubs. Montrealexpress.net 781-979-9001

APARTMENT FOR RENT

Hobart Condos 3 bedroom, hardwood floors, study area in basement. Cable telephone Internet access) in all bedrooms and study. NOW SHOWING for JUNE and SEPTEMBER. NO FEES. www.amherstlincolnrealty.com 253-7879

APARTMENT FOR RENT

2Br apartment for rent by bus stop. $925+ Utilities. 301-938-0038

EMPLOYMENT

Winter/ Spring positions available. Eam up to $150 per day Exp not required. Undercover shoppers needed To Judge Retail and Dining Establishments. Call 800-722-4791

Rent us your ears! Listening Experiments $10/hr English must be your first language. Email: phonetics_lab@linguist.umass.edu voicemail: 545-6837

EMPLOYMENT

Last day to apply. Become a summer orientation counselor and make a difference in the lives of over 4000 new students. Additional information and applications can be found at www.umass.edu/newstudent/contact/student-jobs/counselor The application deadline is February 16, 2007

Bartending $300/ day potential. No experience necs. Training provided. 1-800-965-6520 ext.162

EMPLOYMENT

Dell Campus Reps Needed Promote a top 30 company to gain real-world business & marketing experience! www.repnation.com/dell to apply.

HOUSE FOR RENT

Northampton Cathedral ceiling, sky-lites, hardwood floors, 4-5 bdrms. 9/1 $1950. 413-730-6660

SERVICES

Pregnancy Testing. HIV Testing, Birth Control, and Emergency Contraception. STI Screening and

SERVICES

Treatment. Affordable and confidential. Tapestry Health, 27 Pray Street, Amherst. 548-9992. www.tapestry-health.com

Call Someone who really cares. Birthright of Amherst Area 549-1906, 1800-550-4900 24 hour hotline Free Pregnancy test 233 N. Pleasant St. Amherst www.birthright.org

TRAVEL

Global Express Tours Spring Break Montreal Party Weekends from $99 Complete bus, hotels, & clubs. Montrealexpress.net 781-979-9001

WANTED

EGG DONORS NEEDED $10,000 (Plus all expenses) We are seeking women who are attractive, under the age of 29, SAT 1300+ (math+verbal), Physically fit and maintaining a healthy lifestyle. If you have a desire to help an infertile family and would like more information please contact us. Email: Darlene@aperfectmatch.com www.aperfectmatch.com 1-800-264-8828

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

SPORTS WEEKEND

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 16, 2007 SPORTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Back on track

Bench players Thomas, Milligan lead Minutemen over Rams

BY DANNY PICARD
COLLEGIAN STAFF

BRONX, N.Y. — Brandon Thomas and Dante Milligan haven't played significant minutes this season, but they stepped up when the Massachusetts men's basketball team needed them most, leading UMass to a 74-59 win over Fordham (13-11, 6-6 A-10).

Thomas and Milligan came off the bench and provided UMass (18-7, 8-3 A-10) with 21 points and 15 rebounds combined — none more important than their second-half play.

"We got a lot of help off the bench, and that might have been the difference for us," UMass coach Travis Ford said. "We've had some good bench play, but a lot of times it doesn't show up in the stat sheet.

"Tonight it showed up in the stat sheet from Dante Milligan to Brandon Thomas. They actually put on some results with the hard work, and I thought that was very, very big for our basketball team."

The Minutemen went into halftime with only a 30-27 lead. A 24-9 run in the first 12 minutes of the second half gave UMass a commanding lead that silenced a loud and untamed Fordham student section.

"To respond in a very hostile environment, I'm proud that we were just able to survive," Ford said. "I knew it was going to be loud, but I didn't realize I wouldn't even be able to talk to my team before the game down in the locker room because they couldn't hear me."

With junior Gary Forbes and senior captain Rashaun Freeman in foul trouble, Thomas and Milligan carried the Maroon and White past a Fordham team it needed to beat, especially after coming off a loss to sub-par Temple squad on Sunday.

Milligan finished the game with nine points and 11 rebounds, while Thomas had 12 points and four rebounds.

Needless to say, it was a great birthday present for Milligan.

"Dante deserves success, there's no question," Ford said. "He's a tremendous person who has never complained one single time when he doesn't play. He just accepts his role.

"I told him, 'When you're called upon you have to be ready to play.' And tonight we needed him big time, and he stepped up."

It's hard to believe a total of 57 points were scored in the first half. The score was only 6-6 after the first 10 minutes of the game, with sloppy play coming from both sides.

See M. BASKETBALL on page 7

Freshman Ricky Harris netted two points while playing nine minutes in the Minutemen's 74-59 win over Fordham in the Bronx. The guard was 1-for-4 from the field and 0-for-2 from 3-point range. The Minutemen are now 8-3 in Atlantic 10 play.

Mass Attack heads north to Vermont

BY JEREMY RICE
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The trip is now for the Massachusetts hockey team (UMass (13-10-5, 10-8-3 Hockey East) travels to Burlington, Vt., for a pair of games against Vermont (15-11-4, 10-7-4 HEA) with just a few weeks remaining in the regular season.

The sixth-place Minutemen look to head north in the standings in an effort to earn home-ice advantage for the conference playoffs. The Catamounts stand in their way not only on the ice, but in the standings as well. Vermont currently sits in fifth place in the league, just one point ahead of the Mass Attack.

The only other meeting of the season between the two teams came two days before Thanksgiving, a 3-0 victory for the Catamounts that sent the teams in different directions.

It was the first loss of the season inside the Mullins Center for the Maroon and White after starting 6-1-1 overall and jumping out to an early lead in the Hockey East standings.

However, starting with the Vermont loss, UMass fell into a tailspin, going 2-4-1 over the next seven contests. UVM on the other hand, kick-started its season with the win over the Minutemen.

Making near perfect asymmetry with its rival to the south, Vermont started its season with a record of 2-4-1, only to win six of its next seven starting with the victory over UMass.

Now the Minutemen will look to earn another win inside Gutterson Fieldhouse and break a three-game winless streak that distanced them from fourth place and home-ice.

This is only the second weekend of the season in which the Minutemen play two in-conference games on the road. The first instance came in the second weekend of the season, when UMass visited UNH on Oct. 26, a Thursday, then headed north for a Saturday night game against Maine.

"This trip and the Maine trip [last season], when we played two up there, are a bit tougher because of the travel component," said UMass coach Don Cahoon. "I don't think that's necessarily a bad thing. We have one common opponent, so that gives us a little bit better focus, and the road warrior mentality."

Captain Matt Anderson knows

See HOCKEY on page 7

Sophomore David Leaderer scored his second goal of the season last Friday night against Boston University. The defenseman now has five points on the season with two goals and three assists.

No place like home for Vermont fans

BY JON PELLAND
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Vermont hockey has a long and storied history. From the numerous All-Americans to the legendary coaches, the Catamounts are rich in tradition. Much of that comes from the building in which they play. For the past 44 years, UVM hockey has been played on the sheet at the Gutterson Fieldhouse.

"The 'Gutt' as we like to refer to it, is a very special place for both the student-athletes as well as the fans," said UVM coach Kevin Sneddon, via email on Wednesday night. "It is a social event on Friday and Saturday nights if you are fortunate enough to be a season-ticket holder or have some luck with remaining ticket sales."

UVM has played at Gutterson since 1963. Current NHL players Martin St. Louis and Tim Thomas helped further the Vermont tradition during their days at the Gutt in the early and mid-1990s.

Besides the talent on the ice, another factor that has turned the rink legendary has been the fans in Burlington, Vt. With the nearest major professional sports team residing in Montreal, Quebec, UVM athletics — and hockey especially — is very special to the people of Vermont. The original capacity was 3,335 fans. That number increased to 4,009 when Gutterson was refurbished for the 1990-91 season.

"UVM hockey has really benefited from having a home that had character and a community that is engrossed in that sport having an identity," UMass coach Don Cahoon said.

More often than not, Gutterson is filled to capacity each home game with green- and gold-clad fans. Sneddon says the Vermont student section is "as loud as any in the country," and mixed with the support of the local fans, creates a great collegiate atmosphere for all ages.

Despite its small capacity, the Gutt is widely considered one of the toughest arenas to play in as a visiting team.

"It's a tough place because our fans provide great electricity in the air when we need it," Sneddon said. "While we expect that in all of our games, it is certainly easier to do at home in front of the greatest fans in col-

See GUTTERSON on page 7

UM looks to avenge early-season losses

BY DOMENIC POLI
COLLEGIAN STAFF

There is a very common, reasoning expression which states "[you] that [to]day when you get to [it]."

It is this familiar saying that the Massachusetts women's basketball team (14-11, 4-6 A-10) is using to approach this weekend's pair of Atlantic 10 road matchups.

[illegible] is the 0 [illegible] against the Xavier Musketeers [illegible] 7-3 A-10) on Sunday. [illegible] that's because [illegible] entered in its game against the Duquesne Dukes (7-16, 2-8 A-10) [illegible] night.

[illegible] last Sunday's [illegible] Rhode Island [illegible] season loss, the Minutemen know they have to [illegible] and move through both [illegible] hopes of a post [illegible]. Despite the fact [illegible] Musketeers pos[illegible] Minutewomen coach Marnie Dacko [illegible] first go through [illegible] to get to Xavier.

"We [illegible] first look at [illegible] can [illegible] hopefully be [illegible] bigger," Dacko said [illegible] Tuesday's practice. "But right now, we're not even preparing for Xavier, because first thing's first."

Dacko was very satisfied with the payback her players dished out to URI on Sunday, but with another week comes another bitter memory and new thirst for revenge.

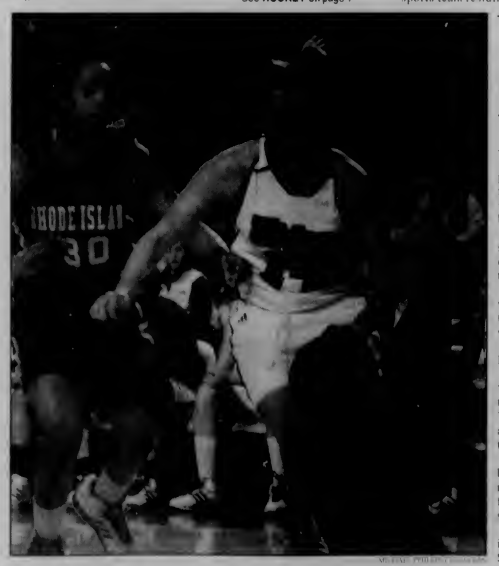
The Dukes handed UMass two frustrating losses last season — a heartbreaking 46-44 contest in the regular season followed by a 56-51 defeat that booted the Minutewomen out of the A-10 tournament.

Keeping with the vengeance-bent theme that began before the URI game, Dacko is holding a grudge against the squad that made two contributions to her team's loss column last season.

"It's pretty easy [to get fired up]. They beat us twice last year," she said. "Their record is not indicative of what any team can do to you. And I told my kids at the end of practice that just because we beat Rhode Island in twenty minutes, you can't be back on your heels and [in] cruise-control — we've got to earn it."

Two roadblocks that will lay in the Maroon and White's path

See W. BASKETBALL on page 8



Junior Pam Rosanio is third on the team in scoring with 11.7 points per game. She is also third on the squad in field goal percentage, hitting 26 percent from behind the arc.

Young, Benton make nice pair

BY ELI ROSENSWAIKE
COLLEGIAN STAFF

They play nothing alike. One brings a strong defensive presence and penetration skills, while the other provides instant firepower from the perimeter. They are sophomore starting point guard Sakera Young and freshman sharp-shooting backup Kim Benton.

Their vastly different styles of play compliment each other so well on the court, that Massachusetts women's basketball coach Marnie Dacko has started to put them on the floor together.

Whether they're paired together or not, the Massachusetts women's basketball team (14-11, 4-6 Atlantic 10) will need them both at their finest for the remainder of the season if they wish to make a run in the conference tournament.

The importance of her floor generals is certainly not lost on Dacko as the season winds down.

"They are really important to the team's success," she said. "They handle the ball 95 percent of the time, so I think that they need to be able to make the decisions with the basketball. There are plenty of minutes to go around and when you look at their minutes played, it's clear they are both very valuable to this team."

Young began the 2006-07 campaign with the starting nod, but the spot-on shooting from Benton was too much to keep relegated to the bench for long. Benton's 30-for-76 shooting from behind the arc in non-conference play propelled her into a starting role.

Due to her recent struggles, Benton has since lost the starting job back to Young, but her record-setting performance Sunday at the Mullins Center is a sign that her shot has returned to previous form.

See GUARDS on page 8

Not Published

Holiday

MINUTEMEN SOAR OVER FLYERS | PAGE 10

HANSON TALKS NEW MATERIAL | PAGE 5

THE MASSACHUSETTS

DAILY COLLEGIAN

NEW ENGLAND'S LARGEST COLLEGE DAILY EST 1890

SHOWERS : HI: 42 LO: 29 WWW.DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 20, 2007

Academic calendar survey approved by Faculty Senate

BY HAYDEN MARX
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The University of Massachusetts Faculty Senate approved the use of a survey to test student support for starting and ending the spring semester two weeks early.

This year classes started on Jan. 29 and will run through May 15. The earliest the calendar change would occur is the 2010 spring semester.

A random 10 percent of students will be asked to take the survey.

Those students will weigh in on whether getting out two weeks earlier is worth having a shorter winter break and a different spring semester than the rest of the Five College Consortium.

According to the survey, "It has been suggested that by starting and ending spring semester two weeks earlier, students might have an easier time gaining competitive summer internships and co-ops, and in getting summer jobs."

This is echoed in the Facebook group Gargano's Official Petition for A New Academic Calendar.

"Basically, a new academic calendar is in order. We want to reduce the long winter session. We want a calendar that matches the calendars of our friends at universities that have the characteristics of an earlier September start, an earlier December finish, an earlier January start and a very early May completion," wrote Caroline Moss, a student who works in the Office of Student Affairs.

The survey is less forward about changing the fall semester. It states that there is no proposal under consideration to change the fall semester, but asks if plans considered how supportive students would be.

This year, classes began within two days of each other at all five colleges for both semesters.

If the start date for classes at UMass were to be moved back, five college students might have difficulties taking classes at UMass.

They would either have to come back two weeks early or miss the first two weeks of class.

A Growing Debate

Professor pursues marijuana research

After six years of attempts, University of Massachusetts professor Lyle Craker was granted a license to perform studies of medicinal marijuana.

BY STELLA CERNAK
COLLEGIAN STAFF

From the football team's trip to the national championship game to Craig Mello's winning of the Nobel Prize, the University of Massachusetts has been making national headlines. Since last Tuesday, however, UMass was recognized for something new – medicinal marijuana research.

Standing alongside UMass was the source of last week's media stir: Professor Lyle Craker. After six years of attempting to obtain a license to perform studies of medicinal marijuana, an administrative law judge has finally opened a window of opportunity for Craker.

Last Tuesday, the judge made a nonbinding ruling which suggested the Drug Enforcement Agency (DEA) to allow Craker to pursue his research at UMass. DEA administrator, Karen Tandy, who has made no comment on the issue, will make the final decision on this ruling.

In the past, the DEA has been wary to grant Craker his requests for a reason which is twofold. First, there are the international treaties which limit the U.S. to one production facility of medicinal marijuana, and second due to fear that extending production to other owners would lead to increased illegal uses.

However, Craker, along with UMass' Vice Provost for Research, Paul Kosteckl, made it very clear that this research would not encourage illegal uses of the drug in any way.

"We will ensure that the research is sound and that there is strict security, no safety issues," Kosteckl said.

Kosteckl also emphasized his colleague's credibility.

"Dr. Craker is a national leader in the area of medicinal use of plants. I've followed his pursuit of this line of research for years, and he's followed all correct procedures despite running against DEA opposition."

He also makes note that Craker's research will not have a negative impact on the university, explaining that the funding Craker will receive comes from an outside group unsatisfied with amount and quality of marijuana plants used in research today.

Currently, all research on the medical benefits of marijuana in the U.S. is conducted under DEA controlled studies at the University of Mississippi.

The medical benefits of marijuana are widely known, being cited in

See MARIJUANA on page 3

UMass students celebrate Black History Month

Among the activities sponsored by UMass organizations such as ALANA was a viewing of the film, Hotel Rwanda.

BY HOLLY SEABURY
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The month of February is usually associated with cold weather, Valentine's Day, and every four years, the Winter Olympics. But more often than not, it is forgotten that the entire month is devoted to Black History in the United States and Canada.

How do people celebrate this occasion, and why?

At the University of Massachusetts, organizations such as ALANA (African, Latino/a, Asian Pacific Islander, Native American) and the Malcolm X Cultural Center, among other groups, have provided the school with relevant, entertaining events throughout February.

Films including Malcolm X: Parts I and II and Hotel Rwanda have been shown, while Yusef Muhammad of Muhammad Mosque spoke on "The Life of Malcolm X" in the New Africa House last Thursday evening.

Other upcoming events at UMass are "Platanos and Collard Greens: Where Cultures and Passions Collide," a comedy discussing stereotypes, which will be performed Wednesday at Bowker Auditorium; the showing of City of God on Thursday, and the French film showing of Rue cases Negres or Sugar Cane Alley in Thompson Hall on Friday. To end the month, ALANA is sponsoring a student, staff and faculty mixer on Feb. 28.

Meanwhile, three exhibits celebrating Black History Month are currently on display in the W.E.B. Du Bois library. "The Black Rural South, 1966" is on the lower level, "In Memoriam: Rosa Parks and Coretta Scott King" is on the second floor, and "Black History in Government Documents" is on the sixth floor. The exhibits will be available until March 31.

Some students, however, think that the University isn't doing enough.

According to Chantelle Ransome, secretary of the Black Student Union (BSU), UMass should be doing a little bit more to commemorate Black History Month.

"They had one day in the D.C. for celebration," said Ransome. "I don't see as many advertisements for Black History Month as I do for other events and such."

The BSU is holding a showcase in the campus center on Friday, called "Telling our Story II." Dinner will be followed by performances representing the African Diaspora.

See HISTORY on page 3

Flyers Downed

Senior Brandon Thomas and the Minutemen knocked off Dayton, 77-69, to move into second place in the A-10. It marked UMass' first win over the Flyers on the road since 1999, and the first home loss for Dayton in 14 games. See page 10

Students know little about U.S. presidents

BY CAMERON LEE
BROWN DAILY HERALD (BROWN U.)

PROVIDENCE, R.I. – Presidents' Day Weekend may be upon us, but students at Brown University and colleges around the country know surprisingly little about past presidents of the United States, according to a recent study from the Intercollegiate Studies Institute.

The study utilized test scores from a 60-question test administered to 14,000 college freshmen and seniors at 50 universities across the country in the fall of 2005. The survey asked questions about topics including economics, international relations and American history.

Students were asked multiple choice questions about such presidents as George Washington, Abraham Lincoln, Franklin Roosevelt and Ronald Reagan.

"There was less gain in knowledge (from freshman to seniors) about American presidents than there was on all the other subjects," said Gary Scott, senior research fellow at ISI, a conservative group.

Freshmen students answered 57.2 percent of the questions about presidents correctly, and seniors did only marginally better, answering 57.6 percent correctly.

At Brown, seniors did worse than freshmen on the presidential section – first-years scored 62.5 percent, and seniors managed to correctly answer just 59.8 percent. Overall, Brown finished 48th of 50 in American History and 44th of 50 in American politics.

Scott noted that "the lesser-known colleges scored better," on the test but that such esteemed institutions as "Cornell, Yale and Duke [universities] scored close" to Brown.

Rhodes College had the best performance in the sections on American politics and world affairs, Colorado State University had the highest marks on the economics portion and Grove City College students ranked first in American history.

But while knowledge of presidential facts is important, it is not indicative of how educated someone is, said Associate Professor of History Michael Vorenberg, who has published works on Abraham Lincoln.

"I don't know if the highest priority should be given to knowledge about what was considered to be basic political knowledge 100 years ago," Vorenberg said. Vorenberg was reluctant to put much stock in the study, questioning its ability to assess the quality of a student's education.

A study conducted by the Intercollegiate Studies Institute tested student knowledge about America.

Leader
Bricklayer Human being*

We believe community service is a part of our job description. Last June, we asked our US staff of 29,000 to take a day away from work and help their neighbors. We called it 29k/30.

Learn more about this project and others.

Visit pwc.com/community

*connectedthinking

PricewaterhouseCoopers

© 2007 PricewaterhouseCoopers LLP. All rights reserved. "PricewaterhouseCoopers" refers to PricewaterhouseCoopers LLP (a Delaware limited liability partnership) or, as the context requires, the PricewaterhouseCoopers global network or other member firms of the network, each of which is a separate and independent legal entity. *connectedthinking is a trademark of PricewaterhouseCoopers LLP (US). We are proud to be an Affirmative Action and Equal Opportunity Employer.

Marijuana research restrictions pique UMass professor's interest most medical journals as helping to treat nausea, seizures and patients with serious conditions such as cancer and HIV/AIDS. Yet, medical research on marijuana is limited because of limitations set by the National Institute on Drug Abuse (NIDA) and the DEA. As the NIDA Web site recognizes, marijuana is designated to the most restrictive drug category, meaning "that the drug in its usual form has a high potential for abuse and has no commonly accepted medical use in this country."

MARIJUANA from page 1

The NIDA recognizes the possible benefits of marijuana but states that "little data from clinical trials are available to support or refute these claims."

These restrictions have fueled Craker, and a group of California researchers who plan on financially backing his studies, to pursue marijuana research even further.

"The government, through the NIDA and the DEA, control all legal uses of this plant material, deciding who can legally grow and who can legally evaluate any medical benefits. Thus, they can control any test results," Craker stated.

Although he recognizes that these organizations are simply doing their job by protecting people from potential drug abuse, he also believes that the stigma attached to marijuana can inhibit the potential research benefits.

He states that there must be a "change in political attitudes that can be directed to the protecting agencies indicating that testing for medical use is okay."

Jim Fox, UMass student and member of the Cannabis Reform Coalition, although excited by last Tuesday's news, expressed concerns with the DEA's control of marijuana studies.

"I think it's a good idea for him [Craker] to do these studies at UMass," he said. "It's good that it's going to be a high quality supply for research as opposed to that which the feds grow in Mississippi, which is low quality. The DEA grows marijuana that's lower quality to fudge results."

Ann Russell, also a member of the coalition, recognizes the benefits of this research in transforming the fear that surrounds marijuana.

"I think that if people see that you can do research on marijuana, the fear around the drug will subside a bit," she stated.

As much as the coalition was pleased by last Tuesday's news, Fox made it clear that Craker's research will have no affect on UMass' stance on recreational use of marijuana or any other drug on campus.

Most students, such as UMass student Sonya James, realize this, and are in support of Craker's pursuits.

"The government shouldn't be able to control everything," she said. "I think if they're really doing research, and he can prove it, then why not allow it?"

UMass student Christopher Scot Bartelson agrees with the research but emphasized that it's important to conduct the research properly.

"I think it is important that background research should be done on the professor and make sure he has a thorough and detailed outline showing what he plans to do with the marijuana so that he is not just obtaining it to brag or possibly use it in an inappropriate way.

"The only reason that this is a big deal in the first place is because it is the infamous 'marijuana', which has basically become a beacon of illegal fun in our society," Bartelson added.

Craker has encountered stiff opposition from the DEA when it comes to researching marijuana, but he has received support from many groups, including the ACLU and the university.

"This is what a university is supposed to do – support research, especially that which can be used for the good of society," Craker said. "We have all the confidence in the world in Lyle."

Five colleges offer cultural activities throughout February

HISTORY from page 1

The event will be free but donations collected at the door will go to AIDS research and education.

Elsewhere, Black History Month is being celebrated in many different ways. At Amherst, Hampshire, Mount Holyoke and Smith Colleges, many events have taken place throughout the month. African-American speaker Akiba Solomon has appeared at both Hampshire and Mt. Holyoke, while at Smith College, a talent showcase was held to celebrate African-Americans in the arts, and the event was accompanied by a trivia tournament.

This February marks the 31st anniversary of Black History month, celebrated by the United States and Canada, and by the United Kingdom every October. The commemoration, once known as "Negro History Week," dates back to 1926 when Dr. Carter G. Woodson, a graduate student from Harvard, chose to bring attention to the African-American population in the country's history. Woodson picked the second week in February to celebrate due to the birthdays of Frederick Douglass and Abraham Lincoln.

At first, Negro History Week was celebrated only by African-Americans, but soon became a nation-wide and interracial tribute. While Woodson's purpose of the week was to eventually have it eliminated, in hopes that African-American history would merge with U.S. History, the entire month of February became "Black History Month" in 1976.

The month of February is chosen for reasons more that just Douglass' and Lincoln's birthdays. February also holds the dates of important events to the African-American culture, such as the birthday of W.E.B. Du Bois, the passing of the 15th Amendment allowing African-Americans to vote, the founding of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) and the assassination of Malcolm X.

February also marks the anniversary of the Civil Rights Movement milestone in 1960 when African-American college students held a "sit-in" at a segregated lunch counter. Also, the first African-American U.S. Senator Hiram R. Revels was elected in February of 1870.

Du Bois, for whom the UMass library is named after, once said that "education is that whole system of human training within and without the school house walls, which molds and develops men."

Duckling has rare mutation

LONDON – Webbed feet run in Stumpy's family, but he's the first to have four of them.

A rare mutation has left the eight-day-old duckling with two nearly full-sized legs behind the two he runs on. Nicky Janaway, a duck farmer in New Forest, Hampshire, 95 miles southwest of London, showed the duckling to reporters Saturday.

"It was absolutely bizarre. I was thinking 'he's got too many legs,' and I kept counting 'one, two, three, four,'" Janaway said.

Stumpy would probably not survive in the wild, but Janaway, who runs the Warrawee Duck Farm in New Forest, says he is doing well.

"He's eating and surviving so far, " Janaway said.

Associated Press

Women urged to exercise

By Marilynn Marchione
Associated Press

Nearly all American women are in danger of heart disease or stroke and should be more aggressive about lowering their risk – including asking their doctors about daily aspirin use, the American Heart Association said Monday in new guidelines.

It is the first time guidelines have urged all women to consider aspirin for preventing strokes, although specialists warn that it can cause ulcers and dangerous bleeding. They said it is probably not a good idea for young women with no big health problems.

"We do not want women to go to the drugstore and just start taking this themselves. It is critical that every woman talk to her doctor," said Dr. Lori Mosca, director of preventive cardiology at New York-Presbyterian Hospital and chair of the expert panel that wrote the guidelines.

The guidelines also advise daily exercise and less fat, and declare vitamins C and E, beta carotene and folic acid supplements worthless for preventing heart disease.

The guidelines were published in the journal Circulation with related studies on women's health, including one suggesting that hormone skin patches may be safer than pills for menopause symptoms.

In general, the guidelines aim to get women and doctors to focus on the long-term risk of high blood pressure, smoking, lack of exercise or being overweight – even if a woman's current health seems fine. Even a single risk factor at age 50 greatly raises the chance of heart disease or stroke later, and only about 10 percent of American women are free of these problems.

CORRECTION

The Friday, Feb. 16, 2007 edition of The Massachusetts Daily Collegian incorrectly reported on the proposed student charges for the 2007-2008 academic year. The article was incorrectly titled "Students react to UMass' newly-passed tuition hikes." The proposal was also referred to as "newly-passed" in the story. The increase has not yet passed. It was only approved by the University of Massachusetts Administration and Finance committee.

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian
CXVII
Issue 86

113 Campus Center University of Massachusetts Amherst, MA 01003
• 413-545-3500 •
• Fax 413-545-3699 •
www.dailycollegian.com

Editor in Chief Eric Athas
Managing Editor Rob Greenfield
Business Manager Dan Conti
Production Manager Amanda Allen
Night Supervisor Sherel Wolnik
Advertising Manager Jameson Porter
Advertising Production Molly Eggleston
Arts & Living Editor Morgan Rousseau
Comics Editor Adam Szaggin
Editorial Editor Tucker Merrick
News Editor Matt Belliveau
Sports Editor Danny Picard
Sports Editor Joe Pelland
Circulation Manager Jeff Penz
Finance Manager David Valade
Assistant Operations Linda Wallack
Assistant Advertising Nicole Puddester
Asst. Arts & Living Tim McCall
Asst. Arts & Living Sydney Towne
Assistant News Anna Doliantis
Assistant News Nicole Boonjakuakul
Assistant Sports Jeremy Rice
Assistant Editorial Brendan Hall
Web Editor James Hale
Photo Editor Toan Trinh

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian is published Monday through Friday during the University of Massachusetts academic calendar. The Collegian is independently operating as a student-run newspaper. Founded in 1890, the Collegian was known as Aggie Life from the College's founding in 1906 until Women's College in 1914 and the The Weekly Collegian in 1916. Published daily in 1967. [illegible] New Hampshire, 1994. The Collegian is printed on recycled newsprint with soy-based inks.

Production Crew
On staff today

NIGHT EDITOR
Rob Greenfield

COPY EDITOR
Jamie Mason

PRODUCTION SUPERVISOR
Tiffany Van Langen

Do you know the...
"TOP 5 REASONS TO PARTY SMART"?

TOP PRIZE: UMass Amherst sweatshirt
RUNNERS-UP receive a $10 gift certificate to Bueno y Sano

Sponsored by: Campus and Community Coalition to Reduce High Risk Drinking

Tell us what YOU think are five important reasons to... PARTY SMART

Email your reasons to:
partysmart@gw.housing.umass.edu
by February 23rd

Lion Dance Performance
Lion Dance Schedule:
Worcester DC 5:30-6:00 pm
Franklin DC 6:15-6:45 pm
Hampshire DC 7:00-7:15 pm
Berkshire DC 7:30-8:00 pm

Lucky Money
in Red Envelope ($200 per DC)

Chinese New Year
Join the Excitement and Festivities!
Tuesday, February 20, 2007 · All DC's from 5-9 pm

Menu Featuring:
Hot & Sour Soup
Peking Duck
Firecracker Chicken
Battered Fish with Sweet & Sour Sauce
Stir Fry Mixed Vegetables or Tofu
Longevity Noodles
Jasmine Rice
Spring Rolls
Green Tea
Almond Cookies
Fortune Cookies
Clementines
Chinese Dessert

www.umass.edu/diningservices

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

EDITORIAL OPINION

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 20, 2007

"I may not agree with what you say but I will defend to the death your right to say it." Voltaire

EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

An equal opportunity holiday?

Domenic Poli

Yesterday finished up one of those calendar occurrences that are oh-so-cherished by members of any student body: a three-day weekend. The reason for this most recent elongated treat was so the country could observe one of its lesser-recognized holidays. I am talking, of course, about Presidents' Day – or should I say Washington's Birthday?

You see, who actually knew that Presidents' Day wasn't all-inclusive? In fact, the nation uses the annual holiday as a way of honoring, specifically, two of America's greatest presidents – George Washington and Abraham Lincoln, whose birthdays are Feb. 22 and 12, respectively. But the odyssey of this mysterious day continues.

I soon found out that Presidents' Day was, in fact, originally intended to paid tribute to Mr. Washington only. When I learned that what my calendar lists as "Presidents' Day" ta day when most remember the faces of the one and five dollar bills) was really instituted in memory of Washington alone, I was a little disappointed.

I mean no offense to Mr. Washington, of course – he is the Father of our Country and, arguably, the greatest American in history.

He fought gallantly for his homeland in the conflict that would grow into the French and Indian war. in 1775 he was elected Commander-In-Chief of the Continental Army, leading a ragamuffin bunch of militiamen through six years of arduous warfare in the American Revolution and when the Constitution (which he was largely responsible for fashioning) was ratified in 1776, the Electoral College chose him as the first President of the United States. The future of American democracy depended on how Washington would conduct himself while in office.

As we all know, he did a superb job as President, and every bit of democracy that thousands of immigrants flock to this country every year for is due, in very large part, to Mr. Washington.

So, I wasn't so much upset that he didn't have a holiday all to himself as I was surprised, especially when I learned that Mr. Lincoln was initially left out of the equation.

I wasn't so much upset that he didn't have a holiday all to himself as I was surprised.

Lincoln is perhaps the greatest Commander-In-Chief in American history. Look at the facts. He kept the nation together when the Civil War threatened to crumble it and he signed the Emancipation Proclamation in 1863, which declared that all slaves (even in the Confederacy) were forever free. As you all can see (and probably knew already) Lincoln was not actually chopped liver. He was instead one of the greatest presidents in history.

But there have been 41 other men who have proudly served this nation (some well, some others not so well) as its elected leader – don't they all, like Lincoln, deserve a little recognition?

President Franklin D. Roosevelt led the country out of the Great Depression, through much of World War II, formed Social Security and established a huge worker relief program for the unemployed – all this while being crippled with polio, mind you.

How about President John F. Kennedy?

JFK guided the country through much of the Cold War and the Cuban Missile Crisis. He helped fund the advancement of science, established the Peace Corps in 1960 and, as the man who proposed the Civil Rights Act of 1964, was probably the greatest pioneers for civil rights in history.

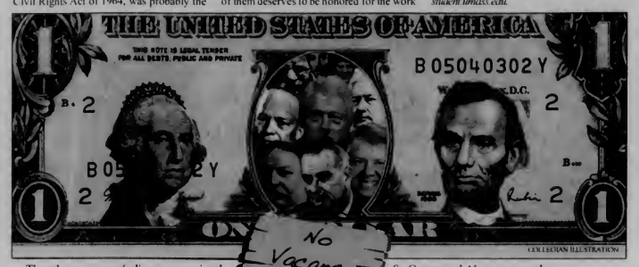
And that's just the start of the list.

Harry S. Truman won World War II when he decided to drop the A-bombs on Nagasaki and Hiroshima in 1945, and Woodrow Wilson helped the Allies win the previous World War by declaring war on Germany in 1917. He then tried to end all future wars with the League of Nations and his Fourteen Points.

I'm certainly not trying to take anything away from Mr. Washington – or Mr. Lincoln. The argument I'm making here is that we've had 42 former presidents, and – though some of them may have done a lousy job (see Millard Fillmore) – each one of them deserves to be honored for the work they did for their country.

The third Monday in February should stand with a different name in order to honor the two tremendous presidents whose birthdays envelope the date. To complement this exclusive day, there should be another during the calendar year to pay tribute to all of our neglected former presidents. Even if they didn't do a bang-up job, they all gave up their otherwise simple lives just to be subjected to the constant scrutiny, pressure and attention that come from handling the reigns of the one of the greatest nations in the world – and they all did it because they loved their country.

Domenic Poli can be reached at dpoli@student.umass.edu.



THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA
THIS NOTE IS LEGAL TENDER FOR ALL DEBTS, PUBLIC AND PRIVATE
B 05040302 Y
WASHINGTON D.C.
No Vacancy
COLLEGIAN ILLUSTRATION

The other guys were feeling unappreciated... So George and Abe were ousted.

A worthy gamble

Debbie Friedman

Deval Patrick did something radical to get elected as governor of Massachusetts – he showed an interest in the college-aged population of this state. During his campaign, Patrick made public higher education a prominent theme, highlighting how critically under-funded state schools had become and promising change. He also visited the University of Massachusetts twice in the final lap of his campaign, showing a sincere commitment to college students and the issues facing them.

Devoting this kind of time and money on a usually politically apathetic population was risky, but in the end it proved worthwhile for Patrick, as he able to win 55.7 percent of the vote. College students comprised a good portion of that number, coming out in large numbers to vote – many for the first time.

The Patrick campaign was able to motivate students to pay attention and mobilize them to vote by pledging to reinvest in public higher education, an idea that had been smashed to pieces by the Romney administration. He gambled on us, and in return we gambled on him by casting votes in his favor without really knowing if he would stay true to his word. Now that Patrick has settled into office, and has started making changes, it is clear that both gambles paid off big time for the state of Massachusetts.

Patrick's vision for the higher education system in this state has been to make it easier for everyone to go to college. It is a simple idea, but getting to that point involves concentrated effort and commitment. Investing more money into the state's educational system and increasing the amount of financial assistance allotted to the average student have been the two major solutions put forth by Patrick in his plans to achieve this vision. Specifically, Patrick pledged to roll back the $13 billion in budget cuts put into effect by the Romney administration.

He also said he would reduce the interest rates of federal Stafford and parent loans, to help families better handle the rising costs of college tuition. On top of this, Patrick promised to work to increase the amount of money given out in Pell Grant awards, which are the biggest forms of financial assistance available to low income students.

He has already reversed the budget cuts, bringing back nearly $23 million to the UMass system.

So far, these promises are being kept. While Patrick has only been in office for a few weeks, he has already reversed the budget cuts, bringing back nearly $23 million to the UMass system. Of that money, approximately 10 million will be given back to this campus specifically. Having that money back will help sustain the University's finances, but increased sources of funding are still imperative to keeping our schools in good shape for the future. The speedy reversal of these cuts shows that Patrick means business when it comes to reinvesting in public higher education, and produces an optimistic outlook on future policy affecting state colleges.

A serious lesson can be learned from what recently happened here in Massachusetts. That is, the youth of this country have the ability to take part in the political process. We can be reached. However, the effort to reach us is rarely attempted because it is viewed as a waste of time. Why should politicians reach out, if we do not react? That is one side of the coin. Yet, most attempts to reach out to the youth are half-hearted and scattered at best. With such little sincerity put into addressing the issues that matter to us, why should we respond, knowing it is likely we are just being swooned into a vote based on false promises?

As a result of this vicious cycle in which politicians and students ignore each other, important issues affecting our generation continue to be de-prioritized. But if college is to ever be affordable and accessible to everyone, things have to change. The partnership between Deval Patrick and this state's college youth shows that the cycle can be broken if students and politicians meet each other halfway. With any luck, the 2008 Presidential candidates and voting youth of the country will be able to do just that in the next election. Only then will the issue of public higher education finally gain the spotlight it deserves.

Debbie Friedman writes on Tuesdays. She can be reached atdrfriedm a student.umass.edu Government: bought and sold?

Joshua H. Wilder

In order to preserve one's sanity these days you must have a strong threshold for troubling news. The last few years have been trying for all Americans; with the terrorist attacks on the World Trade Center, the carnage of Hurricane Katrina and the growing death toll in Iraq all proving that there is no shortage of unbelievable stories out there.

Collectively it seems that most Americans have found a way to cope with these recent tragedies and move on with their lives. The majority of students here on campus either tune out the news or ignore it all together and so they remain relatively upbeat in spite of such troubled times.

Unfortunately, a new story has come to light in the last week that seems to put the icing on the cake when it comes to confirming the time tested motto of "Don't Trust Politicians" – and it shouldn't be ignored. Indictments have been handed out with some serious charges attached to them: bribery, misappropriation of funds and conspiring to defraud the United States and its citizens. Disturbingly enough, the parties in question are a former politician and former high ranking official in the CIA.

The whole situation reeks of a well thought out, highly organized and excessive abuse of the highest government positions.

Former Congressman Randal "Duke" Cunningham and former CIA Executive Director Kyle "Dusty" Foggo are facing charges based on their contact with a San Diego contractor named Brent R. Wilkes. Allegedly Cunningham took a kickback of $700,000 from Wilkes and in return he made sure that his appropriation of funds and government contracts specifically benefited ADCS Incorporated, the company owned by Wilkes.

People say that hard work, determination and a keen mind are all you need to succeed in this country, but when all else fails just use bribery. According to the US Attorneys prosecuting the case, Wilkes paid out bribes to Cunningham in all forms and fancies. Free meals, limousine services, cash donations, corporate jet usage, boats, vacations, entertainment services and yes even prostitution was on the table in this disgraceful burglary of the American taxpayer.

In return for getting to live the life of an extravagant rock star, this Congressman, a person appointed by the people to serve the common good, followed through on his end of the bargain by providing more than $100 million in defense contracts to Wilkes' company. The most disheartening part of the story, aside from the fact that it is true, is that Cunningham abused his power in this fashion for nearly a decade.

Sure enough, Kyle Foggo comes into the story as the one who used his seniority in the CIA to influence the distribution of contracts to a person he had known for years. Apparently Foggo was lifelong friends with Wikes, and as a trio these degenerates mishandled tens of thousands of dollars.

The whole situation reeks of a well thought out, highly organized and excessive abuse of the highest government positions. As the dust begins to clear and the trial for these men begins, many questions remain unanswered.

Does greed always outweigh one's public obligation to serve the people? Just how far can scandals like this go before permanently tarnishing our country's image? Do people who commit such heinous acts always have to have a nick-name like "Dusty," "Drippy" or "Doc?"

It seems that the temptation to abuse powerful positions is too much for some to ignore. This story reads just like the antics of disgraced lobbyist and moral midget Jack Abramoff, and speaks volumes for the decisions people make when they must choose between doing the right thing and getting rich quick.

"The first episodes will be old content, as when we first started working on the album and then it will slowly get closer and closer to modern day," said Zac Hanson, the band's drummer and vocalist. "As we come up to the release of the album the episodes will be almost live, maybe a couple of days old."

The episodes will come in five- to seven-minute installments.

"There's a group of fans who would love it to be 20 minutes every time," said Hanson. "We want people to be able to sit down at a computer, 'Hey cool, there's a new 'Taking the Walk' episode' and just click on it and be able to watch it and not be like 'dude, it's like 30 minutes long, I'll watch it some other time.'"

"Taking the Walk" will be Hanson's second free documentary release on iTunes. In mid-January the band released "Strong Enough to Break," which showed not only the making of their album "Underneath," but also their split for their record label [Island Def Jam] and the creation of their own label, 3 Car Garage (3CG). "Strong Enough to Break is almost a music industry film," said Hanson.

Since "Taking the Walk" doesn't hold the same undertone as "Strong Enough to Break," the feel of the documentary looks to be much different.

"Because of the way it is, in five- to seven-minute little episodes, and the way it was filmed about the process and the way we'll be releasing it, as we go; not sitting down afterwards and somebody editing it, I think your going to see the more light-hearted side of things," Hanson said.

It won't all be fun though.

"It's going to have a lot of the heavy stuff too," said Hanson. "Hopefully a good balance."

"On Strong Enough to Break, it doesn't really go into real depth of how we were feeling," said Hanson. "Taking the Walk" looks to take viewers deeper into the album making process. "A good portion will be about, here's a song, here's how we wrote it, here's what we did."

Hanson is also looking to possibly release "Taking the Walk" and "Strong Enough to Break" together on DVD. "There's always been this looming concept of 'Wow, what if

See HANSON on page 6

OPINIONS IN SHORT

The Issue:

Just this Valentine's Day, the Administration and Finance Committee of the UMass Board of Trustees approved a proposal for student charges for the 2007-08 academic year. This measure, put forth by President Jack M. Wilson, would increase tuition and mandatory fees by 3.4 percent, which is in-fact lower than the current inflation rate at 3.6 percent. (as reported by the Consumer Price Index.)

UMass students graduate with the lowest levels of accumulated debt, according to University statistics. Yet at the same time, our price of attendance will be going up several hundred dollars, while the state's contribution to UMass is lower than it was in 2000. Where should money come from? How much is too much? Are students unfairly griping?

The entire UMass Board of Trustees will convene on March 14th to decide on the proposal. But before they do, we want opinions from you. Give us 200 words on your position – we'll take the best ones and print them in Friday's paper along with some of our own. We look forward to reading.

-Editorial Board-

Email your responses to editorial@dailycollegian.com

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

ARTS & LIVING

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 20, 2007

ARTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Hanson working on new album

Band also plans to release five documentaries on Apple's iTunes

Beginning this week, the band Hanson will be releasing episodes of a documentary series regarding their new album. Each episode will be five to seven minutes long and feature the band working on their latest album to be released on May 22.

BY TERESA REILLY
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Building up to their new album "The Walk," Hanson will be releasing their new docu-series on iTunes for free. The series, entitled "Taking the Walk," will bring viewers through the album making process.

After the first episode is made available on Feb. 26, the rest of the series will be released in segments twice a week until the album's release on May 22.

UMass group speaks out against rape

BY MORGAN-ANN ROUSSEAU
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Tonight at 8 p.m., a group of students devoted to the awareness of sexual violence will hold a meeting at Amherst Coffee. "Take Back the Night" is a student empowered rally that wants to let victims of sexual assault know that they're not alone.

The TBN project is aimed at anyone whose life has been impacted by sexual violence. "This event is to raise awareness about the issue of sexual violence and assault," said University of Massachusetts senior Emma McAlary, a double major in Women's Studies and Legal Studies. "[Sexual violence] is still a huge issue and we are trying to create a safe place where survivors can tell their story."

McAlary and Allison Slutter, a Women's Studies and Sociology double major, are the main coordinators of TBN this year. Their meeting tonight will discuss ideas for TBN speakers, sponsors and event formats.

A main message of TBN is that no one is alone. In their effort for awareness TBN encourages all survivors, as well as their friends, families and other community members to support survivors and this serious issue of sexual violence that's plaguing society. The event has been happening at UMass since the mid-70s, but after a brief hiatus TBN was restarted on campus five years ago. While local community members are doing their part to take direct action against rape, and other forms of violence against women, the TBN rally is a nationally practiced event.

McAlary sees TBN as an educational opportunity to dispel some of the myths surrounding rape and sexual assault.

We usually have speakers with backgrounds and professions in the field of preventing sexual assault," said McAlary.

According to McAlary TBN is looking for people who might offer ideas about strengthening their effort. The group is hoping to gain the attention of those who have an interest in social change, although doesn't limit itself to certain types of people.

"We welcome everyone to learn, participate and get to know each other. A lot of us have bonded over our common work," said an eager McAlary. Still an emerging effort, the group has yet to decide the format and content of this year's TBN event, for which they've yet to set a date.

Tonight's meeting hopes to recruit volunteers from all backgrounds to brainstorm and help make this year's rally better than ever. Since both victims, and those whose lives have been affected by sexual violence, are people of all walks of life, the project hopes to involve students, community members, faculty, staff, five college members and alumni in the rally.

In addition to volunteering ones time, a major way to support TBN is to donate money, food or other supplies and services.

Morgan-ann Rousseau can be reached at Arts@dailycollegian.com

"Taking Back the Night" is a nation wide group for victims and those affected by sexual violence.

Taikoza concert is fun for all age groups

Performance group Taikoza did many types of dance moves throughout their performance this past Friday night.

BY DANA LUDEK
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

Taikoza dazzled its audience Friday night with a captivating display of musical talent and intricate dance moves. Nine troupe members delivered a 16-song performance packed with an assortment of drums, bamboo flutes flue and shakuhachi, as well as a six-foot, 13-stringed zither known as a koto, which justly captured a slice of Japanese culture in a highly visual and energetic performance. Their overall performance was full of variety and zeal.

Whisking audiences away right from the beginning, Taikoza's opening piece, Satsuki, written by troupe member Marco Eisenhard, delivered the energy of May and the Spring season to an audience just warming up from a frigid February. Intense, thundering pulsations on a series of different sized drums brought a sense of excitement to the room and gave audience members a feeling that they were being whisked away to a blossoming Japanese springtime.

The second performance, the Iyo Manzai Dance, incorporated the delicate and intricate moves of two classically trained Mimbuzu Dancers. In a fun dance celebrating the New Year, the Mimbuzu Dancers used green fans to take the shape of lucky symbols for the New Year. These shapes included Pine Tree (longevity), Phoenix (luck) and Treasure Boat (wealth). The dancers made use of their hands, feet and mouths to move the fans into these different shapes, resulting in a visual experience nothing short of breathtaking.

The show was not all drumming

See TAIKOZA on page 6

NEW MUSIC TUESDAY

Menomena makes unique sound on new LP

BY ALEX HORNBECK
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Menomena's 2003 debut album "I Am the Fun Blame Monster!" shows that band members, Justin Harris, Brent Knopf and Danny Seim are not afraid to have some fun. The disc comes packaged in the back of a flip-book presenting four scenes of the band performing, as well as revealing the anagram behind the album's title: rearrange its letters to come out with "the first Menomena album."

However their clever playfulness extended beyond the packaging and the group presented a dynamic set of songs accentuated by mesmerizing piano lines, dramatic swells of drums and a keen sense for vocal melody. These qualities are carried over to this year's excellent "Friend and Foe," and with a newfound sense of lyrical depth, aid in creating an album that sounds at once exceedingly precise and elatedly chaotic.

Within the first minute of the album, the listener is introduced to all the qualities that define Menomena's sound. "Muscle'n Flo" opens the record with eight drum beats enhanced with slight reverb and containing enough explosive energy to immediately entice the audience. The drums quickly disappear and backed with a simple bass line the vocals are introduced: "Oh in the morning I stumble my way towards the mirror Add my make-up, it's light out, and I now face just what I'm made of."

At the end of these lines the drums reappear and all the parts – voice, drums and bass – soldier on through another verse. The vocals and drums then both vanish, replaced by a slow, sliding guitar riff. Soon after, the drums resurface, backed by a hypnotic piano line. All four instruments briefly align in rhythmic synchronization before a dramatic drum beat and the triumphant return of the vocals. Again, this impressive milieu of musical exits and entrances all occurs within the first minute of the album.

MENOENA

"FRIENDS OR FOE"

BUSURK RECORDS

4.5/5

Such detailed analysis is tedious on paper, but it shows how dynamically detailed Menomena's arrangements are. If this analysis seems intimidating, one needs only to listen to the music to hear how smoothly it's all realized by the band. Furthermore, the presence of simple and catchy melodies keeps the sound from becoming too mathematical or mechanical.

The unexpected addition and subtraction of many musical components is what the band thrives on. While every instrument could be played at once, which would no doubt create nice songs, the chopping and splicing of musical components is what gives "Friend and Foe" such an entirely unique sound.

This sound gives the songs an exuberant playful quality, and with the detailed comic art of the album cover and such song titles as "Boyscout'n" and "Evil Bee," one can't help but smile. The lyrical content, however, defies such playfulness. Standout track "My My" is a reflection on self-doubt and somber what-ifs. "What if all my enemies were dead And I could forget everything they said/What if everyone is right/I should've taken their advice," the song's character wonders.

If all the disc's songs had carried such weight, the album may have come off as too polarized, torn between extreme playfulness and solemn concepts. However, the band strikes just the right balance and incorporates quirky humor in many songs. In "Running," the phrase "before the cows come home" is repeated and a faint mooing can be heard in the background. In "Evil Bee," the group puts forth the lament "Oh, to be a machine to be wanted, to be useful," a thought so contrary to common sense that it begs to be uncomfortably giggled at. Still, even this line contains contemplative depth.

Most of the songs on "Friend and Foe" are played on the standard instruments of rock music – piano, guitar, bass and drums make up the core of the disc's sound, and the most "exotic" the band gets is in its deployment of saxophone and the occasional xylophone. What's fascinating is the way these instruments are introduced so suddenly and removed so abruptly only to swell up from behind another voice, and create such joyous accompaniment to the group's thoughtful lyrics. In the realm of independent rock music, where bands oftentimes sound altogether too similar, "Friend and Foe" expertly showcases the truly unique sound of Menomena.

Alex Hornbeck can be reached at ahornbec a student. umass edu

Taikoza performance a success

TAIKOZA from page 5

and dancing. Flute and koto solos and dance performances were well integrated, breaking up the numerous drum sets. The relatively short length of the sets allowed audience members to remain interested and focused.

One particularly notable performance was a koto solo titled "Tori no You ni," translated as "Flying like a Bird". Koto player Masayo Ishigure's performance described the feeling of what it must be like to fly not as a human, but as a bird. Ishigure played the koto with such grace and ease that the instrument seemed more of an extension of her body.

While incredibly intense and infused with high energy, Taikoza did not fail to bring a softer, comedic element to the show with a piece called Eisa. Coming from the festival of Eisa celebrated by the villages of Okinawa, this performance combined the sounds of different sized drums, the fue and the shakuhachi to make a wonderfully playful soundtrack for a mischievous masked woman that entered the stage and played practical jokes on Lienhard.

The prankster of Eisa proved to be successful even among the youngest of audience members. Chelsea Olenick, 7, found this to be her favorite part of the show.

"I liked how the masked person kept poking him [Lienhard]. It was funny!" she said.

The show ended with Yatai Bayashi, a piece borrowed from the Chichibu festival celebrated in an area north of Tokyo. The rhythms played on the drums are defined by two phrases: Ko-nami meaning small wave and Oo-nami meaning big wave. Originally used on the ships which transported the blocks that built Osaka castle, the Taiko player used them to set the pace for the oarsmen as well as describe the condition of the waves ahead. Taikoza's performance fueled listeners' imaginations with musical images of crashing waves and a tumultuous sea. The three main Taiko players even sat at their drums in the position of rowing oarsmen to complete the image.

The audience rewarded Taikoza's outstanding show with a standing ovation and wild applause. Taikoza showed their appreciation by delivering the audience one last encore performance.

A number of University of Massachusetts students were in attendance, and many were especially pleased with the show.

Diana Lulek can be reached at dlulek@student.umass.edu.

COURTESY OF TAIKOZA.COM

One of the more memorable performances during Taikoza's concert was koto player Masayo Ishigue. Ishigue played the Koto with ease.

Hanson starts their own record label

HANSON from page 5

we release the documentary and 'Taking the Walk together?" said Hanson. "Take people through seven years."

Another form of release may be the band's Web site, Hanson. net. With around 60,000 current fan club members the series could have done well there. However, the band decided to release the docu-series on iTunes in order to make it more publicly available.

"iTunes is just about finding the outlet that the most people could find easily," said Hanson.

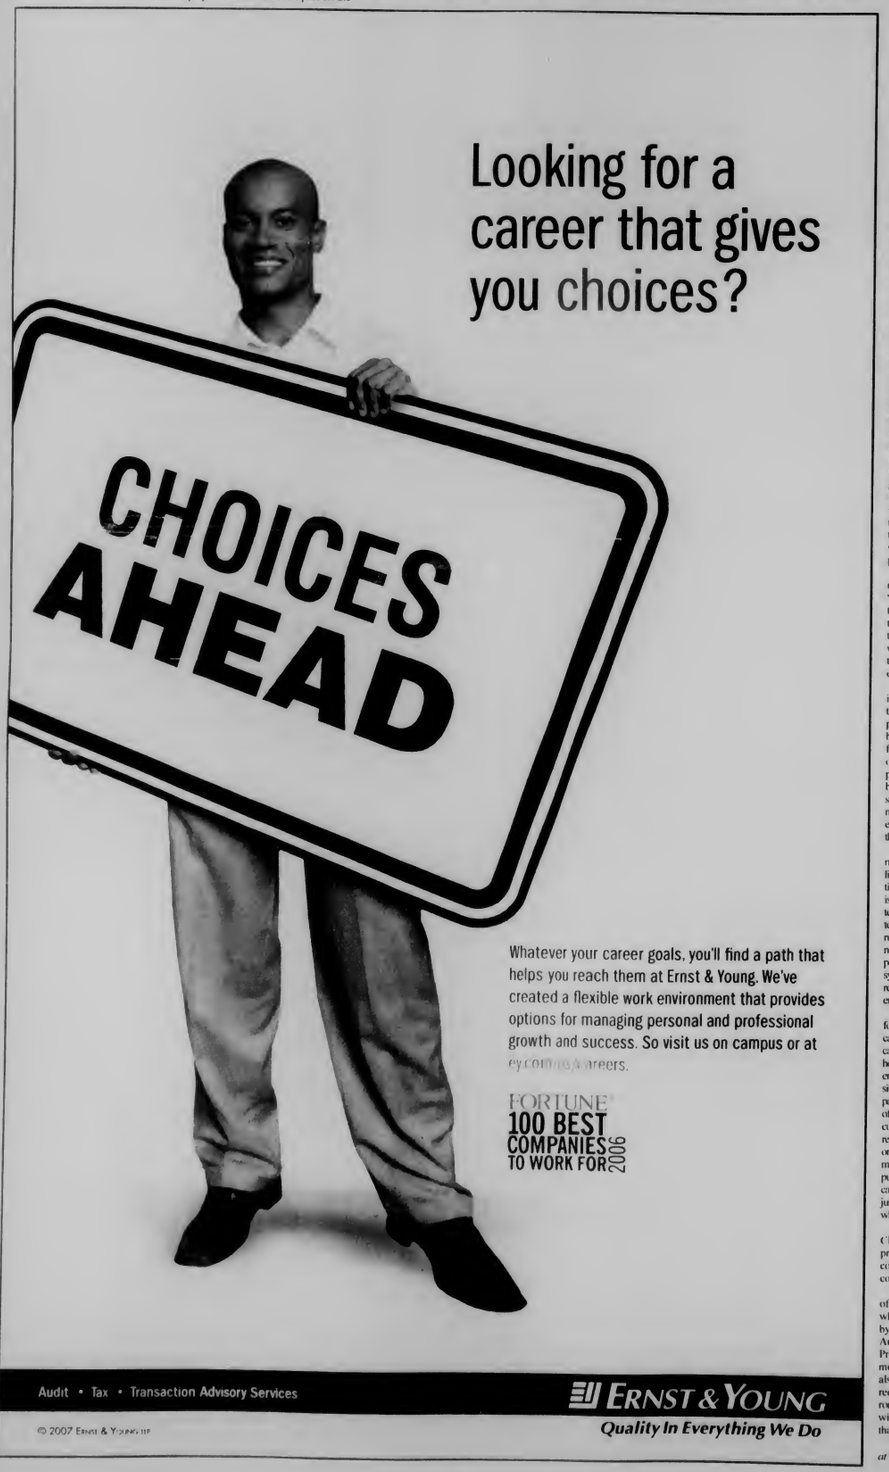
Fanclub members will be happy to hear that there will be exclusive stuff for them. "When you shoot for hours and hours and hours a week," said Hanson, "you've got a lot more footage."

The documentaries aren't the only things that Hanson has used iTunes for. On Dec. 1, 2006, the band released their single "Great Divide" on the international music sharing site. Proceeds from the song were donated to IHVSA, an AIDS organization in Africa. Parts of the song were actually recorded with an African chorus singing "Ngi Ne Themba," which means "I have hope" in Zulu.

The album "The Walk," which the series will document, will be Hanson's fourth. Their first record, "Middle of Nowhere," contained the #1 hit song "MmmBop."

Hanson is currently preparing for the album release by playing four preview shows on the East Coast.

Teresa Reilly can be reached at treilly@student.umass.edu



Looking for a career that gives you choices?
CHOICES AHEAD
Whatever your career goals, you'll find a path that helps you reach them at Ernst & Young. We've created a flexible work environment that provides options for managing personal and professional growth and success. So visit us on campus or at ey.com/us/careers.
FORTUNE 100 BEST COMPANIES TO WORK FOR 2006
Audit • Tax • Transaction Advisory Services
© 2007 Ernst & Young LLP
ERNST & YOUNG
Quality In Everything We Do

Colleges aim to stop waste

By Amy Calandrella
Collegian Columnist

As the issue of global warming becomes more and more a part of public discourse and vocabulary, the question soon arises, "What can we do about it?" Some suggest an individual responsibility, while others advocate the political and legislative route. The American College and University Presidents Climate Commitment weaves two strategies into one, taking advantage of the large community of individuals on a college campus.

The Presidents Climate Commitment asks university presidents and chancellors across the nation to commit to both a carbon neutral campus and increased research in environmental sustainability. Specifically, the Commitment includes:

- Completing an emissions inventory.
- Within two years, setting a target date and interim milestones for becoming climate neutral.
- Taking immediate steps to reduce greenhouse gas emissions by choosing from a list of short-term actions.
- Integrating sustainability into the curriculum and making it part of the educational experience.
- Making the action plan, inventory and progress reports publicly available.

The concept of carbon neutrality is a new one, and on its way to becoming the "recycling" of our generation. Designated the Oxford English Dictionary word of the year, the goal of carbon neutrality is to assess the amount of carbon emissions we as individuals or as groups create, and to make an effort to reduce and eventually eliminate this impact.

The modern college and university is not only a place of learning, but often times a bustling community with a complex infrastructure all its own. In order to become carbon neutral a university must first assess the varied sources of carbon output on its campus from heating and powering academic, office and residential buildings to fueling the campus-wide bus system. Once an assessment has been made, steps may be taken to reduce and eventually eliminate the carbon output of these sources.

For example, new buildings technology can help increase efficiency in lighting, heating and ventilation. Often times a step towards carbon neutrality is as simple as purchasing new, updated technology and appliances. Other, longer term solutions mean a commitment to running the campus on an entirely carbon neutral energy such as solar or wind power. Emissions from a campus bus system and grounds equipment may be reduced by converting to biodiesel, an environmentally friendly fuel.

Because many potential solutions focus on long term goals, another step to carbon neutrality is through purchasing carbon offsets. Moving from a carbon heavy lifestyle to an entirely fuel and energy efficient system is not always possible at first. And so, an individual, company or university may purchase a carbon offset through one of several private firms currently available. This includes funding reforestation efforts, alternative energies or compensating companies that have made efforts to reduce their carbon outputs. The philosophy goes that if we cannot become carbon neutral ourselves just yet, we can support carbon neutrality where it exists elsewhere.

Signatories of the Presidents Climate Commitment include 72 presidents and chancellors from colleges and universities across the country.

To avoid the most harmful effects of global warming our earth as a whole must reduce its carbon output by 80% percent by mid-century. The American College and University Presidents Climate Commitment is a move in this direction. As individuals we can commit to driving less, to recycling and to living a more environmentally conscious lifestyle, but without institutional change reaching that 80 percent is unlikely.

Amy Calandrella can be reached at acalandr@student.umass.edu

Consistency still not there for UM on-three when Torrey Mitchell was sent off for interference. The two-man advantage lasted two minutes with nothing coming to fruition. Twice the Catamounts stalled the advantage by sending the puck down the ice.

HOCKEY from page10

Then all the momentum left the Minutemen when Cory Quirk was called for interference with 58 seconds remaining on UMass' five-on-four. Not much later, Quirk's penalty proved costly.

Brayden Irwin – who served Winowski's major – raced out of the box and into the offensive zone right when the penalty expired. As he reached the top of the right circle, Irwin gained control of the puck and fired a wrist shot. It beat Quick on his left side, putting the Catamounts on the board first.

"No question that was the swing of the game and it changed the momentum of the game in a big way," Cahoon said of the missed opportunity that turned into a score for the opposition. "It was obviously disappointing from our standpoint because we had played very, very well up until that point."

Late in the second, that score almost changed in UVM's favor, but Corey Carlson missed a wide-open net. He skated in with a teammate on the better side of a two-on-one. Carlson received a pass in the low right slot, with Quick frozen on the other side. His shot was wide right and skipped off the bottom of the net. That play gave the Catamounts momentum, which they used to pressure Quick for the remainder of the period and early into the third.

Mitchell and Vermont succeeded in doubling their advantage 2:19 into the final period. That's when Mitchell netted his 12th goal of the season, good for second on the Catamounts. The UVM captain backhanded the puck by Quick with assists given to Brian Roloff and Colin Voek.

The 2-0 UVM lead lasted six minutes before being turned into a 3-0 advantage. Quick fell down in front of his own net making the save on a Peter Lenes try. That prevented Quick from gathering in the rebound and the puck was left right out front. Dean Strong was there to knock it home for his team-leading 13th of the season. Still on his back, Quick had no shot at making the second save.

"Vermont is a good team," Cahoon said. "They're very stingy and get second-chance opportunities. They can win the close game and they've won a lot of low-scoring games.

"That was a tough loss for them last night and they came back and responded tonight with what they needed to do to get the job done."

After blowing at 2-0 lead, it took some late-game heroics from senior Chris Capraro to get the win for UMass on Friday night.

Capraro netted the game-winner – his eighth of the season – with just over two minutes to play in regulation. Sophomore Cory Quirk slid the puck across the crease and in front of Fallon to where Capraro was camped out. He then wasted little time in driving it home. UVM coach Kevin Sneddon pulled Fallon with 1:35 left, but to no avail.

UMass had its two-nothing advantage before the horn sounded the end of the first period. First it was sophomore Will Ortiz, netting his seventh of the season at the 2:08 mark.

Fallon stopped an initial Mark Matheson try, but Ortiz was at the right spot and shot the rebound past the goaltender.

Then defenseman David Leaderer added to the lead some eight minutes later. This time, Ortiz was on the assisting end of the score. He sent a pass to Leaderer just inside the right circle, where he unleashed the shot that recorded his second goal in as many games.

Vermont dominated the second period as much as the Minutemen did the first. Goals by Viktor Stalberg and Dean Strong set up the nail-biting finish. Stalberg found the net at 5:16 of the first, taking a pass from Mitchell. Assists on Strong's tally went to Carlson and Slavomir Tomko.

UMass will undoubtedly keep one eye on the Catamounts the rest of the way as UVM currently holds the final home-ice slot – one point ahead of the Minutemen.

Jon Pelland can be reached at jpelland@student.umass.edu

Senior Kevin Jarman recorded an assist in the weekend split with the Catamounts. The tally boosted the forward's season totals to 19 points on the season on seven goals and 12 assists, which is good for fourth on the team, tied with freshman Will Ortiz.

UMass keeps tradition in tact for A-10 preparations

By Michael King
Collegian Staff

Departing from tradition last season, the Massachusetts men's swimming and diving finished in second place at the 2006 Atlantic 10 Championship. The Minutemen had won five championships in a row, dating back to the 2000-01 season.

But men's coach Russ Yarworth was not about to do away with one of his favorite traditions after one second-place finish. As an extra motivational tool, the coach creates Championship Monday to be kept his team from becoming complacent and focused on the work they have left to do.

"The Monday during the week before we're going to leave," Yarworth said. "I bring all of the old trophies up from former championships and put them on the bleachers as a motivating tool in addition to the banner, to try to challenge the kids to bring home another one."

But Yarworth restricts the bleachers to those swimmers and divers who have been a part of a championship team.

"Tradition is that freshmen or anyone who hasn't been on a team that's won a championship can no longer sit on the bleachers before practice," Yarworth said.

Since the Minutemen failed to win the championship last season, both the freshmen and sophomores are not allowed to sit on the bleachers – a striking change from the past several seasons.

"We're pretty focused on what we need to do to get the championship back," Yarworth said.

In fact, the coach and his players treat the championship trophies far better than last year's second-place plaque.

"It's been decimated from last year," Yarworth said. "As the second place plaque is on the floor and people have been stepping on it."

A-10 Plans

Both teams left for Buffalo this morning at 8 a.m. The athletes should expect to spend at least six hours on the bus for the nearly 400-mile drive, barring traffic and weather problems.

The four-day meet begins Wednesday in the late afternoon and ends Saturday evening. The first event is the women's one-meter dive trials, which precedes relay and diving finals in the evening.

The rest of the championship follows the format of race trials beginning at 10:30 a.m. each morning, then the finals of the same events in the evening starting at 6:30 p.m.

Regardless of the success of each team at the A-10 Championships, it will be their last team competition of the year. However, the swimmers and divers have opportunities to qualify for the Zone A NCAA Regional Finals in their individual events.

But in order to do that, the swimmers must have times in the top 20 to 24 finishers of the collegiate swimmers in the Northeast. Then the top several performers in each of the regional finals compete at the National Finals in Minneapolis, Minn.

It's rare for A-10 schools to send swimmers to the NCAA Regional Finals, although the Richmond women's team sent two last season.

The last UMass swimmer to qualify for the NCAA's was Billy Brown in the 2001 season. Brown qualified in the 200-yard breast stroke.

However, five of the UMass divers have already qualified for the regional finals by meeting the necessary criteria at various meets during the regular season. Junior R.J. Rappe of the men's team, and seniors Melissa Pond and Mary Jenkins, as well as sophomores Karen Upperco and Sarah Horstmann of the women's team will all be diving competitively after this weekend regardless of their performance at the A-10 Championships.

ECAC Results

Depth is certainly not an issue for the men's team. Since each school is only allowed to bring 17 swimmers and three divers to the Atlantic 10 Championships, three of the non-A-10 participants swam in the ECAC Championships this past weekend.

Sophomore Greg Braun and freshmen Brendan Jones and Chris Howard each took on competition from 18 schools at the Harvard University campus.

As a three-man team, the Minutemen finished in 16th place. To put that into perspective, the winning school – Harvard – entered 27 swimmers into the meet. The intention for participating in the event was to give the young swimmers an opportunity to gain meet experience.

Jones had the team's strongest overall individual performance. He finished in third place in the 1,650-yard freestyle event, with a time less than half a second behind the winner. The distance swimmer also took 15th place in the 500-yard freestyle.

Howard, a sprinter, earned fourth place in the 50-yard freestyle and established a new personal record with his time of 21.26 seconds. The freshman also swam another career best time in the 100-yard freestyle, finishing in 16th place.

With the team's second entry in the 50-yard freestyle, Braun finished 18th in the preliminaries. His time of 21.65 seconds placed him only two spots out of qualifying for the final heat of the race.

Michael King can be reached at mking@student.umass.edu.

Junior R.J. Rappe is one of five UMass divers who are already slated to compete at the NCAA Regional Finals. It is the first time since 2001 UMass has sent representatives to the NCAA Regionals.

New WORLD Theater
365 DAYS PLAYS
UMass Amherst FINE ARTS CENTER
365 Days/365 Plays by Suzan-Lori Parks
New WORLD Theater presents Week #15 in the series, Feb. 22, 23 & 24, 2007 at 8 pm and Mount Holyoke College Department of Theatre Arts presents Week #16 of the series March 2 & 3 at 8 pm and March 4 at 2 pm. All shows at Rooke Theater, Mount Holyoke College.
• Special Event
2007 ANNUAL RAND LECTURE: Suzan-Lori Parks, March 5th at 4:30 pm, Rand Theater. Presented by Univ. of MA Department of Theater
Duurbaar (unstoppable)
by Ananya Dance Theatre
March 14, 2007
8 pm, Bowker Auditorium
Disposable Men
by James Scruggs
April 19 & 20, 2007
8 pm, Northampton Center for the Arts
Tickets Available at FAC Box Office, 545-2511. For more info about the shows visit our website or call NWT at 545-1972
www.newworldtheater.org

Minutewomen struggle in final home game of season

W. BASKETBALL from page10

point, 10-rebound performance in her final game at the Mullins Center.

"The team loves Tamara and the coaching staff loves Tamara," Dacko said. "She's a tremendous player at UMass and she's going to be sorely missed. She's probably the most complete athlete that I've coached here."

On the strength of freshman Kim Benton's third and final 3-pointer of the game, the Minutewomen pulled ahead for the first time in the game with 10 minutes left to play. They extended the lead to 61-57 but Xavier put the game away for good with an 11-0 run to seal the 75-67 win.

Tatham's double-double, coupled with a career-high 25 points from Mills weren't enough to down the Musketeers in the end. Xavier capitalized on 16 UMass turnovers – eight of which were committed by Tatham – resulting in an 11-point advantage in points off of turnovers.

"In the past years we would be down 17 and we wouldn't come back," Tatham said. "We'd all be down on ourselves, but this year is different. We knew this was our last home game and we knew we had the talent and ability to come back, and that's what we did. We just fell a bit short."

Harris notched a double-double in the second half, scoring 10 points and bringing down 10 rebounds. But perhaps the biggest key in the second stanza was the effort of Xavier center DeAnna Mason. She was a force under the basket, registering seven offensive rebounds in the second half alone, nine in total.

"We gave up too many offensive rebounds," Mills said. "That killed us. [DeAnna] Mason had a big game for them and if that keeps happening, we're going to have a tough time down the stretch."

"I'm happy with our effort, but I'm disappointed that we didn't do a good job boxing out," Dacko said. "We simply gave up too many second-shots. I think it's hard, because they're a real athletic team. They're great ball players, and when you look at some of our players, we're not as athletic as they are, and we need to be able to do better things to make up for our lack of athleticism."

UMass executed coach Dacko's gameplan of getting the ball inside and taking high-quality shots, but many of their close-range attempts rimmed out.

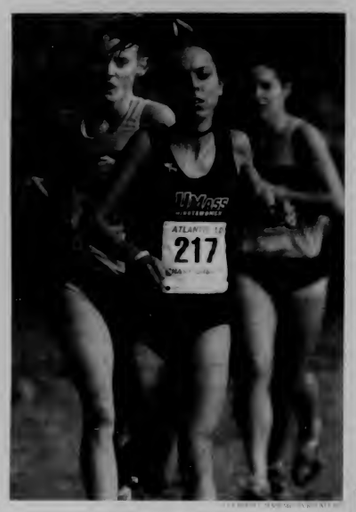
"We were in the game at the end, but if we had made our lay-ups we would have won," Dacko said. "We got the ball exactly where we wanted it, in the paint and a step away from the bucket, and we couldn't finish. When we go to the film, the players are going to be sick, because they ran the offense to perfection."

The Minutewomen had no such problem on Friday, connecting on a majority of their lay-ups, en route to a 13-point triumph over Duquesne. Mills preceded her monster effort on Sunday with 11 points, 10 rebounds and six assists. Her effort over the weekend earned her A-10 co-Player of the Week honors.

The Dukes shot their way into a 36-30 first-half lead, thanks to a 6-for-12 effort from behind the arc. UMass capitalized on Duquesne's poor second-half shooting, outscoring the Dukes 40-21 to take the victory. Tatham led the way with 19 points on the strength of 8-for-10 shooting.

Eli Rosenswaike can be reached at erosensw@student.umass.edu

Junior Pam Rosario logged a set of four's in Sunday's loss to Xavier, tallying the same number of points, rebounds and assists. The forward was just 1-for-7 from the field and 0-for-3 from 3-point range.



Junior Christina DeRosa and the Minutewomen finished in 10th place at the Atlantic 10 Championships, totaling 21 points on the weekend.

UM up and down at Atlantic 10 meet

TRACK AND FIELD from page10

"We have had a few hard things happen that have taken out some of our athletes this year, but still, there is no excuse for that performance."

LaFreniere is making a few changes to help improve the team for the future. Her plan is to have no more short sprinters; every sprinter will now train with the long sprinters. Her hope is that it will give the team more talent and depth in 100 meters all the way to the 400 meters, including the 4x100 and 4x400 relays.

"I'm looking for the 100 and 200 [meter runners] to help us out in the 400, 4x100 and the 4x400," she said. "We need those people. We have them, and they're just going to have put in a lot more work."

LaFreniere and the assistant coach Mark Gottdenker talked to the team about how they must perform harder in practice. Yesterday the team responded and had one of their better practices of the year.

Steve Gaines can be reached at sgaines@student.umass.edu

Anti-climactic ending to storied career

UMass' loss to Xavier not how Tatham wanted to leave UMass

By J.M. Friedman
Collegian Staff

In a sports landscape saturated with highlight reels and Hollywood melodrama, it's easy to forget that story book endings are few and far between. The truth is, conclusions aren't always gift-wrapped pieces of perfection. Reality is a much tougher pill to swallow.

If there ever was a time for last second heroics and mid-court celebration, it would have been Sunday at the Mullins Center, amidst Senior day and a conference battle between two hot teams.

If the script could be written beforehand, than Jack Leaman court would be the stage, and lone senior Tamara Tatham the star. Unfortunately, the speed of Xavier and talent of freshman Amber Harris just wouldn't cooperate.

This past Sunday, reality reared its ugly head again. The Minutewomen's starting center, Tamara Tatham, unceremoniously fouled out with just under three minutes to play in UMass' 75-67 loss. While Tatham ambled toward the bench, there was little pomp and circumstance. A modest ovation by the restless attendees served as a farewell to four years of faithful service. This was not the way she wanted to go out.

With the attention squarely on Tatham during the pre-game celebrations, her parents and former coaches on hand from Ontario to watch her final game, Tatham wanted to do well, but wanted a win for her team more than anything. After Xavier put the finishing touches on victory No. 21 of their season, the disappointment was palpable.

When asked how she felt after playing at the Mullins Center for the final time, she was soft-spoken and subdued.

"I was really pumped up, [before the game]" Tatham said. "It was my final home game and I really wanted to do well, and I wanted the team to win more importantly. I don't know [how I feel about it]."

Her confusion was shared by many who witnessed a UMass comeback fall just short. While she has the raw athletic ability, and shows flashes of brilliance, Tatham's career has been enigmatic and frustrating, often seeming to play below her potential, and failing to protect possession of the ball. However, you don't garner a place in the record books from just turning the ball over. Tatham has had a remarkable career.

A testament to her athletic ability, Tatham has been a model of consistency. In her rookie and sophomore seasons, she started each of the 57 games played by the Minutewomen. Her junior year, she started in 26 of 28 games, and so far this season has started 24 of 27 games, missing two contests to injury. Her total of 107 starts put her third all-time in UMass women's basketball history.

With four years together, UMass coach Marnie Dacko has watched Tatham progress and grow as a player.

"Our team loves Tamara," Dacko said. "The coaching staff loves Tamara and she is going to be sorely missed. She's been a tremendous player at UMass and was my first recruit."

As a freshman, Tatham averaged 30 minutes a game, along with 9.3 points and 4.9 rebounds per contest. This season, Tatham is averaging 8.8 rebounds and 12.9 points per game, good for first and 18th in the Atlantic 10 conference, respectively. Her 34.07 minutes per contest put her 8th in the A-10. Tatham's 1,117 points rank 12th all-time in the UMass record books.

In her final and best statistical year, the Minutewomen have posted their highest win total (15) in the last three seasons.

"She's someone that, whenever she's ready to go, she can take the team and we'll just follow in her footsteps," junior captain Kate Mills said. "Until she fouled out tonight, she was killing for us. She was doing a great job finishing inside, getting monster offensive rebounds. You can't ask for anything more. She did a great job."

After graduation, Tatham hopes to extend her basketball career in Europe, and if her past are of progress is any indication, her best years are still ahead of her.

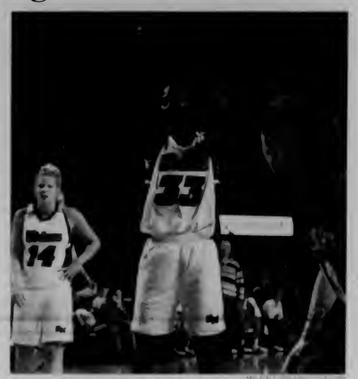
"She has grown and matured and is probably the most complete athlete that I have coached here," Dacko said. "She was somebody that came in with some skills but has really worked hard to refine those skills."

Those skills were on display Sunday afternoon, as Tatham finished with her 13th-career double-double, notching 16 points, 10 rebounds, three steals and two assists. Tatham also tallied five fouls and eight turnovers, providing a snapshot of the trouble she has maintaining possession of the ball.

"I certainly would have liked to see her score 30 points today," Dacko said. "I certainly thought she had the ability to do that, provided she make her bunnies. If she can learn from this, and learn how to compete going further…than this will be worth the lesson."

A win for Tatham and the Minutewomen on Sunday would have been a fitting way to close out a career, but sometimes the storybook endings just don't happen. Reality teaches a much tougher lesson.

Josh Friedman can be reached at jmfriedm@student.umass.edu



UMass' only senior this year, Tamara Tatham played her final game in the Mullins Center Sunday in the 75-67 loss to Xavier.

Tatham recorded her 13th-career double-double Sunday, tallying 16 points and 10 rebounds. She is 12th all-time in scoring for UMass.

FRUSTRATED? CONFUSED? DO YOU HAVE:
A grade dispute?
Teacher, roomate or job concerns?
Billing problems?
...or any other University related problems?
THE OMBUDS OFFICE CAN HELP
(confidentially, of course)
Serving the students, faculty, and staff of the Umass Community
823 Campus Center
Office Hours: 8:00 a.m. - 5:00 p.m.
Telephone: 413 - 545 - 0867
fax: 413 - 545 - 9720
e-mail: ombuds@ombuds.umass.edu

Custom Printed Tee SHIRTS
STUDENTS $20 OFF with this coupon
Not Good With Any Other Specials 24 yr. min.
FAST Our 20th
Sunraise PRINTING Hadley, MA
586-7133

CANCUN, ACAPULCO, NEGRIL, MOBAY, NASSAU, S. PADRE, FLORIDA, CRUISES, AND MORE!
Join the Party!!!
SPRING BREAK
STS STUDENT TRAVEL SERVICES
STS Flight Finder™
Save Hundreds on Spring Break Packages!!!
Search airfares to Mexico and the Caribbean and save up to $300 per person. Best Deals Guaranteed!
1.800.648.4849
www.ststravel.com

SPORTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM
WRITE FOR SPORTS!

Seven O's
EVERY WEDNESDAY: ♦ KARAOKE ♦
EVERY THURSDAY: ♦ OPEN MIC ♦
LIVE MUSIC THIS WEEK
FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 23RD, 2007: MARK SNOW
SATURDAY FEBRUARY 24TH, 2007: MARK SNOW
♦ STUDENT BAND WANTED ♦
ROUTE 116, 330 AMHERST RD SUNDERLAND, MA 01375 (413) 665-8788
3 PM TO 1 AM M-F
1 PM TO 1 AM SAT&SUN
NEXT TO CLIFFSIDE APTS.

Free Delivery to UMass
Menu Online @ andiamo.cc

6					5	7
1				6	3	2
		8		5		1
	8			7	3
7						2
			4	1		6
		9		8		2
	6	1	3
8		7				5

ACROSS
1 Chow
5 Operates
9 Equipped with weapons
14 Turner of films
15 First family grandson
16 River of Paris
17 GM make
18 Lay one down the line
19 Spring and neap
20 Puritan
22 Transmit
23 Blot on the landscape
24 Aromatic garnish
27 Everlasting
29 Afore
30 Polite enough
34 DDE's rival
35 Poet Teasdale
36 Vicinity
37 Masculine
39 Stravinsky or Sikorsky
40 Helsinki native
41 BPOE member
42 Strict
43 Winter hrs. in Boston
44 Home of the Braves
47 Booth or Jones
49 Sheltering projections
54 Allows to
55 In a rapid manner
56 Wading bird
58 Coach Ditka
59 Regan's king
60 Horse opera
61 Extremely dry
62 Very light brown
63 Goulash and ragout
64 Sawbucks
65 Profound

DOWN
1 Boston paper
2 Assemble
3 Excessive
4 Military installations
5 Spiritually revived
6 Brand new
7 Nary a one
8 Sonic boomer, briefly
9 Played flowers
10 Horse controls
11 40-to-60
12 Wind dir.
13 ... Plaines, IL
21 Coward of theater
22 Impertinent
24 Pare
25 Fielder's blunder
26 Have a deep longing
28 Sh...
30 Informal restaurants
31 Folk of Limerick
32 Air out
33 Writer Fleming
35 Pose for a picture
37 Distributes
38 Confederate
42 Rational
44 Changers
45 Servette
46 Nubby wools
48 Extend a subscription
50 Ran in neutral
51 Sister's kid
52 Withering expression
53 Maple product
55 Father of the foal
56 Romaine
57 Informer
58 Welcome site

Find all of today's puzzle solutions online!
WWW.DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

THE HARP
SPECIALS!
Honey Brown, Molson
$2.00 a pint / $6.50 a pitcher
TONIGHT: · Trivia Night
WED: · Open Mic Night (all are welcome)
Pizza 'til midnight 7 days a week
Voted best Neighborhood bar East of the River 2005 & 2006 Valley Advocate Readers Poll
OCMP & All Credit Cards accepted
163 Sunderland Rd. - N. Amherst
Just north of the apartments
413-548-6900 www.theharp.net

QUOTE OF THE DAY

"I don't want to be a product of my environment. I want my environment to be a product of me."
-Jack Nicholson in "The Departed"

WELCOME TO FALLING ROCK NATIONAL PARK By Josh Shalek

Know why I'm happy?
How should I know what makes a lizard happy
I'm pretty happy too
Oh. Yeah. Why?
I ate some tasty beans
You ATE my magic beans??
I was supposed to plant them in the ground and get three wishes!
So I guess you're not happy anymore

PAUL By Billy O'Keefe

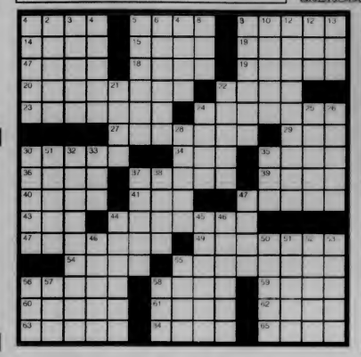
WHOA! I GOT AN E-MAIL FROM PALSTER.COM!
THE SITE ADMINISTRATOR WANTS TO "SHOW ME ALL HIS FAVORITE FEATURES." WELL, I'M FLATTERED, BUT HE'S A DUDE AND I AM NOT.
THAT'S A FORM MAIL MAN EVERYONE WHO JOINS GETS AN E-MAIL FROM HIM
OH.
OH.
OH MY GOD, YOU'RE SAD ABOUT IT NOW??

A COLLEGE GIRL NAMED JOE By Aaron Warner

I LIKE RYAN A LOT, BUT I DON'T KNOW WHAT TO DO. I HAVEN'T HAD VERY GOOD LUCK WITH GUYS.
JUST REMEMBER, MEN ARE A LOT LIKE SHOES.
THERE'S A LOT OF HEELS OUT THERE. IT TAKES TIME TO FIND A PERFECT FIT, AND THE REALLY GOOD ONES ARE WORTH FIGHTING FOR.

THE FAMILY MONSTER By Josh Shalek

Will robots destroy all people when they take over the world?
Depends on their level of benevolence
Were likely won't be a need for humans. Robots might keep a few, out of curiosity
People in zoos?
And in cages, as pets
Maybe I'll fight on the right side of that war
Robots don't take to disagreement
Traitor



Submit your comics!
collegiancomics@yahoo.com
Submit your classifieds!
(413) 545-3500

HOROSCOPES

aquarius Jan. 20-Feb. 18
Baboons have no fur on their butts, what do you make of that?

pisces Feb. 19-Mar. 20
You're about as original as Carlos Mencia.

aries Mar. 21-Apr. 19
Despite all the redeeming qualities of earmuffs, they will never be cool.

taurus Apr. 20-May 20
It's gonna be awhile before they sell candy corn again, so you better hunker down.

gemini May 21-Jun. 21
Your financial plight will come to an end if you invest in the poultry industry.

cancer Jun. 22-Jul. 22
Oh my gosh, HAM AND CHEESE ON A SANDWICH. What a combo!

leo Jul. 23-Aug. 22
Your new pants fit you perfect, like stripes on a zebra and wings on salmon.

virgo Aug. 23-Sept. 22
Do not second guess any of your decisions today. In fact, act entirely on impulse.

libra Sept. 23-Oct. 22
Give a man a fish, he eats for a day, eat your teacher and you'll be full for awhile.

scorpio Oct. 23-Nov. 21
Your soul has dents in it, kind of like Britney Spears' naked head.

sagittarius Nov. 22-Dec. 21
Calling someone "babycakes" might upset people who eat alot of crabcakes.

capricorn Dec. 22-Jan. 19
Start requesting that people speak into your "good ear." It sounds dignified.

Go hang a salami, I'm a lasagna hog.

Read it backwards.

MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN MARKETPLACE

ANNOUNCEMENTS

Global Express Tours Spring Break Montreal Party Weekends from $99 Complete bus, hotels, & clubs. Montrealexpress.net 781-979-9001

APARTMENTS FOR RENT

Brandywine Apts. Now Leasing, 1&2 bedroom apts. Leases begin Jun, July, Aug or Sep. First Come First Serve. Get Them while they last. www.brandywineapts.com stop by or call 549-0600

APARTMENTS FOR RENT

Center of town, 1,2,3 bedrooms hardwood floors. NOW SHOWING for JUNE and SEPTEMBER. NO FEES www.amherstlincolnrealty.com 253-7879

EMPLOYMENT

Winter/ Spring positions available. Earn up to $150 per day Exp not required. Undercover shoppers needed To Judge Retail and Dining Establishments. Call 800-722-4791

EMPLOYMENT

Rent us your ears! Listening Experiments $10/hr English must be your first language. Email: phonetics_lab@linguist.umass.edu voicemail: 545-6837

Bartending $300/day potential. No experience necs. Training provided. 1-800-965-6520 ext.162

Dell Campus Reps Needed Promote a top 30 company to gain real-world business & marketing experience! www.repnation.com/dell to apply.

HOUSE FOR RENT

Northampton Cathedral ceiling, sky-lites, hardwood floors, 4-5 bdrms. 9/1 $1950. 413-730-6660

SERVICES

Pregnancy Testing, HIV Testing, Birth Control, and Emergency Contraception. STI Screening and Treatment. Affordable and confidential. Tapestry Health, 27 Pray Street, Amherst. 548-9992. www.tapestryhealth.com

TRAVEL

Global Express Tours Spring Break Montreal Party Weekends from $99 Complete bus, hotels, & clubs. Montrealexpress.net 781-979-9001

WANTED

EGG DONORS NEEDED $10,000 (Plus all expenses) We are seeking women who are attractive, under the age of 29, SAT 1300+ (math+verbal),

SERVICES

Physically fit and maintaining a healthy lifestyle. If you have a desire to help an infertile family and would like more information please contact us. Email: Darlene@aperfectmatch.com www.aperfectmatch.com 1-800-264-8828

WWW.DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

SPORTS TUESDAY

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 20, 2007 SPORTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Senior Gary Forbes scored a team-high 23 points in 37 minutes, leading UMass to a 77-69 win over Dayton. The Virginia transfer also chipped in five rebounds and four assists in the victory.

Transfer successful

Forbes living up to hype, leads UM over Dayton with 23 points

By Danny Picard
Collegian Staff

Gary Forbes was supposed to bring his big-game experience in the ACC with him when he joined the Massachusetts men's basketball team as a transfer from Virginia. His team-high 23 points in UMass' 77-69 win over Dayton on Sunday was just the latest example of how the junior has stepped up at the right time.

The Minutemen (19-7, 9-3 Atlantic 10) handed the Flyers their first loss at home this season, ending Dayton's 14-game winning steak at the UD Arena. UMass finished the game with three players in double figures. Seniors Rashaun Freeman (15 points, 12 rebounds) and Stephane Lasme (14 points, 12 rebounds) each recorded their 12th double-double of the season in the win.

UMass returns home from a three-game road trip to host St. Bonaventure (6-19, 3-9 A-10) tomorrow night at 7 p.m. It is the first of the final three games at the Mullins Center for the Maroon and White this season.

Dayton hadn't lost a game at home since last year, when it fell to Rhode Island, 65-56, in the last game of the 2005-06 regular season. But UMass didn't come into the game as a slouch away from home.

"I've been proud of the way we've played on the road," UMass coach Travis Ford said. "We're 11-5 on the road, which is very good, considering how many we've played."

UMass	77
Dayton	69

The Minutemen are 8-5 as the visiting team, and 3-0 at neutral sites, which has been the difference from last season. UMass finished 2005-06 with a 13-15 record, with 13 of those losses coming away from the Mullins Center.

The Maroon and White has learned to embrace many hostile environments this season.

"I told our team on numerous occasions that I love going into away games," Ford said. "I'd rather have them be packed. I'd rather their fans be screaming, yelling, hollering and have that big game atmosphere. That's what you want to play in, and if you're ready for it, you prepare for it and you embrace it, it's a great scenario.

"I think our team's done a decent job up to this point of embracing that, and taking advantage of the opportunity to play in those atmospheres. Overall, our team has pretty much accepted playing in those tough environments."

UMass became the only team to embrace the UD Arena in Sunday's win, which began on an 18-3 run from the opening tip-off. Dayton (16-9, 6-6 A-10) cut the lead to just two points on a Jimmy Binnie 3-pointer with 14:36 remaining in the second half, but a 13-3 run by the Minutemen in the next four minutes disrupted any chance the Flyers had at taking a lead.

Forbes finished the first half with 14 points, as UMass took a 31-25 lead heading into halftime.

The last time Forbes scored 23 points was during his tenure at Virginia, when he dropped that same number on the Tar Heels at North Carolina in February of 2005. That was the Forbes UMass brought in as a transfer. And in the last few weeks, he hasn't disappointed.

Forbes has averaged 20.6 points per game and 9.4 rebounds per game in his last five games. His 23-point effort against Dayton was the second-highest of his career – he had a career-best 31 points against Temple last Sunday.

UMass is now tied with Xavier (19-7, 9-3 A-10) for second place in the A-10. Both teams are one-half game behind first-place Rhode Island (17-10, 10-3 A-10) in the standings.

Danny Picard can be reached at dpicard@student.umass.edu.

Mass Attack splits weekend in Vermont

By Jon Pelland
Collegian Staff

BURLINGTON, Vt. – The Massachusetts hockey team continued its seesaw season this weekend on the road against Vermont. The Minutemen defeated the Catamounts, 3-2, on Friday, but dropped the rubber game of the season series, 3-0, Saturday at Gutterson Fieldhouse.

Next up for UMass (14-11-5, 11-9-3 Hockey East) is a rare Friday-Sunday home-and-home with Northeastern. Friday's affair takes place at the Mullins Center with a start time set at 7 p.m. The season-series finale then takes place in Boston on Sunday with a matinee 3 p.m. start. That game will be broadcast on USPN2.

"There was a big difference," said UMass coach Don Cahoon, concerning Friday and Saturday nights' games. "We didn't capitalize [Saturday]. That was the biggest difference. When we were playing well and getting those chances we had capitalized."

Junior Mike Kostka has 11 points on the season with one goal and 10 assists. The Minutemen are currently tied for fifth place in Hockey East with Maine and one point behind fourth-place Vermont and home-ice in the playoffs.

Early in Saturday's game, UMass held the advantage on the Catamounts. The Minutemen pressured UVM goaltender Joe Fallon to the tune of 16 shots compared to the Catamounts' four. But Fallon stood tall and the score remained tied at zero heading into the dressing rooms.

Pace of play kicked up a notch early in the second period. UMass received an opportunity to break the scoreless tie not three minutes in. UVM (16-12-4, 11-8-4 HEA) winger Reese Winowski hit Topher Bevis from behind, sending the sophomore hurtling into the boards. Winowski was given a five-minute major and a game misconduct – forcing him to exit the ice.

UMass	3
UVM	2

UMass	0
UVM	3

The early stages of the power play appeared promising for the Minutemen. Fallon turned away a shot from the right faceoff circle, leaving the puck out front and to his right. Senior Mark Matheson was there with a slap-shot try, but somehow Fallon got back across the crease to make the save.

On the very same play, the visitors' advantage turned into a five-

See HOCKEY on page 7

Senior Day a let-down for UMass

By Eli Rosenswaike
Collegian Staff

It leaves coaches shaking their heads and looking for answers. It's the play of Xavier freshman phenom Amber Harris, and she's giving Atlantic 10 personnel headaches this season.

UMass coach Marnie Dacko and the rest of the women's basketball team (15-12, 5-7 A-10) could've used some aspirin after dealing with Harris and suffering a tough defeat, 75-67, against the Musketeers (21-7, 9-3 A-10) on Sunday.

Xavier	75
UMass	67

The Minutewomen struck down Duquesne (7-18, 2-10 A-10) on Friday, 70-57, and would have moved into a tie for sixth place on the conference with a victory on Sunday.

But Harris and a balanced Xavier team wouldn't oblige. Harris – who notched a record-tying 11th conference Rookie of the Week honor on Monday – led four players in double figures for the Musketeers, scoring 18 points. She also grabbed 14 rebounds and sent five UMass shots in the opposite direction, adding to her school-record 113 blocks for the season.

"Amber Harris," Dacko said, when asked what the difference in the game was. "Her size, her presence. I think our kids backed off of her a little bit. We needed to take a charge and we needed to get her into foul trouble, and we failed to do either. Were we intimidated? Maybe we were a little bit. You'd have to ask my kids that."

Xavier began the game scorching-hot from the field, jumping out to a 9-0 lead just 90 seconds in. It got even worse for the Minutewomen as Xavier's guards Suntana Granderson and Michele Miller were unconscious from the perimeter, connecting on their first five combined 3-point shots. Before you knew it, Xavier had a 17-4 lead within the first 3:30, and the 900-plus fans in attendance were deafening.

The Musketeer lead swelled to 17 midway through the first half, but 12 points from junior Kate Mills and Xavier's return to reality from the field helped cut the lead to 41-32 by halftime.

It took just three-plus minutes in the second half for the Maroon and White to even things out, knotting the game up at 44 apiece. Being that it was senior day for UMass, it seemed only fitting that Iamara Latham – the team's lone senior – helped lead the way during the second half surge.

Latham scored three of the first five buckets for UMass in the second half, en route to a 16-

See W. BASKETBALL on page 8

Mixed results at A-10 Championships

Minutemen finish fourth, but women limp into 10th place

Steve Gamis
Collegian Staff

The men's squad carried the Massachusetts track and field team, which competed in the Atlantic 10 Championships Saturday afternoon. The Minutemen finished in fourth place with excellent performances from senior Erik Hoegland and sophomore Josh Boone. The Minutewomen struggled as a team – placing 10th – but had some strong individual performances.

The Minutemen posted a score of 60 points and the Minutewomen tallied a final score of 21. Both teams will compete next week in Boston for the New England Championships.

The Minutemen's top runners and jumpers posted their best mark of the season at the A-10 Championships, with nine seasonal best performances and three events in which they qualified for ECAC Championships later this season.

"I think anytime you get someone who picks up a seasonal best performance at a Championship meet it pays good," Coach Ken O'Brien said.

Hoegland finished third in the A-10 for the triple jump event with a leap of 47-feet nine inches. Boone also had a season-best in the 1,000 meters, placing second overall (2:29.64).

The 4x400-meter relay posted a season best time of 3:24.01 finishing fourth. Also having a season best in the 4x800 meter relay team placed third with a time of 7:50.14. The distance medley team finished third with their best time of 10:28.21.

"I was proud of this [meet]," O'Brien said. "This year the meet was top heavy with Charlotte, Rhode Island and La Salle, they basically stole the show. The 60 to 90 points wouldn't have moved us up into third place it just would have been a more satisfying performance."

Rhode Island won the meet continuing its dominance of the A-10, winning its fifth conference championship in seven years.

The Minutemen lost points by not having anyone compete in the pole vault or throwing events. To be at the level of Rhode Island Coach O'Brien said the team needs more depth.

"We just have to get deeper. We have to get more people who can score more in their event," he said. "We have some events we don't cover at all. That's the first thing we have to do is beef up in those areas."

Freshman Brian Miller placed fourth in the high jump event with a season-best six feet five inches. In the long jump, sophomore Steve Gerome finished seventh with a jump of 22 feet one inch.

The Minutewomen had a rough weekend. A number of individuals did well, but overall the team did not meet the programs expectations.

"It's awful and unacceptable," coach Julie Lal reniere said. "We are recruiting our butts off trying to bring in new talent to the program."

It didn't all go bad for the Minutewomen, as six runners and throwers posted their season best.

Junior Christina DeRosa continues her outstanding running career, placing third in the 5,000 meter run with a time of 17:38.73.

In the 55-meter dash, sophomore Dionse Miranda placed eighteenth with a seasonal best time of 7.44 seconds. She also had a season best time in the 200 meters with a time of 26.46.

The team has some lingering injuries, however coach Lal reniere does not point to that as the main cause for the team's poor showing at the A-10s.

"We are not going to be satisfied with mediocrity," Lal reniere said.

See TRACK AND FIELD on page 8

Junior Nathan Barksdale placed 12th in the 200-meter dash and fourth in the 400-meter dash at the A-10 Championships this weekend.

THE MASSACHUSETTS
DAILY COLLEGIAN

NEW ENGLAND'S LARGEST COLLEGE DAILY EST 1890

CLOUDY : HI: 41 LO: 23 WWW.DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 21, 2007

MUCH AT STAKE FOR UMASS | PAGE 12

'BREACH' COMES TO BOSTON THEATER | PAGE 6

Grab-n'-go at the Campus Pond

A hawk gives new definition to the term "fast-food" near the Campus Center pond Thursday, killing his prey (top) and then quickly taking off to enjoy the rest of its meal (bottom).

Lights out in Southwest

Power outage creates hectic morning for Southwest residents

By Lorraine Burger
Collegian Staff

Early-risers living in the Southwest residential area awoke to a powerful surprise yesterday, as the entire area lost power for much of the early morning.

The 7:57 a.m. outage was caused by electrical work being performed inside the McGuirk stadium, which has cables that run along the Southwest campus.

Power was returned at 8:30 a.m., but for some students, it was a 30 minutes too long. Without hairdryers for early showers, computers for last minute papers and alarm clocks, some students were annoyed by the early-morning interruption.

"I was still sleeping," said sophomore Tomek Pendzik. "But I remember my roommate saying there was no way he was showering in the dark."

Many students turned to their cell phones for an alternative alarm, but there was one alarm that was sure to wake everyone up, regardless of if they wanted to. The fire alarms in most buildings began to sound as soon as power was lost.

"It didn't bother me," said freshman Alex Morales. "I just hoped my computer would turn back on soon."

For most students, their main concern was that their alarm clocks wouldn't go off.

"Our fire alarm went off – only for a few seconds – then I just fell back asleep," said sophomore Katie Johnson.

"I stayed at my girlfriend's in Cance and she woke me up because of the alarm," said Tom Lepata. "So I called my roommate and he said ours was going off too."

Director of UMass housing, John Findley was pleased with the quick power recovery.

"We have two main concerns: one is that we need to make sure the fire alarms and elevators are running on their back-up generators, and the second is that everything is reset properly once the power is back on," said Findlay.

"We need to make sure that all of our systems are operating correctly," said Gaye Reinhold, director of Southwest housing.

Had the outage lasted any longer, further precautions would have been followed.

"We would work with RA's and staff to get the information out as fast as possible with flyers and posters in all of the lobbies," said Reinhold.

But the situation didn't last.

Once 8 a.m. rolled around the electricity was back and everything was running smoothly again.

Lorraine Burger can be reached at lburger@student.umass.edu.

The Southwest residential area temporarily lost power early yesterday after electrical work on McGuirk stadium interfered with one of its adjoining cables.

Sennott set to speak at UMass

By Melissa Garber
Collegian Correspondent

A little over two decades ago Charles M. Sennott was a Univeristy of Massachusetts student living in Butterfield, and going out to Pearl Street to see concerts.

Twenty-three years later Sennott is returning to his alma mater to teach a week long seminar in the History and Journalism departments.

Sennott, who graduated in 1984 with a degree in History, has written three books, is a frequent commentator on the Middle East for NPR, CNN and the BBC, and has received an honorary doctorate from Providence College. Sennott has been the recipient of many awards including the Livingston Award for National Reporting and the Foreign

See SENNOTT on page 3

UMass alum, Charles Sennott is scheduled to return to campus next week.

Anti-war coalition holds protest

Group aims to end military recruitment

By Derrick Perkins
Collegian Staff

Members of the University of Massachusetts Anti-War Coalition (AWC) held a protest on Tuesday against the War in Iraq and the on-campus presence of United States military recruiters.

Along with affiliated members of the UMass Radical Student Union (RSU) and International Socialist Organization (ISO), the AWC protesters wielded placards and formed a picket line in front of a National Guard recruiting table in the Campus Center.

"It is part of an ongoing campaign to get the recruiters off campus," said Jack Hawkins, a member of the RSU. Hawkins said that it was the job of the recruiters to sell military service and the aim of the protesters was to fully inform the people targeted by recruiters about military service.

Members of the protest handed out brochures with information on military enlistment from the National Youth and Militarism Program of the American Friends Service Committee (AFSC) to students who approached the recruitment table. The AFSC is an international group founded by Quakers to provide conscientious objectors with an opportunity to aid civilian war victims, according to their Web site. The National Youth and Militarism Program aims to stop the spread of the U.S. military in education.

Charles Peterson, a member of the ISO, held a protest sign and called upon passing students and

See PROTEST on page 3

Swim fan boils over in Totman

Man is arrested after scuffle

By Will McGuinness
Collegian Staff

During most major competitive swimming events, water temperature is held around 78 to 80 degrees. However, during a swimming meet held in Totman Pool over the weekend, a fiery altercation between University of Massachusetts Police and a parent may have bumped the water's temperature up a few degrees.

Hundreds of spectators at the Western Massachusetts High School Swimming Championships on Saturday witnessed an altercation between a spectator and police, which led to the arrest of a Ludlow man.

"UMPD officers were assigned to work this detail for MIAA [Massachusetts Interscholastic Athletic Association] as they were hosting a swim meet here on campus," said Deputy Chief Patrick Archbald in an e-mail to The Daily Collegian. "Two officers were assigned to assist civilian staff maintain order, parking issues and assure that any money taken in was secured with the staff."

Totman Gym has a capacity of 300 people, but 500 were present to support students who were swimming that day. As time passed and the gym started to fill, the crowd reportedly started to get impatient and restless.

"Prior to opening the doors, people were repeatedly cutting in line, thereby, upsetting others who had waited for extended periods," said Archbald. "Officers did the best they

See TOTMAN on page 3

Smoking may cause brain damage

WASHINGTON (AP) – Smoking causes long-lasting changes in the brain similar to changes seen in animals when they are given cocaine, heroin and other addictive drugs, U.S. researchers said on Tuesday.

A study of the brain tissue of smokers and nonsmokers who had died showed that smokers had the changes, even if they had quit years before, the team at the National Institute on Drug Abuse reported.

"The data show that there are long-lasting chemical changes in the brains of humans," said Michael Kuhar of Emory University in Atlanta, who was not involved in the study.

"The chemical changes alone suggest a physiological basis for nicotine addiction."

A team led by Bruce Hope of NIDA, one of the National Institutes of Health, analyzed levels of two enzymes found inside brain cells known as neurons.

These enzymes help the neurons use chemical signals such as those made by the message-carrying compound dopamine.

Smokers and former smokers had high levels of these enzymes, the researchers reported in the Journal of Neuroscience.

Hope said other studies had seen the same thing in animals given cocaine and heroin – and it was clear that the drugs were causing the effects.

"This strongly suggests that the similar changes observed in smokers and former smokers contributed to their addiction," he added in a statement.

Experts on smoking have long said that nicotine is at least as addictive as heroin.

The U.S. Centers for Disease Control and Prevention estimates that 20.9 percent of all adults smoke in the United States, which adds up to 45 million people. And 23 percent of high school students smoke.

Local charity helping soldiers phone home

Norwell family gaining national recognition

By Alana Mellanson
Collegian Staff

What good can old cell phones and used ink cartridges be used for? Since 2004, two teens from Norwell, Mass., have been collecting these items rendered useless by the vast majority and turning them into a nationwide project which makes calling home a bit easier for U.S. troops stationed abroad.

Cell Phones for Soldiers, started by then 13-year-old Brittany Bergquist and her 12-year-old brother Robbie Bergquist, was inspired by a news report about a local soldier stationed in Iraq who ran up an enormous phone bill from calling home frequently. Then local bank, South Shore Savings Bank of Hanover, Mass., helped to get them started with a donation of $500.00. Since its inception,

Cell Phones for Soldiers has set up over 4,000 drop-off locations in all 50 states and sent over 100,000 prepaid phone cards to troops stationed in the Middle East, mainly in Iraq, Afghanistan, and Kuwait.

"As long as there are troops deployed throughout the world we want to give them a free way to call home," Brittany, now 16, and Robbie Bergquist, now 15, said in a joint email interview. "Over 250,000 cell phones have been collected to date, nearly $1 million dollars raised, and 15 million minutes of prepaid talk time have been donated to service men and women, all thanks to the Bergquists.

Cell Phones for Soldiers accepts used ink cartridges and all makes and models of various cell phones, batteries, chargers, accessories, pagers and BlackBerry PDAs, regardless of their condition. Drop-off locations can be found at various places and businesses all throughout the country, and the majority of them belong to Liberty Tax Service, all of

See CELL PHONES on page 3

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN
CXVII
ISSUE 81

113 Campus Center University of Massachusetts Amherst, MA 01003
• 413-545-3500 •
• Fax 413-545-3699 •
www.dailycollegian.com

EDITOR IN CHIEF Eric Athas
MANAGING EDITOR Rob Greenfield
BUSINESS MANAGER Dan Conti
PRODUCTION MANAGER Amanda Allen
NIGHT SUPERVISOR Sherd Woluck
ADVERTISING MANAGER Jaimeson Porter
ADVERTISING PRODUCTION Molly Eggleston
ARTS & LIVING EDITOR Morgan Rousseau
COPY EDITOR Adam Szajgin
EDITORIAL EDITOR Tucker Merrick
NEWS EDITOR Matt Belliveau
SPORTS EDITOR Johnny Pelland
SPORTS EDITOR Danny Picard
CIRCULATION MANAGER Jeff Perez
ASST. BUSINESS David Valade
ASSISTANT OPERATIONS Linda Wallack
ASSISTANT ADVERTISING Nicole Paddester
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Tim McCall
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Sydney Towne
ASSISTANT NEWS Anna Colaiutta
ASSISTANT NEWS Nicole Boonjakuakul
ASST. SPORTS Jeremy Rice
ASSISTANT EDITORIAL Brendan Hall
WEB EDITOR James Hale
PHOTO EDITOR Toan Trinh

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN IS PUBLISHED MONDAY THROUGH FRIDAY DURING THE UNIVERSITY OF MASSACHUSETTS' CALENDAR SYMESTER. THE COLLEGIAN IS INDEPENDENTLY FUNDED OPERATING ON ADVERTISING REVENUE. FOUNDED IN 1890, THE PAPER BEGAN AS ALGIE LIFE, BECAME THE COLLEGE SIGNAL IN 1901, THE WEEKLY COLLEGIAN IN 1914 AND THE TRI-WEEKLY COLLEGIAN IN 1956. PUBLISHED DAILY SINCE 1967. THE COLLEGIAN HAS BEEN BROADCASTING ONLINE SINCE JANUARY 1994. FOR ADVERTISING RATES AND INFORMATION, CALL WEEKDAYS BETWEEN 8:30 A.M. AND 3:30 P.M.

PRODUCTION CREW
On staff today

NIGHT EDITOR
Eric Athas

COPY EDITOR
Callie Williams

PRODUCTION SUPERVISOR
Amanda Allen

Twelve-step program aims to cure e-mail addiction

BY JON HURDLE
ASSOCIATED PRESS

PHILADELPHIA—Alcoholics have one, and so do drug abusers. Now people addicted to e-mail also have a 12-step program designed to tackle their obsession.

An executive coach in Pennsylvania has devised a plan to teach people how to manage the electronic tool, which some users say can be as much an intrusive waste of time as it is fast-paced and efficient.

Developed for cases such as a golfer who checked his BlackBerry after every shot, and lost a potential client who wanted nothing to do with his obsession, Marsha Egan's plan taps into deepening concern that e-mail misuse can cost businesses millions of dollars in lost productivity.

"There is a crisis in corporate America, but a lot of CEOs don't know it," Egan said. "They haven't figured out how expensive it is."

One of Egan's clients cannot walk by a computer -- her own or anyone else's -- without checking for messages. Other people will not vacation anywhere they cannot connect to their e-mail systems. Some wait for e-mails and send themselves a message if one hasn't shown up in several minutes, Egan said.

The first of Egan's 12 steps is "admit that e-mail is managing you. Let go of your need to check e-mail every 10 minutes."

Other steps include "commit to keeping your inbox empty," "establish regular times to review your e-mail" and "deal immediately with any e-mail that can be handled in two minutes or less but create a file for mails that will take longer."

Egan says she hosts no 12-step meetings but is planning a monthly teleconference for "e-mailers anonymous."

Michelle Grace, an insurance agent in Lehighton, Pennsylvania, said she receives up to 60 e-mails a day and uses Egan's program to make it less time-consuming and less stressful.

"E-mail had me by the throat," she said. "When you can't find what you need, then it becomes a problem."

Now that her e-mails are transferred -- some manually and some automatically -- into files, Grace said she spends less time hunting for them.

On average, workers who receive an e-mail take four minutes to read it and recover from the interruption before they can resume working productively, Egan said.

She also recommends checking e-mails not more than three or four times a day.

Some employees resist the lure of e-mail during the regular workday, only to find themselves putting in extra hours at home to clear the backlog, she said. One of Egan's clients said he had 3,600 e-mails in his inbox.

E-mail addicts now have a program designed to tackle their obsession.

Part of the problem is senders who copy messages too widely and are too vague in their subject lines, so recipients don't know what they need to open right away, Egan said.

For Grace, relief from her e-mail addiction means she is not checking her computer every five minutes.

She said she has let her colleagues know that if they need to reach her immediately, e-mail is not the way to do it.

"I told them, 'If you need me urgently, pick up the phone,'" she said.

Anxiety harms working memory needed to do math

BY JULIE STEENHUYSEN
ASSOCIATED PRESS

SAN FRANCISCO—Worrying about how you'll perform on a math test may actually contribute to a lower test score, U.S. researchers said on Saturday.

Math anxiety — feelings of dread and fear and avoiding math — can sap the brain's limited amount of working capacity, a resource needed to compute difficult math problems, said Mark Ashcroft, a psychologist at the University of Nevada Los Vegas who studies the problem.

"It turns out that math anxiety occupies a person's working memory," said Ashcroft, who spoke on a panel at the annual meeting of the American Association for the Advancement of Science in San Francisco.

Asheroft said while easy math tasks such as addition require only a small fraction of a person's working memory, harder computations require much more.

Worrying about math takes up a large chunk of a person's working memory stores as well, spelling disaster for the anxious student who is taking a high-stakes test.

Worrying about a math test may actually contribute to a lower test score.

Stress about how one does on tests like college entrance exams can make even good math students choke. "All of a sudden they start looking for the short cuts," said University of Chicago researcher Sian Beilock.

Although test preparation classes can help students overcome this anxiety, they are limited to students whose families can afford them.

Spears enters rehab

BY DAN WHITCOMB
ASSOCIATED PRESS

LOS ANGELES—Britney Spears has entered a rehabilitation center, her spokesman said on Tuesday, after the troubled pop star's recent wild ways escalated this weekend to a bizarre incident in which she shaved her own head.

"Britney Spears has voluntarily checked herself into an undisclosed rehab facility today," publicist Larry Rudolph said in a statement. "We ask that the media respect her privacy as well as those (privacy concerns) of her family and friends at this time."

Rudolph did not elaborate on the treatment Spears was seeking or where the facility was located -- though People magazine and TMZ.com both reported that it was in Los Angeles and that the 25-year-old singer checked in at the urging of family members.

Since her split with husband Kevin Federline in November after two years of marriage, Spears has raised eyebrows with heavy partying, sometimes with celebrity heiress Paris Hilton, and a series of pictures that caught the Grammy-winning entertainer wearing no panties under her short skirts.

This January, Spears posted an impassioned letter to her fans on her official Web site (www.britneyspears.com) in which she acknowledged that her image had taken a beating and pledged to come back "bigger and better than ever."

Sexed-up images may hurt girls

WASHINGTON (AP)—Inescapable media images of sexed-up girls and women posing as adolescents can cause psychological and even physical harm to adolescents and young women, a study in the US has warned.

The pressure of what experts call "sexualization" can lead to depression, eating disorders, and poor academic performance, said the report, released Sunday by the American Psychological Association.

"Sexualization of girls is a broad and increasing problem and is harmful to girls," it concluded.

Adult women dressed as school girls in music videos, bikini-clad dolls in hot tubs, and sexually-charged advertisements featuring teenagers were among the many examples cited.

Such omnipresent images -- on television and the Internet, in movies and magazines -- can also have a negative effect on a young girl's sexual development, the study cautioned.

Based on a comprehensive review of academic literature, the 66-page report noted that young adolescents and girls were particularly at risk "because their sense of self is still being formed."

School performance can also suffer. In one experiment cited, college-aged women were asked to try on and evaluate either a swim suit or a sweater. While they waited for 10 minutes while wearing the garment, they completed a math test.

"The results revealed that young women in swimsuits performed significantly worse ... than those wearing sweaters. No difference were found for young men."

The study, which includes numerous recommendations for concerned parents, coincides with a growing wave of public concern about the impact of highly sexed imagery.

The fashion world has been in turmoil since public authorities in Madrid banned under-weight and underage models from catwalks last year.

The Italian government and two top fashion associations followed suit, signing a code of ethics in December after top Brazilian model Ana Carolina Reston died of heart failure weighing only 40 kilos (88 pounds).

W ho's behind some of the best companies in the world?

Maybe you

When you advance your career at Deloitte & Touche USA LLP and its subsidiaries (the Deloitte U.S. Firms), you'll be working with some of the best known companies in the world. We offer opportunities for growth in assurance, financial advisory, tax and consulting services. So when you're ready to put your education to work, you need to see more.

To learn more about the Deloitte U.S. Firms and the opportunities available to you, please visit www.deloitte.com.

Deloitte.

Audit.Tax.Consulting.Financial Advisory.

www.deloitte.com/us

About Deloitte

Deloitte refers to one or more of Deloitte Touche Tohmatsu, a Swiss Verein, its member firms and their respective subsidiaries and affiliates. As a Swiss Verein (association), neither Deloitte Touche Tohmatsu nor any of its member firms has any liability for each other's acts or omissions. Each of the member firms is a separate and independent legal entity operating under the names "Deloitte", "Deloitte & Touche", "Deloitte Touche Tohmatsu" or other related names. Services are provided by the member firms or their subsidiaries or affiliates and not by the Deloitte Touche Tohmatsu Verein.

Deloitte & Touche USA LLP is the U.S. member firm of Deloitte Touche Tohmatsu. In the United States, services are provided by the subsidiaries of Deloitte & Touche USA LLP (Deloitte & Touche LLP, Deloitte Consulting LLP, Deloitte Financial Advisory Services LLP, Deloitte Tax LLP, and their subsidiaries), and not by Deloitte & Touche USA LLP.

Member of Deloitte Touche Tohmatsu
Copyright © 2007 Deloitte Development LLC. All rights reserved.

Sennott set to return home

SENNOTT from page 1

Press Association Story of the Year.

From Monday, Feb. 26 until Friday, March 2, Sennott will be visiting classes and holding public forums.

"I want to talk about what it's like to be a journalist covering the Middle East," said Sennott. "I've been on the frontlines of this post 9/11 world."

On Tuesday, Feb. 27 from 5:30p.m.-7p.m. the Journalism Program Lecture Series on Broadcast and the Media, in cooperation with the History Department will be hosting Sennott for an "Open Forum on Foreign Policy and the Middle East." The lecture will be held in the Cape Cod Lounge in the Student Union Center and it is free and open to the public.

On Wednesday, Feb. 28, from 3:30p.m.-5p.m. there will be a reception and a forum on "Writing History, the Middle East and the Role of Journalist" in Herter 601 for History, Journalism and English faculty and students.

There will also be a WFCR open forum on Friday March 2 in Chapin Hall at Mount Holyoke from 7:00p.m.-8p.m.

Sennott will be discussing "how to use your liberal arts education toward your work," during his week long stay at UMass.

"The work I did in the history department was crucial to my work as a journalist," said Sennott.

As a UMass student Sennott was active at WMUA radio and worked on a news show called "Undercurrents." Sennott began interning and later working as an on-air reporter at WFCR Five College Radio, Pioneer Valley's NPR.

Although Semnott never took a journalism course at UMass he decided after a year and half at WFCR that he wanted to go into print. He spent one year painting houses before attending Columbia's Graduate School for Journalism where he received his master's degree.

Sennott began as a reporter for The Bergen Record, a Northern Jersey paper that covered Jersey City and Hoboken. In 1989, he took on a job at the New York Daily News where he did investigative reporting, covering everything from cops and courts to the first WTC bombing and the Persian Gulf War.

"The WTC bombings took me to the Middle East to study the backgrounds of the terrorists in the capital of Sudan, Khartoum where Osama Bin Laden lived at the time," said Sennott.

Through The New York Daily News, Sennott was given the opportunity to follow Al Qaeda in its early stages, report on Egypt, the West Bank and Pakistan. Sennott wrote a five-part series titled "Seeds of Terror" about his research and the first World Trade Center bombing in 1993.

Sennott left the paper after the Daily News "butchered the series, shrinking it to two parts."

Sennott quit because, "the importance of the story was too valuable."

In 1994, Sennott became the Special Projects Reporter for the Boston Globe and in 1997 he moved to Jerusalem and served as the Middle East Bureau Chief for four years.

On Sep. 5, 2001 Sennott became the Europe Bureau Chief and relocated to London. By Sep. 19, 2001 he was back in Afghanistan and was one of the first reporters to cover the US response to 9/11.

In 2003, Sennott was stationed in Iraq covering the American occupation. After 10 years of covering the Middle East, Sennott returned to Massachusetts in 2005 to join the Nieman Fellowship at Harvard.

"I studied the monotheistic religions at the divinity school," said Sennott.

Sennott was then invited to be a guest lecturer for a course called "Fundamentalisms."

Sennott, 44, has been an accomplished reporter at The Boston Globe, a Neiman Fellow and a guest lecturer at Harvard and all along the way he has had four sons with his wife Julie.

"After 23 years as a reporter I have been drawn back to academia," said Sennott. "There is just so much life in a university."

Last August, Sennott returned to Afghanistan to do multimedia reporting. Sennott has reported on Afghanistan, Iraq and the transatlantic divide that was created from the Iraq war and the attacks on Madrid and London.

"I look forward to being back in Amherst," said Sennott. "I am coming full circle and I want to hear from students."

Anti-war coalition holds protest

PROTEST from page 1

visitors to help bring the troops home now.

"This is a place of higher learning, not a place to be conscripted for Halliburton," he said. "We have talked to a lot of people here who are equally disgusted."

The National Guard had begun setting up a regular recruiting table in the Campus Center only since last Friday, according to Master Sergeant Kittredge, one of the three recruiters present. The table received about a half-dozen visitors with serious interest in joining the National Guard daily, according to the recruiters.

"I think that everybody should have all the information that they can get," said Kittredge on the protestors. "They have the right to picket as long as they do it peacefully."

Last week a complaint was filed against the AWC with the Dean of Students over a possible violation of the Code of Student Conduct during a protest in front of the Reserve Officer Training Corps (ROTC) booth at the campus job fair on Thursday.

Lieutenant Colonel David Vacchi, head of the UMass ROTC program, told the Daily Hampshire Gazette that the protesters did not clear away for students trying to get information about the program and took a list of personal contact information of interested students from the ROTC booth.

Members of the AWC protesting in the campus center on Tuesday denied the allegations.

Peterson, who had attended the previous protest at the job fair, called the allegations a "complete and utter falsehood."

"Any institution that loses $8 billion in Iraq makes it easy for me to believe that they could lose a single sheet of paper," said AWC member James Fiorentino.

According to the Student Code of Conduct, students have the right to demonstrate on campus as long as they do not interfere with class work or University business, block the free movement of individuals around campus, interfere with the freedom of speech of any other member of the campus or incite a dangerous or violent activity.

"The complaint is under review by the Dean of Students office and she will decide if any sanction is appropriate under the Code of Student Conduct," said UMass spokesman Ed Blaguszewski. "He did not know which party had filed the complaint with the Dean of Students."

The students who had allegedly violated the code of conduct could face anywhere from a reprimand to expulsion from the University, according to Blaguszewski. There is no time table for when the final decision would be made by the Dean of Students.

"I hope that people realize that there is a difference between questioning a political policy and questioning the troops," Kittredge said.

Derrick Perkins can be reached at dperkins@student.umass.edu

Charity helps soldiers phone home

CELL PHONES from page 1

whose 2,450 offices participate in the program. The Bergquists collect 10,000 to 15,000 phones per month, which are then sent to ReCellular, Inc., in Dexter, Mich., and recycled. The money the Bergquists receive from recycling, which is usually about $2 per phone, goes toward purchasing the phone cards that are sent out to the soldiers.

Cell Phones for Soldiers is a registered non-profit organization run by the Bergquists from their home in Norwell, with help from their parents Gail and Bob Bergquist, and their sister Courtney Bergquist, a University of Massachusetts junior currently studying abroad in Brisbane, Australia. They boast celebrity sponsors such as Pro Football Hall of Fame quarterback Jim Kelly of the Buffalo Bills, who has been with them since the beginning, and country music star Maggie Austin. The Boston Red Sox and the Houston Astros have also hosted CPFS days at Fenway Park and Minute Maid Park, respectively.

Brittany and Robbie Bergquist have both been nationally recognized for their work with Cell Phones for Soldiers, and have met many celebrities and government officials as a result. They have appeared on NBC Nightly News, CBS News, The Early Show, FOX News, The Montel Williams Show, The Tony Danza Show, and several local news stations, as well as USA Today, Money, and Good Housekeeping, among other publications.

In 2005 Brittany Bergquist was chosen to be one of Teen People's "20 Teens Who Will Change the World" and Robbie Bergquist was the national winner of DoSomething.org's BRICK award in 2006. They have also been to the White House and the Pentagon twice for tours and meetings.

"My favorite meeting was with President Bush," Brittany Bergquist said. "It was surreal to me to be in the Oval Office speaking with the leader of our country and his wife, Laura Bush. I will never forget that experience because here I was a 15 year old teenager from a small town in Massachusetts meeting with one of the most influential political figures in the world."

"I would have to say that meeting Montel Williams was great for me," Robbie Bergquist said. "He was very kind and generous to us. [He] was in the military and he knows that what we are doing is important for the morale of the troops."

CPFS has grown immensely since it began, and the Bergquists' latest project is Cell Phones for Returning Soldiers, which provides soldiers with prepaid phones when they arrive in the U.S. In the future, they would like to provide banks of satellite and video phones for the troops and their families, as well as VOIP (Voice Over Internet Protocol) communications. The number of CPFS drop-off locations grows by about ten per week, and they are also looking to designate a spot here at UMass Amherst.

The Bergquists feel that not only are they helping the soldiers, but they are protecting the environment as well.

"Our world needs to begin to recycle electronic equipment because we don't want the toxic metals and chemicals leaking into our soil and water supplies," the Bergquists said collectively. "We owe a lot to our military for the sacrifices that they are making so that we can be free and we owe it to our environment to keep it clean and safe for future generations."

More information can be found at www.cellphonesforsoldiers.com.

Swim fan boils over in Totman

TOTMAN from page 1

could given the circumstances but again, there were only two of them and 500 attendees."

Archbald said the trouble seemed to start when Guy Baillargeon of Ludlow, Mass. allegedly failed to listen to officers present and took an "aggressive stance," toward the two members of UMPD. Baillargeon then allegedly tried to get the rest of the crowd involved in the incident, eliciting cheers from some but little from the majority of the crowd. Archbald said that Baillargeon shook his fist at the officers as if to fight and was swearing and yelling. He was then escorted from the premises.

However other spectators sympathize with Baillargeon. While Baillargeon refused to comment, questions posted on an internet blog on www.masslive.com about the incident resulted in a different reaction. Members of the blog include swimmers, student supporters and parents.

One member under the name Spectator217 stated, "The cop was being overly forceful with his tone. I didn't see [Baillargeon] doing anything. People in line told the cop to leave the man alone."

Then Baillargeon allegedly said something to upset the officer, and "he chased the man out of the building while everyone was booing the cop," Spectator217 continues.

Archbald states that after being escorted out of the building, Ballargeon, "was warned yet again to quiet down and to leave the building, he did not. He was again combative with the officers repeating his previous actions and was placed under arrest by the two officers. It was necessary for the whole shift – over seven officers – to then respond to the crowd in order to restore calm."

"I didn't see any behavior on the parents' part that was over the top. I did see police being overly intimidating to the group," wrote Spectator217.

However, UMass sophomore Justin Burke, who was inside Totman during the incident said, "A lot of kids were in the area though, and it was very disappointing to see the adults exhibiting this kind of behavior."

Will McGuinness can be reached at wmcguinn@student.umass.edu

Prime Minister Blair plans to announce Iraq withdrawal plan

British soldiers ride on a vehicle during a joint patrol with Iraqi soldiers in a village in Basra, Iraq, Saturday.

BY THOMAS WAGNER
ASSOCIATED PRESS

LONDON—Prime Minister Tony Blair will announce on Wednesday a new timetable for the withdrawal of British troops from Iraq, with 1,500 to return home in several weeks, the BBC reported.

Blair will also tell the House of Commons during his regular weekly appearance that a total of about 3,000 British soldiers will have left southern Iraq by the end of 2007, if the security there is sufficient, the British Broadcasting Corp. said, quoting government officials who weren't further identified.

The announcement comes even as President Bush implements an increase of 21,000 more troops for Iraq.

But Blair said Sunday that Washington had not put pressure on London to maintain its troop numbers. The BBC said Blair was not expected to say when the rest of Britain's forces would leave Iraq. Britain currently has about 7,100 soldiers there.

Blair's Downing Street office refused to comment on the BBC report.

Blair and Bush talked by secure video link Tuesday morning, and Bush said Britain's troop cutbacks were "a sign of success" in Iraq.

"The president is grateful for the support of the British Forces in the past and into the future," U.S. National Security Council spokesman Gordon Johndroe said in Washington. "While the United Kingdom is maintaining a robust force in south-m Iraq, we're pleased that conditions in Basra have improved sufficiently that they are able to transition more control to the Iraqis.

"The United States shares the same goal of turning responsibility over to the Iraqi Security Forces and reducing the number of American troops in Iraq," Johndroe said. "President Bush sees this as a sign of success and what is possible for us once we help the Iraqis deal with the sectarian violence in Baghdad."

"We want to bring our troops homes as well," Johndroe said. "It's the model we want to emulate, to turn over more responsibilities to Iraqis and bring our troops home. That's the goal and always has been."

Blair said last month that he would report to lawmakers on his future strategy in Iraq following the completion of Operation Sinbad, a joint British and Iraqi mission targeting police corruption and militia influence in the southern city of Basra.

On Sunday, Blair told the BBC that the operation was completed.

Foreign Secretary Margaret Beckett said in January that Operation Sinbad offered the prospect of a "turning point for Iraq, hopefully in the near future."

Treasury chief Gordon Brown, who is likely to succeed Blair by September, has said he hoped several thousand British soldiers would be withdrawn by December.

As recently as late last month, Blair rejected opposition calls to withdrawal British troops by October, calling such a plan irresponsible.

"That would send the most disastrous signal to the people that we are fighting in Iraq. It's a policy that, whatever its superficial attractions may be, is actually deeply irresponsible," Blair said on Jan. 24 in the House of Commons.

Blair, who has said he will step down as prime minister by September after a decade in power, has seen his foreign-policy record overshadowed by his role as Bush's leading ally in the unpopular war

Guest Chef Series

JOANNE WEIR

Meet Joanne Weir

award-winning author, cooking teacher, chef, and television personality at Berkshire Dining Commons.

Joanne is One of Our Own.... a UMass Alumni.

Joanne will showcase
Healthy Italian & Mediterranean Cuisine
at Berkshire DC

DINING SERVICES
UMass Amherst

Thursday, February 22 from 5 to 9 pm.

www.umass.edu/diningservices

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

EDITORIAL OPINION

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 21, 2007

"I may not agree with what you say but I will defend to the death your right to say it." Voltaire

EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Protesters are persecuting

Ben Duffy

Last Thursday afternoon, the University of Massachusetts Anti-war Coalition gathered at the Campus Center to protest one military recruiter at the career fair, decorated Army Ranger Major John Driscoll. He was attempting to steer students toward the Minuteman Battalion, the UMass ROTC detachment.

The protesters were a conglomeration of the usual suspects. I'm talking about the ragamuffin leftists with thick black-framed glasses and big mouths who like to pedal the "Socialist Worker" at the Campus Center. When I saw them gathered at the top of the escalator, they were holding signs that read "Don't Die for Recruiter's (sic) Lies: Ask Us for More Information", among others. Later, they formed a picket line around the recruiting table, and allegedly stole a list of students' names interested in the ROTC program.

Okay, they have the right to be wrong. Just as every citizen has the right to spew the most hideous bile imaginable; these people have the right to protest military recruiters. But what does that mean? Neo-Nazis exercised protected free speech as they marched through Skokie, Ill. in 1977. Just because the neo-Nazis were legally allowed to march, didn't mean that they were sheltered from the criticism that they rightfully deserved. In any case, stealing the list of prospective ROTC cadets was illegal, and disciplinary actions should be taken if they are indeed guilty.

I don't understand why people give military recruiters such a hard time. The days of military conscription are over, and that means that the military has to go into the community to find prospective recruits. Countries that rely on involuntary military service don't need to recruit; they simply induct the unwilling.

Yes, I've heard the arguments about military recruiters "preying" on the poor. I would argue that lower income people just don't think like left-wing college students. A campus leftist can't imagine living the military lifestyle with all the pushups, saluting, boot-shining and following orders that it entails. That's why they assume that no one would ever freely join the military. Instead, they join because their "racist", "classist" society left them with so few opportunities. It never occurred to the lefties that there are people who have actually dreamt since childhood of driving an Abrams tank or parachuting out of a C-130.

The economic situation of those who join the military is not as dire as the Left would like you to think.

The campus Left's mentality speaks volumes about what they think of the U.S. military. Since no one with better opportunities would actually join the military, which must mean that the military is the last receptacle for society's wash-ups. Our troops deserve more credit than that.

In any case, the economic situation of those who join the military is not as dire as the Left would like you to think. Military recruits are solidly middle-class and have gotten wealthier since 9/11. The Heritage Foundation did a study on race, class and education within the military, comparing pre-9/11 recruits to post-9/11 recruits. The study explains, "According to the 2000 Census, the national median income per household in 1999 was $41,994 in 1999 dollars. By assigning each recruit the median 1999 household income for his hometown ZIP code, we calculated that the mean 1999 income for 1999 recruits before entering the military was $41,141 (in 1999 dollars). The mean 1999 income for 2003 recruits was $42,822 (in 1999 dollars)." The "massive" disparity of income was a paltry $853 in 1999. By 2003, recruits had gotten wealthier, and their inflation-adjusted income had gone up $1,681.

Anti-recruitment efforts have been organized across the nation. In 2004, a left-wing mob chased military recruiters out of Seattle Central Community College. According to witnesses, the malcontents slung insults, newspapers and water bottles at the recruiters. According to ejected recruiter SFC Jeffery Due, "They were all going by making off-hand comments and saying 'no war.' We just waved at them. Five minutes later, there was just a mob of 500 people surrounding the table."

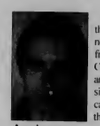
San Francisco passed a non-binding resolution in 2005 banning military recruiters from high schools. April Owens is leading the anti-military movement in the Bay. The "San Francisco Weekly" reports her comments: "'We've got to chop our military off where it lives, in the lies and manipulations that get people to join in the first place. When the soldiers are really hurting because there are no new recruits, then we're getting somewhere...I mean, I support the troops, but ...' she continues to outline the plan that some of the supporters of Proposition I and counter-recruitment have come to believe in. 'We need outrage and power, like in Vietnam. Basically, we need the draft.'"

Right, April Owens really "supports the troops" by making sure that our troops are "really hurting." Owens supports the military, she just wishes that nobody would ever join. That's the unifying theme of the Left: they absolutely support the military, they just pray that nobody would ever be so ignorant, poor or undereducated to sign on the dotted line.

Let's stop humoring ourselves. They don't support the troops, and they certainly don't support their mission. They're leftist clowns, and they need to be identified as such. I leave Major Driscoll and other recruiters alone. He knows a lot more about war than any leftist ever will.

Ben Duffy writes on Wednesdays. He can be reached at bduffy@student.umass.edu

Two more years



Andrew Freeman

You can feel it in the headlines, the palpable sense of excitement. A new crop of candidates: bold visions, fresh insights. The 2008 Presidential Campaign is starting up, and the media and political literati buzz with enthusiasm. But for all the talk about the candidates, the truth is that none of them will matter for a long time.

There is little particularly newsworthy about the campaigns right now. At most a prospective candidate is throwing his metaphorical hat into the metaphorical ring, which has only metaphorical significance. The most important electoral news has been who isn't running for president: John Kerry said he will not campaign in 2008.

Kerry lost for many reasons, mainly because many voters were concerned with how he would handle national security. The Swift Boat smear campaign in particular tarred his image on that count. Moreover, his position on Iraq backfired mightily. He tried to have it both ways – as a hawk he voted for the war appropriations, and as a dove he condemned the war. He never articulated a detailed plan on how he would act as president. The infamous "I actually voted against the $87 billion before I voted for it" statement reflects the tortured logic of his line on Iraq.

Kerry furthermore suffered from his image as an elitist, though he differed little from his opponent. Both men went to Yale, were members of the Skulls and Bones secret society and enjoyed wealth. Bush, however, does not come off as an intellectual; while the senator's often pedantic manner may have been a turnoff for voters.

In any event, Kerry's absence from the campaign ensures it will not be a repeat of 2004. Perhaps the Democrats will be able to field a stronger candidate this time around.

Regardless of who enters the race, the most important figure of 2007 and 2008 will be the sitting president. Bush will be the focus of all parties' attention, because of the tremendous impact his two long terms have had.

Democrats will run against him, his policies and his legacy, regardless of which Republican candidate is nominated. This is inevitable given the awe with which the Republican Party has held him and his close cooperation with its members in Congress. Over the course of his presidency, only once did he veto a bill: the effort to expand stem cell research. His complaints about the Republican Congress' astronomical spending rang hollow, since he signed off on each budget.

Republicans will have to evaluate Bush's legacy, and decide what to embrace of it and what to discard. Given the president's diminished popularity, most will almost certainly try to distance themselves from him.

Against the backdrop of campaigning, Bush will still be in power. Even with his party in the minority in Congress and plunging approval ratings, he will be able to block legislation.

He will have hegemony over America's foreign policy. Bush has made it clear that the issue of Iraq is something to be decided by future presidents – he plans to stay the course.

Congress has no say in this matter, and neither does the public. Any attempt to pressure the administration to withdraw, such as by cutting funds for the military, would be stopped by Republicans in the Senate. GOP senators are currently blocking a toothless resolution that denounces Bush's "surge" plan, and Democrats cannot get the 60-Senator majority they need to bring the resolution to a vote. Direct opposition to the surge would likely share the same fate, as would discussion of withdrawal.

Republicans will have to evaluate Bush's legacy, and decide what to embrace of it and what to discard.

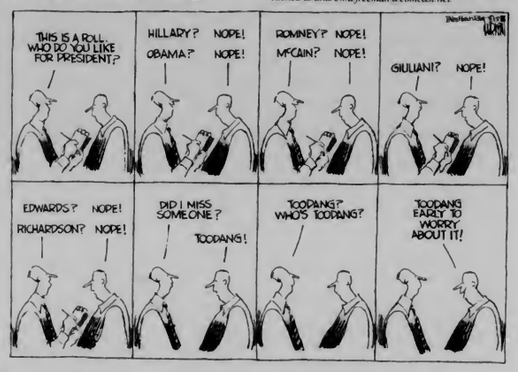
While the status quo persists in Iraq, the other members of the Axis of Evil are receiving attention. Negotiations with North Korea have finally produced a compromise: their nuclear reactor will be shut down in return for fuel oil and diplomatic recognition. This agreement could have been reached years ago, had the Bush administration not taken a hard line from the outset.

The administration is employing the same approach with Iran -it refuses to negotiate without the country first giving up its nuclear program. Moreover, Bush last week claimed that the Iranian government was supplying Iraqis with sophisticated bombs to use against American troops. He later retreated from his statements, saying that it wasn't clear "whether head leaders of Iran ordered" the weapon shipments or not. Bush claimed that this was not an overture to war with Iran – he was committed to resolving the situation "in a constructive peaceful way."

Nevertheless, Bush has the power to bring about a confrontation with Iran, and there is little that Congress, let alone you or I, can do to stop it. For this reason, the date I'm most looking forward to is not Election Day, but January 20, 2009, when he finally steps down from power. 698 days couldn't feel longer.

Andrew Freeman writes on Wednesdays. He can be reached at andrewd.freeman@comcast.net.



Dude, where's our group spirit?

Jackie Hai

If you've ever had reason to visit Lewis Hall on campus, you might notice plaques hanging in the lobby that date back to the 1950's and 60's. They proudly declare Lewis Women's Dormitory winning first place in the Winter Carnival Snow Sculpture Competition of 1958 and the Homecoming Parade Float Competition in both 1965 and 1966. Ever since my friend Marissa McAuliffe, who often works security there, made the discovery, we've wondered the same thing – why doesn't stuff like this happen anymore?

There's an unofficial axiom in Residence Life that one of the harder parts of pulling off a successful event is having people actually attend it. It's difficult enough to get a single floor to do something together, never mind entire dormitories.

I mean, do we even have homecoming parades anymore, or winter carnivals? Campus-wide initiatives are rare these days, and when they do occur – like the annual energy-saving competition between dorms – few people pay any attention to them. Where did this lack of interest from the student body to get together and do things originate?

Could it be our education system's emphasis on competition over cooperation? Grading curves, competitive application processes to colleges, internships and jobs – these are practices that drive us to wish for the downfall of others rather than the success of all, and turn us each into our own islands.

Could it be a culture shift between our parents' generation, the Baby Boomers of the 50's and 60's, and ours? Socioeconomically, the United States in the 50's was the most egalitarian it's ever been. The Vietnam War, and more directly, the draft, incited the country's young adults to near-revolution. Is the growing income gap today to blame for an increased "every man for himself" individualistic mentality? Do we just not have a common cause to rally around?

Campus-wide initiatives are rare these days, and when they do occur... few people pay any attention to them.

Or could it be technology? For a couple years now, experts have voiced fears that programs like AIM and social networking sites like Facebook contribute to a trend of students substituting face-to-face interaction with the electronic kind. Could this be the cause?

Well, technology can be the ultimate connector if used correctly. Facebook may be a double-edged sword, but by and large, I think we can safely put the naysayers' fears to rest. We didn't turn into socially inept hermits drooling at pictures on a computer screen (most of us, anyway). On the contrary, we've proven that it's an incredibly efficient tool for organizing and mobilizing a large group for something; case in point, there's a group on Facebook now of students in Boston planning to get into the Guinness Book of World Records by staging the world's largest snowball fight.

On the flip side, technology can also be the ultimate isolator. You can easily shut yourself in your room and be entertained for hours on end by your TV, your computer, the Internet and video games, even have food delivered to your door with the click of a button. It's the greatest irony of the digital age that we are more connected than ever to people around the world but increasingly closed off from our own neighbors.

The Internet has done wonders in linking individuals with common interests who are otherwise separated by geography. But there's also something to be said about community in the actual "neighborhood" sense of the word. Once upon a time, people living near each other might not have liked the same bands or had the same hobbies, but learned to accept personal differences in the name of uniting for a cause. That cause can be anything from political change to winning a parade float competition; at the end of the day, it's the strength of the community and the human connection that will be remembered.

What can we try on campus to bring some of that back? It's a two-way street – first, the university and its event planners must not give up on sponsoring initiatives and programs that pull us together, and second, students must unplug themselves from YouTube and network television long enough to be a part of it. Maybe before unplugging we can IM our friends to tell them come along. Difficult? Hardly. Worthwhile? Yes. If we don't connect with each other now, what are the chances of it happening in the future? Let's not become the loneliest generation.

Jackie Hai can be reached at jhai@student.umass.edu

OPINIONS IN SHORT

The Issue:

Just this Valentine's Day, the Administration and Finance Committee of the UMass Board of Trustees approved a proposal for student charges for the 2007-08 academic year. This measure, put forth by President Jack M. Wilson, would increase tuition and mandatory fees by 3.4 percent, which is in-fact lower than the current inflation rate at 3.6 percent. (as reported by the Consumer Price Index.)

UMass students graduate with the lowest levels of accumulated debt, according to University statistics. Yet at the same time, our price of attendance will be going up several hundred dollars, while the state's contribution to UMass is lower than it was in 2000. Where should money come from? How much is too much? Are students unfairly griping?

The entire UMass Board of Trustees will convene on March 14th to decide on the proposal. But before they do, we want opinions from you. We urge you to give us 200 words on your position – we'll take the best ones and print them in Friday's paper along with some of our own in hopes of getting a collective and fair analysis of the proposal. We look forward to reading.

-Editorial Board-

Email your responses to editorial@dailycollegian.com

Point-Counter-Point

Print news, not sensationalism

Eric Athas

If you're strictly a headline reader, then Friday, Feb. 9, 2007 and the days proceeding provided you with enough news ammo to last the semester. Some of the headlines included, "Anna Nicole Smith Clown Tape 'Worth Money' for Howard K. Stern," and "Remains of Anna Nicole Smith Finally Embalmed." My personal favorite: "WSFA 12 News Exclusive: Prattville Woman Knew Anna Nicole Smith."

Yeah, that last scoop was about a Prattville, Ala. woman who claims she was best friends with Smith…now that's a hot lead.

While our soldiers are getting killed in Baghdad, Larry King is dedicating his show to the Anna Nicole Smith mystery.

While Anna Nicole Smith's death made headlines and airtime, believe it or not, more important news should have been covered. Did you know the Bush administration may be spending up to $1 billion to test New York City's strength against nuclear devices? It was reported in The New York Times the same day Smith's death grabbed all of the headlines.

In that same edition of The Times, it was reported that Iran's leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei warned the United States that he would retaliate against "American interests worldwide," if the U.S. attacked Iran.

Not to mention the war in Iraq continues to boil over. So while our soldiers are getting killed in Baghdad, Larry King is dedicating his show to the Anna Nicole Smith mystery.

The point is, there is confusion over the concept of newsworthiness. There is a difference between what the general public wants to know and what it needs to know. Sure, the Anna Nicole Smith case is interesting and deserves attention. But the story doesn't need to be beaten to death when there are important stories that deserve the coverage.

The constant coverage of Anna Nicole Smith's death on cable TV has prompted some anchors to simply run out of questions. Last weekend, Nancy Grace asked this hard-hitting question to an "expert" working on the case: "Is there a window on the casket where you can see Anna Nicole's body, or is she wrapped up?" The man responded to Grace, saying Smith was covered.

Television stations and tabloid newspapers are covering this story until there's nothing left to cover… and then they're covering it some more. Celebrity news is not journalism and the coverage of Smith's death is sensationalism at its best.

This happens far too often with media outlets and quite frankly, it's dangerous. Broadcast and print outlets devoted so much time and effort towards the arrest of Jonbenet Ramsey's "confessed" killer John Mark Karr this past summer. Even after his ex-wife said there was no way he could have been in Boulder, Col. at the time of the killing, the media continued to push this story in the public's face. And when Karr's DNA did not match the DNA found at the crime scene, the show was over.

In the case of Anna Nicole Smith, the press (much of it) has lost touch with what the job of a journalist is. People tune in to certain television stations and read newspapers everyday and depend on these outlets to inform them. When the front page and the headlines are devoted to celebrity news, the news organizations have failed.

We have seen this type of coverage many times over the years. Like when an accused murderer is transported and every news organization on the face of the planet has a helicopter following the motorcade. What are the news directors hoping will happen? A car accident and then a shootout?

With a war spiraling out of control and with a presidential election looming, the job of journalists is going to be more essential than it has been in a long time.

Questions need to be asked, organizations and people must be scrutinized, and news organization have to realize that the public needs to know certain information. Unfortunately for gossipers, the death of a former playboy model does not fit into that category. The media needs to leave the celebrity news to the celebrity magazines and start focusing on what's affecting the world around us.

Eric Athas can be reached at editor@dailycollegian.com.

Real-life soap operas sell

Melissa Garber

Picture this: a young blond stripper marries an 89-year-old oil tycoon she met while on the job. One year later he is dead and she throws herself into a decade long legal battle over the estate.

Toss in a stint as a playboy bunny and a reality show, then sprinkle on a son from a previous marriage that dies of a drug overdose days after her daughter's birth. Add on the mysterious death of this playboy bunny only months after her sons.' Then factor in three potential baby's daddies for the newborn, one of whom is Zsa Zsa Gabor's husband, and you have got a perfect VH1 reality series that writes itself.

There are three men fighting over who's the daddy with an unknown fortune – estimated to be millions – at stake. There is an estranged mother working the television news circuit fighting a potential baby daddy over where the body will be buried. Anna Nicole Smith's body has been embalmed. The Bahamian Immigration Official has resigned over pictures advertising his affair with Smith.

Complain all you want but if it wasn't for the public lapping up every detail of Smith's life, this media frenzy over her death would be nonexistent.

Do you want to know why this story has been suffocating the news since it broke? Just ask anyone who watches MTV, VH1, E News or Access Hollywood or anyone who reads People or US Weekly – this material is gold. Check out network and cable news and surprise, surprise, you'll still get your fix of celebrity gossip.

Every television network is a slave to Nielsen ratings. Smith is what the people want. Newspapers and magazines wouldn't sell and incessant TV news reports wouldn't last if there wasn't a demand for constant Smith coverage. The media covers the news that the people want. They track what you watch and what you read. They know what stories continue to pique your interest.

Celebrity's lives have a huge market; celebrity's deaths have an even bigger one. Smith made a career out of being a tabloid staple. Complain all you want, but if it wasn't for the public lapping up every detail of Smith's life, this media frenzy over her death would be nonexistent.

If there was a public demand for more substantial news, then the media would be giving us just that. The news is run like a business. Advertisers want material that sells so that their products are seen by the largest audience. The corporations that own the media want material that sells so that they can make a profit off of the news. It all comes down to the bottom line.

The public has the final say in what is news and what is not. Every time you linger over the newest development on Smith's death, you fuel the media to continue giving you more coverage. The media overkill isn't restricted to E News, CNN, FOX, MSNBC and just about every network that could potentially show news (minus C-SPAN) pounced on the story. Celebrity gossip has been ingrained into American culture more so than baseball and apple pie could ever hope to be.

There was no avoiding the media circus that would spawn from Smith's death. The relentless coverage of it had to happen. Celebrity news is network news; it's cable news and it's E News. In the same breath you will learn about the Iraq war, Smith's death and the 2008 presidential elections because that is the news.

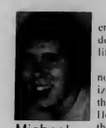
Celebrity culture is just as much a part of the news as domestic and international issues, sports and politics. Imagine if the newspaper didn't report what team won the Super Bowl, the World Series, the Stanley cup or even just what local team won last night. Imagine if the newspapers didn't report what movie won the Academy Award for Best Picture. Imagine if you could only find out Smith was dead through her obituary. With the entertainment industry comes the movies, the TV shows, the sports events and the celebrities, famous for being famous.

Luckily for those of you who don't want to hear the name Anna Nicole Smith ever again, Britney Spears just shaved her head and got two tattoos after 24 hours in rehab.

Melissa Garber can be reached at mhgarber@student.umass.edu.

VOTE ON YOUR OPINION IN THE POLL BELOW!

The Apple of your iPod



Michael Dennis

I, like so many of you, greatly enjoy my iPod. It's a nice little device. I can't say it's changed my life, but it's certainly convenient.

The company behind that phenomenon, Apple, has been revitalized in recent years, mostly due to that little devil of an MP3 player. However, in terms of taking over the computer market, it's still an uphill climb. A generous estimate would put Microsoft and PC's down as having a 90 percent market share, while Apple has about half of the remaining 10 percent, with Linux and the like bringing up the rear. But unlike the Linux community and its constituents, which are part of a niche market and would rather stay that way, Steve Jobs and Apple have different plans.

Consider the recent unveiling of the iPhone. At this point, when Apple unveils a product, it doesn't simply present it to the consumer to discover and analyze objectively. Rather, it is unveiled with a not-so-subtle theme of "this thing is so great it's going to change the world." How incredibly modest.

It's all about presentation and ceremony for Apple. Such pomp and circumstance goes hand in hand with the company line – style over substance. With all the emphasis on creativity, you'd think they'd hire someone to think of better names for their products. Between iBook, iPod, iMac, iPhoto, iTunes and iLife, there's not a single rebel in the bunch. iThink it's high time to drop the madness before it gets out of hand. Give us a name we can talk about, not a safe, bland label with an i-prefix.

True, it's hard to deny that Apple products are user friendly and reliable. The problem is that there is such a thing as being too user friendly, and Apple has that market cornered. I understand not everyone wants to deal with Windows' famed "blue screen of death" on a regular basis, but I'd like to think that even the most reluctant computer novice could figure out how to use a two-button mouse. But, alas, Apple disagrees.

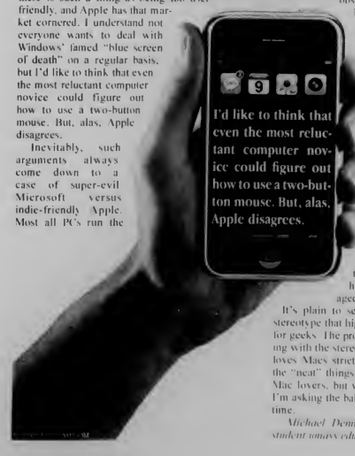
Inevitably, such arguments always come down to a case of super-evil Microsoft versus indie-friendly Apple. Most all PC's run the Windows operating system, but for many, the reliance on Microsoft stops there. There are free and open source alternatives, such as Mozilla Firefox and Open Office to programs like Internet Explorer and Microsoft Office. A gargantuan amount of peripherals manufactured by numerous companies are available for PC's, which by and large are completely user serviceable.

But in the case of Apple, many of their accessories (such as the Airport Extreme card for wireless internet access, or cables for connecting a laptop to a television) are strictly proprietary. This means they are produced by one company and one company alone: Apple. Therefore, they're subject to an astronomically jacked up pricing system. They'd like you to think all that money is going towards a quality product, but there's no denying that when it comes to computer products, competition is a good thing for the consumer.

All nitpicking aside, there's one item that clearly defines the great divide between PC's and Macs: the computer itself. Consider for a moment how many PC manufacturers exist, between HP, Dell, Gateway and the like. Not to mention the thousands of independently-owned computer stores that will custom build a PC for you, or the fact that you could buy the parts and assemble one yourself. Then think about how many companies produce Operating System X-based Mac computers. One. It's called Apple. And no, you can't build one yourself, nor can you easily modify one you've bought pre-made.

The point here is not necessarily to build up Microsoft, or even anoint the PC as decidedly more open-source, user friendly and generally democratic and "for the people" (though it is). I also don't mean to mindlessly slander Apple (I myself own a vintage clamshell iBook, of which, despite its impeding obsolescence, I have nary a complaint).

So, I'd just like to momentarily knock Mac lovers off of their high horse, and wake them up to the fact that Steve Jobs is not Jesus, and Apple is not the second coming. Just as in the case with any individual or government, it's not the greatest idea to put all your chips down on one giant corporation and devote yourself entirely to their cause without second guessing them – whether it be Apple, Microsoft or anyone else.



I'd like to think that even the most reluctant computer novice could figure out how to use a two-button mouse. But, alas, Apple disagrees.

But perhaps it can all be summed up with a priceless line of advertising served up by Apple itself. Yeah, there's more than a hint of truth to those annoying Apple ads, with the young, dressed-down Mac and his counterpart, the stuffy, middle-aged, hokey business suit-wearing PC.

It's plain to see that Apple wants to shatter the stereotype that high-performance computers are only for geeks. The problem with this is that they're fighting with the stereotype of the hipster art student who loves Macs strictly for their aesthetic qualities and the "neat" things they do. No offense to all of you Mac lovers, but when it comes to computer advice, I'm asking the bald guy with the goofy glasses every time.

Michael Dennis can be reached at mdennis@student.umass.edu

Preparing to grow up

Debra Capellari

I'll admit it: I'm a nerd. I'm not just a nerd; I'm a glasses wearing, book hungry, sudoku-playing lunatic. And that's fine with me. It's fine with my group of friends too, who vary in their nerdy status from the toting of Abnormal psychology books from place to place, to the discussion of the color wheel and the state of emergency when discussing the atrocities taking place in Darfur. We're nerds, and we like it that way.

That being said, it's hard for me to imagine why someone wouldn't want to be informed about the goings on in the country and around the world. We, as an age bracket, are about to embrace the fact that we need to be actual adults in a society outside of the college bubble. The nights that we spend playing kings and flip cup will be replaced by working late and getting up early. Scheduling your classes so that you can sleep until 1p.m." That idea gets thrown away when you land your first 8a.m. to 5p.m. And when we take on these adult responsibilities, we become active participants in the world. We become members of society who vote, pay and probably complain. As such, we need to have a vested interest in "adult" information about the world we're going to be participating in.

What else is there to do during breakfast? Pick up a paper and see what's going on in the world outside of this campus.

There are a bunch of different ways to feed the news craving, depending on how much you want to know and how much of an attention span you have. First of all, start with Jon Stewart and Stephen Colbert. Most of us already know these two political comics from their respective shows on Comedy Central. The "The Daily Show" and "The Colbert Report" have a large collegiate following simply because they're hilarious. However, both hosts tout admirable guest lists, including the likes of former president Bill Clinton to higher ups in the U.N. like Shashi Tharoor. "The Daily Show" airs Monday through Friday at 11p.m. and "The Colbert Report" follows at 11:30. For those who are wary about the news, these two shows are perfect starting points- keeping the viewer entertained, but informed.

For those of you who already watch Comedy Central like it's some sort of religious guru, and need alternative news sources, I'd suggest "Anderson Cooper 360°." The show, airing on CNN at 10p.m. Mondays through Fridays, provides the viewer with an in-depth look at stories going on all around the globe. "360°" covers some stories that other networks cover briefly or skip over all together. Cooper himself is a firm believer in hands-on news, and has won acclaims for his journalistic capabilities during times of crisis in America, more recently his coverage of Hurricane Katrina and the U.S. invasion of Iraq. It's true his show runs a full two hours, which interferes with Stewart and Colbert, but the show is worth tuning into, even if you just see the first hour.

It's very easy to get a newspaper now. Just sit down at your computer and type in the paper you'd like to read. Most major newspapers are offered for free online, and you can enjoy the news without stepping outside to get the paper. "The New York Times," "The Wall Street Journal" and "The LA Times" are all available online. Of course, other papers that you choose to read can also be found online. These are only suggestions.

While you're at your computer, you can get streaming news from any of the major cable news networks. ABC, CNN, Fox and MSNBC all offer Web sites with live news coverage. Plus, if you live on campus, you can get a free newspaper at any of the Dining Commons. What else is there to do during breakfast? Pick up a paper and see what's going on in the world outside of campus. Even if you skim the articles, you'll have some idea of recent news.

Getting informed about what's going on doesn't have to be a chore. The above examples are proof that the news is right at our fingertips. Reading an article while you're procrastinating on Facebook is definitely something even the word multi-taskers can handle. Watching Stewart and Colbert is always entertaining, you might not even notice how much information you're acquiring.

At this point in our lives, it's vitally important to know about the world outside of UMass. It's great to know what the best cheap brand of beer is, and where to go for the best drinks downtown. But one day, in the not so distant future, we will all be faced with the direct responsibility to decide who the next president of the United States will be. We will be expected that we have some knowledge of how our tax money is being spent, and that we form some sort of opinion on situations like the war in Iraq.

You don't need to be a nerd, and you definitely don't need to change the world, but you should do your best to stay informed on the issues that this country is facing, right now and in the years to come. If we become as informed as we can be, we will all be able to make better decisions about the government and leadership that we choose for ourselves.

Deb Capellari can be reached at dcapellari@student.umass.edu

Should the affairs of the late Anna Nicole Smith be headline news?

Yes! ☐ No! ☐ Who is that? ☐

GO TO WWW.DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM TO VOTE!

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

ARTS & LIVING

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 21, 2007

ARTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Last, but not least

Forest Whitaker stars in one of the year's best films as a 1970's Ugandan President

By Morgan-ann Rousseau
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Director Kevin Macdonald's Last King of Scotland is an engaging masterpiece. Powerful and at times disturbing, Last King offers a story of power, corruption and relentless brutality. Whitaker's performance, which earned his nomination in this year's Academy Awards as the Best Leading Actor, casts a brilliant shadow over the film's various other deserving qualities.

The charmingly grainy cinematography of Anthony Dod Mantle propels the viewer into the 1970's with hectic and bustling camera work. With on-location filming in Uganda, Africa, Last King, thrives on the visual reality of the exploited nation. Mantle's cinema-graphic work in Last King won him a Best Technical Achievement award at the 2006 British Independent Film Awards. The on-screen sights are unfamiliar yet tantalizing to the vast majority of viewers: ethnic dances, missionary camps, military men with guns slung over their shoulder at every bus stop and street corner.

Unlike fellow Oscar contender and African based film, Blood Diamond, Last King doesn't initially give the impression that it'll be painted in blood. But in Uganda, naivety is short lived. Despite a handful of sickening images, the film succeeds at delivering action without the usual necessity of non-stop bloodshed. The little violence that is present does more than enough to satiate even the hardest shelled desensitization.

And then there's Whitaker. While ego-obsessed characters have charmed the silver screen since the early days of cinema, it's fair to say that few actors are capable of pulling it off. The Texas-born actor's depiction of former the Ugandan president gives a fresh meaning to megalomania.

LAST KING OF SCOTLAND

DIRECTED BY KEVIN MACDONALD

STARRING FOREST WHITAKER, JAMES MCAVOY

GRADE: A-

Last King is a story of historic fiction centering on Nicholas Garrigan young Scottish doctor who takes a job as Ugandan President Idi Amin's personal physician shortly after his rise to political power. Idealism seems to be Garrigan's mutual flaw. Fresh out of med-school, and with the original intention to work as a Ugandan missionary, his youthful romanticism draws him to Amin's magnetism like a polar opposite. The two become unlikely pals, and Garrigan is quickly seduced by the palace life. Women, luxury and foreign exoticism, Ugandan life seems lovely to the young doctor until gruesome truths of reality open his eyes to the world outside the palace walls.

No stranger to ups and downs, most cinema goers are more than capable of smelling a "bad guy" minutes after the opening credits. But Whitaker does himself justice. The actor's portrayal of the larger-than-life president initially seduces audiences with good humor and amiable personality quirks before the character's horrid colors start to show. Garrigan's admiration for Amin dissolves as the irking underbelly of power and corruption is exposed little by little; hence, persistent suspense.

Playing the role of missionary Sarah Merrit, a familiar yet improved Gillian Anderson (X-Files) did little to disappoint, and even less to impress. Kerry Washington's role as Amin's

See SCOTLAND on page 7

Texas born, Forest Whitaker, portrays Ugandan President Idi Amin with great ease in Last King of Scotland. Whitaker has won a Golden Globe for his role and he is also nominated for an Oscar.

DC Dish: it is not just a sandwich

By Mary-Frances Hyde
COLLEGIAN COLUMNIST

Paninis, or pressed sandwiches, are becoming ever more popular on restaurant menus. The diminutive for the Italian word for bread, paninis generally are made from ciabatta bread stuffed with grilled or cured meats, cheeses and vegetables and then pressed between two hot skillets. This Italian invention offers hot, crusty goodness to hungry lunch munchers. With the creation of the panini press, and electric cooking tool, enjoying grilled sandwiches has become quick and convenient.

Paninis are available at The Blue Wall Cafe where they will grill just about any sandwich on the menu. Sandwich shops like Quiznos toast their sandwiches, which, although not technically a panini, can be equally warm and delicious. Dining halls across campus, like Worcester and Hampshire, offer prepared paninis at lunch and dinner and Franklin has a panini press near its deli bar. While the prepared version is suitable if you are in a rush, coming up with your own variations is sure to be more pleasing. In fact, grilling almost any sandwich adds depth of flavor and may be a more satisfying meal.

There are some basic points you should remember when making a panini. Most paninis are tastier with cheese and tend to hold together better as well. If wilted lettuce and warm tomato are not your preference, you can always add veggies after you have grilled your sandwich.

To prevent the sandwich from sticking to the press, and to create an evenly browned crust, you may use olive oil, butter, margarine or cooking spray. Olive oil, although considered heart healthy, may soak into the bread making the final product greasy. Margarine is made from vegetable oil and contains trans fats which are a big no-no if you are health conscious. Butter, while producing the best tasting crust, tends to brown quickly, so make sure the press is set on medium heat so your panini does not burn.

Cooking spray tends to work well at high temperatures but can be less palatable than butter. Panini is, after all, a fancy word for grilled cheese. Consider unusual fillings like hummus, tuna, peanut butter and jelly, or hamburgers (not all together, of course) and breads like tortillas, sub rolls, bagels and English muffins.

Feel free to put what ever you want inside and use whatever kind of bread your heart desires outside.

BASIC GRILLED CHEESE

2 slices bread
2 slices or ¼ cup cheese
Butter, margarine, oil, or cooking spray

Place cheese on one slice of bread. Top with remaining slice of bread. Spread outside with butter, margarine, or oil or spray press with cooking spray. Grill until golden brown and cheese is melted

BARBECUE CHICKEN BAGEL

1 bagel
1 grilled chicken breast
1 tbsp barbecue sauce
2 slices bacon or 1 tbsp bacon bits

See DC DISH on page 7

Margarine is made from vegetable oil and contains trans fat which is a big no-no if you are health conscious.

DC DISH from page 6

2 slices American cheese

Cut chicken breast in half, lengthwise. Place chicken on bottom half of bagel and top with barbecue sauce, bacon and cheese. Make sure cheese is covering the bacon as completely as possible so, when melted, the cheese will keep the bacon in place. Replace top half of bagel. Spray panini press with cooking spray and grill bagel until golden and cheese is melted.

CROQUE MONSIEUR WITH PEAR

1 sub roll or 2 slices whole wheat bread
2 slices Swiss cheese
½ medium pear or apple
2 slices deli ham
½ tsp Dijon mustard
½ tsp mayonnaise
Butter

(Note- If using a sub roll, turning the inside of the roll towards the press and placing ingredients onto the outside, it will create a more even crust.)

If using roll, split roll in half, lengthwise. Cut pear into thin slices. Mix mayonnaise and mustard together and spread on one piece of bread. Arrange pear, ham and cheese on bread and top with remaining slice. Lightly butter the outside of the sandwich and grill until golden brown and cheese is melted.

Mary-Frances Hyde can be reached at mhyde@student.umass.edu

New Orleans funk rocks Noho

Jon Cleary and the Absolute Monster Gentlemen heat up Iron Horse

Jon Cleary and his band The Absolute Monster Gentlemen performed a set full of wild solo's and improvisation this past Monday evening at the Iron Horse in Northampton. Opening act Matt White was a severe disappointment and did not connect well with the audience.

By Michael Trabert
COLLEGIAN STAFF

It may have been cold outside, but Jon Cleary and the Absolute Monster Gentlemen kept it hot and heavy with tight beats and ivory slamming funk this past Monday at the Iron Horse in Northampton.

It was a treat to see such a great band from New Orleans playing the music they know best. Each member seemed to be enjoying the experience thoroughly and had a smile the whole time. Obviously virtuosos, these guys could switch musical styles at any given second going from a march waltz to a Latin montuno.

Cleary was particularly impressive and throughout the set had many piano solos that could have kept the crowed moving all night. The rest of the band had amazing chops too. The drummer, Eddie Christmas, couldn't have held the band together any better and displayed a solid style that you would have had to hear to comprehend.

The relationship between the bassist Cornell C. Williams and guitarist Derwin "Big D" Perkins was phenomenal. At parts in the show a break would occur and the two would play a complex riff together completely in sync. It seemed impossible for this group to drop a beat. Their relationship was impressive and created another level onto why this group was so great.

The band nailed a cover "Just Kissed My Baby" and a few other songs by The Meters, another funk band from New Orleans.

Cleary took it down a notch in the middle of the show with a song called "Post Street Blues." The amount of emotion emitted from that song was staggering. Cleary introduced the song by saying that it is about a place that he used to live. After hearing the soulful piano it left the feeling that something bad happened there. Not much of a break was had before the next song set the pace back into funk.

In the song "Help Me Somebody," Perkins had an amazing guitar solo. The first time he stepped out in front of the band he blew the crowd away. The solo was appreciated by the crowd, earning him a thirty second round of applause afterward.

The Iron Horse was surprisingly filled for a Monday night. The crowd mostly consisted of the usual middle-aged Northampton yuppies. Most of them were into the music and dancing, however, some people watched the show as if it were watching an opera. That is understandable though, considering that this type of music is an acquired taste especially because it gets little exposure in this area.

The only negative aspect about it was the opening act. The band named after its front man, Matt White, absolutely did not fit in with Jon Cleary's music. The music was performed to an audience that didn't receive it at all. White spewed his plastic slog for what was, thankfully, a short set. His music could be compared to a theme song for a Lifetime channel made-for-TV movie. An example of some of his lyrics: "I believe in miracles, I believe in you and me" and "Those are the best days of my life." It would have been very hard for this group to be anymore fabricated, whiny, commercial and average.

The only redeeming quality to their performance was the screaming done by two girls who seemed to be friends of the band. Their screaming was actually funny since it was loud enough to cover up the emotionally canned noise that was coming from the stage.

Fortunately the money spent on the ticket was saved by Cleary and his amazing group. Very few bands from New Orleans show up around the Valley. When they do, you know you will be in for a treat.

Michael Trabert can be reached at mtrabert@student.umass.edu

It's a panini made fresh in the DC

Breach comes to Boston theater

Billy Ray and Chris Cooper speak at Beantown screening

By Michael Cartwright
COLLEGIAN STAFF

BOSTON — The menacing eyes of Chris Cooper filled the silver screen, as the eyes of the audience closely focused in on him. In a moment far more typical of Sunday's Academy Awards, the actor on screen stood no more than four feet away from the edge of it, pressed up against the wall, watching himself.

It was only a few minutes before Cooper (American Beauty, Syriana) would begin the Q&A session, fielding questions from the AMC Fenway Theater audience as part of The Boston Globe's GlobeTalks program. He was dressed in stereotypical-actor's clothes, a long black wool coat worn under a grayish scarf, which lay long around his neck; something a church-going man might wear.

BREACH

Written and Directed By: Billy Ray

Starring: Chris Cooper, Ryan Phillippe

GRADE: B+

Starring in the new spy-thriller Breach, Cooper plays veteran FBI agent Robert Hanssen, a devout Catholic, who spends nearly as much time inside his local church as a Priest does. However, this Opus Dei member, and conservative family man is suspected to have forked over immeasurable amounts of U.S. Intel to Soviets during the Cold War, making him responsible for one of the largest security breaches in United States history. Breach tells the true story of Hanssen (Cooper) leading up to his 2001 capture.

Playing opposite the mature Chris Cooper is the boyish Ryan Phillippe (Crash, Cruel Intentions) as Eric O'Neill, an ambitious upand-coming FBI trainee assigned to get close to Hanssen – he's under the impression he's busting an alleged porn freak before learning he's an integral part of a major FBI sting operation. A man of lapsed spirituality, O'Neill accompanies him to church, eats dinner with him and his god-loving wife (Kathleen Quinlan) and continues to be as close to Hanssen as anyone else, up until his arrest. O'Neill, the student, must outsmart Hanssen, the teacher. Such a relationship predictably causes problems for O'Neill, particularly trust issues with Hanssen, in addition to his own wife (Caroline Dhavernas). Phillippe is unexpectedly strong here, but is expectedly overshadowed by Cooper.

The real-life O'Neill (who now practices law in Washington D.C.) worked over each draft of the film's script with writer-director Billy Ray to help sculpt an authentic model. A tale of deception isn't foreign territory to Ray though, as the filmmaker recently depicted another famous fraud, former New Republic journalist Stephen Glass, with his 2003 film "Shattered Glass."

Laura Linney turns in an unyielding performance as Kate Burroughs, the strong and independent FBI agent assigned to supervise O'Neill during the course of the investigation. Dennis Haysbert has a short on-screen stint as FBI agent Dan Plesac, but plays a seemingly insignificant role which, for Haysbert, falls somewhere between an old episode of "24" and a new Allstate commercial. Cooper's reticent portrayal of Hanssen is without a doubt the film's highlight and deserves to be ranked near the top of Cooper's impressive canon. He carries a sense of paranoia, intelligence, confidence and vulnerability; sometimes all at once. Cooper brilliantly manages to evoke sympathy for a man who was responsible for the death and or capture of over fifty United States agents. If Breach is released months earlier, Cooper presumably could've garnered an Oscar nod.

As credits rolled inside the AMC Fenway Theater, Chris Cooper and Billy Ray were greeted with a well deserved ovation and a few initial stock questions from Boston Globe film critic Ty Burr.

Proceeding Burr's question Ray chose to talk about a recent run-in with legendary writer Norman Mailer, who told Ray he'd "like to know how he did it," referring to the construction of Hanssen's character in the screenplay, as Mailer felt he "didn't get him quite right" when his own screenplay was made into a TV movie in 1988. One can only assume after receiving encouraging words from Mailer, that Billy Ray felt more than satisfied with the film's outcome.

When audience members asked Cooper how he prepared for such a complex role, he explained that he was almost forced to simplify things because he didn't have much to work with in the first place.

"I only had about fifteen seconds of video [of the real-life Hanssen], with no sound, along with five sources [books], which basically created one weird amalgam, and he was from Chicago, so I worked on a Chicago accent to some extent."

Ray commented further on the actor's craft, going far enough to say he regards Cooper as "the best American actor working today."

If you enjoyed Shattered Glass, you'll likely find something of value in this film, but if you're searching for an action-packed flick of the James Bond variety, you should probably look elsewhere.

Breach is an uncharacteristic spy thriller, as it is not so much an edge-of-your-seat espionage adventure, as it is a dramatic and enigmatic character study. And well, whenever Chris Cooper is playing a mysterious character, it's likely worth the price of admission, and if ever Cooper is watching the film right beside you, it surely is.

Michael Cartwright can be reached at mcartwri@student.umass.edu

Playing opposite Chris Cooper (above right) is Ryan Phillippe as Eric O'Neill (above left), an ambitious FBI trainee. The movie also stars Laura Linny (lower left).

Whitaker has Oscar winning potential

SCOTLAND from page 7

unfaithful wife, Kay, is played nicely, but has a "nothing exceptional" ring to it. The same can be said for McAvoy, whose leading role in Last King drew international recognition for the 28-year-old Scot. Garrigan's character is somewhere between likeable and heroic, but McAvoy's performance is just likeable. The actor's ambition seems a little overplayed, as does his cowering intimidation when in the presence of the overbearing dictator.

Obviously in the midst of an award typhoon, if the supporting cast seems subpar, it's not because they are mediocre actors (I or her role. Washington was nominated for an Image award and a Black Reel award, and McAvoy won a BAFTA award for Best Supporting actort. It's because Whitaker's blazon performance makes the film. The actor engulfs the screen much like his character's persona overwhelms a room. His buoyant presence transfixes with charisma just as a dictator should, which may explain his roughly 20 other nominations or wins, including: a Golden Globe award for Best Actor in a Drama, a Screen Actor's Guild Award for Outstanding Performance by a Male Actor in a Leading Role, a Satellite Award, New York Film Critics Circle Award and an L.A. Film Critics Association Award to name a few.

All in all, Last King is worth much more than its theater ticket or DVD purchase price. Not only does this film address and expose issues of government corruption and politically enforced homicide still plaguing African nations today, but it does so with clout. A hammering leading performance by Whitaker, and the distanced yet unsettling circumstances in Last King are capable of leaving viewers' lungs bereft of steady breath.

Morgan-ann Rousseau can be reached at Arts@dailycollegian.com.

Dylan never reached pinnacle of songwriting

By Rob Greenfield
COLLEGIAN COLUMNIST

Bob Dylan is known as a folk music legend and a pioneer of the folk-rock genre. He is credited with articulating the feelings and thoughts of a generation in rebellion against the government and any authority figure in sight.

And while Dylan stood on the front lines and pioneered a new form of music with some pretty stiff resistance (see the 1965 Newport Folk Festival when he went electric in front of the purists), writing songs like "The Times They Are a-Changin'" that spoke to millions, he has always had limits to his popularity and his talent.

Dylan's iconic status was a matter of mere good timing. Dylan's success ended with the 1960s. He did not have the voice, the versatility in songwriting and instrumentation or the stage presence to continue his success beyond the 1960s and the baby boomer generation.

While Dylan put together some outstanding songs, he rarely combined superb vocals, instrumental virtuosity and well-articulated lyrics into one tune. And while Dylan might be one of the best lyricists in the history of American music, to call him one of the best songwriters is an egregious exaggeration.

There are several artists and bands that (in my humble opinion) outclass Dylan in popularity, transcendence, as musicians and as songwriters.

Bruce Springsteen is my main example. Had Springsteen come along 10 years earlier (his first album debuted in 1972), he would have eclipsed Dylan 10-fold in popularity.

Springsteen entered his prime in the 1970s when the United States was in a state of disillusion after the ugly ending to the Vietnam War in 1972, Watergate and the oil crisis.

Americans didn't know who to trust and realized that their protests and grievances were not going to be heard by their own government, which didn't listen to the anti-war sentiments among its citizens until the damage abroad had already been done.

Springsteen's "Born to Run" album — a combination of bluesy rock and fast rock 'n' roll in the jump blues, big band style — illustrated the hopelessness of American south trying to escape from the economic strife of the small-town life.

After "Born to Run" it was on to "Darkness on the Edge of Town," an album filled with the pathos and frustrations of living in an economically starved America where a person couldn't escape from the working class.

In 1982, Springsteen released his "Nebraska" album, a solo endeavor that he recorded in his house with just a harmonica and an acoustic guitar. Two years later, he ventured to the opposite side of the spectrum with "Born in the USA," a pop-rock album with rockers like "Born in the USA" — that illustrated the plight of Vietnam veterans in a society that didn't appreciate them — and "Dancing in the Dark," which pictured the 35-year-old Springsteen struggling with what he was and what he has become, a true introspection.

So the 1978 "Born to Run" album and the 1984 "Born in the USA" album, 10 years apart, reached massive audiences in politically complacent eras in United States history — imagine what he would've done in 1965.

But Springsteen didn't stop there. He continued to show his versatility with "The Rising" in 2001, a gospel-based album with songs dedicated to the memories of 9/11 victims like "The Rising," "My City of Ruins" and "Into the Fire," a respectful and moving tune about the firefighters who risked their lives to save others.

Then Springsteen released his "Devils and Dust" album in 2005, a collection of songs featuring just Springsteen, his acoustic guitar, harmonica, piano and organ. He toured the country by himself on stage, selling out arenas and carrying shows all on his own. He played piano and harmonica flawlessly at the same time and rewrote some of his ballads like "Lonesome Day" onto the acoustic guitar.

He continued to show off his versatility with his most recent album, "We Shall Overcome: The Seeger Sessions," where he rewrote some old American ballads and covered others, fusing blues, jazz, swing, folk, rock and salsa with an 18-piece, acoustic band.

He completely rewrote the instrumentals for some of his songs, like "You Can Look (But You Better Not Touch)" and "Ramrod," which he turned into a salsa swing rocker that sent the crowds into delirium.

Springsteen is also a tremendous on-stage performer, constantly dancing, shouting and engaging the audience with moving stories to accompany some of his personal pieces.

But that is beside the overall point, which is this: Bob Dylan is not the best singer-songwriter of all time, and he certainly is not the best musician, vocalist or performer. Springsteen outdistances Dylan on almost every front, and The Boss isn't the only one.

While Dylan is tops as a lyricist, he never reached the highest musical plateau: the combination of powerful lyrics, moving melodies, virtuosic instrumentals and vocal range in a song.

There are only a few artists that have reached that peak, but Dylan is certainly not one of them.

Rob Greenfield can be reached at rgreenfi@student.umass.edu

Bob Dylan put together some outstanding songs, but if Bruce Springsteen came out with music in the 1960's, he would have won more claim.

Accounting Majors
Master of Science in Accounting and Taxation

Earn the extra hours you need for the CPA Examination

Earn your MS degree in as few as seven months... or at your own pace

Choose between a concentration in Financial and Assurance Services or Taxation

For further information and an application package:
Phone: 860.768.4343
Web: http://barney.hartford.edu
E-Mail Dr. Carl Smith at casmith@hartford.edu

Barney School of Business
UNIVERSITY OF HARTFORD

Still much at stake tonight at Mullins

M. BASKETBALL from page 12

leading rebounder with 7.7 per game while averaging 11.9 points per contest.

"They've got a good scorer in Tyler Relph, who can really get hot," Ford said. "They've got two inside players, Lee and Williams that are as active and good inside players that we'll play against. They have their strengths as a basketball team.

"They're very disciplined. They're going to come down and run their offense and they're going to change defenses on you a little bit."

St. Bonaventure junior swingman A.J. Hawkins has been one of the few bright spots in recent games for the Bonnies. He has averaged 22.5 points in the past three contests, with 23 at Temple, 24 against Dayton and 20 against St. Joseph's. He is now fourth on the team in scoring with 11.3 points per game.

The Bonnies have a poor overall record, and it doesn't get any better when they hit the road. They are just 3-9 when away from home, but that doesn't mean a victory is automatic for UMass, which returns home after a successful three-game road trip.

"We're excited to be back, but again our team can't think just because we're at home it's a guaranteed win because we've had our nights in the Mullins Center where we have not played well," Ford said.

For the most part, the Minutemen are a tough team to beat at the Mullins Center, holding an 8-2 record at home this season. The only two losses came against Boston College on Dec. 2 and against Miami on Jan. 2.

UMass has had strong performances from junior Gary Forbes as of late. He's averaged 20.6 points and 9.4 rebounds per game in the last five contests.

Seniors Stephane Lasme and Rashaun Freeman have provided their usual double-double performances down the stretch, and combined with a most-recent threat of bench players Dante Milligan and Brandon Thomas, the Minutemen look like a force to be reckoned with as a top seed in Atlantic City.

Barring any setbacks against the Bonnies, of course.

Danny Picard can be reached at dpicard@student.umass.edu.

The Minutemen are in second place in the Atlantic 10 just a half-game behind conference leader Rhode Island. That could change tonight as UMass takes on St. Bonaventure at the Mullins Center and the Rams face Xavier in Cincinnati.

Defense is one area where the Minutewomen lost a key player to graduation – Jackie Nesbitt. But junior Julie Papaleo (above) returns to head up the UMass backfield.

Typadis leads talented group

By Michael King
Collegian Staff

A young team with a lot of talent and a new coach – that's probably the best way to describe the 2007 edition of the Massachusetts women's lacrosse team. The Minutewomen graduated only three seniors from last year's seven win squad, UMass total and have only three seniors on the roster this year.

First-year coach Alexis Venechanos brings a tradition of success to UMass from her days as an assistant at Northwestern and a player at Maryland. In fact, her alma mater was four of the last seven NCAA Division I lacrosse championships.

However, it will be a new kind of challenge for Venechanos to put UMass on par with those teams.

"One of the biggest things about taking a program and adapting to the players is just that coach mentality," Venechanos said. "We have a strong core of players at each position and I feel our talent will translate well onto the field."

The core of experienced players in front of the Minutewomen Venechanos said, "We have a returning goal scorer, two and three-year starters in the midfield, midfield, and attack positions. So now it's a matter of the returning freshmen and the freshmen coming in and how it fits all together."

Leading the returnees is senior Samantha Sepulveda. She scored 12 goals in 2006 and has started a total of 49 games during her three years for the Maroon and White.

Another midfielder, sophomore Holly Drown, started every game she played last season, missing only two due to injury. She returns her eight goals and her ability to control possessions and the flow of the game.

Jeannette Villapiano is the team's third returning midfielder. As one the tallest players on the team, the junior has the special ability to use both size and speed to score goals and control possessions. She increased her point total over her freshman year by 17 during her sophomore campaign and is poised to make more offensive progress this season.

The team also welcomes two freshmen, Merritt Cosgrove and Lyndsay Ward, to its midfielder ranks. The pair will add depth to the group and should flourish under the leadership and direction of the experienced returnees.

Defense

The Minutewomen's defensive unit will be challenged after losing star Jackie Nesbitt to graduation. Nesbitt was an A-10 All-Conference performer and she was known for playing strong one-on-one defense.

However, the team has three strong defenders in senior Erica Shapiro, junior Julie Papaleo and sophomore Jackie Rosenzweig. The trio should become a solid unit with game experience, along with junior Alana Jakavas and two freshmen.

Going into the first game of the season, the team's goalie situation is still unsettled and remains the team's biggest question mark. The two candidates for starter are senior Lauren McCarthy and sophomore Jamie Whiteway.

McCarthy played 15 games in net last season for the Minutewomen, splitting time with Krissy Anderson. The senior finished the year with a 12.9 goals-against average and a 0.474 save percentage.

Michael King can be reached at mking@student.umass.edu.

FRUSTRATED? PUZZLED? DO YOU HAVE:

A grade dispute?

Teacher, roomate or job concerns?

Billing problems?

...or any other University related problems?

THE OMBUDS OFFICE CAN HELP

(confidentially, of course)

Serving the students, faculty, and staff of the Umass Community

823 Campus Center
Office Hours: 8:00 a.m. - 5:00 p.m.
Telephone: 413 - 545 - 0867
fax: 413 - 545 - 9720
e-mail: ombuds@ombuds.umass.edu

BOSTON BARTENDERS SCHOOL - W. SPFLD

Special Student Rate

Local-National Placement

Includes Certification

1-800-357-3210

BostonBartender.com

UMass picked as top seed

M. SWIMMING AND DIVING from page 12

the Minutemen.

The same four swimmers will take part in the 100-yard freestyle for the Minutemem, but once again, Duquesne's sprinters appear to be the strongest in this event. Senior Ed Wicker headlines a group that posted three of the top four times this season.

"Nate, Juan, Mike and A.J. are a good crew," Yarworth said. "We should be able to get good swims out of them. But they're going to have their hands full with the Duquesne sprint crew. They're always tough in the sprint."

Vozella's time of 1:43.02 in the 200-yard freestyle was good enough for the third best in the conference this season, but was more than a full second slower than the top two times. Senior Greg Chartier adds depth to the freestyle unit – he recorded the fourth best 200-yard freestyle time in the conference earlier this season. Freshman Tim Smith and junior Derek Castellana look to make a dent on the scoreboard for UMass in this race.

Freshman Justin Brooks and sophomore Brad Moan spearhead the A-10's deepest and most talented distance group.

Brooks recorded the conference's best time in the 1,650-yard freestyle at the Terrier Invitational in November his time of 16:05.12 was a full 16 seconds faster than any other time in the league this season.

"Those are three guys that can all place top 10," Yarworth said. "We might even get a win out of one of them."

The Minutemen must perform well in the freestyle events if they plan to come back to Amherst with a win.

Butterfly

Bromage won the 100-yard butterfly last season as a freshman and looks to repeat as champion this season.

"He has to beat the kid from Duquesne, Eric Bugby," Yarworth said. "It's going to be a good tough battle for him, they're about a tenth of a second apart."

Junior Zack Priest, senior Mike Cordes, freshman Mike Berthaume and senior Mike Herald will also compete in the race for UMass. The Minutemen could potentially finish in the top four spots in this race.

Bugby's time of 49.77 is the best in the conference this season with Bromage just behind him at 49.87. Priest and Berthaume occupy the third and fourth spots with times of 50.88 and 51.14, respectively.

The 200-yard butterfly probably won't be as fruitful for the Minutemen. While Bugby had the conference's best time in this race as well, Priest recorded UMass best time. His 1:54.71 mark places him fourth in the conference.

Backstroke

Senior Evan Swisher won the 200-yard backstroke as a freshman but fell in both his sophomore and junior seasons. George Washington sophomore David Zenk won the event as a freshman and holds a 1.13 second advantage over Swisher so far this season.

"Evan has his work cut out for him," Yarworth said. "But Evan's ready to go."

Swisher needs to swim one of the better races of his career to defeat Zenk. But Swisher isn't UMass' only chance to place highly in this race. Freshman Trevor Ziegler had the conference's fifth-best time this season in the race. Fellow rookie Andrew Willbrant will also compete in the event.

"I freshmen, sometimes, they don't know enough to be scared," Yarworth said. "They're obviously feeling it and it's definitely a big meet for them. But they're definitely confident."

Yarworth will send the same trio plus Priest to starting block for the 100-yard backstroke.

"The backstroke could be big for us since all four of them can place," he said.

Breaststroke

Senior Jake Hogue has been UMass' best in the breaststroke all season. In the 100-yard event, Hogue's time of :58.13 is the best amongst the swimmers competing in the race. Junior John Weaver challenged him for the top spot earlier in the season, but Hogue established himself as the No. 1.

"All three of them have been :58 [seconds] or better in the past, so that's a good depth crew," Yarworth said.

St. Bonaventure freshman Mariusz Michalik's time of 2:06.13 in the 200-yard breast was best of any swimmer this season. Hogue is certainly capable of defeating Michalik and will need to push himself to do so. As a two-time team captain, Hogue understands what these meets are all about and what it takes to win.

Individual Medley

Chartier and Swisher have been two of UMass' best in the individual medley all year.

"In the IM we're loaded. We have Swisher, Chartier, Willbrant, Ziegler and Weaver," Yarworth said. "So, we've got five guys that can go 1:57 or better. It's another solid group for us."

Swisher's time of 1:52.69 was second best in the conference this season behind Zenk from GW. Swisher is determined to overcome Zenk after finishing second to him in both the 200-yard IM and the 200-yard backstroke last season.

Chartier should be able to score points for the Minutemen and could easily finish in the top three. He took fourth in the race last season with a time of 1:53.11. The third-place swimmer from Xavier, Dave Janssen, graduated, so Chartier could move into the third spot or higher.

Ziegler, Willbrant and Weaver add depth to the Minutemen's attack – all three could score points for UMass.

Relays

UMass' relays may prove one of the team's strongest points. The 200-yard medley relay opens up the meet for the men and UMass looks to capture one of the two top spots. Duquesne finished the regular season with the best time of any team in the conference, but historically, UMass swimmers' best times of the season come in the A-10 finals.

The talent Duquesne has in the freestyle has them favored to win every freestyle relay event, but again, teams spend six months training for this one race so truly anything can happen.

In the 200-yard, 400-yard and 800-yard freestyle relays, UMass sits second behind Duquesne in the regular season rankings.

The 200-yard medley relay also shows Duquesne on top with UMass behind them, but the Minutemen's depth could very easily propel them past the Dukes.

The 400-yard medley relay team of Swisher, Hogue, Bromage and Molliere possesses the most talent of any other relay team and should be able to snatch a victory for the Minutemen.

Diving

Junior R.J. Rappe is the two-time defending A-10 Champion in the one-meter dive. La Salle senior Karo Isajan remains his most dangerous opponent. Isajan won the three-meter diving event last season and finished second to Rappe on the one-meter plank.

Isajan has the highest point total on both the one- and three-meter boards this season with Rappe behind him on both.

Fordham's Donato Callara should test both Rappe and Isajan but remains likely to finish in the third spot.

UMass freshman Byron Johnson recorded the eighth and seventh best scores on the one- and three-meter boards. Johnson progressed well throughout the season but doesn't appear ready to become a premier diver in the A-10.

Joe Melore can be reached at jmelore@student.umass.edu.

Senior Greg Chartier will compete in the individual freestyle at this week's Atlantic 10 Championships in Buffalo. He had the fourth-best time in the 200-yard free during the regular season.

Last season it was St. Bonaventure, and not UMass, that won the Atlantic 10 Championships. It was the first time since 2000 that the Minutemen, and Evan Swisher (above), failed to finish in first place in the tournament.

Spiders, Dukes pace A-10s

W. SWIMMING AND DIVING from page 12

Both Richmond and Duquesne have solid depth in the 50 free, including Katrina Streiner, who won the event at last season's A-10 Championships for the Dukes.

Senior captain Liz Lovejoy leads a group of talented swimmers in the 100-yard freestyle. Junior Allison Volpe, freshmen Elizabeth Walsh and Chalikis all have times within the top 12 of the conference.

"Compared to the 50, the 100 involves a little more strategy, but you still have to be ready to get up and go," Newcomb said.

Duquesne has three swimmers in the top six, including Streiner and senior Melissa Johnson. But once again, Richmond has the best overall depth in the race.

The Minutewomen lack the depth in the 200-yard freestyle that they have in other events of this stroke. Lovejoy has the best time this season for the Maroon and White, but the race will most likely be one of the widest open in the championship, with several schools having solid depth and top swimmers.

On the other hand, the distance events require determination and a different mentality. Lovejoy and sophomore Taryn Prout pace the Minutewomen in the 500-yard freestyle.

The mile, also known as the 1,650-yard freestyle, is another grueling event of mental toughness. The race is so taxing on the swimmers that it is conducted as a timed final, meaning that all of the entrants swim once in multiple heats, with the fastest overall time winning.

Butterfly

UMass has an excellent combination of good depth and top swimmers in the butterfly events. Lovejoy has the third-best time in the conference in the 100-yard fly, while sophomore Christa Narus is the school record holder in the 200.

"I think the butterfly is definitely one of our strengths," Newcomb said. "We have some good talent in the stroke, especially with Liz [Lovejoy] and Christa [Narus]."

Chalikis and junior Samantha Demty should compete with the best in the conference. Look for the Minutewomen to score significant points in both races.

However, they will have to get past sophomore Elena Ramirez of Saint Louis, who won each event by several seconds last season as a freshman. Fordham, arguably the A-10's most improved team, has a strong set of swimmers in the stroke.

Backstroke

In both the 100 and 200-yard backstroke events, UMass is well represented at both ends of the swimming spectrum. Walsh and Prout provide young talent, while senior Vanessa Fleguel offers leadership and experience.

Richmond has a core of strong swimmers in each of the strokes and should dominate the event, as they have the top three times in both races among the rest of the conference.

However, Newcomb expects that his swimmers will perform well in this stroke and earn the team valuable points.

"I really like where our backstrokers are and I think we're in really good shape," he said.

Breaststroke

Phenom Lauren Beaudreau of Richmond is far above the rest of the conference in both the 100- and 200-yard races. She established new A-10 records in the events at last year's tournament as a freshman. Beaudreau also qualified for the NCAA Finals in the 200-yard breaststroke and finished in 22nd place.

"She's a great athlete and I think it's great for the conference to have swimmers like that because they help to raise the whole level of quality of the conference," Newcomb said.

For the Minutewomen, the breast is probably their weakest stroke. Demty and sophomore Jackie Porter will need to turn in personal best performances if they want to unseat the talented Beaudreau.

"We're really going to need to see people step up for us in this stroke," Newcomb said.

Individual Medley

The individual medley races are unique, as they require the swimmers to be proficient in all four strokes.

But once again, the Minutewomen will have to beat defending champion and A-10 record holder Beaudreau in the 200-yard IM. The sophomore qualified for the 2008 U.S. Olympic Trials during the summer, and her best time this year is nearly six seconds better than the rest of the field.

However, UMass has solid depth in both the 200- and 400-yard races. It should be a stroke where the team scores a significant amount of points by finishing several swimmers in the top 16, instead one or two in the top few spots.

"Sam [Demty] and Jackie [Porter] lead the way for us in the 400 IM," Newcomb said. "I think they are both ready to have big meets, as they've been very good and solid in the water."

Relays

The five relay events involve the most coaching and strategy of any of the races. Since UMass has a strong core of swimmers in the freestyle and individual medley strokes, it should have a good showing. But how coach Newcomb decides to position his best swimmers will go a long way in determining how the team's stack up against the rest of the conference.

"Defending our title in the 200 freestyle relay is definitely on our mind," Newcomb said. "But I have some choices to make about who's going to be on it. It all comes down to who is swimming well that day."

Duquesne has strong freestyle relays, while Richmond has been the most dominate this season in the medley relay races. However, coaches' decisions about which races to enter swimmers – individual events or relays – will greatly affect which teams are the most competitive.

Diving

Simply stated, UMass has the best set of divers of any team in the Atlantic 10.

"One of the biggest strengths of our team is our divers," Newcomb said. "I look at all four of divers and say that there is not one of them that is not capable of making the top eight on both boards. I know that no other program in the conference has that."

Sophomore Karen Upperco, 2006 A-10 Diver of the Year, won both the one- and three-meter dive events last season. Not to be outdone, seniors Melissa Pond and Mary Jenkins, as well as sophomore Sarah Hortsmann, should also earn significant points for the Minutewomen.

But Upperco has new competition this season. Freshman Anna Larson of Saint Louis posted the highest score on both boards during the regular season. Although it's hard to compare the talent and polish of the divers until they are judged by the same people under the same conditions.

The Minutewomen swimmers and divers face the difficult task of turning a season's worth of hard work and training into meaningful results against some of the region's best swimmers.

"I'm looking forward to this meet," Newcomb said. "This is what we've been working for after 23 straight weeks. I think the team is starting to get evetted and I definitely see an increase in the energy level of the team."

Michael King can be reached at mking@student.umass.edu.

The UMass record-holder for the 200-yard butterfly is sophomore Christa Narus. She will compete in that event this week.

Senior Liz Lovejoy is one of the best swimmers on UMass. She recorded the third-best time in the 100-yard butterfly event during the Atlantic 10 regular season.

UMass has depth needed to victory

MELONI from page 12

Minutemen projects well in both the 50- and 100-yard freestyle. Vozella, freshman Juan Moliere, sophomore Nate Bromage and Herald make up both the 50- and 100-yard freestyle contingents.

Vozella and Herald's experience, mixed with the raw speed of both Moliere and Bromage, should be enough to produce a winner – or at least improve on last season's finish. A talented group of sprinters from Duquesne will probably stand as UMass greatest obstacle, but the emergence of Moliere and Bromage's progression, has Yarworth excited and rightfully so.

Some of UMass' best hopes for first-place points weigh heavily on the shoulders of underclassmen. While Bromage – the reigning A-10 Champion in the 100-yard butterfly – knows what to expect, freshmen like Moliere and Trevor Ziegler must remain focused on victory, since both of them are more than capable of winning races and scoring points for the Minutemen.

Moliere emerged as the team's top short-distance freestyle specialist earlier this season and must swim great races for the Minutemen.

Another freshman who rose to the top of the team's depth charts was Justin Brooks. He has been one of the Maroon and White's top performers in long-distance freestyle races all season – his time of 16:05.12 at the Terrier Invitational in November was the best time posted by an A-10 swimmer in that event all season.

Also, Yarworth hopes freshman Tim Smith can finish in the top eight in at least one of the long-distance races.

Ziegler remains the Minutemen's most versatile freshman and UMass needs strong swims, maybe even a win from Ziegler to take the meet. Not only could Ziegler score points for the Minutemen in the backstroke, a victory in the 200-yard individual medley isn't entirely out of the question.

The depth provided by these freshmen improved the dynamic and performance of the team throughout the season, but if they don't produce now when it truly matters, then one must consider their first year at UMass a failure. Their individual seasons have all been stellar but at the end of the season, a banner only goes up if UMass wins the A-10 Championship.

I'm sure Yarworth would publicly disagree with that last statement 100 percent because he is a good coach and will never speak a negative word about one of his swimmers. He would also disagree with suggesting that winning is all that matters. Winning right is equally important but with Yarworth, any winning that is done is done right and that is why UMass swimming is what it is. That's why so much is expected of these freshmen.

Yarworth has been at UMass for as long as he has for a reason – because when you have a coach like Yarworth, freshmen or not, you really don't have an excuse to lose.

Joe Meloni is a Collegian columnist. He can be reached at jmeloni@student.umass.edu.

A.J. Vozella is one reason the Minutemen possess the depth needed to win the Atlantic 10 Championships. Vozella will compete despite illness.

Attention First-Year Students:

Have you completed MyStudentBody? It's easy, interesting ... and required for all first-year students. To avoid a registration hold, you must take and pass the course no later than Monday, March 12th. For instructions, go to the University Health Services website,

www.umass.edu/uhs

Center for Alcohol and other Drug Abuse Prevention

PINOCCHIOS on the go
Specials of the Week
Buy 2 Calzones GET 1 FREE
5 FREE WINGS With Purchase of any Large Pizza
(413) 256-4110
Call Now!
Sun-Wed Open 'til 1am
Thu Open 'til 2am
Fri-Sat Open 'til 3am

Free Delivery to UMass
Menu Online @ andiamo.cc

		8			9	5		3
	6							1
3			5					6
			9		4		1
	8	5				3	9
	1		2		5
8					6			2
1							7
7		3	1				6

QUOTE OF THE DAY

"Chaos in the midst of chaos isn't funny, but chaos in the midst of order is."
-Steve Martin

A COLLEGE GIRL NAMED JOE By Aaron Warner

HAVE YOU EVER GONE IN OUR SUITE MATE'S ROOM THROUGH THE DOOR IN THE BATHROOM?
NO! THAT'S WAY BAD SUITE MATE ETIQUETTE.
AND DON'T EVER GO IN THERE IF A SOCK IS ON THE DOORKNOB.
A SOCK? WHY?
HAVEN'T YOU EVER HEARD, "DON'T COME KNOCKIN' IF THE DOORKNOB HAS A SOCK ON"?

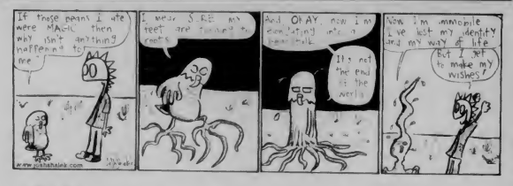
THE FAMILY MONSTER By Josh Shalek

Once I had a bite
It was nice with yellow racing stripes. Before then, I'd never been able to get a bite to fly
Every Summer day I was out flying that nice bite
When the Summer ended I hung on a cross
Does this story have a sad ending?
Nope not Summer I was into yo-yos

PAUL By Billy O'Keefe

SO HEY, I THINK WE NEED TO BREAK UP
I'D LIKE TO BREAK UP WITH YOU AND GO HOME AND PLAY VIDEO GAMES
WHA—IS THERE A DIFFERENCE?!
AW, YOU'RE FUNNY! WHAT WOULD YOU LIKE TO DO TONIGHT?
NO, SERIOUSLY, WOULD YOU LIKE TO GO TO APPLEBEE'S, OUTBACK, TGI FRIDAYS OR CHILI'S?
OOH, GOOD POINT. CHEESECAKE FACTORY IT IS!

WELCOME TO FALLING ROCK NATIONAL PARK By Josh Shalek



If those pants I ate were Mach's then why isn't anything happening to me
I wear SHEE on my feet and I'm not a crook
And OKAY now I'm sweating my pancreas
It's not the end of the world
Now I'm immovable I've lost my identity and my way of life But I got to make my wishes!

ACROSS
1 Confess
5 Tiny victory margin
9 Pays attention to 14 Actress Ten
15 Pot starter
16 Of long ago
17 Machu Picchu builder
18 Iranian currency unit
19 Old-time actress Pola
20 Jumping game
22 Agitate
23 Shaky shape
24 Long, long time
25 Take the plunge
26 Handle rudely
27 Familiarized with new surroundings
31 Visual aid
34 Leisure
35 Bathe
36 Dilapidated cars
37 Kb of Uganda
38 Pisto's prized pupil
40 Guitar ridges
41 Wishful
42 Thirsty
43 Johnny of "Sleepy Hollow"
44 Untruth
45 Sound of a leak
48 Measure of entry
51 Produce
53 Advancements
54 Exploited laborer
55 Lotion additive
56 Speak spectacularly
57 Sea eagle
58 Eccentric one
59 Luster
60 Etsuit
61 Breaks off

DOWN
1 Nimble
2 Wind indicators
3 Killer whales
4 Swaddle
5 Constricted
6 Leek's cousin
7 Males-only affair
8 Sushi bar offering
9 Award recipient
10 Simple
11 Brink
12 Laura or Bruce
13 State of irritation
21 Stunt
22 Expos
25 Hang in loose folds
26 U.S. leaders
27 Iridescent gems
28 Prison term
29 Send out
30 Liars
31 Attired
32 Fabled also-ran
33 Rara follower
34 Arrangement
36 March Madness sport
39 Locks
40 Emancipated
42 Main meal
44 Sierra
45 Permanent place?
46 Got up
47 Goes in search of 48 Intensely eager
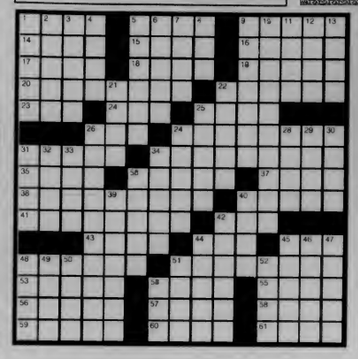
49 Astronomer Sagan
50 Greeting in Genoa
51 Richard of "Chicago"
52 Garden tool
54 Vigor

Find all of today's puzzle solutions online!
WWW.DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

THE HARP
SPECIALS!
Honey Brown, Molson
$2.00 a pint / $6.50 a pitcher
THURSDAY: Covalence
SATURDAY: Intontinations
Pizza 'til midnight 7 days a week
Voted Best Neighborhood Bar
Last of the River 2005 & 2006
Valley Advocate Readers Poll
OCMP & All Credit Cards accepted
163 Sunderland Rd. - N. Amherst
Just north of the apartments
413-548-6900 www.theharp.net



Submit your comics!
collegian.com/submit
Submit your classifieds!
(413) 545-3500

HOROSCOPES

aquarius JAN. 20-FEB. 18
Use the word "ergo" to make yourself sound smarter. It's a sure bet.

pisces FEB. 19-MAR. 20
Facebook has stolen your soul, but there is a group you can join to get it back.

aries MAR. 21-APR. 19
Smile...yup, you've got something in your teeth.

taurus APR. 20-MAY 20
Your loyalty to your friends is surpassed only by Sebastian's loyalty to Ariel.

gemini MAY 21-JUN. 21
Today your dreams will come true, you will get a pretty, three legged, pony!

cancer JUN. 22-JUL. 22
There is nothing worse than being likened to egg salad.

leo JUL. 23-AUG. 22
If a squid has a sneaking suspicion, is it called an inkling or would that be weird?

virgo AUG. 23-SEPT. 22
Although moustaches have a tragic reputation, they have many redeeming qualities.

libra SEPT. 23-OCT. 22
If you see a mouse, do not kill it, it might be magical so make it your new little pal.

scorpio OCT. 23-NOV. 21
Refresh yourself by buying a new toothbrush and walking around with it all day.

sagittarius NOV. 22-DEC. 21
Seriously, a pink track suit is absolutely a great idea.

capricorn DEC. 22-JAN. 19
Your boyfriend's love for you overfloweth like smog from an SUV.

Visit The Amherst Brewing Company
mount snow
Promo Wednesday Nights
Win Lift Passes, Equipment & Merchandise.
Join This ABC Bartender at... mount snow
Get more info about our menu and calendar events at amherstbrewing.com

MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN MARKETPLACE

ANNOUNCEMENTS

Global Express Tours Spring Break Montreal Party Weekends from $99 Complete bus, hotels, & clubs. Montrealexpress.net 781-979-9001

APARTMENT FOR RENT

Brandywine Apts. Now Leasing, 1&2 bedroom apts. Leases begin Jun, July, Aug or Sep. First Come First Serve. Get Them while they last. www.brandywineapts.com stop by or call 549-0600

Center of town, 1,2,3 bedrooms hardwood floors. NOW SHOWING for JUNE and SEPTEMBER. NO FEES www.amherstlincolnrealty.com 253-7879

EMPLOYMENT

Attn: Business Marketing Majors Successful Easthampton Company is looking for Marketing Intern to conduct market research, surveys, and work on campaigns. Part Time, Flexible schedule, previous exp. Preferred. $10/hr Contact Staffing Now, Inc. at 413-529-7100 or email resume to jbrown@staffing-now.com

Bartending $300/day potential. No experience necs. Training provided. 1-800-965-6520 ext.162

EMPLOYMENT

Winter/ Spring positions available. Earn up to $150 per day Exp not required. Undercover shoppers needed To Judge Retail and Dining Establishments. Call 800-722-4791

Rent us your ears! Listening Experiments $10/hr English must be your first language. Email: phonetics_lab@linguist.umass.edu voicemail: 545-6837

Dell Campus Reps Needed Promote a top 30 company to gain real-world business & marketing experience! www.repnation.com/dell to apply.

HOUSE FOR RENT

Northampton Cathedral ceiling, sky-lites, hardwood floors, 4-5 bdrms. 9/1 $1950. 413-730-6660

SERVICES

Pregnancy Testing, HIV Testing, Birth Control, and Emergency Contraception. STI Screening and Treatment. Affordable and confidential. Tapestry Health, 27 Pray Street, Amherst. 548-9992. www.tapestryhealth.com

EMPLOYMENT

Call Someone who really cares. Birthright of Amherst Area 549-1906, 1800-550-4900 24 hour hotline Free Pregnancy test 233 N. Pleasant St. Amherst www.birthright.org

TRAVEL

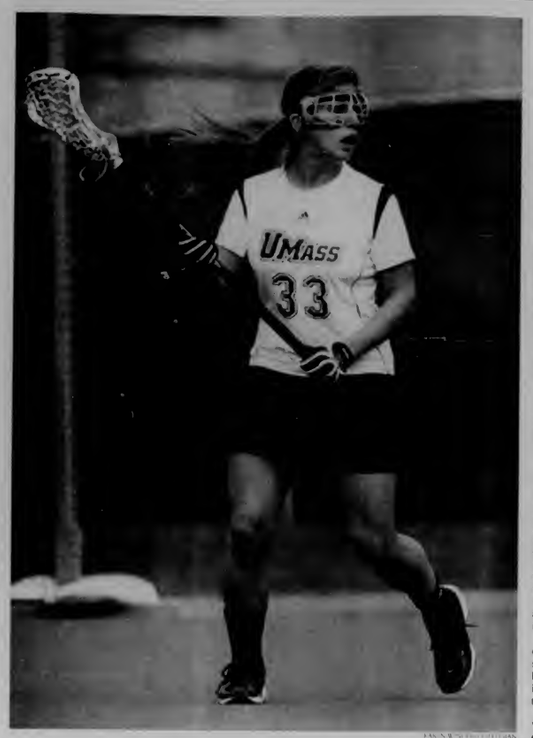
Global Express Tours Spring Break Montreal Party Weekends from $99 Complete bus, hotels, & clubs. Montrealexpress.net 781-979-9001

WANTED

EGG DONORS NEEDED $10,000 (Plus all expenses) We are seeking women who are attractive, under the age of 29, SAT 1300+ (math+verbal), Physically fit and maintaining a healthy lifestyle. If you have a desire to help an infertile family and would like more information please contact us. Email: Darlene@aperfectmatch.com www.aperfectmatch.com 1-800-264-8828

SERVICES

Submit your classified online at www.dailycollegian.com.



There's no question the leader of the Minutewomen's offense in 2006 was Kathleen Typadis. She led UMass with 43 goals, including three in an overtime win over George Washington, and one assist.

UM opens with HC

W. LACROSSE from page 12

McCormick trailed only Typadis when it came to goal production in 2006. As a freshman a year ago, McCormick tallied 31 goals, and along with Typadis, was instrumental in UMass earning a birth in the playoffs, posting a season-high of four goals in the win over the Colonials.

Typadis and her fellow Minutewomen got the year started by taking a preseason trip to the home of Mickey Mouse and Co. in Florida in order to bond as a team and prepare for the upcoming season. However, the 2006 season was far from a fairytale year. UMass posted a 7-11 overall record, but turned it on in A-10 action, finishing with a 4-3 conference record.

The Minutewomen capped off the 2006 regular season by winning four of their last five games before bowing out to the Richmond Spiders in the first round of the A-10 tourney.

Because of UMass' strong finish, it's no doubt that optimism is running high among a team ready to move past the growing pains that inevitably inflict a youth-laden squad. The juniors and seniors who were part of the disappointing 2005 season – in which the Minutewomen failed to advance to the postseason and managed just one conference win – know all too well about the ups and downs that go along with inexperience.

But all the anticipation and optimism surrounding this now seasoned and michorer squad will have to translate that onto the field in order to pick up wins against a tough schedule.

Turning the tables in Wednesday's affair against Holy Cross will prove to be no easy task, as the Crusaders head into this season the defending Patriot League Champions, posting a 14-7 overall record last year. Holy Cross also advanced to its first ever NCAA Tournament, a place UMass hasn't been in over 20 years.

"We're very excited to play against the Patriot League Champions Holy Cross and then the American East Champion [No. 16 Boston University Terriers], so we're more than ready to get this season going," Venechanos said.

After the first of three road trips, UMass opens it's home schedule March 7 against the No. 9 Dartmouth Big Green. That game will be one of four contests against nationally ranked opponents this season for the Minutewomen, including the two-time National Champions and No. 1 team in the nation – the Northwestern Wildcats.

The Big Green had its way with the Maroon and White last season, handing UMass its biggest out-of-conference loss, 16-7, in Hanover, N.H.

After eight out-of-conference matchups, the A-10 schedule for the Minutewomen commences on April 6 on the road against the Temple Owls. The game at Geasey Field in Philadelphia will also conclude UMass' second four-game road trip of the season.

From Philadelphia, UMass hosts the George Washington Colonials in the conference home-opener in what may be one of most important games of the season in determining which team advances to the postseason.

Last season, the Minutewomen defeated the Colonials to earn a spot in the A-10 tourney, 11-10, in a game that many of the Minutewomen cite as their best experience while playing at UMass.

The road to the conference tournament doesn't get any easier for the Maroon and White as it will welcome the defending A-10 Champions and preseason favorite, No. 13 Richmond Spiders, into Amherst on April 15.

Richmond took care of the Minutewomen with ease during the regular season last year, 15-5, and while the Minuteowomen played Richmond to a more competitive game in the postseason, the Spiders dispatched UMass, 15-10, in the postseason.

UMass may be aided by the fact that it will play four of its seven conference games at its new home, McGuirk Alumni Stadium, including the last two tilts of the 2007 campaign versus the St. Joseph's Hawks and La Salle Explorers. The Minutewomen defeated both St. Joe's and La Salle a year ago 10-7 and 16-10, respectively.

But the 2007 season won't be without some key issues needing to be addressed.

Even though Typadis proved stellar when it came to lighting up the scoreboard, the Minutewomen struggled overall landing the ball in the back of the cage. They ranked seventh out of eight teams in scoring, averaging 9.56 goals a game. The Maroon and White also struggled with assists per contest, ranking last in the conference in that category.

Another area of concern for UMass heading into this season will be the goaltending issue. It struggled last season keeping opponents off the scoreboard, surrendering 11.77 goals a contest, which ranked third-worst in the conference.

This season marks the 25th anniversary of UMass' NCAA Championship title under legendary coach Pam Hixon. Come Wednesday, the Minutewomen will finally be able to wave goodbye to the hype, the preseason optimism, the 2006 stats and the anticipation which has been with them since last May.

Kevin Dooley can be reached at kdooley@student.umass.edu.

Inconsistency still plagues Minutemen

Is anyone else's head spinning?

For the past few weeks, the UMass hockey team has been bouncing between the fourth and sixth spots in the Hockey East standings. One week the Minutemen play well enough to reach fourth – the final slot for home-ice advantage in the postseason – then the next they'll have a mediocre couple of games and slump back into sixth.

Once again this weekend, the Minutemen were in prime position to pounce on the fourth spot, but came up short on Saturday night. That was after a brilliant performance on Friday to win at Gutterson Fieldhouse – no small task.

It's almost like clockwork.

By no means did UMass dominate the Catamounts in either game. It blew a two-goal lead on Friday, luckily Chris Capraro was there to save the day late in the third. Then on Saturday, the Minutemen held a slight edge over the Catamounts through the first half of the game, but then dive bombed to finish it.

As soon as they came up short on a five-on-three opportunity, you could tell it just wasn't the Minutemen's night. Sure they peppered Joe Fallon with 32 shots, but none were especially tough. Fallon probably broke a sweat on less than 10 of them.

This inconsistent play couldn't come at a worse time for the Minutemen. There are only two weekends left in the regular season and they currently sit one point out of that critical fourth spot. With two games this weekend it's not unthinkable for UMass to be in that slot come Monday. There's no question UMass coach Don Cahoon has the talent on his bench to be the fourth-best team in the conference, it's just a matter of execution.

Cahoon knows his team has a problem with inconsistent play. He even talked about it directly a couple of weeks ago before UMass lost to BU, 3-2, and tied Providence, 3-3. He told the Daily Collegian that the Minutemen have "found a way a way, in certain games, not to skate at the same level for much of the game."

Jon Pelland

And it isn't just in home-and-away situations like it was in the first half, it's all the time now. One would think the Mass Attack could have carried enough momentum from Friday's game in Burlington to at least put up a fight on Saturday.

But as in any playoff race, the Minutemen must be keeping an eye on the competition, which can't be too encouraging. The team UMass is tied with, Maine, faces a less-than-stellar opponent this weekend in Merrimack as well the Warriors are considered less than stellar to all teams not wearing maroon and white.

On Saturday, Cahoon stressed that a lot could still happen before playoff time rolls around.

"There's still a lot of hockey to be played," he said. "It's too early to predict what's going to happen. Our guys are just trying to take it one game at a time."

But just for fun, let's make some predictions with the upcoming schedule.

Earlier in the season the Black Bears bullied Merrimack for a 4-1 victory at Lawler Arena. This time around they get to take on the Warriors at Alfond – might as well just chalk up four points already.

Vermont and BU should be a good matchup at Aggarin. After seeing the Catamounts firsthand on Saturday, I'm going to say they'll take three points this weekend.

That gives Maine and Vermont season totals of 29 points each. UMass must shake its inconsistent demons in order to keep pace this weekend.

Any other season that could be easy for the Minutemen. But Northeastern isn't the usual conference pushover it has been in recent memory. Huskies coach Greg Cronin has his troops playing well above expectations. Goaltender Brad Thiessan is one reason Northeastern currently holds down seventh spot in the league – just four points behind UMass.

A solid weekend by all means could move the Huskies into a tie the Minutemen.

Jon Pelland is a Collegian columnist. He can be reached at jpelland@student.umass.edu

CHECK OUT MORE SPORTS ACTION AT DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Get 300 free text messages a month for one year.
Sign up for new service and show a valid college ID at the Sprint store. After 12 months, pay the regular monthly fee.

POWER(RED) TO MAKE A STATEMENT.

RED MOTORAZR™ V3m
Motorola and Sprint are collaborating with (PRODUCT)RED to help eliminate AIDS in Africa.
LEARN MORE
This feature-packed phone is the only RED MOTORAZR that lets you download music wirelessly from the Sprint Music Store℠
$59.99
$199.99 2 year price. Plus $50 mail-in rebate with new line activation and 2-year agreement

CALL 1-800-Sprint-1
CLICK sprint.com/powered
GO to the nearest Sprint or Nextel store
Operadores en Español disponibles

Sprint POWER UP

Sprint stores
◆ Hablamos Español
Nextel Store with Sprint products

BROOKLINE 301 Harvard Street 617-277-0600◆
BURLINGTON 91 Middlesex Turnpike 781-221-1447
CAMBRIDGE Cambridgeside Galleria 617-374-9936◆
DANVERS Liberty Tree Mall 978-774-4325
FRAMINGHAM 215 Worcester Road 508-628-0600◆
HINGHAM 92 Derby Street, Ste 127 781-749-7727
HOLYOKE Holyoke Mall 413-534-6074◆
HYANNIS Cape Cod Mall 508-775-3834
KINGSTON Independence Mall 781-585-5637
LAWRENCE 160 Winthrop Ave 978-975-5650◆
LEOMINSTER 14 Commercial Way 978-840-4273
MARLBOROUGH Solomon Pond Mall 508-786-0696◆
MILLBURY Shoppes at Blackstone Valley 508-865-8125◆
NATICK Natick Mall 508-651-2955◆
Natick Mall 508-647-0461
NEWTON 210 Needham St. 617-244-2898
NORTH ATTLEBORO Emerald Square 508-699-3656◆
1400 S. Washington St (Rte 1) 508-695-3451◆
NORTH DARTMOUTH 127 Faunce Corner Road 508-997-6205◆
NORWOOD 1337 Boston Providence Highway (Rte 1) 781-255-5566
PEABODY 232 Andover St. 978-977-7546◆
North Shore Mall 978-532-0250
9 Sylvan Street 978-573-3500◆
SAUGUS Square One Mall 781-233-3302◆
114 Broadway Turnpike Rte 1 N 781-233-7676
SHREWSBURY 196 Boston Turnpike Rd 508-798-3300◆
SWANSEA Swansea Mall 508-675-3647
TAUNTON Silver City Galleria 508-822-5452◆
WEST SPRINGFIELD 1102 Riverdale St. 413-733-8260◆
PREFERRED DEALERS
AUBURN Online Communications 508-832-9886
CHICOPEE Focal Point Communications 413-592-4700◆
FITCHBURG The Cell Phone Store 800 NEXTCALL
HOPEDALE Online Communications 508-473-8805
MARLBOROUGH Online Communications 508-480-0055
MEDWAY Online Communications 508-533-5565
MILFORD Neogen Wireless 508-473-6996◆
SPRINGFIELD Focal Point Communications 413-730-4442◆
TOWNSEND DataInk Communications 978-597-0300
WORCESTER Neogen Wireless Greendale Mall
7 Neponset Street 508-852-3299

Coverage not available everywhere. Available features and services will vary by phone and network. The Nationwide Sprint PCS Network reaches over 250 million people. Voice calling area reaches over 165 million people in the U.S., Puerto Rico, U.S. Virgin Islands and Guam. Offers not available in all markets. Additional terms and restrictions apply. Subject to credit approval. See store or sprint.com for details. Phone Offer: Offer ends 03/31/07 or while supplies last. Requires a new line of service with a new two-year subscriber agreement. Taxes excluded. Service Plan: Up to $36 activation and $200 early termination fees apply per line. Deposit may be required. Instant Savings: Activation at time of purchase required. No cash back. Mail-in Rebate: Requires purchase by 03/31/07 and activation by 04/14/07. Rebates cannot exceed purchase price. Taxes excluded. Line must be active 30 consecutive days. Allow 8 to 12 weeks for rebate. Free Text Messaging: Text message overage is $0.10 per message. To avoid charges, you must contact us prior to the billing end date of the 12th plan month. Risk Free Guarantee: Call us to deactivate and return (to place of purchase) complete, undamaged phone with receipt within 30 days of activation. You are responsible for all charges based on actual usage (partial monthly service charges, taxes, Sprint Fees, etc.). Project RED: Motorola and Sprint will collectively make a $10 contribution on the sale of each RED MOTORAZR V3m phone to the Global Fund to Fight AIDS, Tuberculosis and Malaria. See www.motorola.com/red, JOINRED.com, or www.theglobalfund.org/en for more details. ©2007 Sprint Nextel. All rights reserved. SPRINT, the logo and other trademarks are trademarks of Sprint Nextel. All third-party product or service names are property of their respective owners. All rights reserved.

FOCUS on driving

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

SPORTS WEDNESDAY

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 21, 2007 SPORTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Still much at stake

Minutemen looks for top spot while Bonnies cling to last

BY DANNY PICARD
COLLEGIAN STAFF

St. Bonaventure is tied for the worst overall record in the Atlantic 10, but there is just as much at stake for the Bonnies as there is for the Massachusetts men's basketball team in tonight's game at the Mullins Center.

UMass hosts St. Bonaventure (6-19, 3-9 A-10) in the first of a three-game homestand – the final three games of the season in Amherst – tonight at 7 p.m. The Maroon and White look for its 20th win of the season against the Bonnies. It would mark the first 20-win campaign since 1997-98 when UMass went 21-11.

The Minutemen (19-7, 9-3 A-10) go into the game tied for second place in the conference with Xavier (19-7, 9-3 A-10), half a game behind first-place Rhode Island (17-10, 10-3 A-10). The Musketeers host the Rams tonight as well, making UMass' game against St. Bonaventure even more meaningful.

"This time of year you can't look at your opponents," UMass coach Travis Ford said. "You just have to go out and play as hard as you possibly can and you need to be playing your best basketball.

"[St. Bonaventure] has a lot to play for, as well as we do," he added. "So we just can't overlook this basketball team."

The Bonnies are on a five-game losing skid, and hold the 12th spot (out of 14) in the A-10 standings. That 12th spot, however, is a big one. It is the last seed that makes the cut for the A-10 Tournament in March.

Leading the way for St. Bonaventure is junior forward Michael Lee. He paces the Bonnies in scoring with 13.3 points per game. Senior big man Paul Williams is the team's

See M. BASKETBALL on page 8

MICHAEL PHELPS/COLLEGIAN

Tonight's contest against St. Bonaventure is the first of three games for the Minutemen at the Mullins Center, which are also the final three home games of the season. UMass is 8-2 when playing at home.

Atlantic 10 Swimming and Diving Championships commence

Men must live up to top-seed billing

BY JOE MELONI
COLLEGIAN STAFF

BUFFALO, N.Y. – The Atlantic 10 Swimming and Diving Championships begin here today. For Massachusetts men's swimming coach Russ Yarworth and his team, this year's A-10 finals mean more than championships passed – it's a chance at redemption. Last season, St. Bonaventure defeated the Minutemen, unseating UMass as conference champion for the first time since 2000.

"They're pretty fired up, they have a job to do," Yarworth said, concerning his team. "They know they want to come back here and have another banner to put up. Obviously I think they're pretty nervous, but it's a good nervous. They're confident and ready to go there and swim fast."

The training regimen Yarworth instilled at the beginning of this season demanded his team be in the best physical and mental condition possible to ensure success.

"We're in the pool everyday but basically what we do is cut down the yardage as we approach A-10's," he said. "This last week we're basically just letting them relax and feel good. We did a little fast swimming off the blocks yesterday to keep them loose."

Before the season started, the coaches in the A-10 selected the Minutemen as the favorite to win the conference crown.

UMass' best weapon is its depth. In almost every event, UMass boasts at least one swimmer that could very easily win the race and several others who can finish in the top eight to secure points for the UMass team score.

Defending champion St. Bonaventure and Duquesne appear to be UMass' most worthy opponents.

The depth UMass possesses makes it the rightful favorite. Last year's team wasn't as deep as previous UMass squads had been. A solid crew of freshman and the emergence of a few swimmers solved those problems for the Minutemen.

"Something I really worked on this year was to make sure that we had depth in every event," Yarworth said.

FREESTYLE

In 2006, UMass failed to win a short-distance freestyle event for the first time since 2003. This season, however, the Minutemen's sprinters showed signs that they were ready to breakout and become one of the conference's best groups. UMass could also pull off a win or two in the long-distance freestyle races.

Freshman Juan Mofiere and sophomore Nate Bromage established themselves as two of top 50-yard freestyle swimmers in the conference this season. But Duquesne arrives at the A-10 finals with swimmers who recorded four of the five best times in the event this season.

Senior Mike Herald and junior A.J. Vozella will also compete in the race for UMass and both could score points for

See M. SWIMMING AND DIVING on page 8

Before the season, coaches picked the Minutewomen to finish third at this week's Atlantic 10 Championships behind Richmond and Duquesne. Last year, senior Mary Jenkins finished sixth in the three-meter dive.

Women face steep competition this year

BY MICHAEL KING
COLLEGIAN STAFF

A season's worth of hard work will be evaluated by only four days of competition. Picked to finish third at this year's Atlantic 10 Championships, the Massachusetts women's swimming and diving teams look to improve upon last year's third-place finish and earn their first title since 2001.

However, the league's coaches decided history would repeat itself by picking the Minutewomen to again finish in third place before the season. In fact, the coaches picked the same five teams to finish in the first five spots at this year's event.

Richmond will try to win its sixth straight A-10 title. The Spiders return several of their top swimmers to a team that easily won the 2006 meet by over 250 points. They will be the Maroon and White's toughest competition and are heavily favored to win the title.

St. Bonaventure and Duquesne picked to finish second and fourth, respectively – also have several top swimmers and good overall depth. But the swimmers and divers of each team will have to post their best times of the season if they want to pose a serious challenge to Richmond.

Women's coach Bob Newcomb knows that any of his team's accomplishments this season will mean nothing once the meet begins.

"We're not seeded real well right now, but then again, we never are going into this meet," he said. "It matters what you do when you're there and we've been able to do that the last few years."

Depth is how a team wins a swimming conference championship. Since the top 16 finishers in each event score points, it can be more efficient to finish multiple swimmers in the top 16 than winning events outright.

"To win a championship, you need depth," Newcomb said. "I'm hoping that at least 12 of our 16 swimmers will score points for us."

Ultimately this team competition will be determined by the individual success of the swimmers and divers in their events.

FREESTYLE

The five individual-freestyle events are arguably the team's deepest stroke. The Minutewomen have three swimmers in the top 10 of the best times in the conference in the 50-yard freestyle. Freshman Kathryne Chalikis has the third-best time of 24.38 seconds, which she swam at the Terrier Invitational in November.

"The fifty is a race of perfection," Newcomb said. "In 24 seconds, there's not enough time to make a mistake. You don't have time to make a slow start or have a bad turn. It's a fun race because everything goes so quickly and you have to get up and be excited."

See W. SWIMMING AND DIVING on page 9

Yarworth has depth he lacked in 2006

Joe Meloni

Things looked promising after the third day of the four-day event. The 2005-06 Massachusetts men's swimming and diving teams clung to a four and a half point lead over a surprising team from St. Bonaventure. The small cushion aside, UMass appeared 24 hours away from a sixth-consecutive Atlantic 10 Championship.

With six races scheduled for the tournament's final session, a victory in just one would have effectively clinched another title for coach Russ Yarworth and his side that will never came. And when then-sophomore A.J. Vozella touched that final wall in that final race, St. Bonaventure's celebration was already underway.

Yarworth spoke of complacency and inexperience as possible reasons for the Maroon and White's failure. While those certainly factored into UMass loss, the results showed two other aspects of the Minutemen's performance that contributed to their demise, their sprinters just didn't get the job done and the 2006 version of the Minutemen was not as deep as the teams that won five straight A-10 Championships.

If the Minutemen plan on recapturing the A-10 Championship this season, their sprinters must lead the way.

Collegiate swimming slants heavily in favor of those who excel in short-distance races. It also favors teams that can score points beyond just winning. Although teams must record victories to win, second- and third-place finishes are crucial to a team's aggregate score.

In 2006, the Minutemen failed to capture a short-distance freestyle race for the first time since 2003. The 2006 Minutemen lacked a truly dominant sprinter and suffered the consequences. This year's recruiting class and the progression of swimmers already on the roster solved both of those problems.

Vozella won the 2005 A-10 title in the 100-yard freestyle race, but fell to third in the conference in 2006. The 50-yard freestyle produced equally unremarkable results from the Minutemen; Mike Herald's sixth-place finish was the best in the event for a UMass swimmer. Even in the 200-yard freestyle relay, UMass' team finished behind stronger teams from Duquesne and St. Bonaventure.

This year's version of the

See MELONI on page 9

Venechanos era begins today against HC

Youth, talent have new coach poised for success in Amherst

BY KEVIN DOOLEY
COLLEGIAN STAFF

New coach Alexis Venechanos begins her run at the helm of the Massachusetts women's lacrosse team confident that the platoon of youngsters who helped make the 2006 campaign a turnaround season will be responsible for branding the 2007 season a breakthrough year.

Kaytlin McCormick was the Minutewomen's second-leading scorer as a freshman in 2006. She notched 31 goals and four assists.

The Minutewomen open their long-awaited 2007 season tonight in the first of four straight road tilts, which begins with the Holy Cross Crusaders in Worcester today. UMass dropped last season's contest to the Crusaders, 11-8.

Venechanos, who played her collegiate lacrosse for the perennial-powerhouse Maryland Terrapins, was brought in after three successful years as an assistant for Northwestern. She replaces seven-year head coach Carrie Bolduc.

Venechanos is no stranger to success, which is why she expects her new squad to begin laying the foundation for a return to national prominence. She has been part of four of the last seven NCAA Championship teams either as a player or as a coach and is optimistic that this will be the year the Minutewomen bring home the Atlantic 10 crown for the first time since the 2000 campaign.

"I think our out-of-conference schedule is really tough so those games early on will definitely prepare us for the A-10 Tournament, and anything can happen there when you just need two wins," Venechanos said.

And if you're a UMass women's lacrosse fan, you can't help but like the players and the offensive numbers returning to Amherst this spring.

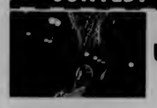
Venechanos inherits a Minutewoman squad returning 17 upperclassmen from a season ago, including three seniors and six juniors. The team also welcomes back 80 percent of its offensive production from 2006.

Only three of the 12 starters were lost from last year and four of the five top goal scorers return to action. Those numbers didn't go unnoticed by the A-10 either. The Minutewomen were predicted to finish the season fourth out of eight schools in the conference.

The UMass faithful will be counting on junior attack standout Kathleen Typadis and sophomore midfielder Kaytlin McCormick to once again be the catalysts for the Minutewomen's offensive production. Typadis registered 43 goals last year, which was the fifth-most in school history and nearly a third of UMass' offensive output all season. Three of those team-leading 43 goals came in the overtime thriller against the George Washington Colonials, which propelled the Minutewomen into the postseason for the seventh time in the last eight seasons.

See W. LACROSSE on page 11

COLLEGIAN CRIBS CONTEST GO TO DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM TO VIEW THE FINALISTS & TO CAST YOUR VOTE FOR THE BEST CRIB OF UMASS COLLEGIAN CRIBS CONTEST



UMASS WINS BIG | PAGE 12

CINEMA HOSTS FILM FESTIVAL | PAGE 6

THE MASSACHUSETTS

DAILY COLLEGIAN

NEW ENGLAND'S LARGEST COLLEGE DAILY EST 1890

SHOWERS : HI: 41 LO: 21 WWW.DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 22, 2007

SGA addresses academic calendar change proposal

BY AMBER VAILLANCOURT
COLLEGIAN STAFF

After being delayed nearly 15 minutes, the University of Massachusetts' Student Government Association's meeting began when the number of senators required for quorum was finally reached, and Speaker Peter Barros initiated the SGA's 1517th regular meeting.

With a full agenda in tote, the 19 senators present got to business. Announcements included PHENOM's Lobby and Convention Day, which was rescheduled to today, due to last week's snow day.

Barros also reported back on a meeting he had with Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs and Campus Life Michael Gargano, calling it "very productive," and "a really good meeting." Barros was told to extend congratulations to the SGA from Gargano on the productive past semester the SGA had, saying he was "very proud of the Senate." During the meeting with Gargano, Barros said the biggest concern that Gargano posed was the prospective new academic calendar.

Barros then urged the Senate to pass a resolution regarding the possible new student calendar. Barros also said that he and Gargano discussed the new Housing Services policy, which states that a student cannot reserve the same room for the next school year as they have been able to in years past.

Byron Bullock, the Associate Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs and Campus Life, was also present and reacted to an executive cabinet report regarding possible renovations to the Student Union.

Bullock explained some possible renovation ideas that had been tossed around, which would be discussed in a meeting on Feb. 22 with

See SGA on page 3

Faculty react to new proposal

Vice Chancellor's calendar change proposal stirs controversy

BY ANNA DOLIANITIS
COLLEGIAN STAFF

A group created on the social networking Web site, Facebook.com, entitled "Gargano's Official Petition for a New Academic Calendar," was intended as a way to gather student reactions to the proposed changes in the academic calendar, but in doing so, the group has also elicited scrutiny from faculty members of the University of Massachusetts.

The group, created early last week at the request of Vice Chancellor of Students Affairs and Campus Life Michael Gargano, outlined the proposed changes to the academic calendar. The current fall semester at UMass begins the day after Labor Day and continues until Dec. 23, and the spring semester begins Jan. 29 and ends May 24.

According to Gargano's update report for the Five Colleges, the proposed semester would begin the Tuesday after Labor Day and end on Dec. 23, and the spring semester would begin around January 15 and run until mid-May.

Gargano cited student and parent concerns as the main motivation for the proposal.

"What started the whole conversation were students and parents expressing to the University that they felt that they were at a disadvantage for summer internships and other employment opportunities, which then created the conversation with the campus at large," said Gargano.

Members of the UMass community, particularly Max Page – president of the Massachusetts Society of Professors (MSP) and Associated Professor of Architecture at UMass – oppose Gargano's push for the changes in schedule, which the administration believes will benefit students.

"I am concerned that the Vice Chancellor has asserted that there is such strong student support," Page said. "Clearly, there is no real study of this. The Facebook poll is clearly coming from a student who believes the change and from Mr. Gargano's office, so that poll is, to me, meaningless."

In a survey conducted by the MSP, 358 (66 percent) of the MSP's 544 members were opposed to the calendar change. One hundred twelve (21 percent) were in favor, 74 were neutral (14 percent) and four did not make a choice, according to Page.

"A 3:1 ratio is very strongly against it," he said. "To me, if any one group felt so strongly, I feel that they should kill it."

The Faculty Senate is conducting a similar poll, but the organization has yet to decide where it stands on the issue, said Page.

Gargano argued that the academic calendar and the late final exam dates interfered with students seeking summer employment and internships.

"Students at competing universities complete the spring semester around May 10 and can start their internship by May 17. This is appealing to the employer," Gargano explained. "Due to our late schedule, UMass Amherst students cannot start until June."

The survey offered an opportunity for members of MSP to assess pros and cons of the new calendar proposal. One of the potential benefits posed was that students would have more access to internships, said Page.

According to Page, MSP members said that students have had no problem placing their students in

See PROPOSAL on page 3

Max Page, president of the Massachusetts Society of Professors.

Top dogs once again

UMass Minutemen soak up the final minutes of their 83-44 blowout victory over the St. Bonaventure Bonnies, last night. The victory launched the team into first place in the Atlantic 10 conference.

College life affects bi-polar disorder

BY JOHN W. COX
INDEPENDENT FLORIDA ALLIGATOR (U FLORIDA)

GAINESVILLE, Fla. – Bipolar disorder and college mix like matches and lighter fluid.

Kevin Stanley, a therapist at the University of Florida Counseling Center, said although bipolar cases are rare at the center, college campuses are breeding grounds for the disease.

Bipolar disorder causes people to experience periods of mania and depression.

Irregular sleep, stress, alcohol and drug use – things common to college life – are prime triggers, he said.

The disease's peak age of onset is between 15 and 25, experts say.

Impulsivity, dramatic mood swings, a decreased need for sleep, weight loss, rampant spending, promiscuity and suicidal thoughts are among the typical symptoms of bipolar disorder.

People with bipolar disorder also have a greater propensity to alcohol, drug and sex addictions.

State prisons criticized for high number of inmate suicides

BY STEVE LEBLANC
ASSOCIATED PRESS

BOSTON – Making cells more "suicide-resistant" and hiring more staff to monitor troubled inmates are among the recommendations in a new study designed to halt an increase in suicides in Massachusetts prisons.

The recommendations – 29 in all – are included in the report commissioned by Department of Corrections Commissioner Kathleen Dennehy. It was released Wednesday along with a plan by the department to respond to each of the recommendations.

"The incidence of suicide in the Department of Corrections was greater than in prior years, and we know that nationally the number of mentally ill entering the prison system is increasing," Dennehy said in a statement accompanying the report.

The study concludes that guards and other staff do not have enough training in suicide prevention; guards fail to check frequently enough on at-risk inmates; some cells where suicidal inmates are held have not been stripped of items they could use to harm themselves. Inmates under suicide watch become more isolated because they are denied visits and phone calls.

The report stressed the need for more and better training.

"The key to any suicide prevention program is properly trained correctional staff," wrote Lindsay M. Hayes, a national specialist in prison suicide prevention and author of the report. "Because suicides are usually attempted in inmate housing units ... these incidents must be thwarted by correctional staff who have been trained in suicide prevention and are able to demonstrate an intuitive sense regarding the inmates in their care."

There were seven state prison inmate deaths ruled to be suicides in 2006, including three in an eight-day period in December. There was one suicide in 2004, and one in 2003. Since 2000, there have been 18 DOC inmate suicides, the report said.

A convicted rapist hanged himself in his cell with an electrical cord at the maximum security Souza-Baranowski prison in Shirley just three weeks ago.

The inmate suicide rate in Massachusetts was 27 percent per 100,000 inmates during the past ten

See INMATES on page 2

A report released yesterday offered suggestions to Massachusetts prisons to stop the increase of inmate suicides.

Fast food chains plan to eliminate use of trans fats

Since the FDA began requiring trans fats listings on food labels in January 2006, food producers have tried to find alternative fat sources.

BY ANN ROSSEEN
ROCKY MOUNTAIN COLLEGIAN (COLORADO STATE U.)

FORT COLLINS, Colo. – Many U.S. fast food chains will eliminate their use of trans fats by the end of the year after being fried by health practitioners and consumer pressure to get rid of the oil.

Since the FDA began requiring trans fats listings on food labels in January 2006, food producers have made a conscious effort to reduce their use of it and to find alternative fat sources.

In 2002, McDonald's pledged to eliminate trans fats from its menu, according to the Center for Science and Public Interest. Although testing is underway, the corporation has not yet switched to healthier oils.

CNNMoney.com reports that more than 1,200 of McDonald's U.S. restaurants have switched to trans fat-free frying oil.

A meal consisting of McDonald's Chicken Selects Premium Breast Strips and an order of large fries contains 12 grams of trans fats. This amount is more than a person should eat in six days, according to the Center for Science in the Public Interest (CSPI).

Partially hydrogenated vegetable oil, which contains trans-fatty acids, was created in the 1900s. It was meant to serve as a replacement for natural fats, including butter and lard. The synthetic fat was believed to have several benefits compared to its cousin, saturated fat.

"The chemical process in the body turns trans fat from a liquid to a solid," Dawn Clifford, a dietitian at Colorado State University's Hartshorn Health Services, said. "Trans fats may increase the risk of some cancers. That is why we are so adamant about getting it out of America's diet."

See FOOD on page 2

Israeli travelers learn yoga during bus ride

Stressed-out commuters got a peaceful surprise as they boarded an Israeli bus on Tuesday: a yoga instructor with a microphone coaching them how to breathe correctly.

The passengers stretched their hands toward the ceiling and bent their heads forward as Miri Harovi, a 21-year veteran yoga teacher, guided them through a set of exercises that can be performed while sitting down.

"I think that because of our history of terror on buses," Harovi said, referring to past suicide attacks that have targeted crowded buses. "It's very important to do yoga to relax and to show everyone that life is stronger than the fear."

Harovi said the idea of for a yoga bus came to her in the middle of the night while she was sleeping. She talked to the Tel Aviv bus company and they jumped on the idea.

Associated Press

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian
CXVII
issue 88

113 Campus Center University of Massachusetts Amherst, MA 01003
• 413-545-3500 •
• Fax 413-545-3699 •
www.dailycollegian.com

Editor in Chief Eric Athas
Managing Editor Rob Greenfield
Business Manager Dan Conti
Production Manager Amanda Allen
Night Supervisor Sherel Wolnik
Advertising Manager Jaimeson Porter
Advertising Production Molly Eggleston
Arts & Living Editor Morgan Rousseau
Comics Editor Adam Stagin
Editorial Editor Tucker Merrick
News Editor Matt Bellveau
Sports Editor Daniel A. Picard
Sports Editor Joseph Pelland
Circulation Manager Jeff Perez
Finance Manager David Valade
Assistant Operations Linda Wallack
Assistant Advertising Nicole Puddester
Asst. Arts & Living Tim McCall
Asst. Arts & Living Sydney Towne
Assistant News Anna Dolianitis
Assistant News Nicole Boonjakuakul
Assistant Sports Jeremy Rice
Assistant Editorial Brendan Hall
Web Editor James Hale
Photo Editor Toan Trinh

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian is published Monday through Friday during the University of Massachusetts' calendar semester. The Collegian is independently funded, operating on advertising revenue. Founded in 1890, the paper began as Aggie Life, became the College Signal in 1901, the Weekly Collegian in 1914 and the Tri-Weekly Collegian in 1956. Published daily since 1967, The Collegian has been broadsheet since January 1994. For advertising rates and information, call weekdays between 8:30 A.M. and 3:30 P.M.

Production Crew
On staff today

NIGHT EDITOR
Matt Bellveau

COPY EDITOR
Nicole Boonjakuakul

PRODUCTION SUPERVISOR
Chris Martin

www.DAILYCOLLEGIAN.com

Lawmakers consider proposing anti-trans fat laws for schools

FOOD from page 1

Trans fats have been proven to raise low-density lipoprotein, or "bad" cholesterol. Partially hydrogenated vegetable oil was originally used because it was "cheaper, performed better under high heat and had a longer shelf life," according to MSNBC.

Realizing its harmful effects, New York City has established a ban on artificial trans fats used for cooking. The law will take effect July 1 of this year.

Lawmakers from nearly a dozen states, including Florida, are choosing sides in the trans fats debate and are proposing bills to ban or limit the use of artificial fats in school cafeterias as well as restaurants, according to the Rocky Mountain News. A national plan may go into effect as early as 2008.

Besides possibly causing cancer, trans fats increase the risk of coronary heart disease. This silent killer causes the hardening of arteries and its effects can be seen even in children, Clifford said.

"There is no certain recommendation for trans fats. Right now, we are recommending zero grams," Clifford said. "You should limit your intake amount. Having fast food once a month is not going to kill you or cause heart disease. Other places where trans fats tend to hang out are in baked goods, cookies, crackers and frozen entrees."

When eating fast food, Clifford recommends ordering smaller portions and having something healthy, such as a vegetable salad with light dressing to balance out the rest of the meal.

Restaurants are starting to follow suit, Clifford said.

Wendy's International Inc. has already started cooking with oils that are free of trans fats. KFC and Taco Bell, both owned by Yum Brand Inc., have announced they plan to do the same. Burger King Holdings Inc. and Starbucks Corp. are planning on implementing changes as well.

Good Times Restaurants Inc., a Colorado-based company, was one of the first restaurants to join Wendy's in the campaign against trans fats. The process to change to healthier cooking oils began in 2006. Good Times' decision was based on consumer input, said Nick Biegel, Good Times' director of purchasing.

"We decided to switch to cooking oil without trans fat because it was the right thing to do," Biegel said. "A lot of other players out there haven't made the conversion. Good Times is a 50-unit chain and we were able to move more quickly. We made sure the quality and taste of our food was not affected by the change. Consumers cannot tell the difference between trans fat and canola cooking oil."

Record companies target colleges

By Ted Bridis
Associated Press

WASHINGTON – College students who faced lawsuits for illegally sharing large music collections over campus computer networks increasingly risk being unplugged from the Internet or even suspended over lesser complaints by the recording industry.

In a nationwide crackdown, the music industry is sending thousands more copyright complaints to universities this school year than last. In some cases, students are targeted for allegedly sharing a single mp3 file online.

A few schools – Ohio University and Purdue University are at the top of the list – already have received more than 1,000 complaints accusing individual students since last fall. For students who are caught, punishments can vary from e-mail warnings to semester-long suspensions from classes.

Ohio University said students caught twice sharing music online would face the same disciplinary sanctions as classmates accused of violence or cheating: suspension, probation or an assignment to write a homework paper on the subject. Ohio said no student ever has been caught twice.

In a nationwide crackdown, the music industry is sending thousands more copyright complaints to universities this school year than last.

"When they told me I freaked," said Ryan Real of Louisville, an Ohio University sophomore who was accused in November of illegally sharing not music but a popular video game, "Grand Theft Auto," over the school's network. Real said he was ordered to delete the game and the Bittorrent file-sharing software he was using from his computer before the school would turn his Internet connection back on.

"Everybody does it," Real said. "The odds that you are going to get caught, it's not something you think about." Classmates who also have been caught "still download illegally," Real said.

At the request of The Associated Press, the trade group for the largest music labels, the Recording Industry

See RECORDS on page 3

Amherst Police log

Washing machine causes house fire

Monday
February 20, 2007

9:23 a.m.

A 1999 Dodge Caravan parked in a space outside of a Puffton Village residence was backed into another vehicle at some point during the night. The left front corner of the struck car was damaged; there are no suspects.

12:40 p.m.

A Cadillac Deville collided with a Toyota 4-Runner at an intersection on North Pleasant Street. Both vehicles had minor damage, but no injuries were reported.

1:17 p.m.

The driver of a 1997 Toyota Corolla hit the open left door of a parked Chevrolet on Main Street, damaging both the left side of the Chevrolet and the left front corner of the Corolla. The driver claimed she did not see the open door.

4:56 p.m.

A man reported a larceny, claiming that several DVDs were stolen from his house on Taylor Street after he hosted a party. The man supposedly knows the suspect, who will be reporting to the Hadley district court soon.

5:11 p.m.

David R. LaBronce of Puffton Village reported missing property, saying that he lost his wallet at either the Monkey Bar on North Pleasant Street or in Puffton Village. He has cancelled his credit cards and American Express has refunded his losses.

11:35 p.m.

The motor of a washing machine at Clark House on Lessey Street caught fire. Smoke was cleared from the building, and the residents re-entered safely.

Report offers tips to curb prisoner suicide years, nearly twice the national rate of 14 per 100,000 during the same time period, according to the report.

INMATES from page 1

Other recommendations in the report include: more "out of cell" time for inmates; 15 minute security rounds on inpatient health services units; clinical judgment regarding placement and length of stay on suicide watch; and a ban on inmates on suicide watch from covering their heads with bedding.

"Confining a suicidal inmate to their cell for 24 hours a day only enhances isolation and is anti-therapeutic," wrote Hayes.

The report also recommends that all inmates discharged from suicide watch remain on mental health caseloads and receive regular follow-up visits and assessments.

The report, based on documents, prison visits, and interviews with staff over several months, includes details about two recent suicides when inmates were hanging for more than 30 minutes before they were discovered, even though prisoners on suicide watch are supposed to be checked at least every 30 minutes.

The report found that in two cases, inmates were taken from their cells before cardiopulmonary resuscitation was performed, and two cases in which nurses struggled to find equipment to attempt resuscitation.

Taglit-birthright israel provides the gift of free, ten-day educational trips to Israel for Jewish young adults 18 to 26. Register now for Summer trips at www.birthrightisrael.com

TAGLIT · תגלית
birthright israel
www.birthrightisrael.com

New SGA Senators sworn in at meeting

SGA from page 1

Vice Chancellor Gargano, as well as Joyce Hatch, the Vice Chancellor for Administration & Finance. The ideas included gutting the current convenience store and creating a coffee bar with a stage for comedians, poetry readings, and other performances that Registered Student Organizations plan.

Senators posed questions to Bullock about displaced RSOs during the renovations as well as the involvement of students in the planning process. When Barros asked how the students were involved in the planning process thus far, Bullock shot back with, "One of the things that you all have got to understand is that the number of students that we have access to is probably far greater on a daily basis than you do…Nobody is trying to leave you out of the conversation.

"We are trying to claim the space for you all, every time we do renovations someone will be displaced," Bullock said. "Everything we do is for you. We do not gain anything out of it. What we gain out of it is regaining the common space that is effective for your use and we will create a space that is representative of what you deserve as students of this campus, and right now, you do not have that."

The SGA also approved a $2,800 loan to Casa Dominicana "from the Financial Reserves to be paid back after they collect their profits from the event," as stated in motion 2007-S6. Representatives from Casa Dominicana were present to explain that the loan was going to be used mainly to pay the band performing at their 14th annual Dominican Independence Night, which is one of the most popular events that the group puts on.

Several vacant Senator positions were also filled during the meeting. Sophomore Jacob Gordon was approved unanimously by the SGA to a vacant Central Area Senator seat, and junior Alex Peterkin was approved unanimously to a vacant Commuter Senator position. Both Senators were sworn into office at the end of the meeting.

MSP president refutes claims in Gargano proposal competitive internships in the past.

PROPOSAL from page 1

"Obviously it's not just faculty that should have a say," said Page. "But the union feels that this would have a substantial change to our working conditions, so we feel like we have a say in it. But our goal is to have the Chancellor really feel how strongly the faculty and staff feel, and to really study the issue instead of just going forward with it, because that's what he seems to be doing."

According to Gargano, several steps are required in order to approve the change. The Calendar Sub-Committee of the Academic Matters Council of the Faculty Senate would have to review the proposal, which would then be submitted for review by the full Faculty Senate, the Provost, the Vice Chancellor for Students Affairs, the Deans, and Chancellor John V. Lombardi.

"This so-called 'process' for making the decision is non-existent," said Page. "The [Vice] Chancellor has made his decision to change the calendar and he is simply going through the motions of getting input."

Gargano holds that this conversation has been taking place for over a year.

"This hasn't just surfaced," Gargano said. "My responsibility was to solicit the students' opinions – the decision rests with the Provost."

The University expects to make a decision on the matter this spring, begin planning for the change next year, and put the new academic calendar into effect for the 2008-09 academic year, according to Gargano's update report.

Anna Doliunitis can be reached at adoliani@student.umass.edu.

Universities take steps to end piracy

RECORDS from page 2

Association of America, identified the 25 universities to which it has sent the most copyright complaints so far this school year.

The group, which has long pressured schools to act more aggressively, said software tools are improving to trace illegal file-sharing on campuses.

"We are taking advantage of that technology to make universities aware of the problem on their campuses," said RIAA President Cary Sherman. "They need to be sending a message to their students about how to live a lawful life."

The top five schools are Ohio, Purdue, the University of Nebraska-Lincoln, University of Tennessee and the University of South Carolina. The RIAA complained about almost 15,000 students at the 25 universities, nearly triple the number for the previous school year.

"They're trying to make a statement," said Randall Hall, who polices computers at Michigan State University, seventh on the list with 753 complaints. Michigan State received 432 such complaints in December alone, when students attended classes for only half the month.

Hall meets personally with students caught twice and forces them to watch an eight-minute anti-piracy DVD produced by the RIAA. A third-time offender can be suspended for a semester; at least one student was targeted with three strikes so far this year.

"I get the whole spectrum of excuses," Hall said. "The most common answer I get is, 'All my friends are doing this. Why did I get caught?'"

The University of Tennessee requires second-time offenders to carry computers to a technology lab where popular music-sharing programs are deleted before Internet connections are restored. A student subjected to a third complaint – which typically happens once each year – faces punishment that ranges from a formal reprimand to suspension.

Advocacy group fights to ban use of contraceptives

By Kathleen Fitzgerald
The Daily Vidette (Illinois State U.)

NORMAL, Ill. – Third-generation oral contraceptives, those containing desogestrel, cause a greater risk of deadly blood clots, according to an advocacy group in Washington, D.C., who is pushing to ban the drugs.

Sidney Wolfe, M.D., director of the Public Citizen Health Research Group, said third-generation contraceptives have no benefit and double a woman's risk of venous thrombosis – potentially deadly blot clots that typically occur in the lower extremities, but can occur in the abdomen, veins of the brain, upper extremities and in superficial veins of the extremities.

Wolfe, whose research group sent a petition to the FDA Feb. 6, said even the first studies completed in the early 1990s confirmed that third-generation pills increased the risk, but nothing has been done.

"There's no explanation for doctors giving out these preveriptions," he said, adding that doctors know of the increased risk, but continue to prescribe.

Heather Dudley, D.O., of Associates in Obstetrics and Gynecology broke down the risk factor

A healthy woman not taking birth control has a four out of 100,000 chance of getting a blood clot. A low-dose contraceptive, one with 35 micrograms of estrogen or less, increases her risk to 10-15 out of 100,000. When a woman becomes pregnant, her risk increases to 60 out of 100,000.

Women who smoke or who have blood clotting in their family history have an increased risk as well.

Any woman about to go on birth control should check with their family first to see if they have a strong history of blood clotting, Dudley said.

"I typically ask [patients] if they have a risk of blood clotting in their family," Dudley said.

Dudley said blood clots usually form in the legs and most people will notice a clot if they have swelling or pain in the leg. Clots can also form in the lungs and one sign of this is shortness of breath.

According to research done by Public Citizen, third generation contraceptives increase a woman's risk of venous thrombosis from 15 out of 100,000 to 30 out of 100,000.

"I don't think doctors want to hurt their patients so they must have rationalized it somehow," he said of prescribing the third-generation pills.

"Doctors receive pressure from drug retail companies and they get into their habits," he said.

Wolfe said the Health Research Group at Public Citizen spends most of their time monitoring prescription drugs.

"We've had calls and e-mails from women who have almost died from venous thrombosis," he said.

Kerri Matthews, senior finance, insurance and law major, said she would ask her doctor before taking a third-generation pill.

"I probably would not take the pill if there were a higher chance of blood clotting. That just scares me and I don't think I would take that risk," Matthews said.

Freshman nursing major, Kaylee Babcock said she feels her doctor is well informed and makes decisions based on the best interest of her patients.

"For this reason, I would trust my doctor enough to make me aware of the new issues on contraceptives and to help me make an informed decision on whether to take it or not," Babcock said.

Rhode Island to recognize Massachusetts' gay marriages

By Ray Henry
Associated Press

PROVIDENCE, R.I. – The state of Rhode Island should recognize the gay marriages of state employees performed in Massachusetts and extend the same benefits, Attorney General Patrick Lynch said in an advisory opinion.

"Rhode Island will recognize same sex marriages lawfully performed in Massachusetts as marriages in Rhode Island," Lynch said in an opinion requested by the state Board of Governors for Higher Education and released Wednesday.

He said Rhode Island prohibits discrimination based on sexual orientation and also extends benefits such as health insurance to domestic partners of state employees. He said that with the absence of a law banning gay marriage, there's no strong reason to deny recognition to gay marriages performed in Massachusetts, the only state where such unions are legal.

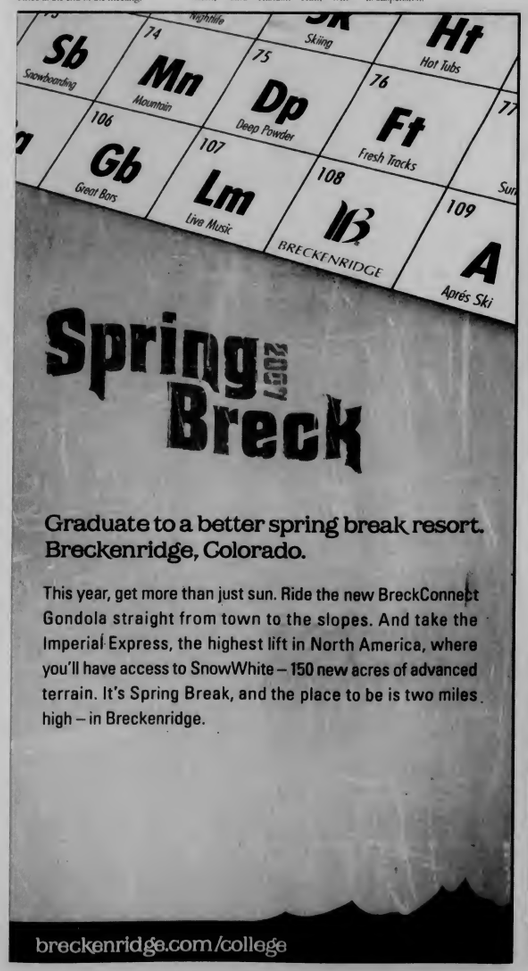
Lynch said the decision was not binding and the Board of Governors could disregard it.

"It's essentially guidance. It's my interpretation of the law," he said, adding that this was a new legal area and there is uncertainty about how to handle it.

But Michele Granda, a staff attorney for Gay & Lesbian Advocates & Defenders, said she expected most government agencies in Rhode Island to heed the legal advice of the state's top lawyer.

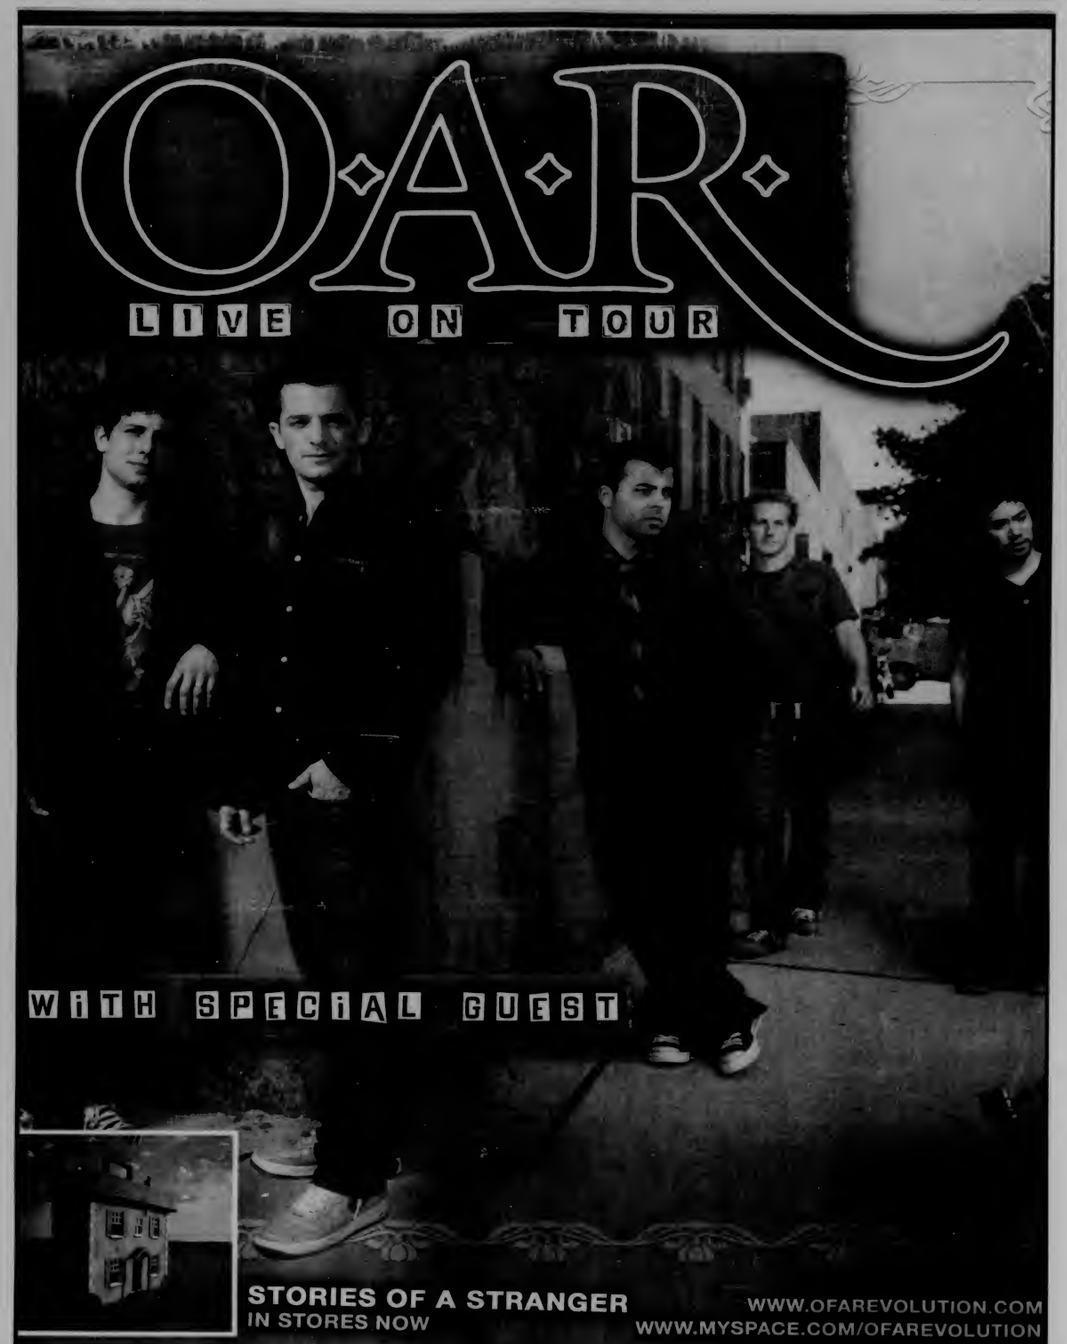
In the letter, Lynch said the Board of Governors asked whether it should recognize the unions of same-sex employees married in Massachusetts. A spokesman for the board did not immediately comment, and it was unclear what effect Lynch's opinion would have on the board's employees or other state agencies.

Rhode Island law does not allow or bar same-sex unions, and several legislative attempts to explicitly ban or legalize gay marriage have failed in recent years. A Massachusetts Superior Court justice decided last fall that Rhode Islanders are allowed to marry there, where the first same-sex marriages were performed in 2004.



Sb
Snowboarding
Mn
Mountain
Dp
Deep Powder
Ft
Fresh Tracks
Ht
Hot Tubs
Gb
Great Bars
Lm
Live Music
B
BRECKENRIDGE
A
Après Ski
Spring Break 2007
Graduate to a better spring break resort.
Breckenridge, Colorado.
This year, get more than just sun. Ride the new BreckConnect Gondola straight from town to the slopes. And take the Imperial Express, the highest lift in North America, where you'll have access to SnowWhite – 150 new acres of advanced terrain. It's Spring Break, and the place to be is two miles high – in Breckenridge.
breckenridge.com/college

Guest Chef Series
JOANNE WEIR
Meet Joanne Weir
award-winning author, cooking teacher, chef, and television personality at Berkshire Dining Commons.
Joanne is One of Our Own.... a UMass Alumni.
Joanne will showcase
Healthy Italian & Mediterranean Cuisine
at Berkshire DC
DINING SERVICES
Thursday, February 22 from 5 to 9 pm.
www.umass.edu/diningservices



SAT. APRIL 14 8PM

SALE

MULLINS CENTER
University of Massachusetts Amherst

Tickets on sale at the Mullins Center Box Office, online at ticketmaster.com, by phone at (413) 733-2500 or at all ticketmaster outlets.
For additional information call the Mullins Center at (413) 545-0505. Presented by Massconcerts • www.massconcerts.com

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

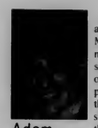
EDITORIAL OPINION

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 22, 2007

"I may not agree with what you say but I will defend to the death your right to say it" Voltaire

EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Your basic ripoff



Adam McGillen

In the world of "truthiness" and hybrid comedy news, Rupert Murdoch has finally inserted his manipulative hand. Jon Stewart started it all with The Daily Show on Comedy Central; Stephen Colbert perfected it with his satirical show that mimics the talking-head atmosphere of the O'Reilly Factor. Now, the biggest name in media just could not resist the opportunity to join in the fun.

The Half-Hour News Hour, with cheesy laugh-track and cheap, awkward comedians, arrived on the scene this past week. The entertainment network of Fox knows something of comedy; the network has had great success with the Simpsons and Family Guy, but this attempt to steal audiences away from The Daily Show and the Colbert Report with a new show on Fox News fell short – way short.

Not even a chuckle escaped as I watched the show for the first time. It had some feeling of Saturday Night Live's old stand-by, "Weekend Update," but without the legitimate comedians and genuine laughter coming from the studio audience. Every joke fell flat or seemed forced. It was blatantly obvious that the show was just another feeding tube for right-wingers to nurture their conservative ideals.

News Corp., owned by Rupert Murdoch, specifically Fox News, has made a killing by playing to conservative ears and using deceptive slogans. Anything but "Fair and Balanced", you'll almost never see one liberal on Fox News without a hefty complement of two or more frequently better looking conservatives to counter any and every argument Murdoch will do anything to sell his product, even bringing an anchor over from Naked News to speak the news to Americans.

My main problem with this ridiculous new show is not that it is just plain not funny, but that a "news station" should stick to the news. The Daily Show and the Colbert Report appear on Comedy Central, a station designed to deliver laughs to its audience. Fox News, regardless of how absurd and tilted the station is, hails itself to be home to all the important information you need to survive, to make "fair and balanced" decisions, and of course, to get Bush in office for a third term.

Stewart makes fun of the media in general; Fox is just an easy target because they are so steeped in the tradition of tabloid news while claiming to be legitimate. Watching the Daily Show, you can frequently catch Stewart picking on Hillary Clinton, a leading liberal in the race for the 2008 presidential election. Sure, both Stewart and Colbert are clearly liberal voices, but their comedy is fair and balanced in the sense that it does not discriminate between the parties – in the world of politics everyone is up to be derided.

Thankfully, I am positive this despicable attempt by Fox to counter Jon Stewart and Stephen Colbert will not last long.

One skit on the Half-Hour News Hour featured Democrat and presidential hopeful, Senator Barack Obama. The anchorman explains that he gets all of his information on Obama from "HO Magazine", the title standing for the Senator's name while making a childish accusation that the man has body odor.

The only joke I gave the slightest smile to was on the cover of the magazine. In the bottom right corner, a headline read: "Should We Even Hold the 2008 Election?" Of course, I was not smiling because the writing, or the nonexistent wit, was somehow funny. No, I smiled because I had heard something similar before coming from Sean Hannity – the Republican half of Fox News' Hannity & Colmes. In the days leading up to the 2004 presidential election, Hannity would frequently send off viewers at the end of the show with a countdown – not counting until Election Day, but until the day President Bush would win. "We Report, You Decide" became more of a "We Decide, You Watch."

Thankfully, I am positive this despicable attempt by Fox to counter Stewart and Colbert will not last long. It seems bound for cancellation with its shabby humor and lack of any real talent.

Rupert should leave the comedy to the professionals. He has done enough damage to legitimate media already, and there is no need to harm the world of satire.

Journalism today is under attack. "Truthiness" was named word of the year for 2006 because of the great truth of our times that exists within that word. Finding real, tangible truths is such a challenge today because our media is so unreliable. Fox News is leading the way, innovating for a specific audience rather than for the good of the people.

Until there is actually news in their news and comedy in their comedy, I would not recommend turning to Fox News for either.

Adam McGillen can be reached at amcgillen@student.umass.edu.

The title seems original, but is the rest of this new Fox News show just an unfunny joke?

From classroom to courtroom

S.P. Sullivan

Like a lot of little kids, I used to fake sick in grammar school because I thought my teachers hated me and treated me worse than the other students. Had I only known then that I could've taken legal action, I might have avoided the whole process of blow-drying my forehead to give the illusion of a fever. Alas, hindsight is always 20/20.

A UMass student recently showed his classmates that their grade doesn't have to be left in the hands of their professors. Brian Marquis, a para-legal and legal studies and sociology major at UMass is trying to prove that the US legal system, with its broadly interpretable statutes, can even help get that A- so maliciously refused by professors and TA's with cruel intentions.

Cruel intentions?

Well, they have to be pretty cruel to commit intentional affliction of emotional distress, as he has alleged. Marquis is charging a literal laundry list of 15 counts of violations of civil statutes, state laws and US codes. Among them are violations of First, Fifth and Fourteenth amendment rights, Breach of contract, and promissory estoppel.

To commit promissory estoppel – one of the more interesting of charges – is to commit an act that is contrary to what the law has determined to be what they have represented as true. Here's the question, if Marquis receives a C for his grade of 84 (91, he claims) because of a class curve, can he claim that his professor is committing promissory estoppel by recording his grade as something other than is normally expected to be a B? Basically, should a number correspond to a letter grade, by law? It might seem a bit implausible, but if he can prove that to be the case perhaps Marquis can have the grade officially changed and his case won.

Despite this interesting charge, not all of them possess the same legitimacy. According to law, once the initial filing costs of a suit have been fulfilled, one can feel free to tack on as many counts of whatever they think sounds fancy. No point in putting all your eggs in one basket, a plaintiff can charge the defendant with anything even remotely relevant to the case. So while the charges of promissory estoppel and breech of contract and special relationship raise interesting questions about the legal responsibility of teachers, his charges of tortious interference with economic advantage and conspiracy to interfere with civil rights seem a little far-fetched.

A larger question Marquis has raised is a bit more loaded: Should college students bring the law into play when they receive grades they find unfair? One would certainly hope so in extreme cases – cases that involve loss of credits or malicious intent – but Marquis' story doesn't involve any deranged professors, just a tough grading curve. At most, there should be a look into the issue of whether the curve which Marquis and his classmates were graded on was fair or not. In the end, there was no conspiracy, intentional infliction, or tortious interference; Marquis encountered what college students everywhere have experienced: a tough class, a strict professor and a curve that just plain sucks.

With the United States legal system finding itself involved more and more in matters it wouldn't be caught dead in court years before, it's no surprise that a student is taking legal action against a university. But the flair with which Marquis is leading his crusade for an A (which on paper is a B before the curve) could lead to a trend in student-university litigation.

Should college students bring the law into play when they receive grades they find unfair?

Are you unhappy with that grade you got in that class you only took for the gened requirement anyway? Do you think being marked absent for the third discussion in a row that you slept through could be legally construed as a violation of the Americans with Disabilities Act? Perhaps you should seek representation.

Marquis also requested a class action certificate, so that he and two other students Marquis claims were cheated can file suit together. However, class action suits typically involve large groups of people, such as a small community, or members of an ethnic or religious group. Three dissatisfied students make for a pretty rag-tag class action suit. The other two students have also yet to come forward; it seems they've taken the traditional route of sucking it up and trying harder next time.

Brian Marquis is suing UMass on 15 different counts – over a grade.

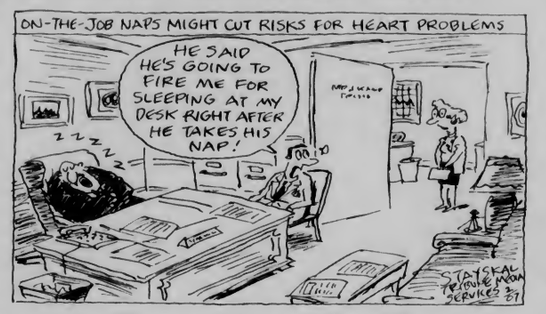
Our courts are so tied up in cases of burnt-crotched fast food patrons, and recently unemployed internet addicts that Marquis' pentadeca-faceted accusation comes off like just another bizarre case to shrug off. However, it is dangerous to allow court intervention with professors' grading systems. Grades are by nature subjective and if forced to adhere strict state or federal guidelines, professors may find themselves unable to teach their courses as they see fit.

Large universities are tied up in enough red tape as it is; professors can't even post ID-number-coded grade sheets on a lecture room wall without written consent. But if this student lawsuit business becomes a trend, I wouldn't be surprised if the next poor sap called upon in your cafe lecture says something to the effect of: "Sorry, professor, I don't answer in-class questions without my attorney present."

S.P. Sullivan can be reached at spsull@student.umass.edu.



ON-THE-JOB NAPS MIGHT CUT RISKS FOR HEART PROBLEMS
HE SAID HE'S GOING TO FIRE ME FOR SLEEPING AT MY DESK RIGHT AFTER HE TAKES HIS NAP!
Z Z Z
STAYSEAL TROUBLE MOON SERVICES

Our turn to decide?

Kaitlyn Silva

It seems whenever there is trouble at UMass, there's always one man to blame. Students have had plenty of reason to criticize Vice Chancellor Mike Gargano for some of his previous proposals. Dogs in the halls and searching backpacks haven't been popular, but this time is different, and we'll need to give credit where credit is due.

Gargano has proposed a change in the academic calendar that will put the University of Massachusetts on the same timeline as most other colleges in New England. Some students might disagree for more personal reasons, but maybe a change in the calendar would be exactly what the students need to stay on top of their own schedule.

In this proposal, the fall semester would begin just after Labor Day as usual, but it would end closer to December 20. Many universities start during their fall semester during the last weeks of August while UMass students are still sitting at home. Even if Gargano had adopted the idea of an August start, would students really disagree? Friends from back home are usually gone around the same time, so it's not as if they would be missing anything. Keeping the start date after Labor Day might even be considered gracious on the part of the administration.

It would give us a few more days to relax during the hectic Christmas season without sacrificing our summer.

The end date may not seem like a huge difference for our current winter release date, December 23, but it would give us a few more days to relax during the hectic Christmas season without sacrificing our summer. The most wonderful time of the year also seems to be the most stressful time. There's nothing quite like taking an exam two days before Christmas Eve while you're still trying to figure out who you're buying gifts for. Who wouldn't gladly get out a few days earlier in order to deter some stress?

The main issue of this proposal seems to be winter break. Gargano would like to start our spring semester about a week and a half earlier than usual, starting around January 15. While this is consistent with most other colleges in the area, it poses as an inconvenience to some students. Students who work over the winter break will have less time to earn money and rid themselves of any debt they may have acquired during the holiday season. There's less precious time to spend with friends and family who live in our hometowns. Some of us are just used to the long vacation. We would have to learn to adapt to the changes, but it shouldn't be too hard to manage. It would mean an earlier summer vacation, after all.

Many are concerned that a shorter winter vacation would eliminate the winter session. This would definitely be a downside for students who need to or would just prefer to catch up on their requirements during the winter session. However, nobody has confirmed whether or not winter session will go out the window. It's quite possible for the University to begin winter session earlier or simply implement a shorter winter session. These classes may not be as easy or effective as in longer sessions, but then again, not all fall and spring semester classes are easy or effective either. Luckily, the two summer sessions would not be greatly effected by the change.

Overall, there seem to be few objections to finishing off the spring semester a little early. There will be more weeks to relax and have fun at home during the month of May. If there's anything more disgruntling than taking exams, it is taking exams knowing your friends are hanging out back home without a care in the world.

Perhaps most importantly, the change may save us from getting screwed out of summer jobs and internships in our hometown due to our late return date. While you may not have experienced this personally, it's fairly easy to understand. You're taking finals when everyone else is training for their job. What's the sense in hiring someone who will start late, when another will be fine to get to work on day one? Unless you're somehow connected to someone working within the organization that can get you through the door, this situation is likely to have an unfavorable outcome.

Changes are always happening around campus and we, the students, are often not given the opportunity to express our opinions on these changes, such as New Dirt and new policies. We are only supposed to adapt to them. Though this is the Vice Chancellor's proposal, it's about what we would like our academic calendar to be, and our feedback is actually being considered. Let's get our opinions out there, whether they are for or against the proposal, so that the administration can create a more efficient academic calendar. It's time to make our changes.

Kaitlyn Silva can be reached at ksilva@student.umass.edu.

Things worth waiting for

This past Valentine's Day, while sitting in the dining commons, I overheard a chatter of girls talking about what they received for the holiday. People on my floor in my dorm were trying to sell poems to make money for charities; people sent out 'gifts' on Facebook. Our culture, if not obsessed with food, or buying things, is completely immersed by this idea of love. My friend – we'll call her Cecilia – is no different. Her boyfriend – we'll call him Daniel – spent his week's paycheck and bought her concert tickets.

Haley Navarro

When Cecilia started dating Daniel, everybody knew it was a smart match. They both like late-eighties punk, reading Sartre and having the same "down-with-the-man-I-don't-give-a-s" type of attitude. They get together on free nights, and they record awkward noises and moan as vocals and call it music. It's a punk thing – I'm never going to get it. When not with Daniel, Cecilia tells me how much fun she has with him. "We went out to see a movie, and then we played guitar together and talked about death, and I love him so much!"

I can't really grasp how talking about dying constitutes as a good reason to love somebody. I'm sure there's more to it, but I also have to take into consideration that since I'm not in love, I won't "get" it. Really though, how is spending a week's paycheck proof of how much you love somebody?

These are the kind of instances Hallmark makes its money on. Not only Hallmark, but jewelers, clothing companies, things of that nature also profit off this concept of love. Anniversaries are expected to come with gifts. It seems materialism is a big part of being in a relationship – even so with my punk friends. For her birthday, Daniel handed Cecilia an XXL Jersey tee shirt with the word "Nausea" barely legible over an unidentifiable graphic. Although the shirt, which he didn't even gift-wrap or make into any sort of surprise and probably cost Daniel a mere ten dollars, Cecilia still regarded the gift as one of the best she's ever received. And it was all because of the thought that Daniel put into choosing this specific band shirt. Of course, she did what any street punk would've done in that situation – altered the shirt to fit her small stature by sewing it with dental floss.

Of course, she did what any street punk would've done in that situation – altered the shirt to fit her small stature by sewing it with dental floss.

Successful musicians write love songs, internet dating sites guarantee one can find their soul mate through a survey, and writers write books about the male psyche and how to deal with it. They could probably sell love on eBay. The only concept I have of love is my attachment to family and friends (it's platonic, of course.) At the same time, I can remember "dating" boys in seventh and eighth grade and claiming to love them after three days of chatter on the phone about English tests. But after five years of holding hands in the hallway, what changes?

Circumstances by default and probably a physical relationship make love more plausible and more real after high school. Another friend of mine, Gary, claims that all he wants out of his life is a girl that he can buy things for and cuddle with while they watch movies. That's his notion of love, but we are all different.

Some people are able to have a substantial relationship with another person and be seven states apart. Others do not go a minute of their waking life without seeing or talking to their significant other. Some still cling to the junior high hand-holding relationship while others abstain from PDA. The question is, do these differences mean that love is patient, and love is kind, or that love isn't here at all? In the end, I don't rule out love's possibility, I just rule out its tangibility.

In the bigger picture, the idea of love makes sense. It's nice to have somebody to listen to your problems and calm you down when you're upset. When Cecilia writes a paper, Daniel reads it. When she has a bad day, Daniel buys her ice cream. They seem to have a comfortable relationship, which I can understand wanting. Eventually, people get married to share benefits and to have somebody to grow old with. Even I would like to live a fairytale dream and marry somebody who will whisk me away to a city and take care of me. But for now, I feel like life isn't about that. Think about it – you have time to settle down with somebody, why does it have to be now?

Haley Navarro can be reached at hnavarro@student.umass.edu.

WRITE LETTERS TO THE EDITOR!

RESPOND TO WHAT WE PRINT!

(550 WORD LIMIT)

Send letters to:
editorial@
dailycollegian.com

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

ARTS & LIVING

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 22, 2007 ARTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Cinema showcases classic film series

Janus Film Festival brings foreign pictures to Amherst Cinema

COURTESY OF JANUS FILMS

Giulietta Masina stars in Italian director Frederico Fellini's film "La Strada," which will be screening tonight at Amherst Cinema at 7 p.m. as a part of their ongoing Janus Film Festival.

COURTESY VIEWS MERCURY FILMS

Fernando Rey and Silvia Pinal star in "Viridiana," a 1961 film by Spain's Luis Buñciel. Amherst Cinema will be screening this film March 1 and March 4.

BY MORGAN-ANN ROUSSEAU
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Something electric is in the February air at the Amherst Cinema Arts Center, and it's definitely not the heat. Film and art enthusiasts in the Amherst area have long awaited the cinema's arrival in November because of its dedication to offering movies that matter. Over the next three months, the cinema will showcase what it calls "an extraordinary collection of undisputed masterpieces that have changed the way people make and watch movies."

The collection in question is a new international art house series of classic films, entitled "Essential Art House: Fifty Years of Janus Films." Amherst Cinema's general manager, Beth Moore Roberts, considers the films to be close to the hearts of Cinephiles everywhere.

"This area is perfect for it," said Moore Roberts about the series' appeal in Amherst. "The films are indisputable classics." Weekly until May 28, the cinema will show 16 of the 30 films in the Janus collection. Screenings will take place on Thursdays and the Sundays following. Every week a film scholar from one of the five colleges will introduce the Thursday screening and field questions afterward.

The cinema began their international art house classics series last Thursday with a packed screening of Jean Renoir's 1939 French film Rules of the Game. Tomorrow at 7 p.m. the series continues with La Strada (1954) an Italian film by Federico Fellini, with an additional screening to take place at 2 p.m. on Sunday.

Fellini's filmic legacy places him as one of the top screenwriters and an influential director in Italian cinema. Fellini has described La Strada as "the complete catalogue of my entire mythological world." Considered to be a film of Magic-realism, La Strada raised controversy at its premier in Venice, Italy more than 60 years ago; praised by Catholic critics and condemned by Leftists as a betrayal of Neo-realism.

Some of the cinema's other upcoming films outside the classics series are Letters from Iwo Jima, which starts Friday, The Lives of Others An Unreasonable Man, Into Great Silence, Days of Glory, Bamako, and Summer in Berlin (this film starts April 27, director present).

The cinema, located at 28 Amity St. in downtown Amherst, is a nonprofit venue that offers three screens, each complete with 35 mm film and digital video projection, as well as stadium seating. Still up-and-coming, the cinema drew support from hundreds of contributors when it opened in November, and has a three-year goal of raising $3.25 million to go toward the building's purchase, loan repayment and support for operations and programs. Tickets to all screenings are available for purchase at the box-office, or at www.amherstcinema.org.

Dating is big balancing act

CAN BITSKY & ROBERT WATCHER

As you enjoy alone time with your new special someone it is important to keep in mind that friends can feel deserted. Talking openly to your beau and your friends can avoid hurt feelings.

BY JASMINE MONTEIRO
COLLEGIAN COLUMNIST

So you meet someone who you really like. You're in the process of dating, getting to know each other – you're enjoying yourself. You don't want to get too involved, but you don't want them to lose interest. And most of all, you don't want to neglect your friends. It's happened to all of us at one time or another. How do we further our relationship with someone without jeopardizing our friendships?

When you're single it's inevitable that you'll spend a majority of your time with your friends. So when you meet someone new, it's obvious that this pattern tends to shift. Just be honest to your friends (and yourself) about it. Let them know how you feel about the person and what it means to you to get to know them better. Communication is key, remind them know you won't forget about them either. Even more importantly, let them know that they can talk to you if they're really feeling neglected.

Make sure that your new beau, as well as your friends, is comfortable with how you want to handle the situation. No one in your life should expect you to choose between one or the other. Everyone has to accept the fact that we have separate lives outside our relationships and friendships. It's important to realize this to avoid taking advantage of someone's feelings. Maybe you can set up a special night you spend just with your romantic interest and another night where you go out with your friends.

If you give yourself space from that special someone it can also help build your relationship. Infatuation doesn't sustain forever, so make it last longer by spending some time apart. This way you value your time together that much more. After all, if you really like each other, you'll have plenty of time to create a bond.

On the flip side, your friends should understand that when you have strong feelings for someone, it's difficult to push them aside. It shouldn't be about liking someone more than your friends. There are lots of feelings that we experience and sometimes can't control. Most of the time, we don't even realize what we are doing or how it makes our friends feel. They have to understand that the only way we can know how they feel about the situation is if they tell us.

The good thing about learning how to manage your romantic partner and friends separately is that eventually you will give yourself the opportunity to manage them together. There are moments when your friends may wonder why you like this person so much. So let them find out. I would hope that your friends are trustworthy enough where they don't get any intrusive ideas.

Introduce your friends to him/her, and let them get to know each other. Some people may feel more comfortable in a group setting so maybe you can all go out together, and he/she could bring some friends of their own. Who knows maybe your friends will like him/her enough that you can all hang out on occasion. Or if you're lucky they may spark some flames of their own with a close friend of his/hers, then you can all be friends.

The possibilities are endless – it's just all about what you make of it. Don't feel like you have to choose one over the other. Just remember how important it is to talk to your friends and to your romantic partner, and make sure they know how you feel too. This way there won't be any room for confusion or mixed messages. The added bonus is that your friends and new boyfriend/girlfriend won't dislike each other before they even get a chance to meet!

Essential Art House Series Upcoming Films:

March 1 at 7 p.m.; March 4 at 2 p.m.
VIRIDIANA (Luis Buñuel, Spain 1961, 90 min.)

March 8 at 7 p.m.; March 11 at 2 p.m.
WILD STRAWBERRIES (Ingmar Bergman, Sweden 1957, 91 min.)

March 15 at 7 p.m.; March 18 at 2 p.m.
WALKABOUT (Nicolas Roeg, Australia 1971, 100 min.)

March 22 at 7 p.m.; March 25 at 2 p.m.
CHILDREN OF PARADISE (Marcel Carné, France 1945, 190 min.)

March 29 at 7 p.m.; April 1 at 2 p.m.
THE EARRINGS OF MADAME DE (Max Ophüls, France/Italy 1953, 105 min.)

April 5 at 7 p.m.; April 8 at 2 p.m.
THE CRANES ARE FLYING (Mikhail Kalatazov, Soviet Union 1957, 94 min.)

April 12 at 7 p.m.; April 15 & 16 at 2 p.m.
THE 400 BLOWS (François Truffaut, France 1959, 99 min.)

April 19 at 7 p.m.; April 22 at 2 p.m.
THE SEVENTH SEAL (Ingmar Bergman, Sweden 1957, 95 min.)

April 26 at 7 p.m.; April 29 at 2 p.m.
CLÉO FROM 5 TO 7 (Agnès Varda, France 1962, 90 min.) plays with ZÉRO FOR CONDUCT (Jean Vigo, France 1933, 41 min.)

May 3 at 7 p.m.; May 6 at 2 p.m.
KNIFE IN THE WATER (Roman Polanski, Poland 1962, 94 min.)

May 10 at 7 p.m.; May 13 at 2 p.m.
JULES AND JIM (François Truffaut, France 1961, 105 min.)

May 17 at 7 p.m.; May 20 at 2 p.m.
SEVEN SAMURAI (Akira Kurosawa, Japan 1954, 206 min.)

May 24 at 7 p.m.; May 27 & 28 at 2 p.m.
BEAUTY AND THE BEAST (Jean Cocteau, France 1946, 96 min.)

McCutcheon tries to keep UMass on pace with private schools

Lack of funding has athletics looking for 'outside dollars'

BY ROB GREENFIELD
COLLEGIAN STAFF

He's the man in charge.

From financial situations to athletic suspensions to meet-and-greets with alumni to traveling with the football and men's basketball teams, Athletic Director John McCutcheon has had an eventful year as the Commander-in-Chief of UMass athletics.

He's been all over the eastern seaboard this fall and winter, trying to follow the success of the football team on its way to the national championship in Chattanooga, Tenn., and the men's basketball team as it took on a powerhouse Kentucky team in Rupp Arena, one of the toughest venues for opposing teams in college basketball.

McCutcheon was there in Lexington, Ky. He was in Chattanooga when the mighty Minutemen finally fell to a superior Appalachian State team in the middle of Mountaineer country.

It's been a busy couple of months for the third-year AD, who has headed up the resurgence of the UMass basketball program and the football team's return to the national championship after a near 10-year hiatus.

But what does the job of the Athletic Director entail? Politics, business, networking, managing, and just being a fan. The guy with the corner office in the Mullins Center always has something on the "To Do" list.

"It is a pretty busy time but I think that that's why a lot of us enjoy it, because it's so varied," McCutcheon says, camped out in his Mullins Center penthouse overlooking the basketball court/hockey rink. "Certainly there are a lot of issues relative to budget and finance and fundraising and budget management and all those kind of things. But there are a lot of other issues that you deal with: student-athlete welfare issues, facility project issues, dealing with the NCAA and legislative proposals and things like that."

Things aren't easy for UMass athletics these days. It is the outcast public school amid the private school money hounds in Boston, where recruiting is stronger because of location and glamour.

Boston University and Boston College, both private universities, get their money for the athletic program through private funds and business. The majority of the funding comes from alumni, the most lucrative source of no-strings money for college programs.

McCutcheon knows that as well as anybody. He served as associate athletic director of business operations and assistant athletic director at the ultra-privatized Boston College, so he knows what it takes to become a money vacuum in the college sports market.

"I think it's more of a comparison of public vs. private," McCutcheon said. "The private schools have been in the development business for a long, long time. It was a big part of their life's blood since their inception. Whereas the state schools, not just on the east coast but in California, are relatively new to this process. It takes a while to get that culture and place and get that understanding of, 'Why doesn't everything from a state school just come from a state allocation?'

"And the reason is that this is just a different day and age. The costs out there have gone up. The demands on public dollars for other interests are greater. The world has changed. Necessitating private dollars to public universities is more so than in the past."

McCutcheon speaks adamantly about the increasing need for "outside dollars," meaning donations from sources outside of state funding. UMass is behind in this regard, having always relied on the allocated money from the state government for higher education.

Chancellor John Lombardi has become an asset to the athletic department because of the value he places on sports in the campus community. Lombardi is a regular at UMass football games and smoothes McCutcheon's relationship with the rest of the University, especially when it comes to finances.

"Every department on campus can lay out what their needs are and have great justifications as to why those are needed," McCutcheon said. "There are only so many dollars to go around. And it comes down to the support of [Chancellor Lombardi], and I think he is extremely good at articulating what the role of athletics is and why we are in the business of athletics and what the uses to the campus are. I haven't seen a Chancellor that is as willing to vocalize that piece of the relationship as well as he does."

McCutcheon is diving head first into the business world of college sports, trying to garner enough alumni support to bring UMass athletics into the state foreground and provide scholarships for potential student-athletes.

Without scholarships there is no incentive for talented athletes to come to a University, so the athletic department dedicates most of its fundraising around scholarship money. Private donations have already had a substantial impact on the athletic department, the most significant gift being the $800,000 donation to the men's and women's track teams for scholarships.

Donations of that magnitude give teams extraordinary opportunities to improve the quality of their recruiting classes, and that in turn improves the quality of the athletic department.

That is what McCutcheon is trying to build, and an aggressive campaign to reach potential alumni donors is in progress.

BASKETBALL AS PROFIT

It is futile to discuss the finances of the UMass athletic department without touching on the basketball program. For some schools, football is the main money-maker. But not in Amherst, where the football team – regardless of its success – loses money every season.

According to a Boston Globe report released on Dec. 8, 2006, the UMass athletic department lost around $2.6 million supporting the football team this season, and that was an improvement from the previous year where the losses neared the $3 million mark.

The jump to Division I-A has been considered, but the cost would be too much for the University to handle without some steep state funding, which has a slim-to-none chance of happening.

So that leaves the men's basketball program, which – through sponsors and a more popular national appeal with alumni – could improve the financial status of every program within the athletic department.

The Minutemen are at the tail end of the 2006-07 season and are flirting with the possibility of an at-large bid into the NCAA Tournament, which is the gold mine for the UMass athletic department.

"If you make the NCAA Tournament, the money that we receive has the potential to go up significantly," McCutcheon said. "It gives you long-term support that you can count on if you have that kind of success. It also leads to additional support from donors. It touches just about every potential revenue stream that we have."

With that potential comes the temptation to give more of the department's resources to the men's basketball program in order to better its chances of helping the department.

So it is a balancing act for McCutcheon, who decides who gets what among his coaches – and they aren't about to make unreasonable sacrifices for the good of one team.

"[The system] isn't based on one team, but it isn't naïve either," McCutcheon said. "You try to look at who you're competing with in the various sports. For us to be competitive in the sport of men's basketball, we have to do certain things and provide certain resources. Does that mean that basketball team stays at the Ritz and the track team stays at Motel 6? No. But salaries are different with coaches.

"If you talk to any of our coaches, they understand that there are some things that we have to do with our most visible program, the one that has the best chance to generate resources to help everybody."

NEW RECRUITS

McCutcheon was hired in 2004 as UMass' AD, and he immediately signed the Northeastern coach who assisted Mark Whipple in the 1998 championship season, Don Brown, as the head football coach. It was his first hire, and one national championship appearance later, it is looking like one of his best decisions at the helm.

The AD's biggest personnel decision since his hiring in 2004 is Travis Ford, who is in his second season as the head coach of the basketball program and leading a significant turnaround in a short period of time. Ford is one win away from getting the Minutemen a 20-win season.

Most of the coaches in the program have had long tenures within the department, including softball coach Elaine Sortino, track coaches Ken O'Brien and Julie LaFreniere, men's soccer coach Sam Koch, women's soccer coach Jim Rudy and men's lacrosse coach Greg Cannella.

"We've got a nice mix of coaches and staff that have been here for a long, long time and who have seen a lot of different things happen and some staff that are new and bring in new perspectives and new energy and new ideas," McCutcheon said. "So it's a nice blend. The ones who have been here for a long time bleed maroon. They really care for the place and they understand. Most of our coaches know that we are not in a position to give them everything."

This makes McCutcheon's job easier, knowing that his coaches have an understanding of his position and the decisions he has to make. When McCutcheon got the UMass job in 2004, he followed the tumultuous reign of the fiery Bob Marcum and the short-lived rule of Ian McCaw.

Instability created short fuses within the department and it desperately needed someone to right the ship. McCutcheon, despite some of his early reservations, believed that UMass needed a steady hand, someone there for the long haul to see things through. He thought he was the man for the job.

"The first press conference that we had here I got everybody together, the whole staff, the grounds crew up to all of the head coaches, we're all over in the weight room because that was the only area we had to get everybody together," McCutcheon said. "And I remember walking in there and looking at the faces, and I swear that if I told everybody, 'OK, go run into that wall' they'd all stand up and run into the wall. They impressed me about being so excited about getting the instabilities behind them and moving forward. They were like sponges. They were ready to go, and that energized me."

Three years later, McCutcheon is still in Amherst and rooting hard for the men's basketball team to get into the NCAA Tournament. And it doesn't look like he's going anywhere.

Rob Greenfield can be reached at rgreenfi@student.umass.edu

UMass Athletic Director John McCutcheon took over the athletics department three years ago. He is in charge of all things Minutemen.

MCCUTCHEON

UMass football coach Don Brown was the first coach to be hired by McCutcheon, and Brown has yet to disappoint.

FRUSTRATED?
PUZZLED?
DO YOU HAVE:
A grade dispute?
Teacher, roomate or job concerns?
Billing problems?
overdue 1-2-3
...or any other University related problems?
THE OMBUDS OFFICE CAN HELP
(confidentially, of course)
Serving the students, faculty, and staff of the Umass Community
823 Campus Center
Office Hours: 8:00 a.m. - 5:00 p.m.
Telephone: 413 - 545 - 0867
fax: 413 - 545 - 9720
e-mail: ombuds@ombuds.umass.edu

Journalism Program Lecture Series
The Historian as Journalist, the Journalist as Historian
A panel featuring award winning Boston Globe reporter and author Charles Sennott and BBC Senior Producer Kate Peters.
The Boston Globe BBC
Tuesday, Feb. 27, 5:30-7pm Cape Cod Lounge

stop in.

ZANNA
Women's clothing, shoes and accessories
downtown Amherst

LIQUORS 44
AT THE HADLEY LOCATION
458 Russell St. #9 • Campus Plaza
413-253-9344
Visit us at our other locations:
NORTHAMPTON • 238 King St.
HOLYOKE • 44 Lincoln St.
FULL REDEMPTION AT ALL LOCATIONS
NOT RESPONSIBLE FOR TYPOGRAPHICAL ERRORS
DON'T DRINK & DRIVE

Smirnoff 80° 1.75 liter	$19.99
Smirnoff 1.75 liter	$20.99
Parrot Bay 1.75 liter	$25.99
Captain Morgan Original Spiced Rum 1.75 liter	$25.99
Captain Morgan Tattoo 750 mls	$13.99
Crown Royal 750 mls	$17.99
Tanqueray Gin 1.75 liter	$29.99
Crown Royal 750 mls	$20.99
Kahlua 750 mls	$14.99
Baileys Original Chocolate Mint & Caramel 750 mls	$19.99
Belvedere Vodka 750 mls	$24.99
Hennessy 750 mls	$26.99

DOMESTIC KEGS	1/2 Bbls	1/4 Bbls
Bud	$68.99	$45.99
Bud Light	$68.99	$45.99
Coors Light	$68.99
Miller Lite	$68.99
Keystone Light	$47.99
Pabst Blue Ribbon	$48.99
Natural light/Ice	$44.99
Busch Light	$47.99

UM drubs Bonnies

M. BASKETBALL from page 12

center. "It felt good from the beginning of the game when we started pressing and we just felt comfortable."

UMass' bench was just as relaxed combining for 41 points. Junior Gary Forbes was the last Minuteman to sub out of the game at 12:58 of the second, and the reserve bench players didn't take it easy on the Bonnies.

The Minutemen held a 51-36 lead at that point, but gave a few nine-crushing blows to a St. Bonaventure team that could not defend itself.

Freshman Ricky Harris and junior Luke Bonner led the way for the Minutemen bench. Harris finished with a career-high 14 points in 21 minutes of action, while Bonner scored a career-best 11 points – none better than his pair of 3-pointers from the top of the arc.

"What you saw tonight is what we see in practice everyday," Ford said. "Luke Bonner a lot of times dominates practice. All these guys can play, and when they get into the game we expect them to perform. What they did is what we knew they could do, so it wasn't a big surprise."

"Right now is the most pivotal time of the season and everybody has to step up their game and everybody has to contribute," Harris said. "I like coach Ford told me, I'm not a freshman any more. It's time to step my game up. He said I'm a freshman, but I have to play like a junior."

UMass went into halftime on a powerful Freeman dunk at the buzzer. The last-second fast break effort gave the Minutemen their largest lead of the half at 36-22.

Lasme and Freeman combined for 22 points in the first 20 minutes, and dominated the paint on the offensive side of the ball. The Minutemen scored 30 of their 36 first-half points in the paint, as opposed to the Bonnies' 18.

The game opened with both teams exchanging baskets, and Paul Williams made his presence felt early on, scoring five of St. Bonaventure's first seven points.

The Bonnies held a 7-4 lead on the back of Williams, but UMass went on a 15-0 run that gave the Minutemen a 19-7 lead at the 11-minute mark and never lost the lead.

Danny Picard can be reached at dpicard@student.umass.edu

Junior Gary Forbes tries to avoid the block attempt of St. Bonaventure's A.J. Hawkins early in UMass' win over the Bonnies last night. Forbes recorded a game-high 10 rebounds in the game.

St. Bonaventure clinging to 12th spot

TRAP GAME from page 12

[illegible] Lasme said. "You [illegible] come into the game ready. You have to come into the game ready no matter who you play. It was good to have a good win for us."

Freshman Ricky Harris scored a career-high 14 points in the Minutemen's win at the Mullins Center last night.

Last night's game meant the world to the Bonnies, who are in a heated battle for the 12th and final spot in the A-10 Tournament with La Salle (3-10 A-10) and Richmond (2-10 A-10). St. Bonaventure holds the advantage in tiebreakers with both teams, but the Bonnies still needed a win last night to keep their destiny in their own hands.

For UMass, that's a recipe for disaster. It's happening all over the college basketball spectrum. Teams high on their conference food chain are nose diving in the polls and standings because weaker conference foes are out for blood.

This game could've bitten the Minutemen before they had time to seal the wound. Games like that have low-bridged UMass teams in the past.

But this time the right UMass team showed up and vanquished any possibility of a let down or a bad loss.

"That's what we're supposed to do," Lasme said. "It felt good from the beginning when we started pressing. We felt comfortable. It's just a good win."

The game was sloppy at best. Loose balls were fumbled and tipped and kicked until the player who came up with it traveled trying to get rid of the ball. Rebounds weren't clean and shooting was off.

But UMass didn't give the Bonnies a whiff of victory, and were up by 37 points with just over five minutes left in the game. The "We Want Pennie" chants began with 5:00 left in regulation and big man Luke Bonner kept the crowd interested with two 3-pointers and a baby hook shot down the stretch.

"What Luke did today is nothing different than what he does in practice every day," Lasme said, taking one of the only opportunities he's had to praise his teammate.

Everything went right for UMass last night, and the Minutemen came away with an easy conference victory. It was a breath of fresh air for an embattled UMass squad that hasn't had a win of this magnitude since late November, when the Minutemen blasted Savannah State and Jacksonville State in back-to-back games.

Lasme, Freeman, James Life, Chris Lowe and Gary Forbes all watched the final minutes of last night's game from the bench, cheering and rooting and smiling with a conference victory all but in the books.

The lineup at the end of the game looked like this: Bonner, Etienne Brower, Mike Sinn, Nana Ampim and Matt Pennie. It was Sinn's first action of the year, and he got one shot up (a missed bank-shot) before the final buzzer sounded.

Ford was a calmer version of his usual self, and he actually sat down for the last five minutes of the game. Although he claims that the 39-point victory was no cinch.

"We told them that we had to keep our eye on the big picture," Ford said when asked if he was able to relax during the romp. "There were some things that we wanted to work on throughout the game. I don't think coaches ever relax. But it was good to get some of those other guys playing time."

While Ford surely won't enjoy a slice of the blowout pie, the starters were clearly enjoying the free ride on the pine down the stretch.

Ford, however, has his mind solely on Saint Louis on Saturday night and won't partake in any of the celebratory self-praise.

"I wouldn't call [the game] easy," Ford said. "We played well. We were just bigger and stronger than they were right now. We have a lot of seniors and they have a team that's still rebuilding. They inherited a tough, tough situation and it takes time. So I wouldn't call it easy."

Despite Ford's political-correctness, the Minutemen had some fun with the win last night, exhaling for a few minutes to admire the hurting they put on their opponents. Blowout wins don't come too often this time of year.

Rob Greenfield can be reached at rgreenfi@student.umass.edu

UMass records 13th 20-victory season

By Rob Greenfield
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts men's basketball team grabbed its 20th win last night against lowly St. Bonaventure, and it marks the first 20-win season since the 1997-98 campaign when Bruiser Flint's Minutemen went 21-11. It is the 13th 20-win season in the history of UMass basketball. The Minutemen hit this historic mark with three wins in a row, including two on the road with sell-out crowds at Fordham and Dayton.

Here are some notes and highlights from the last couple of weeks.

UMass Basketball

• Stephane Lasme has 367 career-blocked shots, tied for 23rd in NCAA history. Lasme has 136 blocks this season alone, more than 13 teams in the Atlantic 10 and more than 307 of the 336 teams in Division I basketball. He currently holds UMass' single-season blocked-shots record and is first in UMass history in career blocks.

• Junior Gary Forbes has been on an absolute tear, averaging 20.6 points per game and 9.4 rebounds per game in the five games preceding last night's the Musketeers dismantling of URI last night, the Minutemen moved into a tie for first place in the A-10 once again.

• Luke Bonner, the West Virginia transfer, was averaging 0.9 points per game heading into last night's contest, and bumped that up significantly with 11 points. Bonner checked in with 8:30 left in the first half and exited at the 6:00 mark without cracking the stat sheet. Bonner dropped two of his 11 points at the 11:44 mark of the second half: he ripped down an offensive rebound and threw in a baby sky-hook, much to the crowd's delight.

The big man also took a charge with 9:30 left in the second half, and stuck a 3-pointer on the ensuing offensive possession, his second trey of the season.

• St. Bonaventure went for a 6:50 stretch in the first half without scoring last night.

• Travis Ford is a perfect 2-0 vs. St. Bonaventure.

• Dante Milligan has sparked the Minutemen of late, averaging 7.5 points and 9.5 rebounds over the two games at Fordham and Dayton. He averaged just 2.2 points and 1.8 rebounds in the first 24 games of the season. Milligan turned 23 on the day of the Fordham game and celebrated the day with a career-high 11 rebounds to go along with his nine-point effort.

• Both Freeman and Lasme tallied their 12th double-double at Dayton. Freeman had 15 points and 12 boards. Lasme had 14 points and 12 boards.

• It's Julius Erving's birthday today. Make sure to wish him a happy birthday, even though his judging in the dunk contest was soft.

• The Minutemen became the first team to win at Dayton this season when they beat the Flyers, 77-69, in front of Dayton's usual sell-out crowd.

• Freeman moved up to third on UMass' all-time rebounding list with 12 boards at Dayton on Sunday. He only had three boards against the Bonnies last night.

• Brandon Thomas had a season-high 12 points against Fordham, and added five assists and four rebounds to cap the win. Thomas didn't score in last night's game.

Rob Greenfield can be reached at rgreenfi@student.umass.edu

WHERE IMAGINATION MEETS
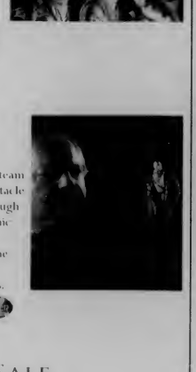
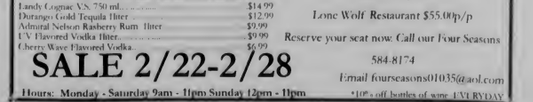
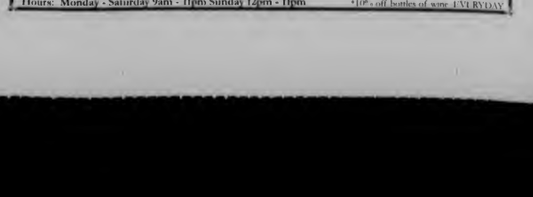
INNOVATION
Natalie MacMaster
Wednesday, February 28 at 7:30 pm
Concert Hall
Natalie MacMaster is one of Canada's biggest stars and a fiddling, singing, and step-dancing fireball on stage. She never fails to bring down the house
Recorder
Valley KIDS
Joffrey Ballet
Monday, March 5 at 7:30 pm
Concert Hall
For pure breathtaking beauty of the otherworldly sort, Joffrey is unmistakable. The company will perform Apollo, Deuce Coupe, and The Green Table, one of the most powerful and important anti-war statements ever created for the stage.
limited tickets available
EASTHAMPTON SAVINGS BANK
BEAUTY WORLD SAWICKI
The Tempest / La Tempête by William Shakspeare
Produced by 4D Art / Directed by Michel Lemieux, Victor Pilon and Denise Guilbault
Monday, March 12 at 7:30 pm
Concert Hall
Blowing a virtual wind on The Tempest, the team of 4D Art have succeeded in creating a spectacle that combines reality and virtual reality through the combination of live actors and holographic projections. From the moment the curtain rises, you will be astonished at the sight of the infamous storm conjured up by the vengeful Prospero – in French with English supertitles.
Advocate
TICKETS ARE ON SALE NOW!
TICKETS ARE ONLY $7 $10 $15 FOR LIVE COLLEGE STUDENTS
UMass Amherst FINE ARTS CENTER
413.545.2511 OR 1-800-999-UMAS WWW.FINEARTSCENTER.COM
Umass Amherst Fine Arts Center Opens Spring 2007







FOUR Seasons
WINE • LIQUOR • CIGARS
333 Russell St., Rt. 9
Hadley, MA 01035
584-8174
Sale date: 2/8/07 - 2/14/07
not responsible for typographical errors
Beer
Heineken & Heineken Light
Sierra Nevada Pale Ale
Busch Light
J.W. Dundee
Milwaukee's Best
Magic Hat Ales
Sol Cerveza
Steel Reserve
Pabst Blue Ribbon
Red Hook Ales
Killians Irish Red
Ithaca Brewery
Liquor
Wine
Kelt Cognac VS.O.P 750ml..... $14.99
Ballantine Scotch 750 ml..... $24.99
Crown Royal Canadian Whiskey 750 ml..... $21.99
Dewar's White Label Scotch 750 ml..... $19.99
Godiva Chocolate Liqueurs 750 ml..... $18.99
Jose Cuervo Flavored Tequila* 750 ml..... $18.99
*Limon, Tropica, Orange
Denaka Vodka 80° 1.75 liter..... $14.99
Landy Cognac V.S. 750 ml..... $14.99
Durango Gold Tequila liter..... $12.99
Admiral Nelson Ranberry Rum liter..... $9.99
UV Flavored Vodka liter..... $9.99
Cherry Wave Flavored Vodka..... $6.99
TASTING NOTES
House of Dewars Scotch Dinner With Dewars
Ambassador Ewan Gunn Thursday March 1, 2007 6:30 p.m.
Lone Wolf Restaurant $55.00p/p
Reserve your seat now. Call our Four Seasons 584-8174
Email fourseasons01035@aol.com
*10% off bottles of wine EVERYDAY
SALE 2/22-2/28
Hours: Monday - Saturday 9am - 11pm Sunday 12pm - 11pm

After one day at the Atlantic 10 Championships, Evan Swisher and the Minutemen currently sit in first place. Swisher and the 200-yard medley team turned in a strong race. The Minutewomen are also in the top spot after one day of competition.

200-yard relay team breaks A-10 record

SWIMMING AND DIVING from page 12

For the Minutemen, Swisher led off both the 200-yard medley relay and the 800-yard freestyle relay.

"We talked about it before the day that Evan was going to be our lead swimmer," Yarworth said. "He knows how to do it, he's not scared and he's confident. He doesn't have as much experience in the 800 [-yard freestyle] and I think he just swam off the people he was swimming with. He did what we needed him to do."

The 200-yard medley relay team posted a time of 1:31 – breaking the school record by more than a full second and the A-10 record by .44 seconds.

Senior Jake Hague, sophomore Nate Bromage and freshman Juan Moliere swam the other three legs for the Minutemen all posting personal bests.

"I did not," Yarworth said when asked if he expected the unit to swim as fast as they did. "I predicted a 1:32.5-1:33 and they went 1:31.0. That's just amazing. Evan Swisher leading off with a 23.1, it was a full second faster than his fastest split and everyone else swam their personal best."

Joining Swisher on the 800-yard relay team was senior Greg Chartier, junior A.J. Vozella and junior Derek Castellana.

The veteran crew swam a near flawless race. Duquesne nearly caught the Minutemen, but Castellana held the Dukes off in the anchor leg.

"We had a few question marks in the second relay," Yarworth said. "A.J. Vozella is coming off mono and had a real good swim. He was nervous. And Derek finishing it, he hasn't swum in a year since he took last year off but he came through great."

The Minutemen enter the second day in good position, with three freestyle events, the 200-yard individual medley and the one-meter dive. The Minutewomen will need strong performances in the races to maintain their lead.

Joe Mellon can be reached at jmellon@student.umass.edu

Matchup with UD determines seedings

W. BASKETBALL from page 12

Sunday, Dacko is pleased with the play of her team as of late and is confident heading off to play Dayton.

"We're coming off of a very strong performance, one of our best ever against Xavier," she said. "Although we didn't come up with the win, we played 35 minutes of great basketball. It was the best I've seen us play this season."

UMass holds the edge in the career series between the schools, eight games to four. Dayton has struggled against the Minutewomen on its home floor, falling in all but one of its five matchups at the University of Dayton Arena.

The two teams last met during the 2005-06 season, when Dayton topped UMass, 57-51, at the Mullins Center. The Minutewomen trailed by 13 points in the second half, but rallied to square things up at 51 apiece. But then a 6-0 run sealed the win for the Flyers. UMass finished 0-for-7 from long distance and committed 24 turnovers. Junior captain Kate Mills finished with just five points on 2-for-10 shooting.

Dayton ended last season 17-12, but it's taken a dramatic step backwards this season, currently standing at 11-16. The Flyers lost five seniors to graduation after last season – including three starters – and have had a difficult time trying to replace their production.

Dayton especially misses the inside presence of Cara Wright, who was an A-10 First Team selection and the only player in the conference to average a double-double. She was named A-10 Player of the Week five times and led the conference in rebounding.

This year's Dayton squad has only one player – Nikki Oakland – averaging over six rebounds per contest, and its second leading rebounder, Brittany Holterman, is a guard. The Flyers get a majority of their points from starting forwards Oakland and Jennifer Strong – the only two players on the team averaging double figures.

Whether or not their perimeter players are able to knock down outside shots will be the key for the Flyers. Dayton launches triples at a frantic pace, hoisting up 484 on the season, for an average of just fewer than 18 per contest. By contrast, the Minutewomen have attempted only 317.

Although it continues to attempt a remarkable amount of 3-pointers, Dayton doesn't shoot particularly well from the perimeter, connecting on just 27.5 percent of its shots. Despite the poor percentages, Dacko is mindful that Dayton is capable of catching fire from long range.

"They're streaky," she said. "They don't shoot well on a consistent basis, but at any one point they could go on a run and hit anything they throw up. As poorly as they shoot from the perimeter, they're not shy, and they just keep chucking them up. We can't afford to let our guard down."

Whether or not Dayton is able to knock down its shots will play a large role in who wins on Thursday, and more importantly, who gets a higher seed in the A-10 tournament.

Eli Rosenzweig can be reached at erosenzw@student.umass.edu

Pam Rosanio had a rare off-night against Xavier on Sunday. She shot just 1-for-7 from the floor and recorded only two points.

UM embarks on one final road trip

Mills honored by Atlantic 10 for recent stellar performances

By Dominic Poli
Collegian Staff

The 2006-07 regular season enters its homestretch this weekend for the Massachusetts women's basketball team (15-12, 5-7 A-10), which has secured a spot in the A-10 tournament.

The Minutewomen are packing their suitcases for a four-day road trip during which they'll face the Dayton Flyers (11-16, 6-6 A-10) on Thursday before trekking off to the Bronx for a matchup with the Fordham Rams (3-23, 1-11 A-10) on Sunday.

Despite both of the week's opponents having losing records, UMass coach Marnie Dacko stresses that the upcoming contests are crucial for her team, as they could help decide which seed it earns in the tournament.

Despite the gravity of the matchups, Dacko is confident that her players have the right stuff to soar themselves into a decent tourney slot.

Kate Mills honored by A-10

Junior Kate Mills continued her dominance over Presidents' Day weekend. In the two games – a 70-57 win over Duquesne and a 75-67 loss to Xavier – the forward notched consecutive double-doubles, averaging 18 points, 11 rebounds and four assists in each. She also amassed seven blocks and three steals over the weekend.

In the Xavier game, her 25 points established a new career high.

The A-10 Conference let Mills know that her solid performances did not go unnoticed. It rewarded the team captain with her second A-10 Player of the Week award last week. She shared the honor with Ayahna Cornish of Saint Joseph's University.

Cornish established back-to-back career highs in scoring with totals of 29 in a 76-67 win over St. Bonaventure and 35 in a 78-77 loss to Dayton. The senior guard averaged 32 points, seven boards and 2.5 assists per game on the week, while adding a block and a steal.

Mills has had a hot hand for UMass all season, leading the Minutewomen in points (427), points per game (15.8), shooting percentage (53.4) and blocks (59). The captain is also second in total rebounds (181) and third in both assists (67) and assists per game (2.5).

Lone-Senior Day

It was hard for Tamara Tatham to enjoy her last game at the Mullins Center. The team's lone senior would have liked to look back at her final UMass home game with the satisfaction of a win, instead of the sour feeling of what could have been.

Whitney McDonald played 14 minutes in UMass' loss to Xavier on Sunday. She pulled down two rebounds in that contest.

As soon as Xavier exploded out of the gate and sank a perfect 9-of-9 shots in the first 90 minutes, the Minutewomen began playing catch-up. Trailing the Musketeers by 11 points heading into the locker room at half-time, UMass picked up the pace and within minutes tied the game up after a Mills jump shot fell through the net.

After about 15 minutes of the second half, the Maroon and White was enjoying its biggest lead of the game, 61-57. It was not long, however, before Xavier went on a shooting spree – tallying 11 straight points – and regained the lead.

With the Minutewomen down, 70-67, with 1:38 left in regulation, the Musketeers called a timeout. After play resumed, Xavier guard Suntara Granderson drained a 3-pointer, giving her team a six-point lead. With precious time melting off of the clock, UMass coughed up the ball. In the waning seconds of the contest, guard Miranda Green sank two free throws, putting the final nail in UMass' coffin.

Tatham would have preferred to walk away from her last home game with a win, but a victory just wanted in the cards for the Minutewomen. But, the Brantford, Ontario native will still be able to tell her grandchildren that she managed to register 16 points, 10 boards and two assists.

Every collegiate game Tatham plays from here on out will be without the comforting familiarity of the Mullins Center. But, she knows if she wants to extend her college career at all, she will have to bring her intensity and leadership on the road with her.

Trying to beat the buzzer-beaters

A 3-pointer with 1.4 seconds on the clock locked up a nail-biter victory for Dayton University on Feb. 17. After two successful free throws by Hartford guard Whitney French gave the Hawks a 77-75 lead, Dayton's Karah Clodfelter unbounded the ball to attempt one last charge down the court with 11 seconds to go. The guard then passed it to teammate Kiki Lund who shoveled it to Kathy Guin.

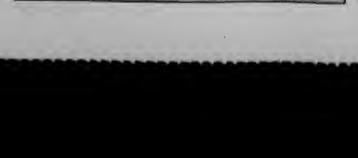
With the final buzzer just a heartbeat away, Guin – who went 5-for-9 (for 13 points) on the day, while adding three assists – put up a shot from behind the arc, finding nothing but nylon. The desperation shot gave the Flyers a 78-77 white-knuckle win.

None of this intimidates the Minutewomen, however. They know they'll just have to bring their own dramatics to Dayton in order to keep their dreams of getting a good seed in the A-10 tournament alive and kicking.

Dominic Poli can be reached at dpoli@student.umass.edu

Freshman Diatenu Hill has consistently come off the bench for UMass this season. She has played in 24 games and started one.

CANCUN, ACAPULCO, NEGRIL, MORAY, NASSAU, S. PADRE, FLORIDA, CRUISES, AND MORE!
Join the Party!!!
STS Flight Finder™
Save Hundreds on Spring Break Packages!!!
Search airfares to Mexico and the Caribbean and save up to $300 per person. Best Deals Guaranteed!
1.800.648.4849
www.ststravel.com



If You've Got a Plan We've Got a Van!
Insurance Replacement Rates
FREE PICK-UP
POTTER'S
AUTO & TRUCK RENTAL
• Direct Billing to Insurance Company
• Locally Owned & Operated
• 7 & 15 Passenger Vans
• UMass Purchase Orders, MHEC Rates
Potter's Collision Repair
Collision Repair & Glass Replacement
at North Amherst Motors
78 Sunderland Rd., North Amherst, MA
(413) 549-RENT (7368)
www.pottersauto.com
(One mile North of UMass - on bus route)

SKYPLEX
SPRINGFIELD'S HOTTEST NIGHTCLUB
3 CLUBS & 3 DJ'S ALL UNDER ONE ROOF!!!
"LA & NYC NIGHTLIFE COMES TO SPRINGFIELD"
Thursday - 18+ College Night "Hot Body Contest"
Friday - 18+ "Underground Electronic Dance Party" Downstairs
"Top 40" Upstairs
Saturday - 21+ "Party VIP Style"
WANTED: Hip Young Promoters/Hosts • Earn $$$$
Calling all DJ's
Do you do campus and house parties? Looking for a chance to work at the HOTTEST Nightclub? Here's your chance to become a Club DJ! Signup online at www.info.skyplex.us
18+ $2.00 off admission before midnight with this ad
21+ FREE admission before midnight with this ad
code:umass
10 Stearns Square Springfield, MA 413-827-9000

Colonials end four game losing skid

By Kevin Dooley
Collegian Staff

Never has putting the skids on a four-game conference losing streak resulted in so many milestones or accomplishments for one team.

The George Washington Colonials (16-8, 7-5 A-10) defeated the Temple Owls last Saturday 84-72 to end a four-game losing streak. Temple (11-14, 5-7 A-10) entered the game having won four of its last five contests.

In the victory, GW senior guard Carl Elliot recorded the first triple-double in the school's 93-year history. Elliot posted 17 points, 12 rebounds, and 12 assists. The senior guard is currently the only player in the A-10 averaging over five assists per game.

A-10 Basketball

In addition, the win marked the 300th home victory for GW at the 32-year-old Smith Center.

But the achievements didn't end there. Temple shooting guard Dionte Christmas, who is currently leading the A-10 in scoring, was held to just five points, a season low for Christmas. Christmas was an uncharacteristic 2-14 from the field and GW forced the sophomore guard to miss his first ten shots of the night. Christmas' prior season-low in points came against the St. Joseph's Hawks (16-10, 8-4 A-10) on Jan 10th, when he registered nine points.

Elliot's decision to return for a senior season at George Washington has yielded some mixed results, as the team has not come close to duplicating the success it enjoyed during the 2005-2006 campaign. That season, the Colonials ran the table during the conference regular season before losing to the Owls in the A-10 quarterfinals.

As a result of the four-game losing streak, a return visit to the NCAA Tournament in March for Elliot and the rest of the Colonials will mean having to win three or four straight games in the A-10 Tournament. As daunting and challenging as that task will be, George Washington doesn't need to be reminded that it has lost to the current top four teams in the A-10 standings.

Irrelevant No More

Last Wednesday's match-up between the Duquesne Dukes (10-14, 6-7 A-10) and the Richmond Spiders (6-19, 2-10 A-10) was supposed to mean nothing, but watching two teams continue on their roads to nowhere. Since the Dukes have made their season all but irrelevant by posting just six conference wins, it was up to the permanent basement dwellers of the A-10 this season, Richmond, to make this game noteworthy.

The Duquesne Dukes came into Wednesday's affair as the new prolific offensive juggernauts in all of the A-10, after coach Ron Everhart implemented a new run-and-gun approach offensively. Prior to its match-up with Richmond, Duquesne had been averaging over 80 points a night in its last seven games, but was held under 70 points in a 69-66 loss to Richmond.

The Spiders, despite owning some horrible offensive statistics, have been solid on the defensive side of the ball all season, ranking as the fourth best defensive unit in the conference.

The secret to Richmond's success defensively has been limiting the number of possessions opponents have and it worked last Wednesday. While the Dukes were still able to shoot just over 46 percent from the field, they were limited to just 41 shots. Duquesne is now in the midst of a three-game losing streak heading into Charlotte Wednesday night. Even Fordham (14-11, 7-6 A-10), which ranks at the top in scoring defense in the A-10, surrendered 83 points to the Dukes but still managed to pull off the victory.

For Richmond, defense has been the only reason it's been able to steal even one win in the A-10 this year. In their last twelve games, the Spiders have only reached 60 points in three occasions and the only player averaging double figures is points per game is Dan Gerrior (10.6). In addition, the team has only two players averaging over two assists a night.

But for all of its offensive woes, its very unlikely any team in the A-10 is taking the Spiders for granted, including GW head coach Karl Hobbs, who during a conference call Monday, likened playing Richmond to making a trip to the dentist in order to get a root canal. GW gets the chance to see if it can come away from the dentist's office without any nightmares when it hosts Richmond Wednesday night.

So Much for That

Coaches in any sport usually don't like to comment on the preseason polls recorded prior to each season. The A-10 is showing why preseason polls are usually laughed upon by season's end.

If the season were to end today, the only A-10 team whose spot would be predicted correctly are Xavier (tied for first place). UMass the other first-place squad, was picked to finish second and would finish as co-champions.

The one team getting the biggest laugh, however, when looking at the preseason poll is the Rhode Island Rams (17-10, 10-3 A-10), who were predicted to finish in 11th place, and were in the top spot as of yesterday, before falling to Xavier last night, dropping them to third behind the Musketeers and the Minutemen. Xavier, which was predicted to finish first in the conference, currently reside in third place.

A Lot of Head-Scratching

Like many teams in the A-10 this season, consistency has been tough to find. All you have to do is ask the St. Louis Billikens' (16-10, 6-6 A-10) head coach Brad Soderberg, who, during a conference call on Monday, said that he was "grasping for straws" when it comes to figuring out why his team has troubles playing consistently on defense.

The Billikens surrendered 83 points to Rhode Island last Wednesday and 76 points to Xavier on Feb. 7. By the same token, however, St. Louis limited Rhode Island to just 58 points back on Jan 10th and have held four A-10 opponents to under 60 points game.

The Renaissance moves to Philly

It's been well documented all season that the Owls have been reborn on the offensive side of the ball. They are led by Dionte Christmas, who leads the league in scoring, averaging 21 points per game. But he's not the only reason the Owls are at the top of the A-10 in scoring.

The Owls currently have three of the top-five scorers in the A-10, including Christmas, Mark Tyndale (third), and Dustin Salisbury (fifth).

Tyndale, who is averaging 18.4 points and just under seven rebounds, registered a career-high 33 points in the loss against George Washington Saturday. For his efforts, Tyndale was named A-10 Player of the Week Sunday. In three games vs. Massachusetts, LaSalle, and George Washington, the junior forward shot 29-of-50 from the field and averaged 25 points.

Salisbury has been a surprising addition to Temple's offensive game plan as well. The senior guard is averaging 17 points a night, including a season-high 25 points against UMass in a 98-89 win on Feb. 11th. Junior forward Will Daniels from Rhode Island was named along with Tyndale as A-10 Players of the Week after averaging 20 points and just under eight rebounds in three wins over Duquesne, St. Louis and Charlotte (12-13, 5-7 A-10). Daniels currently ranks sixth in points per game in the conference (17.0)... In what is now a rarity in the conference, the A-10 Rookie of the Week didn't go to Duquesne standout forward Robert Mitchell, but went instead to Damian Hollis of George Washington. The guard, who is averaging 4.3 points per game, had two breakout games this past week against St. Joe's and Temple. Hollis had a career-high 15 points in GW's win over the Owls.

Kevin Dooley can be reached at kdooley@student.umass.edu

HEA playoff spots wide open

By Michael King
Collegian Staff

With only two weeks left in the Hockey East schedule, each of the eight tournament spots are still up for grabs. Many thought No. 3 New Hampshire (22-6-2, 17-4-2 Hockey East) had the top spot locked up weeks ago and that the usual teams would finish with the top four seeds.

But No. 5 Boston University (17-5-9, 12-4-8 HEA) has a legitimate chance of winning the regular season for the second year in a row and seven teams are in the running for home-ice advantage in the playoffs. UNH is the only team that has clinched home-ice at this point in the season. Even lowly Merrimack (3-23-4, 3-18-2 HEA) still has a theoretical chance of earning the eighth seed.

Yet UNH, BU and No. 11 Boston College (18-11-1, 14-8-1 HEA) all seem poised to finish with the top three seeds in that order. In addition to the top three, the coveted fourth spot guarantees the team at least two first-round games at home. That slot is up for grabs between three schools – No. 17 Vermont, No. 12 Maine and No. 18 Massachusetts.

UVM (16-12-4, 11-8-4 HEA) and the Minutemen (14-11-5, 11-9-3 HEA) split last weekend in Burlington, keeping the Catamounts one point ahead in the standings. The team has a difficult set against BU this weekend, then two games with UMass Lowell (7-19-6, 6-14-3 HEA) the week after.

Maine (19-10-2, 12-10-1 HEA) has perhaps the easiest schedule ahead, but the Black Bears are coming off a pair of losses against BC. They were sitting pretty in third place going into last weekend's games, but now find themselves tied for fifth with UMass. Maine enjoys two upcoming home games against Merrimack this weekend, then it travels to UMass to finish the season.

However, the team that could make the biggest impact in these playoff scenarios is Northeastern (12-14-5, 8-11-5 HEA). The Huskies currently sit in seventh place, only five points away from fourth place. NU has two pivotal games with UMass this weekend, then faces BU the week after for the fourth time.

The team is certainly capable of riding the strong play of goalie Brad Thiessen. The freshman is fifth in goals-against average (2.12) in a conference known for its excellent goaltending. Thiessen has better statistics than several highly regarded netminders, including Cory Schneider of BC, Jon Quick of Massachusetts and Ben Bishop of Maine.

Hockey East

Wilson, Bishop Struggle in Net

There may be a goalie controversy brewing in Orono. But for now, coach Tim Whitehead should be happy if he can get one of his two talented goalies to play consistently well.

Sophomore Ben Bishop had unequivocal claim to the starter's job entering this season. After all, he did yeoman work in net last year as a freshman, finishing with a respectable 21-8-2 record and a 2.28 goals-against average. And replacing the venerable Jimmy Howard, who surrendered his last year of eligibility to the NHL less than two months before the season, was no easy task.

However Bishop went down with an injury on Feb. 3 against UNH, and missed the two games with Vermont the week after. Freshman Dave Wilson stepped into the starter's role and led the Black Bears to a pair of crucial home wins against the Catamounts.

Whitehead made the decision to stick with Wilson as his starter, even though Bishop was medically cleared to play. But the freshman yielded four goals in just over 30 minutes of work, prompting the coach to put Bishop in the game. The sophomore played well in relief, shutting the Eagles out for the remainder of the contest.

Instead of permanently taking back the starter's role, Bishop allowed six goals the next night in Maine's second battle with BC. But the Black Bear offense managed to keep the team in the game, failing to match the Eagles' offensive production by a single goal.

With two upcoming home games with Merrimack, it remains to be seen which goalie will become the starter, or if Whitehead will continue to use them as a tandem.

In all, six different BC players scored in Friday's game, including five-foot, six-inch dynamo, Nathan Gerbe. The sophomore tallied three times and added three assists for a total of six points over the weekend, appropriately earning Hockey East Player of the Week honors.

The Race for First

Although it's still possible for Boston College to win the conference regular season, it can only happen if the Eagles win their last four and New Hampshire loses its last four. Although BC has a pair of games with UNH on the last weekend, the scenario seems highly unlikely to come to fruition.

After making up two points of ground last week, BU now finds itself only four back of the Wildcats. Senior goalie John Curry carried the Terriers to their three point weekend against UNH. Curry has the best statistics in the league and continues to make difficult saves in crucial situations.

The one individual who could be the difference for BU is forward Brandon Yip. The sophomore returned from a shoulder injury this past weekend and made his presence known on the ice.

Yip scored two goals in his first game back against UNH last Friday. The British Columbia native played right wing on the first line with Chris Higgins and Peter MacArthur, replacing Eric Thomassian – a senior who has yet to score a goal this year. In ten total games, Yip has three goals and five assists.

He was one of BU's top scorers last season, finishing with nine goals and 22 helpers. Hockey East named him its 2006 Rookie of the Year. Yip also had the game-winner against BC in overtime of the conference championship game.

Battle of Futility

If it wasn't official before last weekend, Merrimack is having the worst season in Hockey East. But that's probably not anything new to anyone familiar with college hockey.

The Warriors had an opportunity to shed that title with two games against ninth-place UMass Lowell, but MC could not solve freshman goaltender Nevin Hamilton, scoring only a total of two goals.

In fact, Hamilton has the third lowest goals-against average (1.87) in Hockey East, although he has a small sample size of only nine games. Lowell is riding a four game winning streak, all behind the freshman's strong play in net ... Merrimack may not have the league's best offensive, but at least Warrior fans can take solace in the fact that their two leading scorers are freshmen. Pat Kimball and Matt Jones each have four goals each for a team that averages just over one goal a game. To put that into perspective, Maine has 10 players with more than four goals this season and UNH has nine ... They may only be ranked No. 5 in the nation, but BU has the same amount of losses (five) as No. 1 Notre Dame (26-5-3) and No. 2 Minnesota (25-5-3) ... BC retired the number of former goaltender Bernie Burke of the class of 1950. Burke was a captain of the Eagles' 1949 National Championship team and also served as a longtime coach for the team.

Michael King can be reached at mking@student.umass.edu

Oden, Buckeyes take over No. 1 spot

Vanderbilt upset of Florida paves way for Ohio State

By Steve Games
Collegian Staff

According to the ESPN/USA Today poll Ohio State is the No. 1 team in the nation after Florida (24-3) lost to Vanderbilt (18-8), 83-70.

With that loss, Ohio State (24-3) easily took the top spot after stomping over Minnesota (9-18), 85-67. Freshman center Greg Oden hardly broke a sweat, playing 21 minutes but still scoring 19 points, nine rebounds and blocking two shots. Freshman guard Mike Conley Jr. didn't need to score, as he only netted six points on 3-of-4 shooting from the field. He took care of the ball and made plays for his teammates, dishing out 10 assists with one turnover. He also made plays on the defensive end, tying a career high with five steals.

Top 25 Basketball

Oden and Durant staying in school?

Since the inception of the NBA draft eligibility rule that stated players must wait one year after high school to play in the NBA, players like Greg Oden and Kevin Durant have been taking full advantage of their time in school. Every media expert has said that these guys are one and done. Oden loves college and has not really given any indication that he wants to jump to the NBA. Durant's parents have come out and said that they don't need the money and they want their son to graduate.

Texas Tech head coach Bob Knight has said that he does not like the new rule. According to the associated press Knight said the new rule is "the worst thing that's happened to college basketball since I've been coaching."

Knight is known for graduating his players at a high rate. He feels that players might take advantage of school by only going for one semester to play basketball and then dropping out after the season is over.

"Because now you can have a kid come to school for a year and play basketball and he doesn't even have to go to class," Knight said Monday.

Texas head coach Rick Barnes said that they would never recruit a player if he only stayed in school for one semester.

Neitzel takes care of Wisconsin

The Wisconsin Badgers (23-3) were ranked (No. 1 Associated Press polls, No. 2 ESPN/US Today) but after facing the unranked Michigan State Spartans they can say goodbye to that spot. Spartans junior guard Drew Neitzel scored 29 points to upset the Badgers, 64-55. Player of the Year candidate, senior forward Alando Tucker, score 16 points but only managed two in the second half. Spartans sophomore guard Travis Walton scored 13 points and recorded 10 assists.

Neitzel hit two 3-pointers late in the game to give the Spartans the lead and the momentum. Wisconsin led 51-50, until Neitzel hit a 3-pointer to give them the lead with just under four minutes to play. Late in the game with Michigan State leading 53-51, Neitzel shot a 3-pointer from the wing, the ball bounced in and out of the rim twice before it fell through to put the Spartans up for good.

Wisconsin will travel to Ohio State on Sunday. Back on January 9th, the Badgers won the first match-up, 72-69. This could determine first place in the Big 10 Conference standings.

Welcome Back

After taking a week off from the top 25, the Duke Blue Devils (20-7) played their way back to a No. 17 ranking and are over .500 in the Atlantic Coast Conference (7-6). The Blue Devils dropped four straight games and went into Boston College questioning themselves.

Duke defeated the then-ranked No. 21 Boston College (18-7), 78-70. Sophomore forward Josh McRoberts scored 18 points and grabbed 11 rebounds.

On Sunday night Duke took out another ACC foe, Georgia Tech, winning 71-62. That win gave head coach Mike Krzyzewski his 700th victory as coach of the Blue Devils.

What were they thinking?

The No. 18 West Virginia Mountaineers must have been watching game tape of Antoine Walker in preparation for its game against Providence (17-9). The Mountaineers attempted a season high 41 3-pointers in a loss against the Friars, 64-61. The Mountaineers finished 9-of-41 from 3-point land, just a .22 percentage. The Friars went 6-of-16 from beyond the arc. Mountaineer freshmen forward Da'Sean Butler led the charge from long range, going 0-for-6.

Rebels upset No. 13 Air Force

UNLV (23-6) moved up in the Mountain West Conference standings with a win over Air Force (23-5), 60-50. The Rebels led by senior guard Kevin Kruger, he finished with 14 points and a career-high 10 assists. The Rebels controlled the boards, they out-rebounded Air Force, 44-29.

UNLV is now in a tie at 10-4 for second place with Air Force in the MWC standings. No. 23 Brigham Young (20-6) is 10-2 and in first place in the conference.

Steve Games can be reached at sgames@student.umass.edu.

George Washington sits alone atop A-10

By Mike Gillmeister
Collegian Correspondent

The George Washington women's basketball team stands as the only team in the Atlantic 10 that has beaten a ranked team. This is one of the main reasons why the Colonials sit atop the A-10 with an undefeated record in conference play. George Washington's latest win came on the road on Sunday against Saint Louis. The Billikens were beaten 64-47.

However, it is not just luck that has befallen GW. The No. 9 Colonials are led by the strong play of junior guard Kimberly Beck, who notched 16 points and 6 assists for GW in the rout of Billikens. The Rotary Club of Detroit named Beck as one of the 11 finalists for the Nancy Lieberman Award, given to the nation's top point guard. She also leads the conference in assists with 137 and is in the top 25 in steals and scoring as well.

A-10 Basketball

Duke nuked

The abysmal record of the Duquesne Dukes took yet another hit this week as they were routed by St. Bonaventure by a score of 71-59. Senior guard Carmen Bruce was the high scorer for the Dukes with 21 points, three assists and two steals. Junior forward Jade Singleton also chipped in with 12 points and two assists.

Things didn't improve from their game against Massachusetts earlier in the week. Bruce again led the charge for the Dukes, alongside the consistent play of senior forward Loui Hall. Both had 18 points in 38 total minutes.

Currently, Duquesne is 2-10 in conference play and 7-18 overall. The Dukes are currently on a nine-game losing streak, and with their remaining games against A-10 rivals Temple (22-5, 12-0 A-10) and St. Joseph's (15-11, 7-5 A-10), Duquesne will be hard pressed to win another game before season's end.

Triple threat

Although La Salle is mediocre in conference play (17-10, 5-7 A-10), something can be said about the individual play of senior forward Crista Ricketts. She is in the top 10 in scoring (fifth, 16.7), rebounding (sixth, 7.5) and field goal percentage (sixth, 50.4 percent).

She showcased her skills last Saturday against Fordham. Ricketts was the Explorers' high scorer, achieving a double-double (18 points, 11 rebounds) in 31 total minutes played. Right behind Ricketts was senior guard Jenna Graber with 11 points and four assists.

Coming off the hard-fought win against Fordham, La Salle winds down its season with conference foes Charlotte (17-10, 8-4 A-10) and SLU (11-15, 3-9 A-10). Sitting at a less-than-stellar eighth in the conference standings, La Salle can only hope for a promising showing in front of the home crowd.

Bottom of the barrel

And then there was Fordham. The Rams have not won a basketball game since Feb. 4 when they defeated Duquesne by a final score of 74-65. The last effort by Fordham was a 66-54 loss to La Salle. Sophomore guard Annie Zopf had a career-high 19 points with five assists and two steals.

With a record of 3-23 (1-11 A-10), the Rams have little to look forward to with their remaining games against Xavier (21-7, 9-3 A-10) and Massachusetts (15-12, 5-7 A-10).

Mike Gillmeister can be reached at mgillmei@student.umass.edu

Styles by Deborah & Co.
HAIR SALON & SPA
65 University Drive, Amherst ~ 549-5610
Paul Mitchell Signature Salon
FREE HAIRCUT with any Color Service (of $70 or more)
$15 OFF any Color Service (of $70 or more)
$5 OFF any Haircut
Also specializing in chemical relaxing, pressing, and styling ethnic hair.
Coupon may not be combined. Offers expire 3/30/07

Tired of the Dorms?
IT'S NEVER TOO EARLY TO LOOK FOR AN APARTMENT WITH LINCOLN REAL ESTATE
Lincoln Real Estate
25 N. Pleasant St.
253-7879
www.amherstlincolnrealty.com
Now accepting applications for June 2008

Seven O's
Every Wednesday:
♦ KARAOKE ♦
Every Thursday:
♦ OPEN MIC ♦
Live Music This Week
Friday, February 23rd, 2007:
MARK SNOW
Saturday February 24th, 2007:
MARK SNOW
♦ Student Band Wanted ♦
Route 116, 330 Amherst Rd
Sunderland, MA 01375
(413) 665-8788
3 PM to 1 AM M-F
1 PM to 1 AM Sat-Sun
Next to Cuffside Apts

Free Delivery to UMass
Menu Online @ andiamo.cc

		1	5					3
		7		6	8		9	4
					2
5		6			7		8
				5
	7			9		3		6
			2
2	5		8	4		1
7					9	8

Find all of today's puzzle solutions online!
WWW.DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

ACROSS
1 Get lost!
5 Ger. automobile
9 Mental confidence
14 Soft mineral
15 Wish otherwise
16 Drug addict
17 Stepped down
18 Devotee
20 Kim of "Vertigo"
22 Exchange
23 Mas. mates
24 Night before
25 Most inactive
27 Mohammed's tomb location
30 Long time
31 Tanguay and Gabor
35 Vice President under Jefferson
37 10 sawbucks
38 New World nat.
39 Casual affirmative
40 Neighbor of Mont.
42 Pro's foe
43 Ledger entries
45 Athlete's wrist wrap
48 "Lohengrin" lady
49 Na Na
50 Ball lasses
51 Best score ever
54 Mythical bird
55 Altar vow
58 Hit the tub
59 "The ___ of Kilimanjaro"
62 ATMs and vending machines
65 Sketched
66 Maintain
67 Lawyers' grp.
68 Inspiration
69 Ramshackle shack
70 Colonng agent
71 "Baseball Tonight" stn
DOWN
1 Getz or Kenton
2 Circle of light
3 Green army uniforms
4 Mexican poet Paz
5 Lingerie item
6 Civvies
7 Stranger
8 First
9 Melancholy woodwinds
10 Operate
11 Quickly, shortly
12 Clytemnestra's mother
13 Aphrodite's boy
19 Dieter's unit
21 G and Chesney
26 X on a sundial
27 Bea Arthur sitcom
28 Artist's stand
29 Lincoln or Fortas
32 Singer's instrument?
33 Observe Yom Kippur
34 Transmits
36 Results
37 Provides the food for 41 Smidge
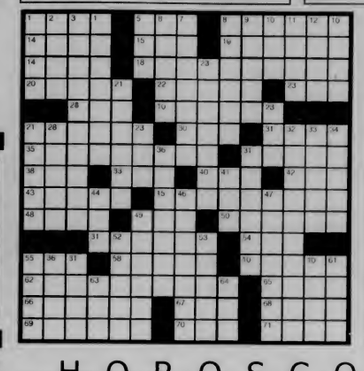
44 Roofer's gunk
46 Torpedo ilk
47 Dagwood's love
49 Meager
52 Critic Roger
53 Kentucky race
55 McKinley and Cantor
56 Menu item
57 Greek peak
60 Shed tears
61 ___ Lake
63 Functional quilt
64 Manuscript end

The Moan and Dove
why do you let yourself drink yellow beer?
themoanandadove.com
460 West St. • Rte 116
Amherst, MA • 256-1710
3pm 'til 1am every day



DELANO'S
"The Heart of downtown Amherst" is open...
Now and always,
Pass it on!

Quote of the Day

"Because if a machine, a Terminator, can learn the value of human life, maybe we can too."
-Linda Hamilton in "Terminator 2"

Paul By Billy O'Keefe

LOOK, ARE YOU OVER ME NOW OR WHAT? BECAUSE YOU'RE ACTING LIKE YOU'RE NOT, AND I DON'T THINK THAT'LL MAKE YOUR NEW GIRL HAPPY
AS... OKAY, SO WE CAN BE FRIENDS THEN?
THAT'D BE FINE.
AND NO MORE WEIRD CRAP?
WELL NOW THAT I CAN'T PROMISE 'CAT REAL...
WEAR A SWEATER, IT'S COLD OUTSIDE!
PSSH. OF COURSE I'M OVER YOU. AS IF WELL ALL RIGHT, I'LL DO THAT.

Welcome To Falling Rock National Park By Josh Shalek

I turned wife a beanstalk because I ate Aur magic beans
I was told I'd get three wishes after the beans sprouted
Use one of your wishes to turn me back into an owl
Just a second there professor Is that the best use of a wish
I would threaten You, but there isn't much a beanstalk can do
Try bribery

A College Girl Named Joe By Aaron Warner

WHAT'S WRONG WITH YOU, GABBY? YOU SEEM A LITTLE CRANKY.
IT'S THAT TIME OF THE MONTH WHEN I'M MOODY, AND SHORT-TEMPERED, AND JUST WANT TO STAY IN BED ALL DAY.
OH, BOY. DO I KNOW THAT FEELING.
I HATE GETTING MY FINANCIAL AID STATEMENT.

Two Dudes By Aaron Warner

Horoscopes

aquarius Jan. 20-Feb. 18
Be like the mighty sparrow and twitch wildly no matter what you're doing.

pisces Feb. 19-Mar. 20
If your day feels like its too long, remember, its a lifetime for a fruit fly.

aries Mar. 21-Apr. 19
Forgo all academic activities until you figure out how to complete a Rubix Cube.

taurus Apr. 20-May 20
You dont know what you've got until its gone, unless it's Ebola.

gemini May 21-Jun. 21
French toast bagels are for people who can't make decisions. You can't have both!

cancer Jun. 22-Jul. 22
You look like the man in the advertisement below this horoscope.

leo Jul. 23-Aug. 22
You're more alive than J-e-l-l-o! Plus, your endorsed by Dr. Huxtable himself.

virgo Aug. 23-Sept. 22
Forget cream and sugar in your coffee, try dissolving a peppermint. YEEEHAA!

libra Sept. 23-Oct. 22
Its getting warmer, I'd say it's safe to lick metal poles again.

scorpio Oct. 23-Nov. 21
If you're feeling grouchy, cover your body in honey. Only then will you be sweet.

sagittarius Nov. 22-Dec. 21
In the future, everyone will wear plaid sweater vests.

capricorn Dec. 22-Jan. 19
Friends come and go, but chunky peanut butter is always there for you.

Chicago Pizzaria
Free Delivery!
PIZZA - CALZONES - SUBS - WRAPS
SALADS - PASTA - DINNERS
RIBS - SEAFOOD - SLICES
PARTY SIZE PIZZA NOW AVAILABLE!
CALZONE SLICES...LIKE NO OTHER!
Now open for lunch!
Hours
Sun-Wed: 11am-2am
Thurs-Sat: 11am-3am
Order For DELIVERY or PICK-UP
(413) 549-6073
150 Fearing Street
Next to Patterson Dorm
Amherst, MA 01002

Massachusetts Daily Collegian Marketplace

Announcements

Global Express Tours Spring Break Montreal Party Weekends from $99 Complete bus, hotels, & clubs. Montrealexpress.net 781-979-9001

Apartments for Rent

Hobart Condos 3 bedroom, hardwood floors, study area in basement. Cable telephone Internet access) in all bedrooms and study. NOW SHOWING for JUNE and SEPTEMBER. NO FEES. www.amherstlincolnrealty.com 253-7879

Center of town, 1,2,3 bedrooms hardwood floors. NOW SHOWING for JUNE and SEPTEMBER. NO FEES www.amherstlincolnrealty.com 253-7879

Apartments for Rent

Brandywine Apts. Now Leasing, 1&2 bedroom apts. Leases begin Jun, July, Aug or Sep. First Come First Serve. Get Them while they last. www.brandywineapts.com stop by or call 549-0600

Employment

WORK ONLINE AT HOME 23 people needed immediately. Earn PT/FT income. Apply FREE online and get started! 800-807-5176 www.wahusa.com Enter Ad Code 9053

Bartending $300/day potential. No experience necs. Training provided. 1-800-965-6520 ext.162

Employment

SUMMER ON CAPE COD!! The Wychmere Harbor Beach Club is conducting interviews for summer employment on our Cape Cod property March 8, 9, 10, 22, 23, 24. On-site Housing is available. Visit our website at www.wychmereharbor.com for available positions and call (508) 432-1000 x129 for details!

Winter/ Spring positions available. Earn up to $150 per day Exp not required. Undercover shoppers needed To Judge Retail and Dining Establishments. Call 800-722-4791

Employment

Rent us your ears! Listening Experiments $10/hr English must be your first language. Email: phonetics_lab@linguist.umass.edu voicemail: 545-6837

Dell Campus Reps Needed Promote a top 30 company to gain real-world business & marketing experience! www.repnation.com/dell to apply.

House for Rent

Northampton Cathedral ceiling, sky-lites, hardwood floors, 4-5 bdrms. 9/1 $1950. 413-730-6660

Room for Rent

Room for rent in S. Amherst by bus stop. $450/mo 301-938-0038

Services

Pregnancy Testing. HIV Testing, Birth Control, and Emergency Contraception. STI Screening and Treatment. Affordable and confidential. Tapestry Health, 27 Pray Street, Amherst. 548-9992. www.tapestryhealth.com

Travel

Global Express Tours Spring Break Montreal Party Weekends from $99 Complete bus, hotels, & clubs. Montrealexpress.net 781-979-9001

Wanted

EGG DONORS NEEDED $10,000 (Plus all expenses) We are seeking women who are attractive, under the age of 29, SAT 1300+ (math+verbal), Physically fit and maintaining a healthy lifestyle. If you have a desire to help an infertile family and would like more information please contact us. Email: Darlene@aperfectmatch.com www.aperfectmatch.com 1-800-264-8828

www.dailycollegian.com

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

SPORTS THURSDAY

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 22, 2007 SPORTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Top dogs once again

Senior captain Rashaun Freeman goes up for two of his 16 points in UMass' 83-44 drubbing of St. Bonaventure at the Mullins Center last night. The win, and Rhode Island's loss to Xavier, puts the Minutemen in a first-place tie with the Musketeers.

Freeman, Lasme dominate paint

BY DANNY PICARD
COLLEGIAN STAFF

It was just another night at the office for Stephane Lasme and Rashaun Freeman. The duo dominated in the paint and combined for 33 points in the Massachusetts men's basketball team's 83-44 blowout over St. Bonaventure last night at the Mullins Center.

UMass 83
St. Bona 44

The Minutemen (20-7, 10-3 Atlantic 10) moved into a tie with Xavier for first place as well, thanks to the Musketeers' 98-72 win over Rhode Island this evening.

UMass wiped the floor with the Bonnies (6-20, 3-10 A-10), and earned its 20th win in the process. It marks the first 20-win season for the Minutemen since 1997-98 when they finished the year 21-11.

"That's always been a bench mark, but hopefully we still have a lot more wins to go," UMass coach Travis Ford said. "We're by no means going to rest after 20. We need to keep our eye on the big picture and what we're trying to achieve here.

"We played well, so I wouldn't call it easy at all," Ford said. "We were just bigger and stronger than they were."

Lasme and Freeman each played less than seven minutes in the second half, but by the time they were taken out for good, UMass had already ended the game.

Lasme finished with a game-high 17 points in 20 minutes. Freeman scored 16 points in 23 minutes.

"That's what we're supposed to do," Lasme said on blowing the Bonnies out of the Mullins

See M. BASKETBALL on page 8

Minutemen take care of business

BY ROB GREENFIELD
COLLEGIAN STAFF

They took care of business last night. And that's all they needed to do.

The Massachusetts men's basketball team beat Saint Bonaventure – a bottom-feeder in the Atlantic 10 on the verge of missing the conference tournament – by a score of 88-43 in front of 6,203 of the UMass faithful.

Senior captains Stephane Lasme and Rashaun Freeman were spectacular as usual. The Twin Towers assaulted the Mullins Center rims with a parade of dunks and strong finishes, and the Minutemen swiftly dismantled the lowly Bonnies to push their conference record to an impressive 10-3.

The game had the potential to trap the cruising Minutemen, who were firing on all cylinders after road wins over Fordham and Dayton, which treated UMass to sell-out crowds on both occasions.

It was an anti-climactic endeavor last night. The crowd wasn't going to do the Minutemen any favors (one of the student sections was mostly empty) and UMass coach Travis Ford has admittedly been puzzled by his team's inconsistent energy this season.

"We say every day that it's

See TRAP GAME on page 8

Pre-tourney trip to Ohio for UM

BY ED ROSENWIRZ
COLLEGIAN STAFF

In two weeks time the Minutemen women's basketball team (11-[illegible] Atlantic 10) will travel to Cincinnati, Ohio for the Atlantic 10 tournament. But first, UMass must travel to Dayton for tonight's tilt against the Dayton Flyers (11-16, 6-6 A-10), a matchup which will largely decide where each team is seeded in the tournament.

With just two games left in the regular season, the Minutemen trail the Flyers by one and one game in the conference standings. Both Dayton and UMass currently stand in eighth position in the conference with a win tonight would [illegible] Dayton.

"I think it's [illegible]

UMass coach Marnie Dicko said. "We need to finish up strong and play as good of basketball as we've played all year. There are really no excuses, the seeding in the tournament is on the line and we need to be thinking about performing for the tournament."

Dayton comes off a dramatic 78-[illegible] victory over conference foe Saint Joseph's on Saturday and will be looking to carry that momentum against the Minutemen. Junior guard Kathy Gnot drilled a 3-pointer with just 1.4 seconds remaining to claim the victory. The Flyers have won two consecutive games and are unbeaten in their last three at home.

Despite losing against Xavier on

See W. BASKETBALL on page 9

Freshman Erin Benton continues to lead the Minutemen in 3-point percentage. She was 3-of-3 from long range against Xavier.

Minutewomen squander first-half lead

BY KEVIN DOOLEY
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Alexis Venechanos' tenure as coach of the Massachusetts women's lacrosse team could not have got off to a more wild and unpredictable start.

Five different players scored for UMass in the opening half to build a 5-0 lead over the Holy Cross Crusaders before the defending Patriot League Champions came storming back in the second half to erase the five-goal deficit and go on to win, 7-6, at Hart Field.

HC 7
UMass 6

The Crusaders (1-0) comeback effort was led by Kristine Corkum at attack, who landed each one of her four shots in the back of the cage, including the game-winner with just a 1:16 on the clock. Holy Cross notched four of its seven second-half goals in the first ten minutes of the half.

"We just weren't doing the same things we were doing in the first half," Venechanos said. "[Holy Cross] stepped up in the second half and no one on our team stepped up with them."

Holy Cross has now beaten UMass in back-to-back season openers.

The Maroon and White (0-1) will have two days to get back on track before traveling to the state capital to square off with the No. 16 Boston University Terriers Saturday afternoon at 1 p.m.

But ironically, it was the first half of games that wasn't UMass strong point a season ago. It was outscored in the opening frame of games last year, 106-79. In last season's tilt between these two teams it was Holy Cross, who got off to the 5-1 start in the first 30 minutes of action before UMass responded in the second half with 7 goals in a losing effort, 11-8.

Sophomore midfielder Meghan Reddy got the scoring started 10 minutes into the contest on UMass' third shot of the game. Reddy had 12 goals all of last season.

Four minutes later, junior Kathleen Typadis recorded the first of what promises to be a high number of goals for the Minutewomen this season. Typadis also registered UMass' lone goal in the second half at the 11:46 mark.

Freshman attack Stephanie Hopkins didn't waste anytime getting her name in the UMass box score, recording her first collegiate goal and the team's final goal of the half. The two other goals were contributed by senior midfielder Samantha Sepulavada and junior attacker Melynda Zwick.

The second half belonged to the Crusaders, as the Minutewomen were outshot, 14-12, while allowing six unanswered goals. Redshirt-senior goaltender Lauren McCarthy surrendered seven goals on 14 shots to the Crusaders.

KAREN WINDER/COLLEGIAN

Junior Melynda Zwick scored one of the Minutewomen's five first-half goals in UMass' loss to Holy Cross yesterday.

Holy Cross' leading goal-scorer from a year ago, Patricia Sutton, notched two goals, while Amy Archambault recorded a goal and an assist as well.

The Crusaders were outshot 15-7 in the opening half and 27-21 for the game, but UMass was plagued by fouls, committing 24 infractions as opposed to just nine by Holy Cross.

UMass is now 15-12-1 all-time in season openers and 4-2 all time when beginning the season with the Crusaders.

Kevin Dooley can be reached at kdooley@student.umass.edu.

UMass early leader at Atlantic 10s

Diving propels women, while Swisher leads Minutemen

BY JOE MELONI
COLLEGIAN STAFF

BUFFALO, N.Y. – After day one of the 2007 Atlantic 10 Swimming and Diving Championships, both the Massachusetts men's and women's swimming and diving teams occupy first place.

Strong performances in the women's one-meter diving event propelled the Minutewomen into the top spot while senior Ivan Swisher proved why many consider him the Minutemen's top swimmer.

Although La Salle junior Katie Gifford invented UMass, sophomore Karen Epperson is A-10 Champion on the one-meter diving board, the Minutewomen in the event finished in the next four spots scoring 58 points.

"Both divers finishing two-three-four-five – a lot for us," UMass women's swimming coach Bob Seweryniak said. "It really shows what [UMass diving coach] Mandy [Hixon] had to work with and how good of a coach she is. They never want to lose, but [Gifford] is a great diver."

The Richmond women won both the 200-yard medley relay and 800-yard freestyle relay, setting school and A-10 records in the process. The Spiders entered the A-10 finals as the favorites and, although they sit behind the Minutewomen after the first day, look like the team to beat in the women's event.

A UMass school record fell in the day's first nice. The 200-yard medley relay team of freshman Elizabeth Walsh, freshman Cecelia Jenkins, sophomore Christa Narus and junior Allison Volpe beat the previous mark of 1 minute, 47.48 seconds by one-hundredth of a second, at 1:47.47.

In the 800-yard freestyle relay, the performance of senior Liz Lovejoy was the story of the day for the Minutewomen. She swam the final leg of the race and entered the pool just behind the swimmer from Duquesne. Lovejoy proceeded to swim the fastest 200-yard freestyle in school history. Her split of 1:50.9 is just under two full seconds faster than the current school record, but because it took place as part of a relay, it is not considered a new record. Walsh, Narus and sophomore Taryn Prout made up the rest of the relay team.

See SWIMMING AND DIVING on page 9

LAX IS BACK | PAGE 12 STARS PREPARE TO SHINE | PAGE 6

THE MASSACHUSETTS

DAILY COLLEGIAN

NEW ENGLAND'S LARGEST COLLEGE DAILY EST 1890

SNOW : HI: 27 LO: 11 WWW.DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 23, 2007

The sign of a true fan

Sign Man redefines meaning of enthusiasm

BY HOLLY SEABURY
COLLEGIAN STAFF

At first glance, Edward Rubin seems like the average University of Massachusetts alumnus. By day, he is an elected member of the UMass Alumni Association Board and the owner of Harvard Marketing Group, Insurance and Financial Services. By night, Rubin becomes a man UMass sees as one of the biggest sports fans in the arena, a man motivating both players and fellow fans to step up the game.

Edward Rubin is Sign Man.

A native of Everett, currently living in Harvard, Rubin was a freshman at UMass and attended his first football game in 1965 when Warren P. McGuirk Alumni Stadium was first played in.

Any student who has attended a UMass basketball or football game in the last 13 years has seen Sign Man. He is the gentleman sporting UMass apparel and holding a variety of large signs, walking around either the basketball arena or football stadium periodically throughout each game.

His first sign appeared in 1994 at a UMass basketball game against Florida State. When Rubin discovered he got "an interesting reaction" to the sign, he decided to come up with more ideas and to start getting crafty.

See SIGN MAN on page 4

Edward Rubin, also known as the Sign Man, has been cheering on the sidelines of UMass sporting events for nearly 13 years.

Students react to changes in housing policy

Housing Services no longer allows same-room requests

BY DAVID HUMPHREYS
COLLEGIAN STAFF

As the deadline for housing selection approaches, many returning students at the University of Massachusetts are noticing a change in the application process. Due to a Housing Assignment Office (HAO) policy implemented earlier this year, the same-room reservations – once a campus commonplace – are no longer available to returning students.

According to the HAO Room Selection Bulletin for Fall 2007, only 1000 students opted to keep the same room. Many students, even if they do not decide to follow through with the reservation, would still like the option to be kept open.

A Facebook.com group, "Same Room Reservation Petition", is designed to lobby for the "Student's right to reserve their housing assignment." This group claims that students should "stick up for [their] ability to stay in [their] current assignment."

Nate Pitcher, founder of the group, wrote on the group's wall that he "has a feeling that if students were consulted in these new changes, the same-room reservation would have been kept in place, and the new room-selection system would be used as well."

Junior Sean McNair, one of the officers for the Facebook group, commented that "it's not about how many students use the feature – it's about how many students want the security of it."

Some students, including McNair, are upset and confused by this new housing policy and are concerned about their current housing situation. McNair is worried about his future residence in the North apartments, saying, "Students need ample notice in order to make preparations for the possibility of losing housing."

Jenna Patila, a sophomore who wanted to "pull" a friend into her room next semester is upset by the HAO's decision to put an end to same-room reservations. She believes that the issue should have been addressed sooner so students could make prior arrangements.

But some HAO staff members believe the changes in the housing policy will benefit the on-campus housing situation. Jean Ahlstrand MacKimmie believes the cancellation of this housing policy to be a "positive change."

Citing the fact that many first year and Residential Academic Progams (RAP) students would not be able to return to their rooms while many other students are being displaced due to the increase in Epoch housing, MacKimmie said that this change "makes the housing process fair" by allowing an equal chance for each student to live where they want.

In response to student outcry about the issue, MacKimmie commented that "people are surprised by change." She said the decision to stop the same-room reservation has been part of the residence hall contract for this entire academic year.

"While Student Affairs always makes an effort to get student input, I'm not sure why the Housing Assignments Office couldn't do the same before they created this policy," said McNair.

The HAO Bulletin reads: "the residence hall contract was amended in July 2006 to eliminate same-room selection from the room-selection process. All students will have an opportunity to participate in [the housing selection] and that the students [Room Selection] Priority will be used to determine their appointment times and selection order." Priority will be used in all housing requests, including single-room assignments and the North Apartments.

The upcoming housing selection dates can be found on the HAO Web site.

David Humphreys can be reached at dhumphre@student.umass.edu

Military funding stirs debate

BY KEVIN FOLEY
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Research universities, including the University of Massachusetts-Amherst, receive research grants every year from sources like the National Science Foundation, the National Institutes of Health and the U.S. Department of Agriculture. One particular funding source stirred debate on WMUA's Up Front on Tuesday – military funding.

The Defense Advanced Research Projects Agency (DARPA) is a military organization that is interested in maintaining the technological superiority of the U.S. military, according to their mission statement. DARPA provides funding for various research projects on the UMass campus.

Mark Corner, a computer science professor, received military funding for his research on wireless networks.

"I'm doing something positive with the money. I think it helps society," Corner said. "You have to look at it from the standpoint of what are we doing with the money and how does it benefit society."

Justin Jackson, a graduate student in history at UMass, believes the University should not accept any military funding.

"In my perspective, that's blood money. The United States is an international criminal organization," Jackson said. "The line of responsibility goes all the way down to the man in the trenches. It's not enforced that way, but it does."

Jackson, who has been actively opposing the War in Iraq since 2002, believes that professors who receive military funding are indirectly supporting the military's efforts.

"It's very easy for people to compartmentalize and make distinctions," Jackson said. "But the war and military funding are connected."

"Military funding has been around a lot longer than the War in Iraq, and it will be around a lot longer. I look at them as two separate issues," Corner said. "My personal feeling is that we should have pulled out a long time ago but that is not going to stop me from doing research for the military."

Jackson expresses his fear of today's scientific military research being compared to 1930's and 1940's Germany.

"I haven't asked that the University stop receiving federal funding, only military funding. I don't deny that some military funding leads to improvements in society," Jackson said. "I don't think the military gives funding for the purpose of improving society."

"I understand the sentiment of war is a terrible thing. I'd hope the benefits outweigh the costs," Corner said. "In a perfect world I would like to see some research on peace."

Corner believes that if UMass stopped receiving military funding, the result could possibly be fewer faculty and fewer students.

"In this day and age there are a lot of places to get funding from," he said.

Justin Jackson of the History Department opposes military funding.

DARPA is one of the largest funding sources, according to Corner.

"A university is nothing more than a collection of its faculty. We make decisions on an individual basis," Corner said. "Everyone draws the line in a different place."

The College of Engineering (COE) has between five and 10 military projects in operation at any given time, according to Mike Malone, dean of the COE.

Up Front airs on WMUA, 91.1, on Tuesdays at 4 p.m.

Ky. considering 'fire-safe' cigarettes

BY BRUCE SCHREINER
ASSOCIATED PRESS

BARDSTOWN, KY. – Debbie Coulter said she supports the right to smoke at her restaurant, but the 52-year-old shudders when she recalls a recent incident in which she fell asleep smoking and her nightgown caught fire.

"It scares me to death," said Coulter, whose husband helped extinguish the fire. "I could have lost everything – my husband would have had to bury me."

But 10 others at a recent house fire in the town died after, investigators believe, a lit cigarette set a chair aflame. That fire has sparked calls from fire prevention advocates to require all cigarettes sold in the state to be "fire safe," or made to extinguish when dropped or not inhaled for a period.

"We should act quickly to make sure we don't have those kinds of tragedies in the future," said Lorraine Carli, a spokeswoman for the National Fire Protection Association, which is supporting measures in the state House of Representatives and Senate. Her group says lawmakers in at least 19 other states are considering similar legislation.

The state Senate passed a measure that would require the conversion to fire-safe cigarettes on Tuesday, and a similar one has cleared a state House of Representatives committee.

Persuading smokers to quit would be a tough proposition in Kentucky, where tobacco has deep cultural roots. The state has traditionally been one of nation's leading producers of burley tobacco, an ingredient in cigarettes. And Kentucky's 2005 adult smoking rate of 28.7 percent ranked first in the U.S.

But Carli says the push to switch to fire-safe cigarettes is not anti-smoking, it is to improve public safety.

"It has little to do with smoking and has everything to do with saving lives," she said.

Nationally, 700 to 900 people die each year from fires caused by smoking materials such as cigarettes, according to the fire prevention group.

In Kentucky, about a third of fire deaths are caused by blazes sparked by cigarettes or other smoking materials, according to State Fire Marshal Rodney Raby.

In 2004, New York became the first state to require fire-safe cigarettes to be sold, and fire officials

See CIGARETTES on page 3

Debbie Coulter, stands in her restaurant Monday, in Bardstown, Ky. Coulter said she has fallen asleep with a cigarette in her hand and has been burned.

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN
CXVII
ISSUE 89

113 Campus Center University of Massachusetts Amherst, MA 01003
• 413-545-3500 •
• Fax 413-545-3699 •
www.dailycollegian.com

EDITOR IN CHIEF Eric Athas
MANAGING EDITOR Rob Greenfield
BUSINESS MANAGER Dan Conti
PRODUCTION MANAGER Amanda Allen
NIGHT SUPERVISOR Sherel Wolnik
ADVERTISING MANAGER Jaimeson Porter
ADVERTISING PRODUCTION Molly Eggleston
ARTS & LIVING EDITOR Morgan Rousseau
COPIES EDITOR Adam Stagen
EDITORIAL EDITOR Tucker Merrick
NEWS EDITOR Matt Belliveau
SPORTS EDITOR Danns Picard
SPORTS EDITOR Jon Pelland
CIRCULATION MANAGER Jeff Penz
FINANCE MANAGER David Valade
ASSISTANT OPERATIONS Linda Wallack
ASSISTANT ADVERTISING Nicole Puddester
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Tim McCall
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Sydney Towne
ASSISTANT NEWS Anna Dolianitis
ASSISTANT NEWS Nicole Boonjakuakul
ASSISTANT EDITORIAL Brendan Hall
ASSISTANT SPORTS Jeremy Rice
WEB EDITOR James Hale
PHOTO EDITOR Toan Trinh

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN IS PUBLISHED MONDAY THROUGH FRIDAY DURING THE UNIVERSITY OF MASSACHUSETTS CALENDAR SEMESTER. THE COLLEGIAN IS INDEPENDENTLY FUNDED, OPERATING ON ADVERTISING REVENUE. FOUNDED IN 1890, THE PAPER BEGAN AS ALGIE LIFE, BECAME THE COLLEGE SIGNAL IN 1901, THE WEEKLY COLLEGIAN IN 1914 AND THE TRI-WEEKLY COLLEGIAN IN 1956. PUBLISHED DAILY SINCE 1967, THE COLLEGIAN HAS BEEN BROADSHEET SINCE JANUARY 1994. FOR ADVERTISING RATES AND INFORMATION, CALL WEEKDAYS BETWEEN 8:30 A.M. AND 3:30 P.M.

PRODUCTION CREW
On staff today

NIGHT EDITOR
Rob Greenfield

COPY EDITOR
Courtney Souza

PRODUCTION SUPERVISOR
Chris Martin

Study: herpes drug reduces transmission risk of AIDS virus

BY ALICIA CHANG
ASSOCIATED PRESS

Treating genital herpes can also help keep the AIDS virus under control in women with both infections, and might reduce the spread of HIV, too, the first major study to test this strategy suggests. Many people with HIV are also infected with the herpes type 2 virus, and scientists have long known that herpes sores on the genitals can make it easier to become infected with the AIDS virus and could increase the risk of transmitting HIV to others.

In the latest study, conducted in Africa and published in Thursday's New England Journal of Medicine, women who took the herpes drug valacyclovir had less HIV in their blood and in their genital secretions.

The study did not look at whether the drug, sold as Valtrex by GlaxoSmithKline PLC, actually reduces transmission of the AIDS virus. However, scientists generally have found that the more virus someone has, the greater the risk of transmission.

Doctors have been looking for novel ways to treat and prevent HIV infection, particularly in poor countries where few can afford modern AIDS drugs and the stigma keeps many from taking them. Researchers recently found that circumcision lowers the risk of spreading HIV, and they hope the same will prove true of treating herpes.

"It does open some potential avenues to slowing down the HIV epidemic," said Dr. Lawrence Corey, a leading herpes researcher at the University of Washington who had no role in the study but has received research grants from Glaxo.

There are 40,000 new HIV infections in the U.S. each year and 4.3 million new cases worldwide. Previous studies have shown that herpes infections can triple a person's chance of acquiring HIV and can make HIV-positive individuals more infectious.

In the study, 140 women from the West African nation of Burkina Faso who were infected with both the herpes and AIDS viruses received either valacyclovir or dummy pills for three months. Participants were not taking other AIDS medications.

Doctors took vaginal swabs and drew blood samples twice a week to measure HIV levels.

Those who took the drug ended up with less HIV in the bloodstream, with their count dropping from an average 20,000 virus copies per milliliter of blood to 8,000 copies. The placebo group saw their HIV levels spike, from an average of 50,000 virus copies per milliliter of blood to 63,000.

The treatment group was also less likely to have HIV in their genital tract – 13 percent had detectable virus levels during each visit, compared with 27 percent in the placebo group.

The study involved researchers from France, England and Burkina Faso and was funded by the French national AIDS research agency, ANRS.

One of the study's authors, Dr. Philippe Mayaud of the London School of Hygiene & Tropical Medicine, called for more research on herpes control methods, including the development of a herpes vaccine. Mayaud has received research support from Glaxo.

A larger study funded by the Bill and Melinda Gates Foundation is under way that aims to be the definitive word on whether treating herpes patients with acyclovir, the first herpes drug, can slow down HIV transmission.

Some AIDS specialists said it is unlikely herpes drugs will be the first line of defense against AIDS. However, they said such treatment could be useful in preventing HIV transmission in Third World countries without access to modern AIDS drugs.

"If, heaven forbid, we didn't have treatments for HIV, this would be something we would use. Fortunately, we have much better therapies to treat HIV," said Dr. Michael Saag, director of the AIDS Center at the University of Alabama at Birmingham. He has consulted for Glaxo.

Clinton backs minority students

Democratic presidential hopeful U.S. Sen. Hillary Clinton, D-NY, meets supporters after holding a town-hall style event at Allen University, Monday in Columbia, S.C.

BY BRENDAN FARRINGTON
ASSOCIATED PRESS

MIAMI — Democratic presidential candidate Hillary Rodham Clinton on Tuesday criticized President Bush's education policy as doing little to help minorities and acknowledged that she is still searching for ways to raise minority student test scores.

More needs to be done to prepare children for school and to get parents involved in their education, Clinton said while visiting a historic black neighborhood during her first campaign trip to Florida since announcing her candidacy. She said Bush's No Child Left Behind Act isn't providing a solution for raising test scores.

"This achievement gap is deeply troubling to me," Clinton said. "If we don't invest in our children, our society and our economy will decline. This is not just something nice to do, this is something that we have to do."

Clinton, a New York senator and former first lady, spoke and took questions for an hour from the mostly black audience of 300 in the Liberty City neighborhood. The event was sandwiched between fundraisers in Tampa, Miami and Hollywood that were closed to the press.

"The federal government can do more to help minority businesses by writing a road map for banks' rules in the communities", Clinton said.

"We've got to change our laws so that they inspire and motivate more lending institutions to look at how they can serve the entire community again," she said. "We've got to get them to look at a community even if they are multinational banks and we can do that through regulation and law."

Clinton also called for microlending programs and helping business owners to develop stronger business plans so they are more credit worthy.

The Liberty City event was a signal that Clinton is going to fight hard to keep black voters on her side in a primary race in which Sen. Barack Obama (news, bio, voting record) of Illinois, who is black, is gaining popularity.

"The black community is betwixt and between. We all love Clinton, but at the same time Obama has a lot of people who love him in the community, too," said Hans Ottinot, a 38-year-old Haitian-American lawyer who grew up in the neighborhood.

"She's showing us, 'Look, the black community has been a major supporter and I want to keep you as a major supporter.' It's a clear message. I don't think it was subtle," Ottinot said.

After the community meeting, Clinton attended a $100-per-ticket cocktail reception in Hollywood, which was followed by a reception at $2,500 per person.

Her campaign announced endorsements from Florida Reps. Debbie Wasserman Schultz (news, bio, voting record) and Alcee Hastings (news, bio, voting record), whose Broward County district is predominantly black.

Minn. leads in US energy policy

BY BRIAN BAIST
ASSOCIATED PRESS

ST. PAUL, Minn. — Minnesota put its faith in a future fueled by renewable energy Thursday as the governor signed a law requiring utilities to generate a quarter of their power from renewable sources such as wind, water and sun by 2025. Considering where Minnesota stands now – about half the power produced in the state is from coal, and only 5 percent from renewable sources – the move is the most aggressive in the country, analysts say.

"We have to break our addiction to fossil fuels," Gov. Tim Pawlenty said in signing the legislation.

The new law, which sailed through the Legislature, encourages the use of wind farms, hydroelectric power and solar energy, as well as cleaner-burning fuels.

Minnesota's numerical goal trails targets already in place for Maine and New York, but those states had been getting a significant amount of electricity from large-scale hydropower facilities before their standards were adopted, according to data from the Interstate Renewable Energy Council and the Union of Concerned Scientists.

Minnesota depends on coal for almost half of the power produced in the state, while using wind, water and other renewable sources for about 5 percent, said Mike Hull, assistant commissioner for renewable energy at the state Commerce Department.

"As of a percentage of where all their electricity will come from, Minnesota is now in the lead with this policy in terms of supporting new renewable energy development," said Jeff Deyette, energy analyst at the Union of Concerned Scientists.

Minnesota's previous objective was to encourage power producers to draw 10 percent of retail electricity from renewable sources by 2015.

Under the new law, all 12 utilities and municipal power consortiums except Xcel Energy Inc. would be bound by the 25-by-2025 standard. Xcel, which delivers half of Minnesota's electricity, would have to meet a 30 percent by 2020 benchmark.

Minnesota's move comes as states around the country stake out far-off goals for renewable energy.

More than 20 states have some type of renewable requirement or good-faith objective. Colorado is moving toward a standard of 20 percent by 2020, while New Hampshire Gov. John Lynch challenged lawmakers last week to adopt a 25 percent by 2025 requirement.

Clean-energy advocates are also pressuring Congress to adopt a goal of getting 25 percent of the nation's energy – electricity, motor fuel and other power – from renewable sources by 2025 and reduce reliance on foreign imports.

A new Minnesota law requires at least a quarter use of renewable energy for utility generation, using resources such as wind, water and sun.

Custody battle leads N.Y. cops to stomach-churning squalor

BY FRANK ELTMAN
ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEW YORK — Police called to a suburban family's home encountered a stomach-churning scene dozens of urine-filled bottles strewn amid animal feces, soiled toilet paper and trash piled several feet high.

The discovery at the white, two-story Cape Cod-style house was made after authorities were summoned by a man embroiled in a bitter divorce; his estranged wife lived there with their three children.

"The stench would drop you to your knees," the estranged husband, Raymond Young Jr., told reporters Wednesday after leading them on a tour of the home he once shared with Deborah Young and their daughters, ages 10, 12 and 14.

A judge scheduled a hearing Friday to consider a request by the husband's attorney to have the children removed from their mother's custody. A Suffolk County police spokeswoman also confirmed that the case had been referred to Child Protective Services.

"No one can live in the house," attorney Joseph Quatela said. "There are hundreds of bottles filled with urine, there are stacks four or five foot high of used toilet paper."

Quatela said the Youngs' divorce proceedings began in 2003. Since then, Young has lost visitation rights, and has had to refute accusations that he sexually abused them, the attorney said. Raymond Young's parents, whom Quatela described as "pillars of their community," also were accused of sexually abusing the girls, but said an investigation determined those claims to be unfounded, he said.

The estranged wife's attorney did not immediately return a telephone call seeking comment.

Deborah Young, who reportedly was visiting her parents in upstate New York, told Newsday in Thursday editions that her husband had no right to be inside the house.

Asked about her estranged husband's claims, she said, "Well, I don't know how much of any mess might be mine and how much they did. They've been coming in and out of the house through the basement."

Raymond Young Jr., a diesel mechanic at his father's heating oil delivery business, was paying for oil deliveries to the house as part of his divorce agreement, Quatela said.

Beginning in November, oil deliverers noticed that the tank remained full each time they came to make a delivery. In the past several weeks, Quatela said his client began receiving reports that his ex-wife and children were sitting in a vehicle in their driveway – sometimes for hours at a time, leading him to suspect there was no heat in the home.

"This is not a financial issue," Quatela said. "He has always supported his children."

Dennis Novak of Suffolk County's Family and Children Services unit, said policy prevented him from confirming any investigation, but did concede the police department was required to make a referral whenever an allegation of child abuse is made. He said when there is an allegation, an investigator is dispatched to the home within 24 hours to initiate an investigation.

Investigators seek to determine if children are receiving basic shelter, sanitation and heat. When it is determined there is a safety hazard, or a parent is unwilling or unable to remedy the situation, cases may eventually be referred to family court and in extreme situations the children could be removed from the home.

Citing privacy rules, Novak also could not comment on Quatela's claims that his client had been investigated for sex abuse allegations.

Looking for business experience??

The Daily Collegian is currently seeking qualified applicants to fill the positions of:

- Business Manager
- Assistant Business Manager
- Distribution Manager

Contact Daniel Conti at 413-545-3500 for more information or stop by the Collegian in the basement of the Campus Center.

Circumcision reduces HIV risk

BY MARIA CHENG
ASSOCIATED PRESS

LONDON — Scientists say conclusive data shows there is no question circumcision reduces men's chances of catching HIV by up to 60 percent – finding experts are hailing as a major breakthrough in the fight against AIDS. Now, the question is how to put that fact to work to combat AIDS across Africa.

The findings first were announced in December, when initial results from two major trials – in Kenya and Uganda – showed promising links between circumcision and HIV transmission. However, those trials were deemed so definitive that the tests were halted early.

The full data from the trials, carried out by the United States' National Institutes of Health, were published Friday in The Lancet.

Circumcision has long been suspected of reducing men's susceptibility to HIV infection because the cells in the foreskin of the penis are especially vulnerable to the virus.

A modeling study done last year projected that in the next decade, male circumcision could prevent 2 million AIDS infections and 300,000 deaths. Last year, 2.8 million people in sub-Saharan Africa became infected with HIV, and 2.1 million people died.

Experts say the breakthrough is a significant one on par with the identification of the virus and the use of lifesaving combination drug therapy.

The two U.S. studies confirm similar results from an earlier trial in South Africa. Given the recent failure of a microbicide trial in Africa and India, and the ongoing difficulties in developing an AIDS vaccine, the potential of circumcision as a new weapon against HIV has become even more significant.

"Male circumcision is such a sensitive religious and cultural issue that we need to be careful," she said.

Several African countries have already met with U.N. agencies to explore new strategies for increasing circumcision services. Swaziland, for instance, recently experimented with a series of "Circumcision Saturdays," where existing health care facilities, normally closed on weekends, were opened by local doctors to circumcise approximately 40 men a day on certain Saturdays.

In recent years, the fight against the AIDS pandemic has focused on the provision of lifesaving drugs. The circumcision data gives prevention, rather than treatment, renewed emphasis.

"Treating people with antiretrovirals is completely unsustainable unless we can turn off the tap of infection," said Hayes.

While circumcision may offer new hope, it is not a cure for the epidemic.

In the Kenyan study, 1,391 circumcised men were compared to 1,393 who were not. And in Uganda, 2,474 circumcised men were compared to 2,522 men who were not. After tracking the men for two years, scientists found that circumcised men were 51 to 60 percent less likely to contract HIV than their uncircumcised counterparts. Since the studies were stopped, all the men have been offered the opportunity to be circumcised. And all the men were warned not to lapse into sexually risky behavior, such as abandoning condom use.

Scientists theorize that women would benefit indirectly from lower HIV prevalence in men, and a study is currently ongoing in Uganda to determine this.

In areas where HIV is spread primarily through heterosexual sex, such as sub-Saharan Africa, male circumcision could theoretically slash the infection rate in half.

U.S. military finds insurgent car-bomb factory in Baghdad

Residents search for bodies in the rubble of houses destroyed during clashes between U.S. forces and insurgents in Ramadi, 60 miles west of Baghdad Thursday.

BY KIM GAMEL
ASSOCIATED PRESS

BAGHDAD, Iraq — The U.S. military warned Thursday that insurgents are adopting new tactics in a campaign to spread panic after troops uncovered a car bomb factory with propane tanks and chlorine cylinders – possible ingredients for more chemical attacks following three explosions involving chlorine.

Those blasts and a recent spate of attacks against helicopters have raised fears that insurgents are trying to develop new ways to confront U.S. and Iraqi forces. Any increase in chemical bombings could complicate the Baghdad security crackdown, now in its second week.

Lt. Gen. Ray Odierno, the No. 2 American commander in Iraq, said he did not think the attacks signaled a more capable insurgency. Instead, he said they were merely an attempt to provoke fear.

"What they're trying to do is ... adapt in such ways where they can continue to create instability," Odierno said.

The general also said at least two suspects have been arrested in the downing of eight helicopters since Jan. 20, but he gave no further details.

The raid on the car bomb factory occurred late Tuesday in the volatile western province of Anbar, U.S. authorities said. U.S. troops discovered a pickup truck and three other vehicles that were being prepared as car bombs, as well as detonation material in five buildings.

"We also found ingredients to be used to devise or enhance explosives, such as fertilizer and chlorine cylinders," Odierno told Pentagon reporters by video-link.

Insurgents have detonated three trucks carrying chlorine canisters since late January. The most recent attack occurred Wednesday in Baghdad, killing five people and sending more than 55 to hospitals.

On Tuesday, a bomb planted on a chlorine tanker left more than 150 villagers stricken north of the capital. More than 60 were still under medical care Wednesday.

A suicide bomber driving a dump truck filled with explosives and a chlorine tank also struck a quick reaction force and Iraqi police in the Sunni city of Ramadi on Jan. 28, killing 16 people.

U.S. and Iraqi officials pledged to adapt to fight the evolving insurgent tactics.

"What is obvious to us is that the terrorists are adopting new tactics to cause panic and as many casualties as they can among civilians," Iraqi military spokesman, Brig. Gen. Qassim Moussawi, told reporters. "But our plans also are always changeable and flexible to face the enemies' new tactics."

Although relatively few people have been killed or seriously injured in the chlorine blasts, such attacks are unnerving and can cause panic among a people suffering severe psychological strains after nearly four years of war.

With low levels of exposure, chlorine, which was used as a weapon in World War I, can cause breathing problems and irritate the skin. At high levels, it is fatal.

Experts say chlorine is used as a disinfectant and is widely available in Iraq, which the U.N. long suspected of trying to build a chemical weapons arsenal.

But former U.N. weapons inspector David Kay said U.N. experts paid little attention to "garden variety" industrial-grade chemicals such as fertilizers and chlorine unless they were found in large quantities or near weapons plants. Major cities such as Baghdad stocked chlorine for water treatment.

The discovery of the car bomb factory Tuesday took place in the town of Karmah, 50 miles west of the capital.

Elsewhere in Anbar province, Sunni insurgents armed with rocket-propelled grenades attacked U.S. troops in the volatile city of Ramadi, setting off a six-hour firefight that killed at least 12 people, the U.S. military said Thursday. Iraqi authorities said the dead included women and children.

The battle broke out Wednesday evening when insurgents opened fire on a U.S. patrol from nearby buildings. The Americans responded with "precision guided munitions" that damaged several buildings and ended the fight, Marine spokesman 1st Lt. Shawn Mercer said.

There were no U.S. casualties, but 12 insurgents were killed and three were wounded, Mercer said. He said no civilian casualties were reported.

However, Dr. Hafidh Ibrahim of the Ramadi Hospital said the bodies of 26 people, including four women and children, were pulled from the rubble of three houses damaged in the fighting.

Photographs made available to The Associated Press showed the bodies of two small boys wrapped in one blanket. Other photos showed four or five bodies covered by blankets, and several men clearing rubble.

Firefights are not unusual in Ramadi, the Anbar provincial capital 75 miles west of Baghdad. The clashes underscore the challenges posed by Sunni insurgents in the area even as the U.S. seeks to quell Sunni-Shiite violence in the capital.

President Bush is sending 21,500 more soldiers to Iraq – 4,000 of them to Anbar and the rest to Baghdad for the security plan.

One U.S. soldier was killed and three others were wounded in a roadside bombing Thursday near the Shiite city of Diwaniyah, the U.S. command said.

Nationwide, at least 19 people were killed or found dead Thursday, including 14 bullet-riddled bodies showing signs of torture that were found in Baghdad and two in the southeastern city of Kut. Three others were shot to death in the northern city of Mosul.

Also Thursday, an Iraqi official said four Iraqi soldiers were accused of raping a 50-year-old Sunni woman and the attempted rape of her two daughters – the second allegation of sexual assault leveled against Iraqi forces this week.

Brig. Gen. Nijm Abdullah said the alleged attack took place about 10 days ago in the northern city of Tal Afar during a search for weapons and insurgents.

A lieutenant and three enlisted men denied the charge but later confessed after they were confronted by the woman, a Turkoman, Abdullah said. He said a fifth soldier suspected something was wrong, burst into the house and forced the others at gunpoint to stop the assault.

A second rape allegation within a single week is likely to undermine further the reputation of Iraq's security services, which the U.S. hopes can take over from coalition troops so the Americans and their allies can go home.

Kids exempt from passport rules

BY BEVERLEY LUMPKIN
ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON — Children will be exempt from new rules that will require travelers to show passports when entering the U.S. at land or sea borders, the Bush administration announced on Thursday.

The new passport requirements will take effect as soon as January 2008. In a change from earlier plans, children aged 15 or younger with parental consent will be allowed to cross the borders at land and sea entry points with certified copies of their birth certificates rather than passports.

Children aged 16 through 18 traveling with school, religious, cultural or athletic groups and under adult supervision will also be allowed to travel with only their birth certificates.

Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff was expected to discuss the relaxation in rules at a speech in Detroit on Thursday afternoon. The department described the details in a written statement.

Beginning last Jan. 23, nearly all air travelers entering the U.S. who are citizens of Canada, Mexico, Bermuda or the Caribbean – as well as returning American citizens – have been required to display passports. Children entering the United States by air will still be required to show passports.

Homeland Security spokesman Russ Knocke said the easing of rules for children entering by land or sea was in part the result of talks between the department and Canadians and interested state officials. Canada and U.S. border states have been concerned that the passport requirements would hurt legitimate travel and commerce.

When the new requirements for travelers crossing land and sea borders take effect, it will bring residents of Western Hemisphere nations under the same rules as travelers from the rest of the world.

The rules were mandated by Congress in 2004 as a response to the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, and the recommendations by the Sept. 11 commission that border security be tightened.

Last October, Congress passed an amendment sponsored by Sens. Patrick Leahy (news, bio, voting record), D-Vt., and Ted Stevens (news, bio, voting record), R-Alaska, that would postpone the day the land and sea rules take effect for as long as 17 months, till June 2009, if certain conditions have not been met.

One of those conditions was to develop an alternative procedure for groups of children traveling across the border under adult supervision and with parental consent.

Chertoff will meet with local officials in Detroit before traveling to Ottawa, Canada, for meetings Friday with his Mexican and Canadian counterparts.

Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff says children will be exempt from new rules that require travelers to show passports when entering the U.S.

Girl dies during rodeo parade

BY ARTHUR H. ROTSTEIN
ASSOCIATED PRESS

TUCSON, Ariz. — Rodeo parade spectators watched in horror Thursday as a five-year-old girl was thrown off her mount and trampled by an out-of-control team of horses pulling a wagon. She later died.

Hundreds of people were in eyesight of the tragedy along the two-mile route of the Tucson Rodeo Parade.

"I saw the wagon coming around the corner out of control," said Hebert's husband, Henry. "They hit the horse, her horse flared up and the girl fell off."

Hebert said it appeared that two other girls riding beside the five-year-old saw the horses coming at them and were able to get out of the way. Witnesses differed on whether the wagon ran over the victim.

The girl, whose identity was not released immediately, died at University Medical Center, hospital spokeswoman Darci Slaton said. Tucson police were investigating, Sgt. Decio Hopffer said.

The death was the first in the parade's 85-year history, although injuries at the event are not uncommon, parade spokesman Bob Johnson said.

At last year's parade, Mayor Bob Walkup bruised an arm and his wife, Beth, suffered a concussion and whiplash when two runaway horses slammed into the rear of a 150-year-old buggy.

The parade, billed as the world's longest nonmechanized parade, includes horses, marching bands, folklorico dancers and beauty queens. It is one of the highlights of the 82nd annual La Fiesta de los Vaqueros rodeo, a weeklong event that began Monday featuring more than 700 contestants from across the U.S. and Canada.

Cigarette company backs Ky. law

After 10 people were killed by a house fire investigators say was caused by a lit cigarette, a fire prevention advocacy group wants Kentucky to pass legislation that will require all cigarettes to be self-extinguishing.

CIGARETTES from page 1

there have noticed a difference.

"We are comfortable that the 'fire-safe' cigarettes have reduced the number of fires and fatalities," said Eamon Moynihan, a spokesman for the New York State Office of Fire Prevention and Control.

The special smokes are wrapped in thin bands of paper that work like "speed bumps" to slow the burning of cigarettes not being puffed. They extinguish when the burning tobacco reaches a "speed bump." The lower-ignition paper does not otherwise reduce the health consequences of smoking.

Philip Morris USA, the nation's leading cigarette maker, has made its Merit brand in self-extinguish paper nationwide since 2000, and it hasn't really affected the brand's market share, said company spokesman David Sutton.

The company supports the Kentucky legislation, and Sutton said changing to fire-safe cigarettes shouldn't affect the price consumers will pay.

He cautioned, though, that smokers shouldn't feel lulled by fire-safe cigarettes into a false sense of security.

"There's reduced ignition propensity, which yields safer products if handled properly," he said. "What it doesn't yield, no matter how you handle it, is something that's completely fire safe or fire proof. So people have to be very careful."

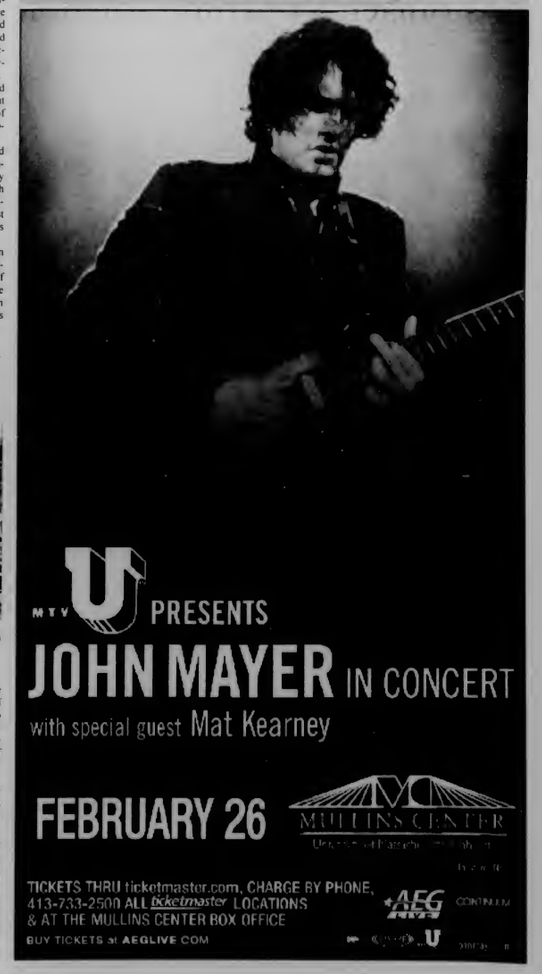
R.J. Reynolds Tobacco Co. has opposed such legislation, and company spokesman David Howard said there's "no convincing evidence" that the specially made cigarettes will significantly reduce fires caused by careless handling of cigarettes.

"Identifying cigarettes as 'fire safe' certainly carries some risk of giving a false sense of security to consumers," he said. "The bottom line is even in this legislation, these products are still burned .... So if carelessly handled, they still may cause fires."

He said the emphasis should be put on such preventive measures as smoke detectors and fire-retardant furnishings.

Norman Shipp, 70, who was eating at a smoke-free restaurant in Bardstown, said he wants to quit smoking, but if he can't he would buy "fire-safe" cigarettes. He said he had burned holes in two pairs of jeans by falling asleep with lit cigarettes.

"Those cigarettes would be a good deal," he said.



MTV U PRESENTS
JOHN MAYER IN CONCERT with special guest Mat Kearney
FEBRUARY 26
MULLINS CENTER
TICKETS THRU ticketmaster.com, CHARGE BY PHONE, 413-733-2500 ALL ticketmaster LOCATIONS & AT THE MULLINS CENTER BOX OFFICE
BUY TICKETS at AEGLIVE.COM
AEG LIVE
CONTINUUM

RUBIN KEEPS US ROOTIN'

SIGN MAN from page 1

"I was surprised to see that people liked and took notice to my sign," said Ruhin. "I remember enjoying the entertainment I was providing for the fans."

Ruhin has also said that in his long career of sign-making, he has made somewhere between 450 and 500 signs. While he gives most away to players and/or their families, he has only kept about half of the signs, which remain in a collection in his basement and will soon be donated to the W.E.B. Du Bois Library on campus.

About 85 signs have been autographed by UMass alumni like Bill Cosby or former basketball player Julius Erving, according to Ruhin. The library has asked for these signs, declaring that "they are part of UMass history."

For at least one game during the season, Ruhin will sit out and simply enjoy the game. While he really only displays the signs during timeouts, he claims he misses about 20 percent of the game.

"I take a break about once a season," Rubin said. "People always ask me afterwards if I was out sick or if the Mullins Center workers finally kicked me out."

At Wednesday night's basketball game against St. Bonaventure, Rubin began the night in full costume. Wearing a gray beard and a maroon robe, an outfit referred to by Ruhin as his "Moses costume," Rubin held two Commandment-shaped signs demanding "Thou Shalt Dive for Loose Balls."

Later, Ruhin changed into something more comfortable: a UMass tee-shirt and baseball cap. His next sign was a clever "MATH 101: A Three, Two Twos, and a Free Throw." Though not exactly hilarious or witty, Ruhin and his signs have become a staple at sporting events.

"He brings a lot of energy to the games," said Mike Lucci, a UMass junior, during Wednesday's game. Meanwhile, Ruhin walks by presenting his math sign, creating a noticeably louder crowd as he passes a group of UMass fans.

"The Sign Man is great," said Steven Coutts, a senior. "It's really nice to see someone who graduated a while ago and still shows a lot of dedication to the school. I wish the students had as much passion as he does."

Realizing that not everyone may like him or may find him a nuisance during the games, Ruhin feels as though he is doing a service to the University. He believes that while showing enthusiasm, he is also promoting UMass by advertising its sportsmanship, hoping that UMass sports games will be televised more. Ten years ago, Rubin's "advertising" signs landed him a spot on the ABC Evening News.

"My real dream is to be Sign Man on national television," said Rubin. "I'm just waiting for Monday Night Football to give me a call."

As far as his sign ideas go, Rubin has said that he might wake up at 2 a.m. with an idea and write it in a book that he keeps with him. He described most of his ideas as simple, with basic information that he turns "goofy." Of course, there are his play-on-words signs that he comes up with less commonly, seeing as they are "more creative than the rest."

Rubin also stated that while fans will approach him at games hoping to work on a sign with him, he takes pride in his own ideas. He said that while he has worked with others to make a sign, he prefers to do his own work.

As long as sign ideas keep coming to him and people are appreciative, it doesn't look like Sign Man will be stopping anytime soon.

"Every game someone will walk over to me and thank me," said Rubin. "There's my motivation."

Holly Seabury can be reached at hseabury@student.umass.edu

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN
EDITORIAL OPINION

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 23, 2007

"I may not agree with what you say but I will defend to the death your right to say it" Voltaire

EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Learning tolerance the Hardaway

Just pass, don't tell

Greg Collins

Former NBA player Tim Hardaway's comments regarding another former NBA player's outing as a gay man, John Amaechi, has predictably stirred up controversy throughout the sports world and America. In response to Amaechi's public disclosure of his sexual orientation, Hardaway was originally asked how he would have felt about having a gay teammate.

"First of all I wouldn't want him on my team," said Hardaway. "Second of all, if he was on my team I would really distance myself from him because I don't think that's right and I don't think he should be in the locker room when we're in the locker room."

After an immediate public outcry, Hardaway apologized for his comments. He continued to be castigated by columnists, commentators and by NBA commissioner David Stern, who subsequently barred him from attending last weekend's All-Star game festivities in Las Vegas. Stern explained, "We acted immediately. We told him he couldn't do anymore work for us because his views don't represent our views."

A player's sexual orientation should never be pronounced publicly.

The commissioner's reasoning has a tenuous foundation. Would he support banning star Allen Iverson from all future NBA games because of the homophobic sentiments he conveyed in a rap album released a few years ago? Of course not.

It was shameful for Hardaway to display incredible insensitivity towards homosexuals because he made a value judgment on a person's character merely because of his sexual orientation.

But the reactions of Stern and the mainstream public to Hardaway's comments reflect how whimsical responses to politically incorrect comments can cloud the substantive issues at hand.

One of the issues in this case is how an openly gay player would affect the functioning of a sports team, whose primary purpose, in almost all circumstances, is to win as many games as possible while losing the fewest games as possible. Doing these tasks requires cohesion, trust, and sacrifice from each of the team's members.

Publicly announcing one's own sexual orientation on a sports team, whether it is heterosexuality or homosexuality, would put the needs of an individual to make a sociopolitical statement ahead of the team's desire for success.

This is why I believe that a player's sexual orientation should never be pronounced publicly. It would create additional implications if someone thought that an openly gay player was making sexual advances on him in the locker room (although Amaechi rightfully hopes to debunk this stereotype).

In the aftermath of Hardaway's controversy, many players admitted that if such sexual advances were not made, then they would not have a problem with a gay teammate. Of course, using this reasoning, then why not allow women to shower with men in their locker rooms, as long as the women promised not to make sexual advances on men?

Ultimately, if a gay player feels that he is unable to play at a high level and maintain a strong level of self-respect because of his team's homophobic atmosphere, then he should demand a trade. Similarly to the effects of capitalism, discrimination hurts the employer or fellow employees in a substantive fashion more often than the person being discriminated against. In the sports world, a team would most likely lose a contributor to their success if he deemed it to be too hostile an environment in which to play.

In the past numerous athletes have expressed comments insensitive to gay athletes, so it is safe to say that Hardaway's sentiments are not uncommon among athletes in general. But more revealing is the fact that the reaction from current NBA players to Amaechi's outing and Hardaway's words were much less hysterical than the mainstream media's response.

This should come as no surprise, as we have seen similar reactions in the past by like-minded politically correct journalists, media heads, and social pundits, such as when former New Jersey governor James McGreevey announced he was gay.

In Hardaway's case, it was severely misguided and insensitive for morally righteous individuals to embrace John Amaechi's sociopolitical statements as appropriate methods by which to raise awareness of homophobic discrimination.

The bigger issue is that the relentless push from social liberals for people to openly pronounce their homosexuality in order to make sociopolitical statements – often in inappropriate areas, like in the sports world, which epitomizes a certain vision. This vision for how the world should work and how people should act is confronted by the realities of how the world actually does work and how people actually do think and act.

The fact that most players reacted in a more reserved fashion, and without any of the moral indignation of Hardaway's national media critics, reflected the reality of the situation. While the people who were least affected by Amaechi's outing were most morally enraged over Hardaway's response, the NBA players who were directly affected by both comments did not appear to be overly concerned with or outraged by either man's remarks. Contrary to the vision of social liberals, this is how the world actually works and how people actually think.

Greg Collins can be reached at gcollins@student.umass.edu

Out of the homophobic closet

You're dating a supermodel but things just got ugly because you got your ex-girlfriend pregnant. Congratulations, you pulled a Tom Brady. You've made an extremely insensitive and inflammatory remark, and now much of the world is disgusted by you. Congratulations, you pulled a Tim Hardaway.

Eli Rosenswaike

A former NBA star, Hardaway has found himself in some hot water due to the anti-gay remarks he made on a sports radio show. Hardaway was commenting on his reaction to the news that a former player, John Amaechi, had publicly admitted that he was homosexual.

"You know, I hate gay people, so I let it be known," Hardaway said. "I don't like gay people and I don't like to be around gay people. I am homophobic. I don't like it. It shouldn't be in the world or in the United States."

Hardaway has since apologized, saying, "Yes, I regret it. I'm sorry. I shouldn't have said I hate gay people or anything like that. That was my mistake."

Thanks, Hard-away. That was truly heartfelt. I can really sense the sincerity. Let me intervene here and tell you what he really meant by that apology. "Yes, of course I regret saying those things. I mean look at all the trouble it's got me in. I'm sorry not for the people who I offended, but rather for myself, because saying that got me banned from partaking in the All-star festivities in Las Vegas."

What is it exactly that scares Hardaway so much about gay people? Are homosexuals committing hate crimes against straight people? I thought it was the other way around, but maybe I was mistaken. Let's look at some data.

I wonder what Mr. Hardaway would say to someone who hates him, not because of his remarks, but rather because of the fact that he's black.

According to hatecrime.org, there were 1,197 incidences of hate crimes in 2004 dealing with sexual orientation. Of those 1,197 instances, just 33 (2.7 percent) of them were anti-heterosexual crimes, as opposed to anti-homosexual. Okay, so that's not it.

Does gay marriage scare him? Maybe it does, he doesn't reside in Massachusetts, after all. What's there to be scared of anyway? Has the sky fell in Massachusetts since gay-marriage became legal? Has life ended in this state as we know it? Hey, here's a thought. If you have a problem with gay marriage, then don't marry someone who's gay.

I'm finished trying to figure out why Hardaway hates homosexuals, or why people hate other people just because they look different. The conclusion I have come to, though, is that Hardaway's prejudice is rooted in fear and ignorance.

I wonder what Mr. Hardaway would say to someone who hates him, not because of his remarks, but rather because of the fact that he's black. I think Hardaway would have a problem with that, and rightfully so.

I know about free speech. He had every right to say what he did. And with that right he 'outed' himself as an ignorant and intolerable human being. "It was like, you know, I had killed somebody. ... I never knew that this was going to escalate that high," Hardaway said.

How could he not know that? Is he really that naive to think that his comments wouldn't cause a stir? I think it would be fair to say that if someone had made negative comments towards the African-American community, he would have reacted in a similar manner as the people who he offended did.

Sensing that he was digging himself into deep grave, Hardaway made a second round of apologies in an attempt to save face.

"I don't hate gay people," Hardaway said. "I'm a goodhearted person. I interact with people all the time. ... I respect people. For me to say 'hate' was a bad word, and I didn't mean to use it."

It's too late for Hardaway. The second he opened his mouth on that radio show sealed his fate. He will forever be known as the bigot who made the disparaging remarks on Dan Le Batard's radio show.

He can apologize all that he wants, it won't do him much good. I'm heterosexual, and I can't forgive him. Just imagine how much work he has left to patch it up with the homosexual community.

The fear and ignorance of people is a pervasive problem plaguing this nation, and I don't think it's going away anytime in our near future. Maybe once we get educated in this country our sentiments towards people different than us will improve. And if not, try sensitivity training or something.

This doesn't all fall on Hardaway. Not in the least bit. There are countless people just like him, but without the platform that he had to express his feelings.

Free speech is a good thing for this country. Sometimes, like in this case, it can result in pain for some people. But at least free speech gave us a glimpse into the person that Tim Hardaway is. It's just not something I particularly care to look at.

Eli Rosenswaike can be reached at erosensw@student.umass.edu.

People come and go, but good friends are always there

Kevin Pascucci

Ever since we were kids, we have had an inner desire to connect with our peers. Whether it is via Facebook or an extracurricular club, all of us have a method we use to meet other people. Although there are a few who are content with a life of solitude in their dorm room, the rest of us are usually out trying to meet new people. Sometimes the people we meet stick around for a while, and we affectionately call these people our friends.

Even though the concept of friendship is one that many of us take for granted, it probably plays a more prominent role in our development than we think. There is a good reason that your parents didn't allow you to hang out with certain kids when you were younger. The friends that you choose throughout your lifetime will either be your greatest blessing or your biggest downfall.

This campus has a variety of activities and clubs for one to participate in, making it very easy to meet other people with the same interests as us.

Although I have not had the experience myself, I have watched all too many of my friends be negatively influenced by the people they chose to hang out with. Ultimately, my friends have paid a price for it, forgetting how easy is it is to give in to peer pressure. Just look at the UMass riots, and the kids who had to pay some serious prices because of their involvement in them. I'm sure their friends egged them on the whole time.

The concept of peer pressure is one that we are all familiar with, but one that we too often succumb to. This may be a news flash to some of you, but if your friends only like you when you are acting a certain way or participating in certain activities, they are not really your friends. It's time for you to find new ones.

For those of us that survived high school, which I would imagine applies to most reading this right now, we easily remember the social cliques that made up our student bodies. No matter what clique you found yourself in, you knew that there were others who were in that group with you, and it was whatever you had in common with those other students that brought you together as friends.

Although some of the clique mentality rolls over into college, this university is one of the biggest melting pots of diversity, making it more conducive to social interaction. With all of the negative effects of friendship pointed out, there's something to be said for making friends with people whom are different than us.

This campus has a variety of activities and clubs for one to participate in, making it very easy to meet other people with the same interests as us. What I would challenge all of you to do though would be to make an effort to become friends with people who are vastly different than you. I've certainly learned more from my friends who are different than me than from those who are exactly like me. Not that there is anything wrong with having friends with similar interests, but it's good to keep your friend base diverse. You might learn something new.

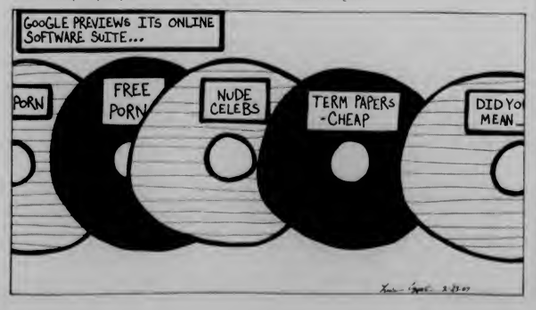
As someone who has lived in three different states, it has not always been easy to keep in touch with all of my friends, and I have had to say goodbye to many of them. What I've found though is that your true friends will stand the test of time and distance, and it's these people that we need to appreciate more in our lives. Some of us have had friends since our childhood that are still around today, and it's always nice to have someone to talk about your kindergarten teacher with.

Friends can also be a huge support system when you need them. I can name more than a few occasions where it was nice to have a friend who I knew had my back. It's also nice to know you have someone to give you the notes for that lecture you skipped the other day.

As college students, we are given the opportunity to make new friends everyday. Some of these friends may stay your friends long after graduation, while others will be nothing more than college memories. My advice would be to pick your friends wisely, and hold onto to the few people that you really connect with.

For the sake of not sounding cheesy, I would like to quote the band Tenacious D: "Friendship is rare" Like I said, many people come and go, but your true friends will stick around for a very long time. After all, if Jack Black is singing it, it must be true.

Kevin Pascucci can be reached at kpascucc@student.umass.edu.



LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

iBeg to differ

Michael Dennis's column, "The Apple of your iPod" (Feb. 21), failed to bring many key details into the picture. He states: "With all the emphasis on creativity, you'd think they'd hire someone to think of better names for their products. Between iBook, iPod, iMac, iPhoto, iTunes and iLife, there's not a single rebel in the bunch. iThink it's high time to drop the madness before it gets out of hand. Give us a name we can talk about, not a safe, bland label with an i-prefix."

First off, MacBook, Aperture, GarageBand, etc. do NOT have an i-prefix. And does putting an "I" in front of each word make it not creative? I'd call it easy to remember, the main thing a company wants you to do; remember their product. Quick, name every computer Dell makes. Not so easy. How could you forget the XPS M2010, the Inspiron E1505, or the Dimension C521? Those names just flow off the tongue. What was the first one again? I'd say Apple was very creative for coming up with easy to remember names for their products.

Dennis also states, "I'd like to think that even the most reluctant computer novice could figure out how to use a two-button mouse." Apple does indeed make a mouse with two buttons, aptly names the Mighty Mouse (no i-prefix on that one). Is right-clicking so key that it needs a permanent button? Can't you just ctrl-click? Michael maintains that since Apple is the only company that makes computers that are compatible with their software, the prices are jacked way up, but this is not the case.

I have programs in my PowerBook (also doesn't start with an i-prefix) laptop that would cost hundreds more in a Dell. And it's true right across the board of Apple's computers: cheaper when compared to an equal. Dennis also forgot to mention that indeed Apple makes computers that run on Windows. All of the new Apples can run Windows, because of their new processors. And they run it better than HPs, Dells, and Gateways do.

Apple's market is media. They edit music, video, photos, etc. better than any PC could. PCs, on the other hand, are used for business. But it will be interesting, in the future as the two genres merge, who wins in this battle over computer supremacy.

Michael Linnehan
UMass Student

Lack of fan support

Last night I drove 50 miles to attend and support Coach Ford and the much improved basketball team – one that was coming off two very important road wins. I was so disappointed to walk into the Mullins Center and find few students in attendance.

This team has a chance to win the A-10 and possibly make some noise in the NCAA Tournament. It's time to put down your iPods and cell phones, get off your asses and give this team the support it deserves before the program goes back in the toilet like it has been in the past eight years!

David Jacques
UMass Basketball Fan

Bring them home

It appears that Mr. Duffy's only form of research is Googling statistics to prove his point. Clearly though, he doesn't understand that an income of 42,000 dollars is still not enough to raise a family of four on although it may be claimed as "middle-class." Military recruiters routinely lie to high school students and target high schools in low-income areas.

Instead of complaining about the "leftist clowns", maybe Mr. Duffy should have looked at the American Friends pamphlet that was handed out and evaluated those claims instead of quoting numbers created by a conservative think tank. I acknowledge that some people do want to join the military, but no one should join under false pretenses. It is a moral sin to send young men and women to possible death based on fraud. Who cares about America's troops more: those of us that want to bring them home so they can live peacefully with their families or those that want to send more and more away to possible maiming, death, or trauma?

Bart Frost
UMass Student

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

ARTS & LIVING

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 23, 2007

ARTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Academy Awards mix style and substance

The Oscars celebrate a diverse group of films and actors

BY KATE BAUER
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

At this year's Golden Globes, Warren Beatty, upon accepting the Cecil B. DeMille award (the equivalent of an honorary Oscar), referred to Hollywood as "America's biggest export." He's got a point there. Not only is it an international export, but it's a domestic one as well. Come February, America's eyes turn their attention to the glitzy, glamorous, political and at times trashy, world of Hollywood. While half the country wonders who will win Best Actress, the other half wonders what she'll be wearing.

As for this year's nominees, they're shaping up to be quite a diverse group, with nominees hailing from Asia, Mexico, Spain, England and Africa. In fact, out of the combined nominees for Best Picture, Director, Actor/Actress and Supporting Actor/Actress, there are only 12 American nominees out of 27. As director Alejandro González Iñarritu said in a recent interview, "It's a celebration that the Academy's acknowledging and opening the borders of world cinema."

But don't forget that, even if the Academy is more diverse than it has been in the past, the Oscars are still all about the glad handling. You've seen those "for your consideration" ads in magazines, or TV commercials declaring "6 Oscar Nominations!" or "Winner of the Golden Globe for Best Picture!" You've probably even seen some so often that your either sick of watching them or intrigued enough to actually go out and see the film.

According to a recent article in Newsweek magazine, the first step towards winning that little golden statuette is selling your story – the Academy likes to honor comebacks (think this year's nominees Jackie Earle Haley and Eddie Murphy) or 180-degree role reversals. Back in 2003, besides some massive campaigning, Charlize Theron's drastic change for Monster caught the Academy's attention.

Networking doesn't hurt either. Around Oscar season celebs make sure to attend big award events, benefits or premiers, where Academy voters are sure to be in bulk. There are rare acceptions, like past winners Sean Penn (for Mystic River) and Judi Dench (for Shakespeare in Love), but you can always count on a flood of TV commercials from movie studios declaring their actors "the best performance of the year," and their mugs in every gossip magazine.

But of course, a celeb must always remember not to overdo it. While campaigning can be a complicating strategy, overdoing it can make you look needy. Just look at Martin Scorsese's last two campaigns, for Gangs of New York and The Aviator. Neither film was able to garner a Best Picture or Director, which can probably explain why Scorsese's remained so quiet this season.

So ok, to be honest, I haven't seen every film or actor that has been nominated this year. Little Children, Volver, and Venus seem to have left the theatre before I even got a chance to enter it, and thanks to Netflix I'm still waiting for United 93, Half Nelson, and The Black Dahlia to make it to my mailbox.

But thanks to critics' reviews, predictions, and some guessing, below you'll find a list of the nominees, and their chances at taking home the honors this Sunday night. This year's 79th Annual Academy Awards airs on ABC at 8 p.m., and is hosted by Ellen Degeneres. Also check out Oscars.com for a full list of the nominees. (Oh, and if you're in for a little celebrity ogling, check Ryan Seacrest's Oscar Coverage starting at 12 p.m. on the E! Channel.)

NOMINEES FOR BEST ACTOR IN A MOTION PICTURE:
- LEONARDO DICAPRIO, BLOOD DIAMOND
- RYAN GOSLING, HALF NELSON
- PETER O'TOOLE, VENUS
- WILL SMITH, THE PURSUIT OF HAPPYNESS
- FOREST WHITAKER, THE LAST KING OF SCOTLAND

Forest Whitaker. That's right, Forest Whitaker. Out of all of the performances in this category this year, Whitaker's interpretation of the Ugandan dictator Idi Amin is both frightening and surprisingly vulnerable. Whitaker has also received the top acting award for all of the major critics' awards, including the National Board of Review and LA Film Critics Association, which makes him almost a shoo-in for Best Actor.

DiCaprio, like Kate Winslet, has garnered a surprising number of nominations for such a young age, but his nomination for Blood Diamond instead of The Departed has critics thinking his chances of winning have declined. The young actor has proven to be a force to watch out for though, so we can expect him to have plenty more tries in the future.

While Will Smith has proved that he can work both comedy, action and drama, Happyness was poorly reviewed, and he had a better chance when he was nominated for Ali in 2001. Yet Charlize Theron did win for Monster, even though the film received bad reviews, so there's still a chance he could win, but I wouldn't count on it.

As for the oldest and youngest nominees, Peter O'Toole and Ryan Gosling, their nominations are enough glory in themselves. Already having received an Honorary Oscar back in 2002, O'Toole's Venus received equally good and bad reviews, which only gives him a 50/50 chance. As for Gosling, Half Nelson was seen by few, only so far grossing $3 million, but thanks to an already very diverse career Gosling has potential for being nominated in the future.

Will win: Forest Whitaker
Deserves it: Forest Whitaker

See OSCARS on page 7

Djimon Hounsou (left) and Mark Wahlberg attend the 79th Annual Academy Awards Nominees luncheon, in Beverly Hills, CA, Feb. 5, 2007. They are both up for the Oscar for Best Supporting Actor.

Best Actress nominee Penélope Cruz arrives at the 79th annual Academy Awards Nominees' luncheon at the Beverly Hilton Hotel in Beverly Hills, CA, Feb. 5, 2007.

Lubar performs at Hampshire

BY EVAN POWERS
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

Lubar stood on stage in front of an overflowing crowd at the main stage of Merrill Dickinson Hall at Hampshire College Wednesday night. She made it be known that it wasn't something she was expecting. "I thought to myself on the bus, 'I'm going to have a one-on-one conversation on tonight's demo for about 30 or 40 people,' Lubar said to the audience, "but here you are."

Lubar, a performer, writer, spiritual healer, teacher and activist who has been an artist-in-residence for the past week at Hampshire College. She has spent the past 25 years traveling around the world, visiting countries that include Germany, Bosnia, Guatemala, Israel and the former Soviet Union.

She was in search of women who have had to maintain their "sanity and humanity" while living through the oppressive and intensely violent periods of war such as World War II, the Holocaust, the war in Bosnia and the rift between Israel and Palestine. Lubar then takes these amazing stories and turns them into theatrical monologues, some acted as the very women she interviews, while others are merely based off the women she met.

It's so interesting to go to all of these countries and hear these stories and bring them home," Lubar told the audience, which was so much larger than expected that over two-dozen chairs had to be brought in to accommodate everyone. "I feel like we as Americans aren't able to understand the kind of things these women have gone through in their lives."

Lubar gave two performances Wednesday night, the first about a German woman who Lubar visited in Berlin in 1997. She grew up during the Holocaust, and was part of the Anti-Hitler group. Lubar went to great lengths to describe the complexity of the woman; her upbringing in a wealthy family, her life growing up during the Holocaust and her dislike for the Nazi party. Lubar left no feature of this woman unknown to the audience.

Lubar, who described the woman as "eccentric and arrogant", dove into quotes from the woman from their interview. Using a deep, rich German accent, Lubar left the audience awe-struck as she portrayed the woman as a heroine in helping save two Jewish men by hiding them underneath her couch bed, one of whom was her boyfriend at the time.

Her second performance, just as riveting and involved, was about a Bosnian family's life before and during the war in their country, and the utter chaos they went through. She also conveyed the hope for life and peace that the mother of the family, whom Lubar played, had even as the war continued.

"These women are just some of the light and spirit in the ashes of difficult times," Lubar explained following her performance, "and they're a tribute to how humans can maintain humor and sanity during dark times and situations, and that's where I get my inspiration from."

Lubar credited her studies in theatrics, spiritual healing and energy vibration as a way to help the interaction between actor and audience in her performances, and said that it also helped her to be more hospitable to the women that allowed her to come and hear about their lives. Her experience in these fields has helped her connect with Hampshire College students during her stay this week.

"She's been such a great help to all of us," said Dani Silverstein, a second-year student at Hampshire from Long Island. Silverstein explained that Lubar has spent much of her week visiting a play-writing class where students are writing monologues on issues for social change, with each student choosing a topic that they are passionate about. Silverstein chose child abuse.

Lubar has been meeting with students individually and discussing their topics and offering them help along the way, something Silverstein said has really helped. "She's been telling us to be manipulative and grasp the audience emotionally, so that you can engage the audience the best you can. She's the voice of reason."

Lubar said that she has enjoyed every moment of her travels and experiences and turning them into performances that have captivated audiences for years, but she made it clear: it's the people she's looking for first and foremost. "I love writing unique characters, human emotion is human emotion and it's the same wherever you go, but I look for people with lives, not people with stories," she explained, "it's the people who want to share their life I want, the best stories just sort of come from there."

Lubar will be giving another performance at the Enfield Living Room at Hampshire College tonight from 4:30 to 6:00 p.m., which is entitled "Blood and Stories", about the fear, courage, pain and hope of Israeli and Palestinian women. It is free to the public and on a first-come, first-serve basis.

Evan Powers can be reached at epowers@student.umass.edu

Deborah Lubar is an activist, writer and performer who has been the artist-in-residence at Hampshire College for the past week.

THE SOURCE

(the sors) n. key to discovering the weekly happenings of New England

TuesdayFebruary27

COMEDY
Alba Sanchez is a writer, actress, and comedian from the Bronx, NY. She has performed in such venues as the Lincoln Center, the Apollo, Playwright Horizons, Stand-up New York, NY Comedy Club, and hundreds of other clubs and venues both across the country and internationally. Ms. Sanchez is currently the face of the HABLA campaign on HBO Latino and the 2003 recipient of the BRIO award. She will be performing at the Carroll Room at the Smith College Campus Center at 8 p.m. The event is free to all.

LECTURE/READING
Political essayist Gabriel Schoenfeld and George Freeman '71, the assistant general counsel at The New York Times will be the key speakers at this Amherst College lecture. The topic that will be covered is "Should The New York Times be Prosecuted under the Espionage Statutes? Or, Does the First Amendment Give the Media an Exception to the Laws?" Schoenfeld has written on world affairs for The New York Times, the Wall Street Journal, the Atlantic, the New Republic and other publications. As assistant general counsel of the Times since 1992, Freeman has been involved in newsroom counseling, antitrust and distribution problems, and business counseling involving all divisions of the Times. This lecture will be in the Babbott Room of the Octagon at 7:30 p.m. and is free and open to the public.

ThursdayMarch1

MUSIC
The University of Massachusetts will host the 26th Annual Jazz Showcase on Thursday. This concert will consist of Chapel Jazz, Jazz Ensemble I, Vocal Jazz and Jazz Lab Ensembles with the MASS Marimba Band. Jeffrey Holmes is the producer/director. Catherine Jensen-Hole, David Sprony, Thomas Hannum, John Leonard and Andrew Smicker will also be directing. Included will be a tribute to saxophonist Michael Brecker (1949-2007). This concert is at the Bowker Auditorium at 8 p.m. Tickets are $10 for the general public, $5 seniors and children under 18, and $3 for UMass students.

FridayMarch2

CONFERENCE/SYMPOSIUM
Mount Holyoke College will host an Interdisciplinary Symposium on Love and the Erotic in Indian Poetry and Performing Arts. This one-day symposium brings together conversation by six scholars and artists who are doing new and exciting work on the history and transformations of the themes of love and the erotic in literature and the performing arts in India. The symposium culminates in a performance of the female devadasi court and temple dance repertoire by eminent dancer and scholar Hari Krishnan, followed by a Question and Answer session. It will be held in the Willits-Hallowell Conference Center from 9 a.m. to 5 p.m. and is free and open to the public.

FridayMarch2 & SaturdayMarch3

THEATER
The powerful hip-hop theater production Dreamscape will be performed at Amherst College. This performance is in honor of Martin Luther King, Jr. and will be performed on both March 2nd and March 3rd in honor of his birthday. Written by innovative playwright Rickerby Hinds and directed by Mary Mukasa, an assistant professor of theater and dance at Amherst, the one-woman show brings together acting, dance, DJing and verse to tell a story based on the 1998 shooting of a 19-year-old African-American woman, Tyisha Miller, at the hands of four California police officers. This production will begin at 8 p.m. each night and will be held in the Kirby Theater. It is free and open to the public.

WEEKLY PINUP

VAGINA MONOLOGUES

The Vagina Monologues will be performed this Friday and Saturday at Amherst College. This will be the 10th year Amherst College will be bringing the Vagina Monologues to campus. The performance will be at 7:30 p.m. Friday and 6:30 p.m. Saturday in the Cole Assembly Room in Converse Hall. Tickets are $10 for the public or $5 with a student ID.

Best Picture Oscar still up in the air for 79th annual awards

OSCARS from page 6

NOMINEES FOR BEST ACTRESS IN A MOTION PICTURE:
- PENÉLOPE CRUZ, VOLVER
- DAME JUDI DENCH, NOTES ON A SCANDAL
- HELEN MIRREN, THE QUEEN
- MERYL STREEP, THE DEVIL WEARS PRADA
- KATE WINSLET, LITTLE CHILDREN

All Hail the Queen! Like the Best Actor race, Best Actress is turning out to be just as predictable. Like Whitaker, Helen Mirren has received all the top awards from critics, as well as Globe and SAG awards. Arguably the most refined of the year's performances, Mirren's complete meld into the role of Queen Elizabeth II in The Queen is turning out to be one of those that years down the road will be labeled as a legendary performance.

Penelope Cruz has shown how to walk away from a flop like Sahara, and is proving to be the Spanish version of Leonardo DiCaprio-Martin Scorsese with Volver director Pedro Almodovar. Yet her first-time nomination, like Gosling's, is more of a bask-in-the-glow moment. Winslet's impressive career and nominations means she could follow in the steps of Streep, now the current record holder for the most nominations, 14, yet not many caught on to Little Children's dark storyline, which means fewer viewers and fewer votes.

As for Streep, the Academy, while seeming to really like nominating her, rarely awards comedies. If Mirren has any competition, it'd be the Dame Judi Dench, who's never made creeps more fun to watch. But then, it's Mirren who's received all the awards so far.

Will win: Helen Mirren
Deserves it: Helen Mirren

BEST SUPPORTING ACTOR IN A MOTION PICTURE:
- ALAN ARKIN, LITTLE MISS SUNSHINE
- JACKIE EARLE HALEY, LITTLE CHILDREN
- DJIMON HOUNSOU, BLOOD DIAMOND
- EDDIE MURPHY, DREAMGIRLS
- MARK WAHLBERG, THE DEPARTED

Ok, I'll admit Eddie Murphy in Dreamgirls was good. Beside his sing and dance routines, Murphy's James "Thunder" Early held a surprising softer side, and his demise into a boozie and junk forgotten pop star was more entertaining to watch than his musical numbers. Yet surprisingly Murphy's performance has garnered no wins from the major critics' awards, and more attention has been focused more towards Murphy's cast member Jennifer Hudson. Yet, critics argue he's well deserving for the role, and the biggest front-runner.

Jackie Earle Haley's comeback role as a sex offender has brought numerous praises, but the character itself may scare away voters. Djimon Hounsou's performance proved that In America wasn't just a fluke, but he really only shined in Blood Diamond when he was freaking out.

Alan Arkin and Mark Wahlberg are the two potentials to knock Murphy's chance at reaching the podium. Yet, while Arkin was nothing short of sparkling in Little Miss Sunshine, his character didn't get enough screen time. But it worked for Dench in Shakespeare In Love, who won Best Supporting Actress, even though she was in the film for only a grand total of seven minutes.

Wahlberg's performance as a Boston state cop in The Departed deserves accolades not just for his dry and fast-paced dialogue (excuse me, cursing); he fit perfectly into the role of a supporter. Never stealing the show from the film's leads, Wahlberg still managed to deliver a memorable performance both affecting and smart. He best fits the part of "supporting."

Will win: Eddie Murphy
Deserves it: Mark Wahlberg

BEST SUPPORTING ACTRESS IN A MOTION PICTURE:
- ADRIANA BARRAZA, BABEL
- CATE BLANCHETT, NOTES ON A SCANDAL
- ABIGAIL BRESLIN, LITTLE MISS SUNSHINE
- JENNIFER HUDSON, DREAMGIRLS
- RINKO KIKUCHI, BABEL

Let's face it; Hudson will take the win, no question about it. Her turn as diva Effie in Dreamgirls has proven maybe Simon should have been a little nicer, and for her first role, she's not half bad. Plus, she's got that amazing musical number to best her chances.

Personally, I feel Rinko Kikuchi delivered the best performance. As a deaf-mute character Kikuchi had to use only her face and body to convey her sadness, anger, and loss into one too-short role.

While Barraza's fumbling nanny was certainly moving, her screen presence is the one of the least strong in this category. And as for Abigail Breslin in her makes-you-want-to-smile role as a beauty pageant wannabe, the Academy rarely honors children with a win, and she has even lesser chances because Sunshine is a comedy.

Cate Blachett, while certainly deserving in her role as a cheating pedophile, already has a win (for playing Katharine Hepburn in The Aviator), so we'll pass her in favor of a first-time nominee.

Will Win: Jennifer Hudson
Deserves It: Rinko Kikuchi

BEST PICTURE:
- BABEL
- THE DEPARTED
- LETTERS FROM IWO JIMA
- LITTLE MISS SUNSHINE
- THE QUEEN

"Little Miss Sunshine" is the only comedy up for the Best Picture Academy Award. It appears unlikely it will win despite the critical acclaim it has received because the Academy seems to favor dramatic films.

If the Globes taught us anything last month, it was that there's still no direct shot at who'll win Best Picture. Five very different films make up this year's crop of nominees, from a small family comedy, a WWII battle, a mob crime drama, and a tale about a queen. Oh, and there's Babel, which can best be described as a politically international look at four intertwining dramatic stories.

What's even more confusing about this year's crop of nominees is that conceivably any of these pictures could take the top prize. The Queen may have been the best-reviewed film of the year, but The Departed and Little Miss Sunshine have received the most nominations from critics as the potentials to take home the win.

While touching and poignant, Babel never really found a creative flow, making the film very choppy, and reviewers seem to be running hot and cold on it. Props do, however, go to director Alejandro González Iñarritu for attempting to bring light to a serious subject. If the film had any potential (not counting its surprise win at the Globes), it'd bet that the Oscars tend to have a weakness for the heartbreaker tragedy (please see Million Dollar Baby, Schindler's List, Terms of Endearment or Gone with the Wind for confirmation).

While Letters from Iwo Jima has received better reviews than its counterpart, Flags of our Fathers, it was released too late in the season to garner enough from balloters. Plus, let's face it; director Clint Eastwood won Best Picture and Best Director in 2004 for Million Dollar Baby (and probably would have won for '03's Mystic River if it weren't the year of the Ring). So it's about time to pass the accolades onto someone else. It's also funny to note that, though nominated for Best Picture at the Oscars, Letters was nominated for Foreign Film at the Globes, where it had a better chance of winning (beside the US the film has Japanese financing, and therefore could qualify in both foreign and domestic categories). Just goes to show the film industry really loves Eastwood.

As for the little film-that-could, Little Miss Sunshine, I'm torn as to whether to side with critics or go against the majority. Sure, the film was a touching dysfunctional tale, and the cast certainly deserved that win at the SAG awards for Outstanding Performance (which is the equivalent to winning Best Picture), but, like Meryl Streep's nomination, rarely does the Academy honor comedies.

Last but not least is Martin Scorsese's The Departed, which behind The Queen has garnered the largest amount of praise for critics. But a lot of that praise has gone to Scorsese's return to form, which could label the film as a comeback instead of simply an impressive and smart crime drama. And the film certainly isn't light on the language. But since I can't vote for Children of Men (but hope that it wins Best Cinematography), I'd have to go with my second favorite film of the year.

Will Win: The Departed
Deserves it: The Departed

Kate Bauer can be reached at kbauer@student.umass.edu

Rinko Kikuchi stars in "Babel," as a young deaf Japan girl. She is nominated for an Academy Award for Best Supporting Actress at Sunday's 79th Oscars.

BITE ME!

Pizza Shark Plus presents
Two-for-one Mondays

Buy any large pizza, get a second large pizza FREE with your UMass ID

Cheese $12.00	Pepperoni $14.00	Pesto $17.00
Teriyaki Steak $18.00	BBQ Chicken $17.00	Antipasto $18.00
Buffalo Chicken $17.00	Seafood $18.00	White Pizza $14.00
Mediterranean $17.00	Roasted Veggie $17.00	Margherita $17.00
Shark Therapy $17.00	Honey Mustard Chicken $18.00

(413) 259-4259
17B Montague Road, Amherst MA 01002
higher price prevails. must show UMass ID at time of purchase. offer expires 9/1/06

Last season a distant memory for UMass

M. LACROSSE from page 12

get in the way when the Minutemen take the field at Shuart Stadium tomorrow afternoon.

The last time the Pride saw the Maroon and White, UMass bounced them from the NCAA Tournament on their own Astroturf, 11-10, in overtime. The Minutemen won that game behind five goals from current sophomore Jim Connolly including the game-winner in the extra session.

That loss was Hofstra's first since the beginning of the season, also to UMass, 11-7. The Minutemen were the only team to defeat the Pride in 2006. Between the two losses they ran off a streak of 17 consecutive victories, giving them the No. 2 spot in the country, and No. 3 seed in the tournament.

"Well they have a new coach, Seth Tierney, this is his first year. There will be some differences with them, particularly on offense. He's an offensive coach and a real good coach," Cannella said.

Tierney takes over for the departed John Dankowski, who is now the head coach at Duke.

Like the Minutemen, Hofstra lost much of its offense from a season ago. Gone are the likes of Chris Unterstein, Athan Iannucci and their combined 161 points. Unterstein notched his 81 points on 45 goals and 36 assists, while Iannucci had 80 on an astounding 62 goals and 18 assists. But then again, the top returning scorer for the Pride is no slouch.

He is attackman Tom Dooley. He had 51 points last season and is poised to return as the forefront of Hofstra's offense as sophomore this year. With just a year of collegiate lacrosse under his belt, there's no question Dooley has just scratched the surface of his potential – a scary thought for a player who notched 18 goals and 38 assists as a rookie.

"I expect them to be extremely hungry and to come out raring to go, this is their first contest as well," Cannella said. "I'm sure there is a revenge-factor for those guys [with] us winning the last game last year."

There will be many teams gunning for revenge against UMass this season, especially several members of its own conference, the ECAC. This season the conference gets back its automatic qualifier (automatic bid) for the NCAA Tournament after a three-year hiatus. It lost the AQ when Stony Brook, Maryland-Baltimore County and Navy all left the conference beginning in 2001.

According to NCAA lacrosse regulations, a conference must have at least six teams competing against one another for two years. Now the only conference without an AQ is the Atlantic Coast Conference. The ACC is a four-team league (North Carolina, Duke, Maryland and Virgina) that need not worry about an AQ because of the overall quality of its teams.

Although it may not be the ACC, Cannella says the level of competition in UMass' own conference remains high. The Minutemen have contests against each of the seven other ECAC teams with three being played at Garber Field and four on the road.

The start of the ECAC schedule is still more than a month away. On March 24, UMass travels to Baltimore, Md. to face off with Loyola. That trip is also the longest the Minutemen will make during the regular season. But they wouldn't mind a trip back to Baltimore for the semifinal and championship rounds of the tournament.

After Loyola, UMass plays ECAC squads for the next five weeks, including home games against Penn State and Georgetown.

Last season the Nittany Lions dealt the Minutemen their first of just two conference losses. That game was played in Happy Valley and ended as a low-scoring affair, 7-5.

UMass' second, and final, league defeat came at the hands of the Hoyas. Georgetown and the Maroon and White are bitter rivals and have traded wins the past few years.

The other road games of the conference schedule will be played against Hobart on April 14, Fairfield on April 24 and Rutgers on May 5. UMass handled these teams relatively easily a season ago – beating the three by a combined score of 30-18.

"Every game we play is going to be a huge game this year," Cannella said. "So we're used to being marked. We're used to having a target on our backs – that's no different. I'm actually happy it's no different because our guys haven't approached it differently. They're out there working their tails off. And that's how you have to approach it."

To go along with its difficult conference season, UMass has one of the more difficult non-conference schedules in the country. The highlight of the non-conference schedule of course is the April 28 game against Syracuse.

A lacrosse powerhouse for much of the late 20th century, the Minutemen have recorded several huge victories over the Orange in recent history. In 2005, UMass defeated them in the opening round of the NCAA Tournament, 16-15 – it was the first time since 1981 that a Syracuse team didn't advance to the Final Four.

Just a few weeks prior, the Minutemen defeated Syracuse for their first of two victories over the Orange that season. That game was decided by one goal as well, 14-13.

"We play a strong schedule. Coming into the season, our strength of schedule is somewhere around 14 or 15 in the country," Cannella said.

Other out-of-conference tilts for the Minutemen include Albany – whom they haven't beaten the past three years – and Ivy League schools Brown, Yale and Harvard.

"We've played Brown, Harvard and Yale forever – something like 30 or 40 years," Cannella said. "Syracuse, I think we've played them since the late '70s, maybe even before that. I make the schedule. I think it's a strong schedule. We enjoy playing a strong schedule."

Jon Pellard can be reached at jpellard@student.umass.edu.

SARAH PRATT – THE COLLEGIAN

Sophomore Joe Reale is expected to contribute to the already deep UMass midfield this season. The Burlington, Mass., native will backup the first and second lines of the midfield while contributing in other needed areas.

New faces in starting lineup in 2007

POSITIONS from page 12

for the 2007 UMass men's lacrosse team.

ATTACK

This position is stirring uncertainty with Cannella, as the front line is young and new. Sophomore Jim Connolly returns as the Minutemen's main option on the offensive end. Connolly turned in a dramatic finish to an already-stellar individual season when he scored five goals including the game-winner in overtime in a win over tomorrow's opponent (Hofstra) in the NCAA Quarterfinals.

But this season is a different chapter in Connolly's book, and he will be receiving much more attention from opposing defenses.

"Everybody knows about Jimmy Connolly who had a great year for us as a freshman," Cannella said. "He's a super player, a great goal-scorer, hard worker. He'll get the No. 1 guy now. He's going to get a lot of attention because people know him because they saw him on TV score a bunch of goals."

Connolly put 22 shots in the net and tallied 26 points alongside Morris, who demanded the attention of all defenders. Connolly slid under the radar for a stretch, but has emerged now as the Minutemen's No. 1 threat up front. It will be a big adjustment for the second-year attacker.

Connolly will be playing alongside two new attackers without much experience, and three players – senior Dennis Whelan, sophomores Tim Balise and Evan Blum – are fighting for playing time as Connolly's wingmen.

Balise, Blum and Whelan have five collegiate goals between them, and jumping into a regular season game against Hofstra tomorrow will reveal much about who can step up and score in the immediate future.

Balise scored two goals last season during scarce minutes. Whelan has played in just 14 games over the last three seasons and Blum hasn't played a second for the Minutemen.

"Dennis [Whelan] is a senior and he hasn't played for us yet," Cannella said. "Blum hasn't played. It's his first time getting in there and he is a goal-scorer as well, pretty crafty, pretty quick, not a big guy. Blum is a big kid so he can throw his weight around a little bit. Right now, those guys are battling out a little bit and finding out who's going to be able to do it."

MIDFIELD AND DEFENSIVE MIDFIELD

There are no problems or question marks for this team in the midfield. UMass is returning almost everyone, including three senior captains on the first line: Brett Garber, Brian Jacovina and Pat Larmon (who is coming off of a September surgery for a torn ACL but is "doing very well," according to Cannella) will start in the midfield.

"You have three seniors with the first group, Brian Jacovina, Brett Garber and Pat Larmon," Cannella stated. "Those three guys are captains, pretty stable there. All good players and all have the ability to dodge and get to the goal. They have the ability to feed the ball as well. You feel that at least you're settled there. You know who's going to play."

There is no drop to the second line of midfielders, all equally good scorers and playmakers with adequate experience. Senior Andrew Recchione and juniors Rory Pedrick and Fred Federico further solidify the Minutemen's prowess in the midfield. Pedrick notched 28 total points last season – good for second on the team with 12 goals and 16 assists.

"I don't think there is a difference between the first and second midfield groups," Cannella stated. "There's no difference. Those guys are all quality middies and they can play on any team in the country."

In the defensive midfield, senior Sam Moody, an Amherst native, heads up the short-stick group with junior Paul Manesis, senior Matt Carroll and sophomore Dennis Lynch all expected to contribute.

Long-stick defender Dan Whipple is a team captain and will lead the Minutemen's defense this season. Whipple had 36 groundballs and 28 caused turnovers last season, second on the team last season behind Jack Reid.

"[Whipple] is a warrior," Cannella said. "He's a fighter. He's a good athlete who's got good speed. But he's a warrior. His development over the last four years has been really impressive. [The pole] is where he's excelled. He's a guy who can create havoc in the middield."

CLOSE DEFENSE AND GOALIE

The loss of Jack Reid will be a large hole to fill. He was the ECAC Defensive Player of the Year and First Team All-ECAC, among other prestigious awards. But the Minutemen are returning three defenders who got significant playing time alongside Reid last season.

The junior trio of Brian Danvers, Sean Krygier and David Von Voigt will be a sufficient suffocator of opposing offenses. Krygier started all 18 games last season and Von Voigt split time with Danvers after going down with an injury.

"We have a lot of confidence in those guys and in their ability," Cannella said. "But you can't replace guys like Jack [Reid], the ferocity that he played with, the intensity and the leadership he had on the field for us."

Redshirt freshman Jordan Hendry may also see some time at close defense after recovering from a broken leg last season.

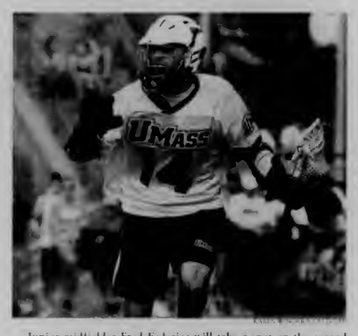
Sophomore Doc Schneider returns as one of the main leaders for this year's UMass squad. As a freshman last season, Schneider led the Minutemen through the playoffs after winning the goalie spot earlier in the season. Schneider had a 60.3 save percentage last season and allowed just over eight goals per game.

Cannella is confident that his second-year star can continue to improve.

"Doc Schneider had a really, really good year last year, an outstanding leader and a great goalie," Cannella said. "We don't have a problem. We don't need to push him. He's a self-motivated guy. That's what makes him good. I think everybody's told him in the past that he couldn't do it. He's kind of grown up. He's a man now.

"In high school we recruited him based on not only his ability but his leadership qualities in the goal. That has carried over, and now he's got the physical part and he's been very serious about his approach."

Rob Greenfield can be reached at rgreenfi@student.umass.edu.



JAMES WORKMAN – THE COLLEGIAN

Junior midfielder Fred Federico will take a spot on the second line because of Jamie Yaman's graduation.

JASON WOLF – THE COLLEGIAN

Senior Andrew Recchione heads up a strong second line in the midfield for the Minutemen.

BOSTON UNIVERSITY
School of Medicine
Master's in Mental Health and Behavioral Medicine Program
(eligible for independent licensure)
OPEN HOUSE
2007–2008
Saturday, February 24, 2007
Friday, March 30, 2007 • Friday, April 27, 2007
10:00 a.m. - 2:00 p.m.
Boston University School of Medicine
715 Albany Street
Robinson Building, Suite B-2903
Boston, MA 02118
(Interviews will be offered to students with completed applications)
Please R.S.V.P. to:
Bernice R. Mark
Program Administrative Assistant
(If you plan on attending one of these sessions)
617 414 2320
nerey@bu.edu or visit our website www.bumc.bu.edu/mhbm
BOSTON UNIVERSITY SCHOOL OF MEDICINE

UM looks to continue reign at ECSC's

By Justin McGrail
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Massachusetts men's ski team has a huge weekend ahead of it. The team will be competing in the ECSC Regional Championships at Waterville Valley.

After working hard all season, it has finally paid off. The team was invited to compete in the Regionals after finishing second in the conference behind Boston College. The team started its season with fourth and third place finishes in the UConn Carnival, then the Minutemen exploded. The Minutemen won their next four races in a row and captured the top spot in the conference.

In the Brown/MIT Carnival the men took fourth place in both races, which was very uncharacteristic. They finished the season strong by taking second and first place in the final two races of the season, respectively. The team had a great season and now it is looking to translate that success into another regional championship.

Senior Rush Hawkins had a fantastic end to his final year on the UMass ski team. Not only did he win his final race of the regular season, he had eight Top 10 finishes this season and two of those finishes were in the top spot. Hawkins also placed third overall in the conference. In the previous two regional championships, Hawkins has won both the giant slalom and the slalom races. He will go for his third straight sweep of the event this weekend.

Not to be outdone, Rush's sister Eliza will be competing individually at this weekend's regional championships. Eliza also had a great season, placing third in the Mact onnell Division standings as well. She had four Top 10 finishes and edged out her brother by having three wins.

Her season didn't end as well though. She fell hard on the first run of her first race at the Boston College Carnival and suffered a concussion. Doctors told her that she would only need one week's worth of rest before skiing again.

The regionals come two weeks after the last race, however, allowing Hawkins a chance to repeat at the Regionals, giving her a chance to repeat as the individual National Champion.

Rush Hawkins isn't the only star on the men's side. Usually finishing right behind him is junior Jason Small. Hawkins co-captain had seven Top 10 finishes this season and was the best overall skier for UMass at the Plymouth State Carnival. He will be trying to get the Minutemen back into the National Championship hunt with a strong showing at this weekend's regionals.

Postseason skiing is something that the men's team is used to. Last season, Hawkins' dominating performance helped advance the team to nationals. The season before that, both the men's and women's teams won their respective regional championships.

This was the first time in school history that both teams were Regional Champions in the same season. Even though the women's team will not be competing, the men are looking to achieve the same results. With a stellar team record and a solid finish to their season, the Minutemen could go all the way this season.

MATTHEW THAYER – THE COLLEGIAN

Junior Gary Forbes has been on fire lately, scoring more than 20 points in three of the last five contests. The forward is now averaging 13.4 points per game, good enough for third-best on the team.

Minutemen refusing to look past disappointing Billikens

M. BASKETBALL from page 12

UMass coach Travis Ford can't figure it out.

"I've watched [Saint Louis] a lot on tape when we're scouting other teams, and this is a very talented, well-rounded basketball team," Ford said. "They beat some very good teams in our league, and they beat some very good teams overall this year.

"They're one of the most dangerous teams in our league because if you look at their record they can sneak up on you," he added. "But if you understand who they are, they should not sneak up on anybody."

Saint Louis is coming off wins against La Salle and Dayton, thanks to the stellar play of Kevin Lisch. The sophomore guard scored 24 points against La Salle and 22 points against Dayton. Lisch is the Billikens' second-leading scorer, averaging 14.8 points per game.

Sophomore guard Tommie Liddell leads Saint Louis in scoring with 16 points per game. He is also the team's best 3-point shooter, hitting 50 percent (487-for-941) of his shots from behind the arc.

The Minutemen also can't overlook the presence of 6-foot-10 big man Ian Vouyoukas, who leads the Billikens in rebounding (7.1 boards per game) and blocks (52).

"They've got three players in Lisch, Liddell and Vouyoukas who are as good as any three players in our league," Ford said. "I really believe that. They're that good."

Those three combined make for a dangerous team on paper. It just hasn't been consistent within the A-10.

UMass looks to record its second four-game winning streak of the season against Saint Louis. The last time the Minutemen won more than three in a row was back on Nov. 28 at Savannah State.

Wednesday night's blowout over St. Bonaventure made this year's Minutemen the 13th team in school history to post 20 wins in a season. The last time they did it was in 1997-98 when they finished 21-11. That was also the last year UMass advanced to the NCAA Tournament.

With three games left, these Minutemen don't plan on stopping there.

"It was one of our goals to get 20 wins or more," senior Stephane Lasme said after Wednesday night's win. "But I'm not ready to just stop winning right now. I want to get as many as I can.

They are going to need more than 20 wins to advance to the field of 65. And whether history repeats itself can only be answered in Atlantic City.

Dunn Picard can be reached at dpicard@student.umass.edu.

Mills' career-high 28 points lifts UM pressure defensively," UMass coach Marnie Dacko said. "That was to take some of the responsibility off of Kate and Tamara."

W. BASKETBALL from page 12

The strategy worked. Dayton managed to take 10 more shots from the field Thursday, but it didn't help their cause with a dismal 19-for-66 night shooting. The Flyers managed to lower their conference worst 27.5 percent mark from behind the arc, going 5-21 in that category.

One area the Flyers had success was at the charity stripe.

The Minutewomen strive to make more free-throws than their opponents' attempted. Last night, they shot a sub-par 14-20 from the line, but managed to hold the Flyers to 18 attempts. On the season, UMass has attempted 507 free-throws to its opponents 369.

"We put them on the foul line 18 times, and that's not our game, fouling and being out of position" added Dacko.

After their loss to Xavier on Sunday, a top conference team, Dacko made sure to remind her players of the brighter points of their performance.

"I was hoping to use [the loss to] Xavier as a positive," Dacko said. "We played very well [against Xavier]. That's the level we want to play to all the time. If we can match that intensity with every outing then we're going to be in every game."

One Minutewoman in particular carried her strong performance into Ohio.

Junior forward Kate Mills led all scorers with a career-high 28 points on 12-of-18 shooting, along with eight rebounds, one assist and two blocks.

Mills' performance was particularly impressive, considering she had little help to alleviate inside pressure. Excluding Mills' 12-for-18 night, the rest of the Minutewomen shot a meager 13-for-38 from the field.

"Kate worked for every shot she got tonight," Dacko said. "She had two or three people on her, they were doubling and tripling up."

Thursday's matchup marked Mills' second-straight career performance, following up a then-best 24-point effort in Sunday's loss to Xavier with her 28 points last night. Entering last night's contest, Mills was averaging a team-high 16.3 points per game, good for eighth in the conference.

Senior center Tamara Tatham led the way on the boards, pulling down 14 rebounds and dishing out six assists. As a team, UMass outrebounded UD, 47-34.

"I thought we did a nice job on the boards," added Dacko. "All in all, I'm just really pleased to get out of there playing ugly and getting a win."

Playing ugly is a recurring theme when Dayton and UMass get together. The last time the Minutewomen traveled to UD Arena, they walked away with a 52-30 victory Feb. 11, 2005.

One recurring problem that surfaced again on Thursday was points-off-turnovers. UMass allowed 22 points off of turnovers, while gathering 16 from the Flyers. The Minutewomen had turned over the ball 21 times to Dayton's 13.

Heading into the final regular season game against Fordham, a must-win for UMass, considering the Rams' 3-24 record (1-12 in conference), the Minutewomen need to take better care of the ball and play fundamentally sound if they want to make it deep into the tournament.

"I sound like a broken record, but we need to make lay-ups and make free-throws," said Dacko. "We're still in a situation where I think we are reluctant on offense. Our perimeter people need to work harder on knocking down open jumpers. The coaching staff has complete confidence in them."

Barring a meltdown at Fordham on Sunday, the Minutewomen will close out the season with five wins in six games. They will try and parlay that momentum and confidence into a deep postseason run this March, when they play on Xavier's home court in the Atlantic 10 Tournament.

MATTHEW THAYER – THE COLLEGIAN

Senior Tamara Tatham led UMass with 14 rebounds, including 12 on the defensive side of the ball. Her eight points was second on the team.

MATTHEW THAYER – THE COLLEGIAN

Junior Kate Mills led the Minutewomen with a career-high 28 points in the win over Dayton. She added eight rebounds, two blocks and an assist.

N.E. Championships cap year for UMass

By Steve Games
COLLEGIAN STAFF

This weekend the Massachusetts track and field teams will compete in Boston for the New England Championships. The men are coming off a strong performance at the Atlantic 10 Championships, while the women hope to turn the corner after a disappointing finish last week.

Last weekend, the Minutemen finished fourth overall at the A-10s in Kingston, Rhode Island. Nine runners and jumpers posted a season-best time and distance last week.

The New England Championships will have 20 events scored, which hurts the Minutemen because they do not have competitors in every event. Last year, they finished sixth out of 32 teams and scored 32.50 points in the overall standings.

At the Championships last season, senior Erik Hoagland won the long jump event with a leap of 23 feet and 3.25 inches. He was the only UMass athlete to finish first in any event. He also placed 11th in the triple jump with a leap of 44 feet 5.5 inches.

Also performing strong last season was senior James Godinho, who finished fourth in the 500-meter in 1:03.98. The distance medley team finished fifth out of 20 teams with a time of 10:08.90.

Connecticut took first place at the New England Championships last year with a score of 161.50.

The Minutewomen finished 19th out of 37 teams last season at the New England Championships. One of the top performers from last years meet, junior Kristen Bakanowski, finished 3rd in the pole vault with a distance of 11 feet, 9.75 inches.

Bakanowski is out for the rest of the indoor and outdoor season after undergoing foot surgery. She is red shirting this season and will have two seasons of eligibility left.

Junior Christina DeRosa finished fourth last season in the 3,000-meter run (10:04.05). This year she will be running in the 5,000-meter run. Last week, she had her best time in the event, finishing third overall with a time of 17:38.73.

"That was her best performance so far this year," UMass coach Julie LaFremiere said.

After finishing poorly in the A-10s, the coaches want to see a better effort out of their athletes.

"We were pleased with the intensity of the women on [Monday] at practice," LaFremiere said. "They just have to work so much harder during workouts in order to rise to the level that we except of them in competition."

In the field events the team has some young talent, freshman Molly Chapin who is a walk on will be competing in the pole vault event with Bakanowski injured. Freshman Lisa Wilson picked up a point for the team last week in the weight throw event placing eight with a toss of 13.61 meters. She also competed in the shot put event coming in ninth (11.04 meters).

The Minutewomen lack depth, and it has become hard for them to overcome the frequent injuries.

"It's very difficult to cover when you lose some of the top kids," LaFremiere said.

UConn's women also captured first at the New England Championships last season with a total score of 181.83.

Steve Games can be reached at sgames@student.umass.edu.

Rappe and co. maintain lead in Buffalo

By Jon Melloni
COLLEGIAN STAFF

BUFFALO, N.Y. – The Massachusetts men's swimming and diving team maintained a familiar position on Day Two of the Atlantic 10 Championships – first place. But the Minutewomen dropped to second behind a talented bunch from Richmond.

Junior diver R.J. Rappe won his third straight A-10 1-meter diving championship with a score of 631.5.

"R.J. is the man," Yarworth said. "We were down to one diver for various reasons and R.J. just stepped it up. He consistently gets me the most points we can get. He's a solid diver. He's just the man."

Also, senior Evan Swisher was spectacular for the second day in a row. He finished second in the 200-yard individual medley and swam the lead leg in the silver-medal winning 200-yard freestyle relay team.

"I'm really pleased with how I'm swimming. I knew I would swim well," Swisher said. "I knew we'd all swim well. We've been working hard all year. The good swims that we're having gets people pumped up to do well."

The Maroon and White's 246 points is more than 50 in front of the second-place team Duquesne (194.5) and St. Bonaventure (169) round out the top three.

For the Minutewomen, senior captain Liz Lovejoy anchored the 200-yard freestyle relay to a third-place finish behind strong squads from five-time defending champion Richmond and Duquesne. The captain swam three relays through the first two days proving why women's coach Bob Newcomb considers her such an asset.

"You look at somebody like [Lovejoy] and you've got a big time swimmer, somebody who is going to anchor your relays," Newcomb said. "She's the first one to cheer for everybody and she uses that big loud voice of hers to get people up and motivated."

In the women's final event, the 200-yard freestyle relay, Lovejoy anchored a group that swam it in 1:45.89 seconds – just .16 seconds behind the 1:35.73 mark set at last year's A-10's. Senior Nicole LeBarge, junior Allison Volpe and freshman Kathryne Chaliks also swam in the race. LeBarge, Volpe and Lovejoy were members of the team that set the school record last year as well.

UMass looks strong headed into the third day of the event, but Richmond appears unbeatable at the moment. The Spiders broke three A-10 records in the first two days. The Spiders' dominance, however, does not faze the Minutewomen.

"With Richmond, we just kind of let them go," Lovejoy said. "We like to race them but Richmond is not who we're out to get."

Illness appears to have struck the Minutemen at the worst possible time. Freshman Eric Smith became physically ill before swimming in the finals of the 500-yard freestyle and still took part in the race for UMass. Senior Mike Herald is also suffering from sickness. Smith persevered through the race despite the illness, which was a great source of pride for men's coach Russ Yarworth.

"[Smith] did one of the toughest things I've ever seen," Yarworth said. "He [vomited] seven times in the two hours before the finals. He swam as fast as he could. He could hardly stand at the starting blocks. It was unbelievable taking one for the team."

If Smith dropped out of the race, Fordham freshman Justin Coombs would have replaced him since he had the next best score in the preliminary race. But Smith swam the race scoring 11 points for the Minutemen.

The sickness of Smith and Herald isn't the only thing that left the UMass shorthanded. Freshman divers Byron Johnson will not compete for the Minutemen for undisclosed reasons.

Yarworth and his bunch are in great shape with the individual races beginning tomorrow.

Jon Melloni can be reached at jmelloni@student.umass.edu.

Styles by Deborah & Co.
HAIR SALON & SPA
65 University Drive, Amherst ~ 549-5610
Paul Mitchell Signature Salon
FREE HAIRCUT with any Color Service (of $70 or more)
$15 OFF any Color Service (of $70 or more)
$5 OFF any Haircut
Also specializing in chemical relaxing, pressing, and styling ethnic hair.
Coupons may not be combined
Offers expire 3/30/07

UMass eyes home ice

Mass Attack plays two against NU with playoff implications

BY JON PELLAND
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Last season the Northeastern Huskies were a team that didn't know how to win games. They came close and pushed many teams to the brink, but could never get over the hump of turning a tie into a win.

Northeastern posted seven ties a year ago, coupled with 24 losses and just three wins, all of which came in conference play. They finished the season in ninth place, only one spot ahead of cellar-dwelling Merrimack. But this season is much different for Boston's third university.

The Huskies turned around their recent misfortunes and currently enjoy 12 wins for an overall record of 12-14-5 (8-11-5 HEA). Although they remain under .500, there is no question Northeastern is much improved this season. It currently occupies the seventh slot in the league, four points behind sixth place – occupied by the Massachusetts hockey team.

UMass (14-11-5, 11-9-3 HEA) squares off with Northeastern in a pair of games this weekend split between the Mullins Center and Matthews Arena. Tonight's contest is in Amherst, while the series finale shifts to the road for the Minutemen on Sunday in a rare afternoon game.

Despite the Huskies' poor record in recent history, UMass coach Don Cahoon sticks by the fact that no game in Hockey East is ever easy.

"Well I don't think there are any pushovers and I think that's been proven,"" he said after practice on Thursday. "Quite frankly, I think you look around the league, maybe Merrimack is the one team that's had the toughest go of it, but they certainly had their way with us.

"That's what makes the league so special. We are the best league in college hockey because of the strength of the bottom-end teams. Every weekend is a new venture and we respect Northeastern a whole lot."

And the Huskies deserve that respect with some of the wins they've posted this season: 3-2 over Michigan in Ann Arbor, 3-2 in overtime to defeat Boston College and a 6-1 drubbing of Maine at Alfond Arena. Northeastern then took the Black Bears into overtime the following night before bowing out, 2-1.

The resurgence comes in coach Greg Cronin's second year at the head of the Huskies. Perhaps a season ago was a learning experience for Cronin's troops to get used to his coaching style – something it appears the Huskies have left in the past.

"I think the players there are getting adapted to his system and what he brings to the table and what he wants of each player on the team. It's paying off now for them," said sophomore center Cory Quirk.

Northeastern has played especially well during this season's second half. That's when the BC and Maine victories came, along with five other wins. Overall, the Huskies are 7-4-3 since the turn of the calendar year. Last year, Northeastern posted just two wins during the second half.

And one reason for the Huskies improved play this season is the contributions from Cronin's inaugural recruiting class. Two of Northeastern's top-three scorers are freshmen. Chad Costello leads the team with 20 points (10 goals, 10 assists) while Kyle Kraemer sits in third with 16 (five and 11).

But that is nothing compared to the role rookie netminder Brad Thiessen has played. He's the one who has sparked the Huskies' success. Entering the weekend, Thiessen is the statistically one of the top three goalies in a league ripe with talent at the position. He currently boasts this stat line: 657 saves, 929 save percentage and a 2.12 goals-against average.

"I think they have a few special players – good young players," Cahoon said. "And they have the competitive end to it. They play with an edge. They play hard and have played hard for a long time now. So, I think that's as big a reason why they've improved."

Quirk and the rest of the Minutemen witnessed the Huskies ability to skate with anyone firsthand, early on in the 2006-07 campaign. The Minutemen downed the Huskies in a 2-1 contest that was as close as the score suggests.

Mark Matheson and Chris Davis potted goals for UMass in that game way back on Nov. 10.

"Every game is tough in our league," Quirk said. "As we've noticed with Merrimack and Lowell, anybody can beat anybody. As coach as been saying, this is the playoffs now – every game is tough. We want to get that home-ice advantage, it would be huge for us to get that."

Jon Pelland can be reached at jpelland@student.umass.edu.

KAREN WINCHOR/COLLEGIAN

Junior P.J. Fenton is one of the Mass Attack's top offensive threats with 18 points on eight goals and 10 assists, ranking him seventh on the team in scoring. The assistant captain is tied for third in goals scored.

KAREN WINCHOR/COLLEGIAN

A-10 Pitcher of the Week Brandice Balschmiter is 1-1 with a minute 0.37 ERA, allowing just one earned run in three starts.

Minutewomen take on stacked field

Pair of ranked opponents on tap for Maroon and White

BY JEREMY RICE
COLLEGIAN STAFF

After a two-week layoff, the Massachusetts softball team dives back into action against perhaps its most challenging field of opponents during the regular season.

The NFCA Leadoff Classic, held in Columbus, Ga., kicks off today and runs through bracketed play on Sunday. The Minutewomen (2-2-1) will face four teams receiving national recognition in two days before Sunday's tourney.

UMass will face No. 17/16 Baylor (12-2) and No. 19 Florida (12-3) on Friday to begin play, followed by Georgia Tech and DePaul, both of which are just outside the Top 25 but still receiving votes in both polls.

"The field is extremely difficult," UMass coach Elaine Sortino said. "Baylor and Florida are off to phenomenal starts. Georgia Tech and DePaul, if you look at their stats, they're really, really tough."

For a team that has played a grand-total of five games this spring, that line-up could seem rather imposing. But it also presents a huge opportunity for the Minutewomen to improve its RPI and climb in the national polls, something that will help them when the NCAA Tournament gets nearer.

"This is our crack at a good RPI, with the strength of schedule [this weekend]," Sortino said. "So we've got to be running on all cylinders."

Baylor has been on a tear so far this season. Their only two losses came against No. 9/14 Louisiana-Lafayette. The Bears will go for their 10th straight win against UMass Friday at 2:35 p.m.

The game will also be a reunion of sorts for one BU coach. First year assistant Tracey Drown was a third-team All-American at UMass during her senior year in 2004. Her team-leading 47 goals that season remain the second most in school history.

Drown also served as an assistant to former UMass coach Carrie Bolduc for the past two years, before moving to BU in the wake of the program's regime change.

Even though the team has two returning scorers with at least 35 points in 2006, Venechanos wants her team to have multiple scoring threats in order to develop as efficient an offense as possible.

"We're trying to be more balanced [in our offensive attack]," Venechanos said. "So if one [attacker] is having a bad game, someone else can step up; that was the goal going into the season."

Judging by the statistics from Wednesday's game, it appears that the team is succeeding in this area. Five different players scored against Holy Cross, with three coming from attackers and two from the midfield. Senior attacker Kathleen Typadis was the only UMass player to score multiple goals.

On the other side of the ball, the Minutewomen are led by goalkeeper Ashley Monceaux has done everything for the Bears through their first 14 games. The pitcher is 3-0 as a pitcher, with a 2.39 ERA. However, she's also been the best player at the plate as well, batting .650 with seven home runs and 24 RBIs already this season.

The Gators are also doing well early on, winning four of their last five games. Offensively, the team is being carried by one player, Kim Walesonia. Her .373 batting average and .510 slugging percentage lead the team. She is the only Gator batting above .300 this year.

Florida's strength is clearly their pitching, where a pair of Stacey's – Nelson and Stevens – have been truly dominant, giving up just 21 runs over 15 games. Nelson in particular has been virtually un-hittable in the early going. She currently has a 0.25 ERA, giving up just five runs while going 7-1 in eight starts.

Two weeks ago, it was easy to decide who would pitch in what game. Sophomore Brandice Balschmiter pitched the late game Friday against then-No. 6 Oregon State, leaving freshman Bailey Sanders to open the season for the Minutewomen against UC Santa Barbara.

This week, however, the decision is more difficult. With two ranked opponents in one day, Sortino cannot hide her freshman. She said the decision will come down to which pitcher matched up best with each team.

"Right now I'm trying to figure that out based on scouting reports," Sortino said yesterday. "Because Brandice and Bailey are such different pitchers, it could matter who you throw against who."

Possibly the biggest challenge for the Sortino and the Maroon and White will be preparing for this weekend's opponents. Only Georgia Tech met the Minutewomen in 2006, so Sortino has been forced to work primarily from scouting reports, as opposed to watching the teams play first-hand.

"The good part about going out to the California tournament [two weeks ago] was I got to watch all the teams before we played them," Sortino said. "So I knew what I saw, which is much better than what somebody else is telling me."

UMass has not faced Baylor since 2005 (10-2 loss), and only one starter remains from the Bear squad Sortino saw two years ago: Florida and UMass have not met since 2000 (4-3 win for the Gators), and DePaul has not faced the Maroon and White since 2004 (a 7-0 loss in the same tournament).

Only Georgia Tech represents an opponent from the 2006 season, a team the Minutewomen defeated, 2-1, in the USF-Adidas Spring Break Invitational. The two teams will meet a second time this season in this year's edition of the invitational. The tournament takes begins two weeks from today, the next time the Minutewomen will see the field following this weekend.

Jeremy Rice can be reach at jeremyr@student.umass.edu.

KAREN WINCHOR/COLLEGIAN

Senior Amanda Acampora has just one hit through five games this season – a three-run single – as the Minutewomen's designated player.

KAREN WINCHOR/COLLEGIAN

Sophomore midfielder Kaytlin McCormick was UMass' leading scorer in 2006 as a freshman and a member of the All-Rookie Team.

Revenge on UM's mind against BU

BY MICHAEL KING
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The tour of New England continues this weekend for the Massachusetts women's lacrosse team (0-1). Coming off a 7-6 loss to Holy Cross (1-0) Wednesday, the Minutewomen travel east to take on Boston University. The game will be the Terriers' first of the season and will take place at Nickerson Field on Saturday at 3 p.m.

In last year's meeting, the Maroon and White dropped the home decision, 16-6. It failed to maintain a 3-1 lead in the first half and allowed the Terriers to score 10 goals in the second half. Later that season, BU went on to win the America East Championship and qualify for the NCAA tournament.

But the makeup of BU's roster is vastly different from last season. The Terriers only return 11 players and welcome the same number of freshman to the program.

"They graduated a lot of people and they lost a couple players," Venechanos said. "But they also have had a tremendous amount of depth in the last couple of years and a lot of experienced players – they're a great team."

A credit to the BU coaching staff's ability to restock the program with talent, the Terriers are held in high regard this year. The team is ranked No. 16 in the season's first edition of the Inside Lacrosse Media Poll.

CINEMARK
CINEMARK AT HAMPSHIRE MALL 8
367 Russell St 413-587-4233
Schedule for Fri 2/23/07 - Thurs 3/01/07
DIGITAL SURROUND SOUND IN ALL AUDITORIUMS
Purchase Tickets Online @ cinemark.com
Reno 911 Miami (R) 1:45 4:55 7:55 10:15
The Queen (PG-13) 12:55 4:40 7:15
Music and Lyrics(PG-13) 1:20 4:20 7:35 10:10
Breach (PG-13) 12:00 4:40 7:20 10:00
The Astronaut Farmer (PG) 1:10 4:25 7:25 9:55
Bridge to Terabithia (PG) 1:30 4:30 6:55 9:20
The Number 23 (R) 1:25 4:30 7:40 10:25
Ghost Rider (PG-13) 1:15 1:40 4:05 4:30 7:00 7:40 9:35 10:20
Hannibal Rising (R) 1:05 4:10 7:05 10:00
Tyler Perry's Daddy's Little Girl (PG-13) 9:45
Beerpube (Said So) (PG-13) 1:00 4:00 7:10 9:40*
Norbit (PG-13) 1:35 4:15 7:20 9:45
* no passes or supervisors
NO PASSES, NO SUPERSTARS
Events & showtimes available at cinemark.com

NOW SHOWING
FEB. 23 - MAR. 1
amherst cinema
LETTERS FROM IWO JIMA
Fri - Sat 11:45-4:00-7:00-9:45
Sun - Thurs 11:45-4:00-7:00
VOLVER
Fri & Sat, 2:30 - 7:30
Sunday, 4:30
Mon & Tues, 1:00 - 6:00
Wed & Thurs, 1:00
Pan's Labyrinth
Fri & Sat 5:00 10:00
Sunday 7:30
Mon & Tues, 3:30 8:30
Wed & Thurs, 3:30
THE LAST KING OF SCOTLAND
Fri & Sat, 2:45-5:15-7:45-10:05
Sun - Thurs, 2:45-5:15-7:45
LA STRADA
Federico Fellini
SUNDAY
FEB 25, 2:00
RULES OF THE GAME
Jean Renoir
SUNDAY
FEB 25, 9:30PM
VIRIDIANA
Luis Bunuel
THURSDAY
MAR 1 7:00
BUGS BUNNY Daily 11:30 Film Festival 1:00
Heading South Wed. Feb 28, 6:00
28 AMITY STREET 413-253-2547
www.AmherstCinema.org

Free Delivery to UMass
Menu Online @ andiamo.cc

	6		3	5		2
			7		9
9		5			7	1
					3	6
	8	7			4	5
5		9
8		3			1	7
	6		8
7			3	6	9

Find all of today's puzzle solutions online!
WWW.DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

ACROSS
1 Novelist Rand
4 Divide and share
9 Struck powerfully
14 Floral wreath
15 Give a ring
16 Having harmony
17 Bluegrass pluckers
19 Spoken examinations
20 Valentino role
21 Broad-mindedness
23 Precious one
25 Allies: WWII opponents
26 Rudimentis
29 Reverence
32 Bed canopy
36 Old Pea bread?
37 Cut unevenly
39 Norma
40 Exploded
41 Goof
42 Less
43 Maui strings
44 Aflward
45 Church court
46 First mass-produced car
48 Word before room or house
49 Gray of face
50 Disfigure
52 Columnist Smith
54 Unlike capital letters
59 Happen twice
63 Render weaponless
64 Dire
66 Converge
67 One more time
68 Buddy
69 Like some windows
70 Bangor's state
71 Wallflower-ish

DOWN
1 Clerical wear
2 Uh-huh
3 Square of three
4 Delivered an address
5 Beta Kappa
6 Misplaced
7 Absorbed by
8 Inventor Nikola
9 Legendary
10 Quagmire
11 Judah's son
12 Sprinkle after a shower
13 If all fails
18 Puzzle in pieces
22 Outward
24 Regal
26 Photo book
27 Silvers TV role
28 Words to live by
30 Viral lump
31 White heron
33 Jazz combos
34 Potting soil
35 Team race
38 Tipper or Al
42 Grass chomper
44 Scared
47 Come into view
51 Charwoman's title
53 "Goodnight" girl of song
54 Shapeless mass
55 SSS classification
56 Tip off
57 Nintendo rival
58 Morales of "La Bamba"
60 Toy gun ammo
61 Four Corners state
62 Bank (on)
65 Brooch

THIS SATURDAY
HIGH HORSE ENTERTAINMENT & [illegible]
G.LOVE & SPECIAL SAUCE
PLUS REDEYE
SAT. FEB. 24 • 8:30 PM
DOORS OPEN 7:30 PM/BALLROOM
Pearl Street Nightclub 10 PEARL ST. NORTHAMPTON
TO PURCHASE TICKETS OR FOR MORE INFO VISIT OUR WEBSITE OR CALL:
WWW.IHEG.COM or 413-586-8686

QUOTE OF THE DAY

"There are nights when the wolves are silent and only the moon howls."

-George Carlin

THE FAMILY MONSTER By Josh Shalek

Hello, Miss
Might I interest you in taking a survey
You're no mom
SHOOT
A lizard, hm. I would have guessed rat or alien
But how did you know
No one asks kids what they think
Be still my cold-blooded, reptilian heart

TWO DUDES By Aaron Warner

WE GOTTA GET OUT OF HERE, DUDE! SPENDING OUR YOUTH JUST WATCHING MOVIES AND VIDEO GAMES WILL ROT OUR BRAINS
I HAVEN'T MOVED FROM THIS SPOT IN TWO DAYS, DUDE.
IT'S TOO LATE FOR ME, GO! SAVE YOURSELF WHILE YOU CAN.

TWO DUDES By Billy O'Keefe

AND THEN SHE CALLED ME A STALKER? JUST BECAUSE I VISITED HER PLACE OF WORK WHICH HAPPENS, BY THE WAY, TO BE A STORE AND I'M PART OF THE BUYING PUBLIC, LAST I CHECKED
I MIGHT'VE TAUNTED HER BUT IT WAS IN VERY GOOD TASTE
OH COME ON, STALKERS DON'T TAUNT! THEY FLATTER AND STARE!
WELL DID YOU DO ANYTHING WEIRD WHILE YOU WERE THERE?
UMM—YOU TAUNTED HER?!
YEAH, THAT'S HOW THE COPS HAD THEM. THEY CATCH THEM COMPLIMENTING!

WELCOME TO FALLING ROCK NATIONAL PARK By Josh Shalek

I wish for forever to be an owl again!
Thanks for using your last wish on me
Your other wishes were good, too
Yeah, but now the ice cream is gone
And I should've fixed global warming
And I shouldn't have eaten your magic beans
We can't have regrets
Now let's go have dinner

Submit your comics!
collegiancomics@yahoo.com
Submit your classifieds!
(413) 545-3500

HOROSCOPES

aquarius JAN. 20-FEB. 18
Do not shave today, let your hair grow wild as a pack of wolves.

pisces FEB. 19-MAR. 20
Cut all ties with your current social scene, make friends who speak in odd tongues.

aries MAR. 21-APR. 19
The squirrels are conspiring against you. You can see it in their beady little eyes.

taurus APR. 20-MAY 20
Spend your weekend trying to catch and eat all the ducks in the campus pond.

gemini MAY 21-JUN. 21
Don't lean back too far in your chair. You might fall out and wet yourself.

cancer JUN. 22-JUL. 22
Ask yourself "What am I doing to improve the efficiency of my species?"

leo JUL. 23-AUG. 22
You are as charismatic and good looking as the love-child of Bill Clinton and Elvis.

virgo AUG. 23-SEPT. 22
Find a shiny object and see how many people you can distract with it.

libra SEPT. 23-OCT. 22
Get the produce code from your favorite fruit tattooed on your upper thigh.

scorpio OCT. 23-NOV. 21
Going out without your cellphone is liberating, a lot like not wearing underpants.

sagittarius NOV. 22-DEC. 21
Stop littering! Can't you see Captain Planet is crying, alone in the corner?

capricorn DEC. 22-JAN. 19
Look inside yourself...by opening your mouth really wide in front of a mirror.

Pioneer Valley Pizza
Free Delivery 253-1011
Pizza • Wings • Subs • Calzones • Entrees • Salads
Gourmet Pizzas from Small to PARTY SIZE!
Feed your party right!
Buy any Large Pizza, receive "Wings for One" 1/2 price
Not to be combined with any other offers.
We're up when you're up
Sun-Wed 11am-1am
Thurs 11am-2am
Fri-Sat 11am-2am
20 Belchertown Rd. Amherst, MA (across from Cumby's)

MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN MARKETPLACE

ANNOUNCEMENTS

Global Express Tours Spring Break Montreal Party Weekends from $99 Complete bus, hotels, & clubs. Montrealexpress.net 781-979-9001

APARTMENT FOR RENT

Hobart Condos 3 bedroom, hardwood floors, study area in basement. Cable telephone Internet access) in all bedrooms and study. NOW SHOWING for JUNE and SEPTEMBER. NO FEES. www.amherst-lincolnrealty.com 253-7879

APARTMENT FOR RENT

Brandywine Apts. Now Leasing, 1&2 bedroom apts. Leases begin Jun, July, Aug or Sep. First Come First Serve. Get Them while they last. www.brandy-wineapts.com stop by or call 549-0600

Center of town, 1,2,3 bedrooms hardwood floors. NOW SHOWING for JUNE and SEPTEMBER. NO FEES www.amher-stlincolnrealty.com 253-7879

EMPLOYMENT

Winter/ Spring positions available. Earn up to $150 per day Exp not required. Undercover shoppers needed To Judge Retail and Dining Establishments. Call 800-722-4791

Rent us your ears! Listening Experiments $10/ hr English must be your first language. Email: phonetics_lab@linguist.umass.edu voicemail: 545-6837

EMPLOYMENT

Bartending $300/day potential. No experience necs. Training provided. 1-800-965-6520 ext.162

Dell Campus Reps Needed Promote a top 30 company to gain real-world business & marketing experience! www.repnation.com/dell to apply.

HOUSE FOR RENT

Northampton Cathedral ceiling, sky-lites, hardwood floors, 4-5 bdrms. 9/1 $1950. 413-730-6660

ROOM FOR RENT

Room for rent in S. Amherst by bus stop. $450/mo 301-938-0038

SERVICES

Legal Questions? We have answers. Contact Student Legal Services office 922 Campus Center or call 545-1995

Call Someone who really cares. Birthright of Amherst Area 549-1906, 1800-550-4900 24 hour hotline Free Pregnancy test 233 N. Pleasant St. Amherst www.birth-right.org

SERVICES

Pregnancy Testing, HIV Testing, Birth Control, and Emergency Contraception. STI Screening and Treatment. Affordable and confidential. Tapestry Health, 27 Pray Street, Amherst. 548-9992. www.tap-estryhealth.com

TRAVEL

Global Express Tours Spring Break Montreal Party Weekends from $99 Complete bus, hotels, & clubs. Montrealexpress.net 781-979-9001

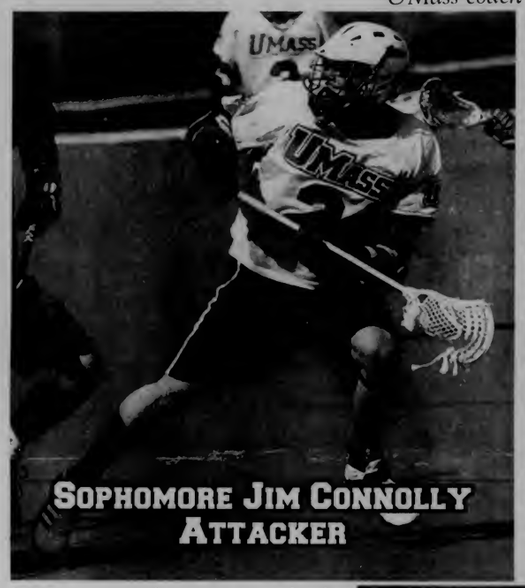
THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

SPORTS WEEKEND

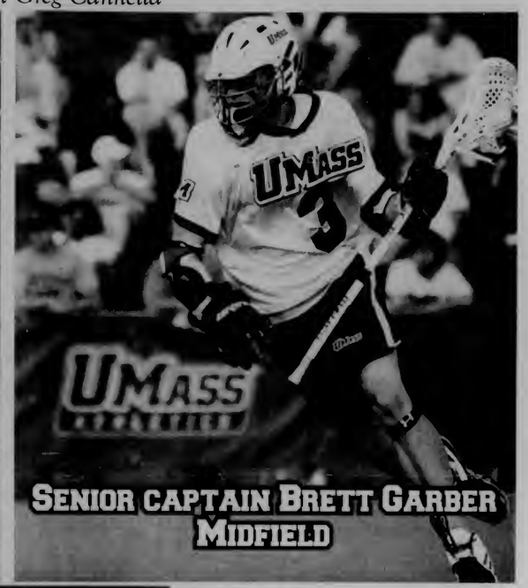
FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 23, 2007 SPORTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

A NEW BEGINNING

"This team has a new identity than the 2006 team. This is a totally different team."
–UMass coach Greg Cannella



SOPHOMORE JIM CONNOLLY
ATTACKER



SENIOR CAPTAIN BRETT GARBER
MIDFIELD

Minutemen focusing on fresh start after deep run in 2006

By Jon Pellant
Collegian Staff

What's past is past.

That's the message UMass coach Greg Cannella is stressing to the Massachusetts men's lacrosse team entering the 2007 season. The last time the Minutemen were on a lacrosse field was last May for the National Championship game at Lincoln Financial Field in Philadelphia.

Although Cannella's team came up short of the ultimate goal in that game – losing to a highly-talented Virginia squad, 15-7 – it solidified its place as one of the premier lacrosse programs in the country. But at the same time, he doesn't want the Minutemen to lose themselves in the memories of past glory. They start a new season, a clean slate, against Hofstra tomorrow in Hempstead, N.Y.

"It's got to be past," Cannella said from his office in the Boyden Gymnasium on Wednesday. "You don't want to ever forget the experience. It was a wonderful experience for everybody involved. But you have to put it past you because you're playing a new season.

"This team has a new identity than the 2006 team – this is a totally different team. Every year that I've coached here it's been a different team."

One reason for that difference is the graduation of three All-Americans from last season's team. Leading scorer Sean Morris (33 goals, 39 assists and 72 points), top defender Jack Reid and faceoff specialist Jake Deane are all gone. However, that's something, Cannella says, that can't

See M. LACROSSE on page 8

UMass coach Greg Cannella is entering his 13th year in the Minutemen's lacrosse program.

Breaking down the new squad with a number of holes to fill

By Ron Greenfield
Collegian Staff

Following a great performance is never easy. But that is what the Massachusetts men's lacrosse team has to do this season, battling against the already-mythologized team of 2006 that made it all the way to the national championship before losing to No. 1 Virginia, 15-7.

UMass has to overcome some considerable losses to maintain last season's torrid winning pace: 13-5 on the season and 5-2 in the Eastern College Athletic Conference.

The Minutemen had both the ECAC Offensive (Sean Morris) and Defensive (Jack Reid) Players of the Year in the starting lineup. Morris tore up defenses on a regular basis, and he has the accolades to show it. Morris was on the NCAA All-Tournament team, the ECAC All-Conference team and the New England Intercollegiate Lacrosse Association's First Team.

The list goes on for Morris, who will be a significant loss in the attacking position. But the close defense and defensive midfield will be without All-Americans Jack Reid and Jake Deane, who anchored the Minutemen with smothering defense.

This is a brand new season, and UMass coach Greg Cannella will have his coaching hands full starting tomorrow at Hofstra, trying to get a new attacking line molded together without Morris and replacing Deane's 62 percent faceoff win percentage.

Here is the positional breakdown

See POSITIONS on page 8

Billikens visit Mullins Center

By Danny Picard
Collegian Staff

When preseason polls were finalized, the Saint Louis Billikens were projected to finish third in the Atlantic 10. The Xavier Musketeers and the Massachusetts men's basketball team were picked to be the No. 1 and No. 2 teams in the conference, respectively.

With only a few games left in the regular season, the voters got the top two teams correct. Saint Louis, however, didn't live up to the expectations in A-10 play.

UMass (20-7, 10-3 A-10) hosts the seventh-place Billikens (17-10, 7-6 A-10) tomorrow night at 7 p.m. at the Mullins Center in the second-to-last home game of the season.

UMass moved into a tie with Xavier for first place on Wednesday night with an 83-44 win over St. Bonaventure. Also helping the cause was the Musketeers' win over Rhode Island that same night, dropping the Rams from first to third.

Saint Louis comes into Amherst on a two-game winning streak. The Billikens have had their ups and downs this season. They've beaten most of the upper echelon of A-10 teams in Rhode Island, Xavier and George Washington, but have also suffered losses to struggling teams like St. Bonaventure, Temple and Duquesne.

See M. BASKETBALL on page 9

Senior Stephane Lasme is averaging nearly a double-double through 27 games this season, with 13.6 points and 9.4 rebounds per game.

Minutewomen handle Flyers

By J.M. Friedman
Collegian Staff

Pardon the Minutewomen for not getting down on themselves after a tough loss – it's just not their style. The Massachusetts women's basketball team (16-12, 6-7 Atlantic-10) quelled any fears of a hangover from Sunday's home loss to Xavier, taking to the sky for some payback to the tune of a 66-58 win over the Dayton Flyers (11-17, 6-7 A-10).

While they got off to a slow start, the Minutewomen rattled off an 11-0 run to go up 13-6 heading into the break with a 32-28 edge. UMass opened up an 18-point lead in the second half with 6:28 remaining. Dayton scored the final eight points of the contest.

The Minutewomen pressed more in the second half, disrupting the rhythm of the Flyers.

"We tried to put a little more

See W. BASKETBALL on page 9

Sophomore Sakera Young had four assists and four rebounds in the Minutewomen's 66-58 victory over the Flyers in Dayton.

FOR THE REST OF YOUR UMASS SPORTS COVERAGE
•Hockey •Women's Lax
•Softball •Swimming
•Skiing •Track & Field
TAKE A LOOK INSIDE

MINUTEMEN DEFEAT BILLIKENS | PAGE 10

HERBS HELP HEAL | PAGE 5

THE MASSACHUSETTS
DAILY COLLEGIAN

NEW ENGLAND'S LARGEST COLLEGE DAILY EST 1890

SNOW : HI: 37 LO: 23 WWW.DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM MONDAY, FEBRUARY 26, 2007

Pro-life doctor speaks at UMass

Dr. John Diggs lectures against homosexuality and abortion

By Rob Greenfield
Collegian Staff

Last Thursday, the student-run organization "UMass Students for Life" sponsored a lecture by controversial South Hadley Medical Doctor John Diggs Jr., an outspoken pro-life and anti-gay marriage advocate.

Diggs spoke in a 7:15 p.m. lecture titled, "Abortion: Today's Global Genocide" in the Campus Center Auditorium, where he shared his opinions on abortion's cruelty and illegality.

The South Hadley doctor has run into plenty of opposition for his numerous controversial views on abortion and homosexuality and has continually taken public stances against homosexual intercourse and abortion practices.

He wrote "The Health Risks of Gay Sex" in 2002, an essay that describes in detail the risks of homosexual intercourse.

In the essay's opening paragraph, Diggs states that "Sexual relationships between members of the same sex expose gays, lesbians and bisexuals to extreme risks of sexually transmitted diseases, physical injuries, mental disorders and even a shortened life span."

"UMass Students for Life," a group that stands against abortion, wants to further educate the University of Massachusetts and local areas to the dangers of abortion "in the hopes that we will all gain a greater respect for life, from conception to natural death."

"Ultimately, we hope that our efforts will make a difference for women facing a very difficult decision and will result in saving lives," according to the organization's Web site: people.umass.edu/phaines.

According to a Nov. 17 Boston

See DIGGS on page 3

The "UMass Students for Life" hosted a lecture titled, "Abortion: Today's Global Genocide" where South Hadley doctor John Diggs discussed the illegality and cruelty of abortion.

UMPD charges 34 more people in link to December riot

For the second time in about a week, the University of Massachusetts Police charged more students in connection with the December riot in Southwest, according to a press release.

Criminal charges were filed Wednesday by the UMPD against 34 additional people – 31 of them students, a UMass News and Information press release states. In total, 57 people have been charged in connection with the riot, and more cases could be forthcoming. The cases were filed in Eastern Hampshire District Court according to the press release.

A total of 11 people were arrested the night of the Dec. 15, 2006 riot, 10 of whom are students. Following an extensive investigation, the UMPD announced on Feb. 14 a second wave of criminal charges against an additional 12 students.

According to the press release, the UMass Dean of Students Office has been moving forward with disciplinary action under the Code of Student Conduct.

"So far, 55 cases have been completed. Five students have been expelled, 28 suspended and 22 received deferred suspensions. Eight students have been removed from university housing as part of their discipline," states the press release.

The incident occurred following the UMass football team's 28-17 loss to Appalachian State on Dec. 15. After the conclusion of the game, about 1,800 students gathered in the Southwest plaza. Several police officers were injured during the riot and about $100,000 in damage was reported.

In January, Deputy Chief of police Patrick Archbald said his department was pursuing a full investigation into the riot. He said detectives used video footage from campus cameras and from YouTube.com, photos from cell phone cameras, facebook.com and MySpace.com in an effort to identify the accused.

"We have no intentions of stopping until we've identified every single rock thrower and every single person who is responsible for the damage," Archibald said in a Jan. 25 interview.

Eric Athas

Eric Athas can be reached at editor@dailycollegian.com

UMass 6th in nation for illegal downloads

By Chris Hynes
Collegian Staff

In another effort to eliminate the illegal file-sharing on college campuses throughout the country, the music industry has increased the number of copyright complaints sent to top universities for the 2006-2007 school year. The University of Massachusetts logged 897 complaints, ranking the school sixth in the nation for illegal music trafficking, according to a study released last week.

Schools that landed in the top five in total number of complaints were Ohio University, Purdue University, the University of Nebraska-Lincoln, University of Tennessee and the University of South Carolina.

The group in charge of the crackdown is the Recording Industry Association of America (RIAA), the watchdog organization which represents the U.S. recording industry.

The RIAA released to the Associated Press a list of the 25 universities that received the most copyright complaints so far this school year. The complaints for these universities approached 15,000 – nearly triple the total for the previous school year.

A survey by the Intellectual Property Institute at the University of Richmond's School of Law found that more than half of college students download music and movies illegally.

A complaint accuses a student of sharing at least one song over a campus network. These complaints are sent to colleges every day via e-mail. However, when the RIAA sets its sights on more extreme offenders – those sharing hundreds or thousands of files online – it often takes the form of expensive civil lawsuits.

"We need to have a system in place to demonstrate that our system is not being used illegally," said Ed Blaguszewski, Director of the UMass News Office. "The university has an obligation to obey the law and take appropriate steps to make sure students aren't using campus networks illegally."

At UMass, first and second time offenders receive warnings regarding the dangers of piracy. The student's network connection is also disabled until they report to the Office of Information Technology and sign an acknowledgement. Upon the third complaint the student's internet connection is pulled and further punishment is put in the hands of the Dean of Students. Once the case has been reviewed, the dean can assign a variety of sanctions, ranging from a reprimand to an expulsion.

"We've had very few repeat offenders. I can't recall a case that has gone

See RIAA on page 3

PHENOM encourages student involvement

By Eden Unver
Collegian Staff

Recent rallies by graduate students and members of the Student Government Association at the University of Massachusetts have addressed the issue of funding for the University and public higher education. The most recent rally, held on Feb. 8, directed attention to the increase in salaries of administrators tied in with the lack of funding for educational programs and job opportunities for UMass faculty members.

According to a press release from the Massachusetts Society of Professors, the number of administrators has increased 21 percent since the 2003-2004 school year and the total salary since then has increased by 51 percent. While the numbers in administrators and their salaries have increased, there has only been a five-percent increase in faculty job opportunities, according to the press release. The average salary per administrator has increased 25 percent while the average salary per faculty member has increased six percent.

The Amherst 250 Plan which, according to the release, is a strategy with a goal of hiring 50 new faculty members every year for five years, hasn't been executed according to plan.

UMass students and Amherst community members march in protest against unfair distribution of state funding for higher education. PHENOM is a new group aimed at increasing student involvement with such issues.

Stephanie Luce, the Vice President of the Massachusetts Society of Professors, said the administration has the strongest voice in this issue and that others' voices should be heard.

"Right now, it is an entirely top-down process, and faculty, students and staff have no say in deciding what UMass should spend money on," said Luce. "There is no doubt that UMass Amherst does not receive adequate funding from the state legislative, and I think we all need to keep the pressure on to make the state increase its investment in public higher education."

Joe LeBlanc, President of the Massachusetts Community College Council, said he believes that students should have their opinions voiced in these matters.

"I encourage them to use their bully pulpit to demand that funding increases be used to fill much-needed front-line teaching and support staff positions while reducing student fees," said LeBlanc.

UMass students and Amherst community members lobbied outside the State House in Boston last Thursday to push for more fund-

See PHENOM on page 3

It's fun to stay at the...

UMass Mechanical Engineering student Nickolas Maynard created an ice sculpture of figures spelling out YMCA outside of Johnson Residential Hall in Northeast. Maynard said he did it out of boredom using a long bread knife as his tool of choice.

Principal considers Jesus chant offensive

VIRGINIA BEACH, Va. – A Catholic school principal has organized sensitivity training for students who shouted "We love Jesus" during a basketball game against a school with Jewish students.

The word "Jew" also was painted on a gym wall behind the seats of Bishop Sullivan Catholic High School students attending the Feb. 2 game at Norfolk Academy, said Dennis W. Price, principal of the Virginia Beach school.

Price, who also watched the game, said the rivals exchanged chants. "Then, at some point, our students were chanting, 'We love Jesus.'"

"It was obviously in reference to the Jewish population of Norfolk Academy, that's the only way you can take that," he added.

Price said he sent a letter of apology to Norfolk Dennis G. Manning, the academy's headmaster, declined to comment.

Several Sullivan students met with Norfolk Academy's cultural diversity club Thursday as part of a series of events aimed at promoting tolerance, Price said.

He has arranged for the Virginia Conference for Community and Justice and the United Jewish Federation of Tidewater to work with students.

A message left for the United Jewish Federation of Tidewater was not immediately returned Saturday.

Price also has consulted the Anti-Defamation League, a national group that fights anti-Semitism.

"It is important that we work harder at having students leaving here who are tolerant and understand how serious these kinds of things are," said Price, who said diversity training will be incorporated permanently at Sullivan.

Associated Press

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN
CXVII
ISSUE 90

113 Campus Center University of Massachusetts Amherst, MA 01003
• 413-545-3500 •
• Fax 413-545-3699 •
www.dailycollegian.com

EDITOR IN CHIEF Eric Athas
MANAGING EDITOR Rob Greenfield
BUSINESS MANAGER Dan Conti
PRODUCTION MANAGER Amanda Allen
NIGHT SUPERVISOR Sheryl Wolnik
ADVERTISING MANAGER Jaimeson Porter
ADVERTISING PRODUCTION Molly Eggleston
ARTS & LIVING EDITOR Morgan Rousseau
COPIES EDITOR Adam Staigin
EDITORIAL EDITOR Tucker Merrick
NEWS EDITOR Matt Belliveau
SPORTS EDITOR Danny Picard
SPORTS EDITOR Jon Pelland
CIRCULATION MANAGER Jeff Pentz
FINANCE MANAGER David Valade
ASSISTANT OPERATIONS Linda Wallack
ASSISTANT ADVERTISING Nicole Puddester
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Tim McCall
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Sydney Towne
ASSISTANT NEWS Anna Delianitis
ASSISTANT NEWS Nicole Boonjakuakul
ASSISTANT EDITORIAL Brendan Hall
ASSISTANT SPORTS Jeremy Rice
WEB EDITOR James Hale
PHOTO EDITOR Toan Trinh

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN IS PUBLISHED MONDAY THROUGH FRIDAY DURING THE UNIVERSITY OF MASSACHUSETTS CALENDAR SEMESTER. THE COLLEGIAN IS INDEPENDENTLY FUNDED, OPERATING ON ADVERTISING REVENUE. FOUNDED IN 1890, THE PAPER BEGAN AS ALGIE LIFE, BY AND THE COLLEGE SIGNAL IN 1901, THE WEEKLY COLLEGIAN IN 1914 AND THE TRI-WEEKLY COLLEGIAN IN 1956. PUBLISHED DAILY SINCE 1967. THE COLLEGIAN HAS BEEN BROADSHEET SINCE JANUARY 1994. FOR ADVERTISING RATES AND INFORMATION, CALL WEEKDAYS BETWEEN 8:30 A.M. AND 3:30 P.M.

PRODUCTION CREW
On staff today

NIGHT EDITOR
Matt O'Rourke

COPY EDITOR
Callie Williams

PRODUCTION SUPERVISOR
Amanda Allen

New analysis shows 1 in 6 people rely on welfare

BY STEPHEN OHLEMACHER
ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON—The welfare state is bigger than ever despite a decade of policies designed to wean poor people from public aid.

The number of families receiving cash benefits from welfare has plummeted since the government imposed time limits on the payments a decade ago. But other programs for the poor, including Medicaid, food stamps and disability benefits, are bursting with new enrollees.

The result, according to an Associated Press analysis: Nearly one in six people rely on some form of public assistance, a larger share than at any time since the government started measuring two decades ago.

Critics of the welfare overhaul say the numbers offer fresh evidence that few former recipients have become self-sufficient, even though millions have moved from welfare to work. They say the vast majority have been forced into low-paying jobs without benefits and few opportunities to advance.

"If the goal of welfare reform was to get people off the welfare rolls, bravo," said Vivyan Adair, a former welfare recipient who is now an assistant professor of women's studies at Hamilton College in upstate New York. "If the goal was to reduce poverty and give people economic and job stability, it was not a success."

Proponents of the changes in welfare say programs that once discouraged work now offer support to people in low-paying jobs. They point to expanded eligibility rules for food stamps and Medicaid, the health insurance program for the poor, that enable people to keep getting benefits even after they start working.

"I don't have any problems with those programs growing, and indeed, they were intended to grow," said Ron Haskins, a former adviser to President Bush on welfare policy.

"We've taken the step of getting way more people into the labor force and they have taken a huge step toward self-sufficiency. What is the other choice?" he asked.

In the early 1990s, critics contended the welfare system encouraged unemployment and promoted single-parent families. Welfare recipients, mostly single mothers, could lose benefits if they earned too much money or if they lived with the father of their children.

Major changes in welfare were enacted in 1996, requiring most recipients to work but allowing them to continue some benefits after they started jobs. The law imposed a five-year limit on cash payments for most people in the Temporary Assistance for Needy Families program, or TANF. Some states have shorter time limits.

Nia Foster fits the pattern of dependence on government programs. She stopped getting cash welfare payments in the late 1990s and has moved from one clerical job to another. None provided medical benefits.

The 32-year-old mother of two from Cincinnati said she supports her family with help from food stamps and Medicaid.

Foster said she did not get any job training when she left welfare. She earned her high-school equivalency last year at a community college.

"If you want to get educated or want to succeed, the welfare office don't care," Foster said. "I don't think they really care what you do once the benefits are gone."

Foster now works in a tax office, a seasonal job that will end after April 15. She hopes to enroll at the University of Cincinnati this spring and would like to study accounting. She is waiting to find out if she qualifies for enough financial aid to cover tuition.

"I like data processing, something where it's a bunch of invoices and you have to key them in," Foster said. "I want to be an accountant so bad."

Shannon Stanfield took a different, less-traveled path from welfare, thanks to a generous program that offered her a chance to get a college education.

Stanfield, 36, was cleaning houses to support her two young children four years ago when she learned about a program for welfare recipients at nearby Hamilton College, a private liberal arts school in Clinton, N.Y.

"At the time I was living in a pretty run-down apartment," said Stanfield, who was getting welfare payments, Medicaid and food stamps. "It wasn't healthy."

The program, called the Access Project, accepts about 25 welfare-eligible parents a year. Hamilton waives tuition for first-year students and the program supplements financial aid in later years. Students get a host of social and career services, including help finding internships and jobs and financial assistance in times of crisis.

Shannon Stanfield is a former welfare recipient who was accepted into the Access Project, a program that offers a free college education to welfare-eligible parents in central New York.

About 140 former welfare recipients have completed the program and none still relies on government programs for the poor, said Adair, the Hamilton professor who started the Access Project in 2001.

Stanfield, who still gets Medicaid and food stamps, plans to graduate in May with a bachelor's degree in theater. She wants to be a teacher.

"I slowly built up my confidence through education," Stanfield said. "I can't honestly tell you how much it has changed my life."

Programs such as the Access Project are not cheap, which is one reason they are rare. Tuition and fees run about $35,000 a year at Hamilton, and the program's annual budget is between $250,000 and $500,000, Adair said.

In 2005, about 5.1 million people received monthly welfare payments from TANF and similar state programs, a 60 percent drop from a decade before.

But other government programs grew, offsetting the declines.

About 44 million people — nearly one in six in the country — relied on government services for the poor in 2003, according to the most recent statistics compiled by the Census Bureau. That compares with about 39 million in 1996.

Also, the number of people getting government aid continues to increase, according to more recent enrollment figures from individual programs.

Medicaid rolls alone topped 45 million people in 2005, pushed up in part by rising health care costs and fewer employers offering benefits. Nearly 26 million people a month received food stamps that year.

Cash welfare recipients, by comparison, peaked at 14.2 million people in 1994.

There is much debate over whether those leaving welfare for work should be offered more opportunities for training and education, so they do not have to settle for low-paying jobs that keep them dependent on government programs.

"We said get a job, any job," said Rep. Jim McDermott, chairman of the House subcommittee that oversees welfare issues. "And now we expect them to be making it on these minimum-wage jobs."

McDermott, D-Wash., said stricter work requirements enacted last year, when Congress renewed the welfare overhaul law, will make it even more difficult for welfare recipients to get sufficient training to land good-paying jobs.

But people who support the welfare changes say former recipients often fare better economically if they start working, even in low-paying jobs, before entering education programs.

"What many people on TANF need first is the confidence that they can succeed in the workplace and to develop the habits of work," said Wade Horn, the Bush administration's point man on welfare overhaul.

"Also, many TANF recipients didn't have a lot of success in the classroom," Horn said. "If you want to improve the confidence of a TANF recipient, putting them in the classroom, where they failed in the past, that is not likely to increase their confidence."

Horn noted that employment among poor single mothers is up and child poverty rates are down since the welfare changes in 1996, though the numbers have worsened since the start of the decade.

Horn, however, said he would like to see local welfare agencies provide more education and training to people who have already moved from welfare to work.

"I think more attention has to be paid to helping those families move up the income scale, increasing their independence of other government welfare programs," Horn said.

"The true goal of welfare to work programs should be self-sufficiency."

Learn More About GCC's Health Career Programs:

Licensed Practical Nursing Certificate Program
Location: VA Medical Center, Leeds
Thursday, March 22, 2007 ..... 7 p.m.
Thursday, May 10, 2007 ..... 7 p.m.

Stillpoint Massage Therapy Certificate Program
Location: Downtown Center, 270 Main St., Greenfield
Wednesday, March 7, 2007 ..... 6:00 p.m.
Wednesday, April 11, 2007 ..... 6:00 p.m.
Wednesday, May 9, 2007 ..... 6:00 p.m.
Wednesday, June 13, 2007 ..... 6:00 p.m.

Paramedic Certificate
Location: Downtown Center, 270 Main St., Greenfield
Tuesday, March 20, 2007 ..... 5 p.m.
Friday, March 30, 2007 ..... 4:30 p.m.
Monday, April 9, 2007 ..... 5 p.m.
Wednesday, April 25, 2007 ..... 6 p.m.
Thursday, May 3, 2007 ..... 4:30 p.m.

Associate Degree Nursing
Location: Downtown Center, 270 Main St., Greenfield
Wednesday, April 18, 2007 ..... 4 p.m.
Tuesday, June 12, 2007 ..... 3 p.m.

GREENFIELD Community College

For more information contact (413) 775-1802 or visit www.gcc.mass.edu

Fire kills 2 college students in Boston

BOSTON—An early morning blaze that killed two Boston University students and seriously injured a third person was caused by a burning candle, fire investigators said Sunday.

The victims, both 21, were killed when fire ripped through the top-floor apartment near campus early Saturday, officials said.

The three-story building had been without power for several hours as crews performed utility work nearby, and a burning candle in a bedroom sparked the blaze, Boston Fire spokesman Steve MacDonald said.

"The room was heavily involved with fire," MacDonald said. "It was totally burned."

MacDonald would not comment on whose bedroom it was. The bodies of Rhiannon McCuish and Stephen Adelipour were found in separate rooms, he said.

A third victim, whose name was not released, was being treated at Massachusetts General Hospital. The extent of his injuries was unknown. About 30 people were displaced by the fire. Utility workers helped warn residents to get out.

—Associated Press

Rev. Sharpton tied to Sen. Thurmond's slavery family history

BY ADAM GOLDMAN
ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEW YORK—The Rev. Al Sharpton is a descendant of a slave owned by relatives of the late Sen. Strom Thurmond — a discovery the civil rights activist called "shocking" on Sunday.

Sharpton learned of his connection to Thurmond, once a prominent defender of segregation, last week through the Daily News, which asked genealogists to trace his roots.

"It was probably the most shocking thing in my life," Sharpton said at a news conference Sunday, the same day the tabloid revealed the story.

Some of Thurmond's relatives said the nexus also came as a surprise to them. Doris Strom Costner, a distant cousin who said she knew the late senator all her life, said Sunday she "never heard of such a thing."

"My momma never would talk to me about nothing like that," Costner said of ancestors who owned slaves. "She only talked to me about good things."

The revelations surfaced after Ancestry.com contacted a Daily News reporter who agreed to have his own family tree done. The intrigued reporter then turned around and asked Sharpton if he wanted to participate. Sharpton said he told the paper, "Go for it."

The genealogists, who were not paid by the newspaper, uncovered the ancestral ties using a variety of documents that included census, marriage and death records.

They found that Sharpton's great-grandfather, Coleman Sharpton, was a slave owned by Julia Thurmond, whose grandfather was Strom Thurmond's great-great-grandfather. Coleman Sharpton was later freed.

Thurmond, of South Carolina, was once considered an icon of racial segregation. During his 1948 bid for president, he promised to preserve segregation and, in 1957, he filibustered for more than 24 hours against a civil rights bill.

Sharpton, who ran for president in 2004 on a ticket of racial justice, said he met Thurmond only once in 1991 when he visited Washington, D.C., with the late soul singer James Brown, who knew Thurmond. Sharpton said the meeting was "awkward."

"I was not happy to meet him because what he had done all his life," Sharpton said.

Thurmond was seen as softening his segregation stance later in his life. He died in 2003, at 100. The long-serving senator was originally a Democrat but became a Republican in 1964.

Thurmond's children have acknowledged that Thurmond fathered a biracial daughter, Essie Mae Washington-Williams' mother was a housekeeper in the home of Thurmond's parents.

Telephone message left by The Associated Press on Sunday for Strom Thurmond Jr. and an attorney who once represented Thurmond's biracial daughter, Essie Mae Washington-Williams, were not returned.

New group fights for education funding

PHENOM from page 1

ing for public higher education.

"We've got smart, dedicated and committed students here, and the more they get involved in trying to set priorities for the university, the better," said Luce, who agrees with LeBlanc.

The Public Higher Education Network of Massachusetts, or PHENOM, was created to encourage students to become active in raising awareness for education funding.

"I am excited about PHENOM," said Luce, "as it may be the first time in the state's history that such a coalition is formed; one that cuts across universities, state colleges and community colleges, and includes students, faculty, staff and community."

PHENOM's mission is to fund public higher education so it can serve the Commonwealth, make higher education affordable and more accessible, hire more teachers, researchers and staff and honor and expand democratic institutions of governance for public higher education.

Luce said she believes this program will bring great benefits to the educational system.

"I think PHENOM will make an impact by presenting sound proposals for short-term goals, such as increased funding, but also maintaining a longer-term vision of broader change," she said.

"PHENOM has been discussed for more than a decade," LeBlanc said. "Today's launch is significant. Our words about the need to organize all the stake holders in our system are over. Now is the time for action."

With this new program in place and the recent effort to actively pursue the issue of proper public funding, group members hope that there might be a change in the future ways that colleges and universities distribute the funds that they do receive.

"I am an optimist," said LeBlanc. "I believe that Massachusetts will eventually fund a world class system of public higher education. It will eventually follow the lead of states like California and the competitors like the European Union and make higher education virtually free," he said. "Equaling the playing field for all our citizens in this way is just and humane and is in keeping with the promise and potential of this Commonwealth."

Eden Univer can be reached at ednau@aol.com.

South Hadley doctor opposes 'homo-sex'

DIGGS from page 1

Globe report, Diggs has advocated for certain state policies in order to advance the anti-abortion cause, including forcing women to look at an ultrasound before deciding whether or not to have an abortion.

Diggs is trying to rally the college-aged voter to his cause, as he has visited other universities around the country to speak about the dangers of homosexuality. In October of 2005, the student group "College Republicans" at Gonzaga University invited Diggs to speak.

He called the lecture, "The Medical Effects of Homo-Sex," and, according to an Oct. 28 article in the Gonzaga Bulletin, changed the headline of the lecture after objection from the University from its original form, which was "The Medical Effects of Homosexuality," because the term "Homo-sex" referred to the specific act and not to a person.

In the 75-minute lecture at Gonzaga, Diggs stated that homosexuality is defined by two characteristics — promiscuity and penetrative anal intercourse. According to the article, Diggs also suggested that homosexuality was the reason for the spread of sexually transmitted diseases to the general population.

Dr. Diggs has written controversial essays arguing homosexuality as the cause for the spread of STDs in the general population, as well as mental disabilities and a shortened life span.

Despite Diggs' controversial views, he has been honored profusely throughout his career. He was given the Presidential Meritorious Executive Rank Award, the Public Health Service Superior Award and was named the Distinguished Senior Professional of the International Personnel Management Association by the National Institutes of Health (NIH), according to the NIH Web site.

But Diggs has angered many in the gay and pro-choice communities through his politics.

He has advocated against homosexuals through the words of Dr. Martin Luther King, stating in an essay titled "It Doesn't Take My Training as an M.D. to Recognize that the Essence of Marriage is Reflected in the Neat Division of Mankind into Male and Female" that "were Dr. King homosexually coupled, he would not have had four little children for whom to dream."

Rob Greenfield can be reached at rgreenfi@student.umass.edu

RIAA ranks universities for piracy

RIAA from page 1

to the third stage in the last year," Blaguszewski said. "Once students understand the consequences of downloading and legal repercussions they don't do it for the most part."

"We have found that a proactive approach on the part of the media industry and universities will have the greatest effect in terms of reducing piracy," said Jenni Engebretsen, spokeswoman for the RIAA.

Engebretsen described the RIAA effort as a "multi-faceted approach," which includes enforcement, education, legal online music services and technological measures.

"The habits students form begin well before they get to college," according to Engebretsen, which is why the RIAA has initiated a series of programs for kids and teenagers. They are involved with Music Rules!, a free educational curriculum, as well as a series of nationwide high school assemblies.

"We believe that education plays a key role in the long term solution for music piracy," Engebretsen said.

One way UMass is attempting to deter its students from pirating is to expose them to legal downloading options. One such choice is Ruckus, an online avenue designed for college students and alumni. The service, which until one month ago was available only to schools with a contractual agreement with Ruckus, is now available free for all college students nation-wide. UMass promotes Ruckus' work by hosting three of the services servers on University property.

According the Engebretsen, "the surest and easiest way to address the problem is through technological measures." The University of Florida is implementing these measures using an anti-piracy program called Icarus. The software blocks unauthorized peer-to-peer applications on campus and immediately proved its worth with a 90 percent drop in illegal peer-to-peer downloaders.

The trade group said it has targeted software programs that are prevalent on college campuses, including AresWarez, BitTorrent, eDonkey and other programs that operate on the Gnutella and FastTrack services.

The program i2hub, a file-sharing service created by a UMass student, was shut down citing legal pressure from the RIAA on Nov. 14, 2005. During its 19-month existence i2hub managed to connect over 400 universities both in the United States and abroad.

"They think it's free music with no consequence, but if you're putting your academic career in jeopardy with a federal law, that's something students pay attention to," Blaguszewski said.

TSA scanner sees through clothes

BY TERRY TANG
ASSOCIATED PRESS

PHOENIX—Sky Harbor International Airport became the country's first to begin testing a controversial new federal screening system that takes X-rays of passenger's bodies in an effort to find concealed explosives and other weapons.

The Phoenix airport started testing the new technology on Friday. It can see through people's clothes and show the body's contours with blush-inducing clarity.

Critics have said the high-resolution images created by the "backscatter" technology are too invasive. But the Transportation Security Administration adjusted the equipment to make the image look something like a line drawing, while still detecting concealed weapons.

During testing, the machine will be used only as a backup screening measure. Passengers who fail the standard screening with a metal detector will be able to choose between the new device or a pat-down search.

"It's 100 percent voluntary, so if the passenger doesn't feel comfortable with it, the passenger doesn't have to go through it," TSA spokesman Nico Melendez said.

Passengers selected for screening by the device are asked to stand in front of the closet-size X-ray unit with the palms of their hands facing out. Then they must turn around for a second screening from behind. The procedure takes about a minute.

But one expert said the machine's altered image is ineffective, while the clear picture is an invasion of privacy.

"The more obscure they make the image, the more obscure the contraband, weapons and explosives," said Harry Steinhardt, director of the Technology and Liberty Project at the ACLU in Washington, D.C. "The graphic image is a strip-search. You shouldn't have to be strip-searched to get on an airplane. Millions of Americans would regard them as pornographic."

The machine will be tested for up to 90 days at a single checkpoint at Sky Harbor International Airport's largest terminal, which hosts US Airways and Southwest Airlines, the two busiest airlines in Phoenix.

The technology could be left in place after the trial period, and the TSA hopes to roll out similar machines at the Los Angeles airport and New York's Kennedy Airport by the end of the year.

The security officer who works with the passenger going through the screening will never see the images the machine produces. The pictures will be viewed by another officer about 50 feet away who will not see the passenger, the TSA said.

Romney condemns polygamy despite Mormon family history

BY JENNIFER DORNER AND GLEN JOHNSON
ASSOCIATED PRESS

SALT LAKE CITY—While Mitt Romney condemns polygamy and its prior practice by his Mormon church, the Republican presidential candidate's great-grandfather had five wives and at least one of his great-great grandfathers had 12.

Polygamy was not just a historical footnote, but a prominent element in the family tree of the former Massachusetts governor now seeking to become the first Mormon president.

Romney's great-grandfather, Miles Park Romney, married his fifth wife in 1897. That was more than six years after Mormon leaders banned polygamy and more than three decades after a federal law barred the practice.

Romney's great-grandmother, Hannah Hood Hill, was the daughter of polygamists. She wrote vividly in her autobiography about how she "used to walk the floor and shed tears of sorrow" over her own husband's multiple marriages.

Romney's great-great grandfather, Parley Pratt, an apostle in the church, had 12 wives. In an 1852 sermon, Parley Pratt's brother and fellow apostle, Orson Pratt, became the first church official to publicly proclaim and defend polygamy as a direct revelation from God.

Romney's father, former Michigan Gov. George Romney, was born in Chihuahua, Mexico, where Mormons fled in the 1800s to escape religious persecution and U.S. laws forbidding polygamy. He and his family did not return to the United States until 1912, more than two decades after the church issued "The Manifesto" banning polygamy.

"When you read the family's history, you realize how important polygamy was to them," said Todd Compton, a Mormon and independent historian who wrote a book about the polygamous life of the church's founder, Joseph Smith. "They left America and started again as pioneers, after they had done it over and over again previously."

B. Carmon Hardy, a polygamy expert and retired history professor at California State University-Fullerton, said polygamy was "a very important part of Miles Park Romney's family."

Hardy added: "Now, very gradually, as you moved farther away from it, it became less a part of it. But during the time of Miles Park Romney, it was an essential principle of the Romney family life."

Republican presidential candidate Mitt Romney opposes practices in Mormonism, even though his great-grandfather practiced polygamy.

Other Mormons have run for the White House, including Romney's father in 1968 and Sen. Orrin Hatch (news, bio, voting record), R-Utah, in 2000. But Mitt Romney's stature as a leading 2008 contender has renewed questions about his faith and its doctrines.

At the same time, polygamy remains a part of current events.

HBO is airing a television series, "Big Love," that features a man in Utah — where the Mormon church is based — with three wives. Self-proclaimed "Mormon fundamentalist" Warren Jeffs, formerly on the FBI's 10 most wanted list, is facing multiple felony charges for sex crimes related to underage marriages among members of his breakaway church's 10,000 members in Utah and Arizona, who openly practice polygamy.

Romney has joked about polygamy, saying in various settings that to him, "marriage is between a man and a woman ... and a woman and a woman." But in serious moments he has called the practice "bizarre" and noted his church excommunicates those who engage in it.

An introductory film played at his fundraisers and campaign appearances features his wife, Ann, talking about their 37-year marriage. Romney himself notes they started as high school sweethearts.

This month, Ann Romney tried a different tack, taking a lighthearted jab at her husband's main Republican competitors, Sen. John McCain (news, bio, voting record), R-Ariz., and former New York City Mayor Rudy Giuliani, as she introduced Romney at a Missouri GOP dinner.

The biggest difference between her husband and the other candidates, Ann Romney said, is that "he's had only one wife."

McCain has been married twice; Giuliani three times.

The Romney campaign had no comment for this story.

Guest Chef Series
Tues. Feb. 27th 5 to 9 pm in the Berkshire DC

LOOK WHO'S COOKING DINNER FOR US!

Ralph Coughenour
Executive Chef
of UNH C.E.C.

As part of a friendly wager between UMass & UNH Dining Services for the NCAA Quarterfinals, Ralph will be serving UMass, UNH Student Favorites

Come savor the sweet taste of victory & enjoy the fun!

Menu:
• Chicken Chesterfield
• Roast Wild Salmon
• London Broil
• Warm Brownie Pudding
• Chocolate Cheesecake Bar

DINING SERVICES UMassAmherst

GO UMass!!! Atlantic 10 Champion

www.umass.edu/diningservices

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

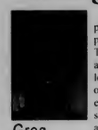
EDITORIAL OPINION

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 26, 2007

"I may not agree with what you say but I will defend to the death your right to say it." Voltaire

EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

SGA and misguidance



Greg Collins

It is often said that a government's priorities should be a reflection of the preferences of the people it represents. This could not be truer for local, state and federal governing bodies, in which legislation is debated and passed in order to, among other reasons, promote economic prosperity and ensure the safety of its citizens. When these laws accurately mirror the choices of the people, the connection between constituents and their elected representatives is strengthened to the point where they have deep faith that their leaders will make the right decisions.

Unfortunately, this characteristic cannot be applied to the current undergraduate Student Government Association (SGA). According to its Web site, the Senate, as the primary SGA legislative body, is responsible for "passing resolutions and enactments, determining a budget and expressing the will of the undergraduate student body on campus."

In regard to this last clause, SGA leadership is currently worried that the student body has a distant bond with its student government leadership, a latent problem that has existed for many years at UMass. To remedy this issue the SGA is considering refining its by-laws concerning "Back to the People" meetings. Senators meet at pre-arranged locations, most often at dining commons, to make themselves visible to their constituents and absorb any suggestions or complaints from the student body.

But the SGA leadership is fooling itself if it thinks this will substantively bolster the relationship between students and the SGA. As a former senator who participated in "Back to the People" meetings last year, I feel that these arrangements were essentially meaningless and had little affect on improving communication with our constituents. Students would raise legitimate questions about university tuition, textbook prices and washing and drying machines. Senators would nod their heads in agreement, saying that the SGA would make strong steps to alleviate the problems, when in actuality we were kidding both our constituents and ourselves.

When current president Elvis Mendez was elected last spring, he told The Massachusetts Daily Collegian, Regrettably, the SGA has no one to blame but itself for this tenuous communication.

"I'm here to make sure that students are engaged and are involved in the decision-making process on policies that affect them. It's about time their concerns more directly influence both SGA and administrative policy."

Regrettably, the SGA has no one to blame but itself for this tenuous communication. For some time now, its leadership has stubbornly refused to recognize the inherent limitations of an undergraduate governing body which has little control over wide-ranging issues concerning the University as a whole. For instance, the SGA has focused much of its energy on influencing state legislators to pass laws for free higher education, a good-faith effort which has had little effect on resolving the issue of college tuition.

However, the preparation and work used to plan free higher education campaigns could be employed for goals which would make the SGA a more respected institution on campus. This is why I support a fundamental change in its operational purposes. Rather than attempting to psychoanalyze the preferences of the student body as a whole, a group with varying interests and concerns, the SGA should focus exclusively on passing substantive legislation which will have a direct impact on student life, even if senators feel that not everyone will be satisfied with its results.

For example, the Ruckus music program initiated on campus by the SGA last year was the tangible result of legislation passed by the Senate. Not all students completely embraced the program, as it does have its weaknesses in comparison to other music downloading services.

However, the fact remains that Ruckus represents a substantive, concrete benefit conferred upon the student body by the SGA. It symbolizes that within the limited constraints of an undergraduate student government, the body still has the power to pass legislation directly impacting students.

Once tangible initiatives are passed, then the SGA can receive constructive feedback on whether constituents actually enjoyed or benefited from the legislation. In effect, this will reinforce the original aim of the SGA of promoting better communication between senators and constituents.

But if the mindset of the current SGA administration holds, then there is little hope for accomplishing this task. It should have been the SGA's responsibility in years past, and should still be its responsibility, to pass measures within their scope of authority. While not intending to implement initiatives with students' collective preferences first and foremost in its mind, ultimately the SGA will be valued more by students as a body, which produces results affecting the student body directly and purposefully.

Greg Collins can be reached at gcollins@student.umass.edu

Has the recent focus by SGA President Elvis Mendez (above) on state legislature distanced his constituents too far from the student body?

Politics, not religion

Dan Nicastro

With the election a scant 19 months away, candidates from both parties are trying to win over prospective voters in a variety of ways. However, judging by the amount of time spent on this issue, the most pressing issue of the upcoming election is religion. Candidates from both sides are trying to prove their religious muster to the American people. For the Democrats, Hillary Clinton has hired an Evangelical Christian as a campaign aide, Barack Obama has added an aide who has experience with religious outreach and John Edwards has framed "poverty relief as a moral issue that's helping to drive his campaign."

The definition of Christianity needs to be taken away from those in government.

On the Republican side, the biggest issue of the 2008 race is whether Mitt Romney can be elected, despite his religious affiliation (he's Mormon, for those of you who have been living under a rock). So when did politicians dictate the discourse by which politics can be discussed? How did we get to the point where the Democrats (and Republicans) need to prove their faith to the American people?

I'd like to start out by saying that I only really point to Christianity in this column, because it's what I know, and because it's the religion most utilized by politicians, not to devalue other religions, or the lack of religion. "Christian," in the sense of the political world, has been perverted into a rigid definition of Right vs. Left. "Christian Conservatives" have usurped religion and invoked God in order to justify a wide range of policy decisions, ranging from abortion, to gay marriage, and even to the federal budget. On the other hand, many liberals scoff at those who call themselves Christian, buying into the strict definition of Christianity that is espoused by Conservatives. These are not definitions that I, nor many others, subscribe to.

I consider myself a pretty devout Christian. I've gone to church since I was a little kid and remained active in my church until I left for college. I very firmly believe in the basic tenants of my religion and find myself thinking about God more often than I realize. I also consider myself a pretty devout Democrat, as I have been arguing against my more conservative friends since I was in middle school. I strongly believe that everyone is created equal and that everyone deserves equal rights. I believe that the job of government is to help its citizens, and not to increase the wealth of a select few. How can I justify my religious beliefs with my political beliefs in the context of the current battle taking place between religion and politics?

Honestly, I don't believe it's my job to try and justify my faith with my politics. Moreover, I don't think it's the job of politicians to set the terms and conditions for this battle. The versions of God and Jesus Christ that are held up as examples by politicians are not ones which I recognize. However, that is not to say that their beliefs are any less true or matter any less than mine do, and this is the problem with religious discourse in terms of politics. The two don't belong together and it's the reason why a separation between church and state exists.

Religion is one of the most controversial and contentious subjects that exists in the world today. I wrote seven different versions of this column because I couldn't figure out what I wanted to say and because I didn't want to offend anyone in the process. After starting draft number seven, I realized that religion is so touchy because it's probably the most personal aspect of our lives. It is really one of the only major things you are allowed to choose in your life. Gender, race, sexual preference, although somewhat debatable, are concrete aspects of person hood which are chosen by random chance. Choice of religion (or for that matter, the choice not to have a religion) is monumental.

Religion, whether we like it or not, is a defining force in this country and our ability to choose it helps to give us the power to define how we are seen by others, and how we are able to visualize the world. There is no right or wrong answer when it comes to this choice because of its extremely personal nature. When people are allowed to usurp the meaning of religion and dictate what is right and what is wrong, as has happened in the current political climate, this monumental choice given to us is taken out of our hands.

The definition of Christianity needs to be taken away from those in government. While our nation is built on religious tradition, we are not a theocracy. By forcing the religious subject into the political world, politicians risk increasing religious intolerance everywhere. Christian does not just mean Southern Baptist, or Born Again, but it also means Mormon or Unitarian, just in the same way that Judaism does not just mean Reform, but also Orthodox, or Islam does not mean only Sunni, but also Shia.

It's time to take away the power of those in government to determine the boundaries by which religion is discussed. God is not running our government, people are. It's time they realized that.

Dan Nicastro can be reached at dnicastr@student.umass.edu.

An alternate route

Although the University of Massachusetts excels at both academics and student activism, it seems that for many, the first thing that comes to mind when they think of the University is drinking. Once No. 9 on the Princeton Review's list of top party schools, UMass has climbed up two notches to No.7. On weekend nights, students tilt the overcrowded buses on their way to and from bars and parties. Swarms of partygoers line the sidewalks. And, if you happen to be traveling or socializing outside on a typical weekend night – especially at a late hour – you will notice several DUIs take place.

Joe Hughes

While it is obvious that people who drink and drive put themselves, their passengers and other drivers and pedestrians at risk, there are other factors that come into play before fingers start to get pointed. With scores of students being pulled over on a weekly basis, taxpayers' money is being wasted on Amherst police officers who must spend all of their time pulling over drunk drivers instead of being able to tackle other problems. However, what choice do drunk students have in Amherst when it's 3 a.m.?

They can't take the bus – it stops running at 1:26 a.m. So why not take a taxi?

I looked up cab companies in Amherst and called each one individually, asking for their hours of operation. As it turned out, there is not a single

If we are to minimize the problem, the solution is not to continue increasing the arrests of offenders.

one that runs in Amherst past midnight without reservations hours earlier, and who knows where a student might end up in their escapades? Their only mode of transportation is by car, and nobody wants to be the guy at the party who can't drink all night. Sometimes, the sober driver ends up drunk as well. I've seen it happen countless times.

You may be thinking to yourself right now, the choice is simple, do not put yourself in the situation where you have no choice but to drive drunk. While this suggestion seems to be the most simple and ideal general solution, it still won't prevent partying students from doing what they love to do. Like it or not, students will continue to drink, continue to travel to far-away parties and continue to drive, no matter how many times a message is drilled into their heads through banners, classes and advertisements.

It is naive to believe that this will simply stop. Just as people wear helmets to undertake dangerous extreme sports or use filters in cigarettes, it is a lifestyle, and safety measures are the solution. And although your attitude might be "screw it, if they mess up they've got to face the consequences and that's all there is to it," you still have to remember that the problem will not be solved unless there is change.

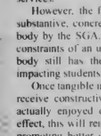
If we are to minimize the problem, the solution is not to continue increasing the arrests of offenders and sending them to often pointless alcohol and responsible driving meetings. The answer is to set up a system of transportation that runs specifically at night and picks up intoxicated students. Whether this means expanding the hours of the Amherst bus schedule or creating a business that would make bank from this idea does not matter, as long as students have an alternative means to get home besides driving drunk. Such a system would save lives, injuries, emotional stress, money and time for the authorities.

I remember reading an article in which someone was pulled over several times in a night simply because he happened to be driving after 9 p.m. on a weekend. Many are too afraid to drive outside on a weekend night sober or not, for fear of getting pulled over despite not having done anything wrong. With a system of late-night transportation, innocent, sober people who are simply driving late at night can be spared the ordeal of being pulled over simply for reason of suspicion.

A specifically ideal late-night transportation service would be a system of shuttles reaching different areas of Amherst, provided by UMass at a cost to the passenger. This would not only reduce drunk driving, but it would also increase the University's revenue. The idea may be radical, it may be adventurous, but it's worth a shot.

Joe Hughes can be reached at jhughes@student.umass.edu

To the people of Iran



Jeff Napolitano

First, let me apologize for the insufferable lack of democracy in our country. The richest of the rich, the whitest of the white, the most privileged of the overprivileged has managed to seize the reins of power of this country, despite the best efforts of many good people here. This lies translated to unspeakable suffering in your neighbor, Iraq, as well as in Afghanistan and so many other places in the world.

That this fool, and the extraordinarily ignorant and evil people and institutions that prop him up, was able to win (or even steal) one election was bad enough. That he did it twice is a crystal-clear indication of the fact that the people of this country are too cynical, lacking in the most basic knowledge of history or feel too powerless to tilt the balance of power back into more accountable hands.

Let me also apologize, lest you had gotten prematurely excited, abou the recent sweep to power of the Democratic Party.

And that lack of accountability has led to so many horrors around the globe.

Second, let me apologize (though long overdue) for the elephant in the room: the overthrow of your democratic government. It happened in 1953, but you likely have a better recollection than the average U.S. citizen, particularly because it was your government that was overthrown by the C.I.A., not ours. U.S. crimes against Iran (past and present) don't receive much press in our media. For some odd reason, our "freedom of the press" doesn't translate into the American people hearing more than an inkling of time in another country's history. Injury to others seems to be forgotten far more quickly than injury done to us.

Ironically, the democratic and largely secular Iranian government of Mossadegh that was overthrown by the U.S. was precisely the type of government that Bush and his cohorts purport (though unconvincingly) to want to create. Yes, we all know he's lying about notions of "freedom" and "democracy," but he wouldn't have been able to bomb so many people if he had truthfully said it was about "oil" and "empire." Who would vote for someone who was honest about the genocide and privatization he and his cabal have incurred?

Let me also apologize, lest you had gotten prematurely excited, about the recent sweep to power of the Democratic Party. Even though they won due to the disgust with the crimes and policies of Bush Inc., it seems that they promptly dismissed why they managed to be elected. The chauvinistic posturing by so many Democrats shames the nation and represents the pandering to the basest elements of the U.S. population. The call for violence and belligerence against Iran, uttered by those such as Hillary Clinton, is so dangerous and reminiscent of the fraudulent calls for the invasion of Iraq that I would like to convey the shame and embarrassment of the American people.

I, along with millions of Americans, know that Iran is not the same as the fragile and poor countries of Afghanistan and Iraq. We know that, despite the ignorance of many other citizens of this country, Iran is more populous, more modernized and more able to defend itself. We know that, unlike the tendency of our government to decimate only helpless populations, that Iran is an entirely different story. We know that if Bush and the Democrats wage war against your country, that you will be able and entitled to fight back. We know you'll bring the fight to our soil, once the U.S. government begins to pummel yours. I would just like to make sure that you know that I and millions of Americans do not welcome, and actively oppose, such a war. And as a personal note, if you could avoid blowing up Springfield (where I live), I'd be much obliged.

Although it might not seem like it from the outside, there are millions of people in this country that reject the bloodlust of the plutocrats that run the U.S. Millions of us value human life, as we know most of you do. Millions of Americans value peace and fight (though not with guns and missiles) for it daily. We are not all heartless and calculating cretins, like those who run the government. We truly believe in and desire democracy and the peaceful co-existence of cultures and people in the world. We just don't happen, at the moment, to be in control of the aircraft carriers or the missiles or foreign policy.

We do promise, however, to try to do something about that.

Jeff Napolitano can be reached at jjnapolit@bre.umass.edu.

WRITE LETTERS TO THE EDITOR. MAKE YOUR VOICE COUNT.

WE ARE LOOKING FOR YOU. THE COLLEGIAN IS ALWAYS LOOKING TO IMPROVE ITS COVERAGE. PART OF THAT MISSION EMANATES FROM TAKING THE PULSE OF YOU, THE MEMBER OF THE UMASS COMMUNITY. TELL US WHAT YOU THINK. SPEAK YOUR MIND.

Send an e-mail to EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

ARTS & LIVING

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 26, 2007

ARTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Oils possess healing qualities

Herbs and essential oils used as alternatives to doctor's visits

By Lauren Modiset
Collegian Columnist

Germs seem to be growing on every surface imaginable. Health Services can be rather inconvenient and the antibiotics prescribed may work, but they can cost big bucks and have side effects. Prescription medicines aren't the only option for the typical illness.

Herbs, spices and plants have been used for medicinal purposes long before modern medicine came around. Many ways exist to extract the different properties in these plants to create a specific mixture that will assist in treating an ailment. There are tinctures, elixirs and essential oils that can be incredibly effective in healing a variety of illnesses that college students experience.

Essential oils can be very helpful, but must never be ingested unless recommended by a physician. Recently, they have become popular and more accessible. The most effective ways to use these oils are by inhaling the aroma directly from the bottle, or applying the oil to the skin via cotton ball, massage, amulet or mister. If you have high blood pressure, epilepsy or sensitive skin these oils aren't recommended for use.

There are over 400 different essential oils available in the market. For those who have weak immune systems, the essential oil of Echinacea is suggested. It can also be used in other forms. This herb is thought to stimulate the body's defense against disease without toxicity. It is used as an antibiotic, antiseptic and can be used to treat fevers, infections and even reduce allergies. If you frequently experience high fevers, the essential oils of peppermint and rosewood are also ideal.

During the winter, many people experience seasonal depression. The essential oil of orange or rose petal elixir works wonders as a mood enhancer. Rose petal elixir can be ingested while the essential oil should be inhaled.

Stress is also a problem most college students face during the long months spent at school. Lavender is the best herb to calm the nerves and relax the muscles. As a tea lavender also treats anxiety, nausea, flatulence and headaches. The essential oil is an antiseptic, a mild sedative and has pain killing properties. This oil can also treat insomnia and high blood pressure. The essential oil of cedarwood is also useful to prevent stress and anger.

Insomnia is another problem that many experience. Along with lavender, chamomile is very helpful for those restless minds and can be consumed as a tea or used as an essential oil.

The essential oil of vervain

See HERBS on page 6

Lavender, besides being a beautiful addition to any garden, has soothing qualities when used in a tea or as an essential oil.

Winter fashions keep some warm, leave others cold

Regardless of the unsightly nature of UGGs they continue to have limitless fans on campus in a variety of colors.

By Amanda Mitchell
Collegian Columnist

Walking down the hallway wearing my beat-up, worn-out boots often prompts my friend Tim Murphy to say, "Hey Amanda, 2003 called and it wants its UGGs back."

Despite what Cosmo, J-14 and fashion forward UMass students may say, the warm, fuzzy, and rather ungainly trend is one that just will not quit. Thanks to the one and only Cameron Diaz, UGG boots have become one of the more inexplicable fashion trends in our world today. The boots are and have been popular on campus for the last several years.

Why are they so popular? No one is really sure. They're not easy to walk in, they aren't particularly waterproof and they most definitely are not a good-looking shoe.

"I think UGGs are going to be around for a while," said Maddy Siewert, a sophomore fashion guru. "They're practical in the winter weather, and they're comfortable, which is unusual for most trends. I don't think they're going to disappear from campus fashion for a long time."

The Amherst cold certainly brings out some winning fashion combinations from UMass students; some are stylish while others, well, not so much. Over the last few weeks, the snow and cold have brought out moon boots, stiff snow boots, long puffy jackets, full face masks, hats, mittens, scarves and of course, the UGGs.

For some, remaining warm even trumps matching, as layers and layers of multi-colored clothing often leave students looking as though they've gotten into a fight with their closets.

Though looking good may be a challenge during the Amherst arctic freeze, there are definitely several trends that have emerged so far this semester.

Everything from The North Face, including snow boots, backpacks, jackets, sweatshirts, gloves and sweatpants continue to be must haves for the fashionably conscious on campus. Particularly popular are the zip-up fleece shells that can be worn under ski jackets in the frigid temperatures or on their own as a lighter jacket in the warmer, more pleasant weather.

Lisa Wen, a freshman on campus, loves her North Face gear. "I love my boots especially," she said adding, "I'm anti-UGG so they're great for me."

Also popular once again this

See FASHION on page 6

Environment and food systems meet

Visiting professor lecture series illuminates connections

By Sydney Towne
Collegian Staff

Food may be the one thing that truly connects all people. The interdependence of humans on food and its production is the basic premise behind a spring lecture series hosted by the University of Massachusetts's Environmental Institute. Four researchers are scheduled to hold lectures discussing different ways that the food system interacts with the global environment.

A political science professor, an economist, a food microbiologist and an agricultural scientist will each bring a depth of knowledge from their own fields to this topic. Each lecture plans to provide students with an opportunity to see how what they are studying can impact a more diverse field of study.

Kicking off the spring series today at 3:30 p.m. in the Cape Cod Lounge, Molly Anderson, director of the graduate degree program at Tufts for Agriculture, Food and Environment, plans to deliver a talk titled "The Future of Food Systems: Global to Local." Her lecture is slated to focus on the connections between society and the environment and how both interact to impact the ability to produce food in a sustainable manner. She is also active with the Community Food Security Coalition and the New England Farthcare Ministry Committee.

She will be followed on Mar. 13 by Robert L. Paarlberg. Professor Paarlberg, from Wellesley College, will be giving a lecture entitled, "Why Environmentalists Should Like Genetically Engineered Agricultural Crops." Paarlberg will explore the history of genetically modified crops and discuss their potential environmental benefits. His work will no doubt be informed by his 2001 book "The Politics of Precaution: Policies towards GM Crops in the Developing World."

Lectures three and four will be given by Emeritus Professor Frank T. Busta and Assistant Professor Parke E. Wilde respectively. Busta, who teaches at the University of Minnesota, will be exploring the hazards of food in his April 3 lecture, "Terrorism and the Defense of the Food System." Wilde, also from Tufts University, plans to deliver a lecture titled "Got Milk?" Nutrition and Environmental Impacts of Federal Food Advertising," and will be given May 1.

Despite each lecture's connections to both the environment, and, more specifically, food's place in the world, these speakers propose to address these topics from a wide variety of angles.

All events are planned to be held in the Cape Cod Lounge at 3:30 p.m. on their respective dates. A reception will follow each lecture and will be free and open to the public.

Sydney Towne can be reached at stowne@student.umass.edu

G. Love and Special Sauce find loving fans at Pearl St.

By Michael Trabert
Collegian Staff

G. Love and Special Sauce got a packed Pearl Street Night Club moving to their unique brand of slinky blues/rock on Saturday night.

The lead member of the group, G. Love is a black suit-wearing, cocky, guitar-playing singer from Philadelphia with a penchant for screaming harmonica solos. Throughout the concert he threw down his guitar and walked around the stage rapping. He did surprisingly well for a self proclaimed blues musician.

The Special Sauce consisted of Jimi Jazz, an upright bass player who is crucial to their patented sound and Jeffrey "Houseman" Clemens, the man behind the skins keeping the heart pumping. They never missed a beat and served as a great platform for G. Love to do his job.

Aside from the usual Special Sauce line up there was an organ player who sounded like he could lay into the keys, but unfortunately could not be heard well. He did provide a great texture at points in the set though, so his performance was not entirely in vain.

After a twenty-minute wait between acts, the crowd became restless and were relieved when G. Love finally took the stage. Even that wait, however, didn't deter the excited crowd from going nuts for G. Love who walked on stage like he was the Messiah.

Ripping the microphone from the stand, he walked around touching people's hands and it looked like he received a tremendous ego boost.

G. Love was quite the showman. While performing one of the band's singles "Cold Beverage," a song about drinking, he used a beer bottle from the audience as a slide for his guitar.

As a highlight of the performance he walked through the crowd soloing on his guitar, being closely followed by a ner-

See G. LOVE on page 6

G. Love and Special Sauce generally have a blues and rock inspired sound, but at Saturday's show played Snoop Dogg's "Gin and Juice," with relative success.

'Golden Flower' overshadowed by set and costume design

Curse of the Golden Flower

Directed by Zhang Yimou

Starring Chow Yun-Fat

3.5/5

By Kate Bauer
Collegian Staff

Is it possible that the scenery and background of a film can be more entertaining and interesting to watch than the story itself? Apparently so. In Curse of the Golden Flower, Zhang Yimou's third extravagance into the martial arts epic (after Hero and House of Flying Daggers) starring his muse Gong Li along with action superstar Chow Yun-Fat.

Set in the 10th century during the Tang Dynasty, corruption, secrets and "Soap Opera Digest" fill this listless story about family woes. Unknown to the Emperor Ping (Chow Yun-Fat), Empress Phoenix (Li), is unhappy in her marriage, and is spending some quality time with her stepson, the Crown Prince Wan (Ye Liu). Yet unbeknownst to her, the Emperor has secretly been poisoning his dear wife, slipping a fungus into her daily medicine in order to make her go mad. And yet she doesn't know that Wan is conducting his own affair with the Imperial physician's daughter. And on top of it all, the Empress is secretly gathering an army to overthrow the Emperor. Get all of this so far?

Everything in the Emperor's palace is formality, everyone following strict ceremonial rituals. The opening sequence of the film follows an endless line of young maidens as they ready themselves for another day of royal servitude. At a certain time of the day, always announced by the gong from a Buddhist, the Empress is forced to drink the medicine that is slowly killing her. Makes you think the royal lifestyle isn't all it's cracked up to be.

Rumored to be China's most

See CURSE on page 6

The costumes and set design stole the show in Zhang Yimou's new film "Curse of the Golden Flower." The bright colors and ornate details weren't enough, however, to keep the audience entertained.

Students keep UGGs

FASHION from page 5

season is the mitten glove combination. These contraptions are made like fingerless gloves, but have a pouch that flips over the hand to hide the fingers and make mittens. Ideal for fishing through your bag for your keys without having to rip off your mittens, this item is both efficient and fashionable.

Faux fur is also frequenting the campus fashion scene again this winter. Fur-lined sweatshirts and jackets from stores like Hollister and Abercrombie and Fitch were back this season, providing an extra layer of warmth. Decorative fur lining on the hoods of jackets are also frequent sights on campus. Sievert reports that Russian-style faux-fur hats are creeping their way onto the fashion scene. "Everywhere on the New York City streets there are people wandering around with big puff balls on their heads," she said. "I absolutely love mine; it's really fun to wear."

Also popular in the realm of women's outerwear are the long, caterpillar-like puffy coats. The most extreme version of these coats nearly touches the ground, while others stop right above the knee. Though the tailored, tapered versions of these coats are often very stylish, there are others that appear to be little more than feather-stuffed sausage casing with a zipper. Though not always aesthetically pleasing, this trend is certainly one that is both practical and popular.

And then there is the ladies' leggings trend. One of the more impractical fashion trends on campus, leggings are generally worn with a tunic-length shirt or a skirt and are almost always tucked into a pair of UGG boots. This revealing spandex style certainly isn't for everyone to try, and it is definitely reminiscent of the stretch pants that many of us wore in grade-school during the early '90s. For whatever reason though, it is a trend that has been picking up speed in the last few months.

Sievert, who confesses to experimenting with the leggings trend said: "It's definitely a trend that is gaining popularity on campus. But it's kind of ridiculous because it's cold and leggings aren't very warm."

Also bearing on the side of impracticality is the winning weekend combination of skinny jeans and high stiletto boots for the ladies. Though a fashionable and (in most cases) sexy combination, one walk from a bus station or bar at 2 a.m. over the ice and snow in stiletto heals provides a hard-learned lesson in the theories of gravity and balance.

Nevertheless, Sievert believes the skinny jean trend will carry through the cold and into the spring. "There's no one who can't pull off a nice pair of classy skinny jeans," she said. "They've always been popular, but now they're becoming trendy and you can find them just about anywhere."

The spring thaw is slowly approaching, but until then UMass students will continue to brave the freezing temperatures the best way they know how. For some, this means fur-linings and fuzzy boots. For others, looking good and ignoring the thermometer is the way to go. Whichever trends students decide to follow, one thing is for certain: UGG boots are not going anywhere anytime soon. Sorry 2003.

Amanda Mitchell can be reached at amitchel@student.umass.edu

COURTESY THE NORTH FACE

The North Face provides many UMass students with a warm and trendy option during the cold winter months on campus.

G. Love plays in Northampton

G. LOVE from page 5

vous security guard. This was impressive because of the risk of walking among screaming fans with expensive equipment. He made it through intact though and the band took a break before performing the encore.

Unexpectedly the band broke into "Gin and Juice" the 1993 single by Snoop Dogg. For a blues/rock band this song was well done. G. Love rapped it without missing a step and the band kept trucking behind.

Throughout the rest of the set, G. Love played some blues tunes by his lonesome with his low-action, rusty-sweet sounding electric acoustic and a harmonica. The band eventually joined him and played some odd songs. One was about breakfast cereal and being "coo-coo for coco puffs."

The only thing there should have been more of was the bass player Jimi Jazz. He seemed ready to rip up a solo if provoked. He pulled out a bow and used it on the upright for an introduction to a song. The bow could have used more play time.

Most people at the show were getting into the music. The audience ranged from the generally upbeat high school kids to the aging hipsters looking for a good Saturday night show.

The opening band, Redeye, is from Canada. They are the average mix of Sublime and Dispatch one can hear these days. Their lead guitarist is very talented and was the highlight of the performance.

They jammed a little too long on some songs turning a fresh riff stale. They were, however, well-rehearsed and knew what to do and say in order to pump the crowd up for the main act.

While not one of the best, the show was worth the money spent on the ticket. Both groups played well and performed on a professional level. G. Love and Special Sauce got the blood pumping on an otherwise average Saturday night.

Michael Trabert can be reached at mkt711 a yahoo com

COURTESY PHOTO

G. Love is the lead singer, guitar and harmonica player for the band, which includes Jimi Jazz on upright bass, and "Houseman" on drums.

Local herbalists offer ideas for treating common woes is also a common remedy for insomnia and menstrual cramps. There are other essential oils that can be used to suppress menstrual cramps besides vervain. Ylang-ylang is another plant that not only assists in reducing cramps, but can also be used to treat impotence.

HERBS from page 5

Many are experiencing the cold and flu wave that sweeps campus every year. Ginger can be used in several different ways, but the most efficient way of taking it is drinking it as a tea. The steam from the tea treats colds, lung infections, indigestion, flatulence and also reduces fevers. A single drop of the essential oil can also be used during a massage to help ease muscle pain and fatigue.

Patchouli has been well known and popularized by its ability to hide the distinctive smell of marijuana. The essential oil of patchouli, however, has the ability to curb your appetite. It also assists in clearing up acne, eczema, dysentery and reducing fevers.

Essential oils can also treat a very common ailment that no one likes to talk about – warts. There are many medicines and painful procedures out there that assist in their removal, but there is also a natural solution. Calendula is a very powerful healer. It is an antiseptic and antifungal with high amounts of vitamin A and can treat multiple types of skin problems. If you are experiencing warts, an application of this oil along with the frequent ingestion of milk thistle elixir will help solve the problem. Milk thistle, when ingested, does wonders for the liver which rids the body of toxins. If you are experiencing genital warts, it is suggested you converse with a well-informed herbalist, or your physician, before applying calendula.

Well-informed herbalists can be found locally. There is a natural healing store in Hadley that supplies every essential oil and elixir mentioned. Inspirit Common is located on Route 9 towards Northampton and the owners can answer any questions and always have recommendations. Inspirit Common can also be found online at www.inspirit-common.com.

In addition, they have a surplus of healing stones that release energy which are said to communicate with the body, assisting in the healing process. Don't be shy because they are very nice and understanding. Sometimes modern medicine can seem like an endless pit of appointments, prescriptions, and disappointment. It might be worth giving natural medicine a try.

Lauren Modiset can be reached at lmodiset@student.umass.edu.

COURTESY PHOTO

Essential oils can offer natural alternatives to traditional treatments for a variety of discomforts associated with colds, fevers and stress.

Candy-colored film belly flops expensive production to date, Curse's candy-colored extravaganza of scenery is good enough to make you think it's edible. But I must warn that you may become blind watching this film. Every single detail, every costume, tapestry, wall, chair, you name it, are detailed to the nine's. There is so much detail and extravagant color that at times it's too overwhelming, and when the film finally moves outside of the palace (where most of the story takes place), it's a relief to the eyes. Consider it sensory overload.

CURSE from page 5

Stunningly visual, you spend half the film just trying to soak in every element and color, even the exaggerated detail of Ping's armor. There's so much to look at you forget that you're suppose to be paying attention to the storyline. While the actors themselves deliver fine performances, these hermits stuck in one extravagant palace do nothing to boost the storyline.

Unfortunately the story and structure to Curse buries itself under its own weight. Confusing as it is to have three different storylines happening at once, the plot is executed so poorly that, by the end of the film, you're scratching your head and wondering what just happened.

While past films House of Flying Daggers and Hero were beautifully orchestrated, Curse's dance is never quite as elegant or well orchestrated. The ornate production is relied on too much, and time is spent more on that than the plot. By the time we finally get to see some action, you're already trying not to fall asleep.

Yün-Fat is certainly interesting to watch as a Dictator with too firm a grip on power. His shrewd and harsh eyes reveal he's a calculating man, even if you're not sure he knows all that is going on, and by the end of the film he reminds you of some kind of Chinese version of Russia's Stalin.

If one could argue one interesting aspect of Curse, it's that it can keep you guessing as to the conclusion of the film. Will Phoenix succeed in her conquest to overthrow the Emperor, or will he succeed in turning her into a vegetable? The answers may surprise you, and unfortunately, that's all this entire candy-coated flick has riding on its interest to moviegoers.

Kate Bauer can be reached at kbauer@student.umass.edu.

COURTESY PHOTO

The beautiful Empress Phoenix, played by Gong Li, is simultaneously plotting to overthrow her husband and suffering as he attempts to poision her.

Looking for business experience??

The Daily Collegian is currently seeking qualified applicants to fill the positions of:

- Business Manager
- Assistant Business Manager
- Distribution Manager

Contact Dan Hall at 545-3500 for more information or stop by the basement of the Campus Center

Starting Monday, March 5th,
The Daily Collegian
will print an advice column.
If you'd like some guidance or help with a question please email it to Veronica Garrett, Advice Columnist at vgarrett@student.umass.edu

UMass holds off Billikens

M. BASKETBALL from page 10

Freeman to 13 combined points.

The victory marks the first 21-win season for the Minutemen since 1997-98 when Bruiser Flint's squad finished the year 21-11.

The Minutemen, who shot a dismal 22 percent from the field in the first half and 29 percent in the game, were led by forward Gary Forbes with a team-high 13 points.

"I actually told our team at halftime, 'I don't think we'll go out and shoot 22 percent again.' But it was close," Ford said.

UMass scorers struggled to adapt to the enormous size of the Billikens' front line, led by centers Ian Vouyoukas (6-foot-10) and Bryce Husak (7-feet), who played far off ball handlers, forcing the Minutemen to settle for outside shots, a strategy that nearly paid off for coach Brad Soderberg's Billikens.

Vouyoukas (game-high 18 points) tied the game after draining a running hook shot while drawing Freeman's fifth foul with only 29 seconds left. His free throw put Saint Louis on top 50-49.

But Life then drew a foul on a drive and made the two shots from the line that put UMass on top for good.

"He made a nice move to the basket, that might not have been something I drew up, but it worked out OK for us in the end," said Ford. "I was holding my breath that's for sure."

The Billikens, down 50-49 with 15.6 seconds remaining, put the ball in the hands of their leading scorer Tommie Liddell. Liddell drove on Forbes who swiped the ball away with 6.5 seconds left and was fouled with just over one second in regulation.

"We were going to have Tommie get a ball screen from Luke Meyer, with the hope that the guy covering Meyer would over help on Liddell, Meyer would have a chance to shoot the three, but Tommie got picked, and that was that," said Soderberg.

"That's basic textbook playground basketball. I was trying to reach. I knew he was going to cross over, and I just had my hands at the right place at the right time," said Forbes.

Forbes made his final two foul shots and the Billikens' inbound pass was picked off by forward Dante Milligan.

"I'm disappointed with the loss, when you hold a team to shoot under 30 percent on their own court, that's not a good sign. We need to get that win," said Soderberg.

The victory keeps the Minutemen's hopes alive for an at-large bid to the NCAA Tournament.

"At this point, we're just trying to learn how to win. We're trying to show that we're a team and we stay together no matter what," said Lasme.

UMass committed a season-low nine turnovers on the night while forcing 18 from Saint Louis.

Matt Bellivieau can be reached at mbellivieau@student.umass.edu

Life breaks out of slump at right time

LIFE from page 10

open, I don't mind him shooting it. I thought he forced a few earlier, but that was the best shot he had all night."

"He's like a ticking time bomb," junior Gary Forbes said about Life after the win. "You never know when he's going to go off. He hits big shots when it counts, and that was a deep three. We needed that."

As for the man who shot it, there were never any worries.

"I knew it was going in, honest to God, before I even shot it," Life said. "I was due for something.

"Obviously we weren't hitting any shots, we were struggling," Life said. "I came into the huddle and said, 'I'm tired of this [expletive]. I'm about to start shooting.'"

The clutch shot didn't put Saint Louis away for good, however. The Billikens' big man Ian Vouyoukas made a shot over Rashaun Freeman to tie the game at 49 apiece with 26 seconds remaining in the game. Vouyoukas hit the free throw, putting Saint Louis on top, 50-49.

Freeman fouled out of the game on that play, opening the door for someone else to step up with the game on the line.

Life took advantage of the opportunity, making a most uncharacteristic drive to the net with 15 seconds remaining. A Tommie Liddell foul put Life at the foul line with a chance to be the hero in a category the Minutemen have struggled in all season long.

Ford never lost faith.

"Once he got to that free throw line, I thought we were in pretty good shape," he said.

Two free throws later, UMass regained the lead, 51-50. And thanks to a game-saving steal by Forbes, the Minutemen walked out of the Mullins Center with a well-earned win against a solid Billikens team.

Meanwhile, Life was the hero. His only five points in the game came when his team needed them most. He just wants it to leads to a hot-streak.

"It's kind of frustrating because I shoot a lot of shots after practice and before games," Life said. "I put my time in, so it's a little frustrating in that sense. But you just come out in a game and hit a few shots and that's it, you're right back on.

"So hopefully, with this one three, it's going to be the start of me hitting shots for the rest of the season."

Life is UMass' best outside-shooter by a long shot. He has hit 70 of his 182 3-pointers this season, which is 42 more than the next best shooter from behind the arc, Forbes.

This type of game-winning performance could make the difference in the James Life UMass knows best. He needs to continue to make big shots. And the Minutemen need him just the same.

Danny Picard can be reached at dpicard a student umass edu

Hofstra gets revenge on Minutemen

M. LAX from page 10

gle-handedly knotted the game up for the third time to that point. He carried the ball in front of the crease and roll-dodged to free himself of the UMass defenseman, Brian Danvers. The move worked and Miller underhanded the ball into the net.

Schneider and Orlando traded nice saves to preserve the tied score. But then with 6:01 remaining the third, Rory Pedrick reclaimed the lead for the Minutemen.

He took a feed out front from sophomore attackman Jim Connolly and scored his first of two goals in the game from point blank. But, like it was the entire second half, the Pride came right back to even the score.

Not a minute after Pedrick's goal, Mike Colleluori carried the ball into the restraining box in Hofstra's attacking zone. He then rolled to the inside and fired a shot on Schneider. The bounce shot hit the ground at the crease and sailed past the goalie.

Then three minutes later it was Pedrick again for the Minutemen, this time bringing the game back to a tie. For his second tally, Pedrick carried the ball behind the cage and wrapped around from Orlando's left to right. When he got out front, Pedrick ripped a bullet that beat the netminder top shelf.

That score set up the dramatic fourth quarter in which Hofstra netted four goals to UMass' one. Two of the goals came before the 8:00 mark and gave the Pride their first lead of the game, 6-5, since being up 1-0 in the first quarter.

The play started in UMass' defensive end. Schneider made a nifty save on a tough shot and started the Minutemen's break. The ball came to Paul Manesis and he then sent it along to Denis Whelan. When he got to the middle of the restraining box, Whelan fired a shot on net that beat Orlando. It was his first goal in two years.

After Hofstra took the lead back, it appeared Whelan may have brought it back to a tie. Off a rebound, the ball was slowly rolling in the crease. Whelan dove and shoved it into the net. The UMass sideline erupted but quieted quickly when the referee waved the goal off because Whelan was in the crease.

"That's obviously a big turning point in the game," senior defensive midfielder Dan Whipple said. "You see the goal go in, we go nuts, and then the next thing you know they're coming down – there's no goal. I think they scored on that possession or the next possession. So that's a big letdown for us right there."

It was in fact the ensuing possession in which Hofstra sealed the scoring with its eighth goal on the afternoon. Mike Unterstein carried the ball behind the cage and wrapped around. His shot from the top of the crease beat Schneider high. It was the only two-goal lead for either side.

Garber attributed the loss to a combination of Hofstra's defense and the Minutemen failing to capitalize.

"The goalie made a bunch of great saves on inside and outside shots. Their defense played great," he said. "There were times when we should have capitalized on our shots too, but overall both teams played great. We just didn't take care of all our chances."

Both of Garber's goals on the day were tallied during the game's first half. He along with Connolly helped UMass to a 3-2 halftime lead.

Jon Pelland can be reached at jpelland@student.umass.edu.

Rematch with Pride proves unsuccessful with a Dennis Whelan goal, but Hofstra had too much history and too many demons to let it slip away. The Pride scored two straight goals to end things, and the Minutemen began the season with a loss for the first time since 2004.

GREENFIELD from page 10

It is hard enough to beat two teams in one season like the Minutemen did to the Pride last year. But three meetings with a team in a short period of time is something that no coach would envy.

Whipple said it after the game: "They knew us inside out." And how could they not? Hofstra's players and coaches have seen those game tapes and studied them thoroughly. Twenty-four of the 47 players on the Pride's roster were there for the carnage last season.

Whether they wanted to or not, they knew UMass really well. For UMass, beating a team of similar caliber that many times in a row is extremely difficult. That being said, the Minutemen had their opportunities on Saturday and ran into a great performance from Hofstra's freshman goalie, Danny Orlando, who made 14 saves on the afternoon.

The Minutemen came into this season at the No. 10 team in the country. But they are a new machine this season and the loss of the All-Americans and a face-off specialist doesn't help the cause.

All of these changes and history and rivalry made it a fun game to watch, and there is the possibility for another meeting between these two teams this season. If both programs maintain their previous standard of excellence, then these two squads could be on a hard line to a playoff matchup.

And the next time around, the Minutemen would be the ones with the chip on their shoulder.

Rob Greenfield can be reached at rgreenfi a student umass edu

Connolly shows up again against Pride

Sophomore attacker continues to play well against his rival

By Jon Pelland
Collegian Staff

UNIONDALE, N.Y. – Maybe he hates the colors blue and yellow, or perhaps Jim Connolly is just that good when it matters. No one knows, not even the sophomore attack himself can pinpoint the reason he plays so well against the Hofstra Pride.

Connolly was a factor on offense Saturday, even though the Minutemen fell, 8-6, to the Pride on the road. He scored his first goal of the season and the seventh of his career when lining up against Hofstra. Counting Saturday, Connolly has only faced the Pride three times in the short time he's worn maroon and white.

Last May, Connolly recorded a career-high five goals in an 11-10 overtime thriller of a win for the Minutemen in the quarterfinals of the NCAA Tournament. Those five goals were also the most a UMass player posted during all of 2006.

Before that, in the first game of the season, he notched his first career goal against the Pride at Garber Field in Amherst. Connolly refutes the notion that there is something about Hofstra that brings out the best in him.

"I just try and play my game the same way every game," he said. "I just try to look at the opponent and know their tendencies and react off those."

The above is something he does exceptionally well. Connolly scored nine of his 22 goals from a season ago during the tournament. One of those came in the championship game and two were in the semifinal win over Maryland.

The young attackman has been dubbed the heir to UMass' offense entering the 2007 campaign. Connolly is following in the footsteps of All-American Sean Morris, who now suits up for the Chicago Machine of Major League Lacrosse. The Machine took Morris, and his 72 points (33 goals, 39 assists), with the third pick in last summer's draft.

But Connolly doesn't see it as just him replacing Morris. He says it's up to the whole team to fill the void left in the departed attackman's wake.

"Well obviously losing Sean was a big deal to us. He was a great player, great leader," he said. "But I don't think any one person can step up and make the impact that Sean did. I think we all as a team on offense have to step up and try to fill the role that way."

His tally on Saturday tied the score at one goal apiece. Connolly took a pass from Tim Balise and found himself at the top of the crease. He rolled to his left to get Hofstra goalie Danny Orlando on the move, who then had little shot at making the save. Connolly fired the ball from directly out front, scoring with ease.

Then, Connolly's assist midway through the third helped the Minutemen recapture the lead, 4-3. He and Rory Pedrick were both on the right side of the restraining box. Connolly fed the midfielder and he cut to the net. The score was Pedrick's second of the game.

Connolly's two points tied him with senior Brett Garber for the second most by a Minuteman on the day. Pedrick's two goals and an assist gave him a team-leading three points.

Even with the two-point performance, Connolly said afterwards that it wasn't his best game for the Maroon and White. He still believes that he – and the rest of the UMass offense – still needs improvement.

"For me personally, it wasn't my best day," Connolly said. "I had a few [mistakes] that I'd like to have back. But you can't really look at that, you have to look towards the next game next week.

"Offensively we need a lot of work, I think. Six goals aren't going to cut it against anybody. The defense played well, but we have to put up more points."

With Connolly as the No. 1 threat, that shouldn't be a hard improvement to make.

Jon Pelland can be reached at jpelland a student umass edu

Mass Attack sweeps home-and-home set with Northeastern was held out of the game after suffering an ankle injury late in Friday's win, and his backup, freshman Dan Meyers, was tested early and often, facing a number of tough shots in the early going and stopping all of them.

HOCKEY from page 10

Cahoon was impressed with the way Meyers responded in crunch time.

"I thought he battled all night long," Cahoon said of his No. 2 goalie. "I thought he followed the puck particularly well. It was just a gritty effort. You can't imagine how difficult it is to come in after not playing for such a long time, and to get into the rhythm of a game and the intensity of a game that's played at this level."

The Minutemen were forced into an uncharacteristically rough style of play by a very physical Northeastern team. The UMass faithful got a taste of what was to come in Friday night's 2-0 victory for the Maroon and White, as shoving was exchanged any time play got tight.

But when the teams moved to the Huskies' home inside Matthews Arena for Sunday's matinee, the closer quarters made for a number of tense moments on the ice.

"I think it was clear that this was one of the more entertaining games for the people upstairs watching," Cahoon said. "I don't know how entertaining it was for the coaching staffs on either team, but it certainly was very intense. I think it was played at a playoff pitch."

Only 18 seconds into the first period, the Minutemen responded to what they believed was a dirty hit by a Husky player. Defenseman Justin Braun was hit hard behind is own net and struggled to get back to his feet.

Braun's teammate, senior winger Kevin Jarman came to his defense, yelling and pointing fingers at NU skaters. Jarman and the Huskies' Randy Guzior were given matching minors, creating a 4-on-4 for the first two minutes of the game.

One minute later, the Mass Attack drew first blood. With the 4-on-4 still in effect, Justin Braun continued his eventful day by starting the scoring.

The freshman brought the puck up the right boards and dumped it behind the net to Chris Capraro, who immediately fed Cory Quirk in front of the net. Quirk carried the puck across the crease and beat Northeastern netminder Brad Thiessen with the backhand shot.

It was not until 7:54 into the first that Northeastern evened the score. In the waning seconds of a UMass power play, Husky center Joe Vitale left the box and joined Chris Donovan and Bryan Usher up the ice, creating a 3-on-1 attack.

Meyers stopped the initial shot by Vitale, but the rebound squirted across the crease, where Donovan stuffed the puck into an open net behind a helpless Meyers.

The Minutemen responded before the first frame came to a close, however. With 2:26 remaining, defenseman David Leaderer – who has been hot in recent weeks – split the NU defense and entered the high slot uncontested.

He fired a hard shot past Thiessen, but hit the right post. Thiessen lost sight of the puck, which bounced behind him and to his right, just outside the crease. Senior Matt Anderson was in perfect position to gather the rebound and threw it in an open net for his seventh goal of the season and the 2-1 lead.

"I was just crashing the net and the puck popped out," Anderson said. "Your eyes just kind of open up wide when it pops out like that, and try to get as much of it as you can and I was fortunate that it went in."

The score would not change again in the period, though Cahoon's lineups were forced to. With just two seconds left, Jarman was called for hitting from behind and given a game misconduct, ejecting him from the game and effectively ending his afternoon just as it began.

The Minutemen started the second stanza with a five-minute penalty to kill, and they did just that, swinging the momentum back in their favor.

"Maybe the game-breaker," Anderson said of killing the penalty. "Last weekend we were in the same situation, where we couldn't score on a 5-on-4 and it came back to haunt us. It's a big momentum changer, and it's a testament to our PK and our goaltending. We had some guys go down, and to have Danny step up is just unbelievable."

At 8:12 in the second, Northeastern's Chad Costello beat Meyers through traffic to knot the game at 2-apiece. Vitale and Kyle Kraemer assisted on the play.

Following the goal, the Maroon and White drew two penalties about a minute apart, but gave up a shorthanded goal in the process.

Meyers – in a rare display of his inexperience – gave the puck away in his own zone. He controlled the puck behind his own net and sent it up the left boards, trying to get it out of the zone.

The Huskies' Ray Ortiz intercepted it inside the blueline and quickly threw it up to Esner in front of the crease. The right-winger spun away from a UMass defender and slipped the puck under Meyers' outstretched right pad, giving the Huskies a one-goal lead for the first time in the game.

The Minutemen responded quickly, drawing the second penalty and gaining a two-man advantage mid-way through the second.

With traffic all around Theissen, a Chris Carparo shot was blocked by a Northeastern defender, but junior P.J. Fenton was right there to stuff the puck home and tie the game, 3-3.

UMass went up for good with just under two minutes to play in the second. Taking a pass across the blue line from Anderson, Braun continued his strong performance with the game-winning goal, beating Thiessen glove-side.

Mike Kostka added his second empty-net goal of the weekend with 1:05 left to play in the game, lifting UMass into a tie for fourth place in Hockey East with next weekend's opponent, Maine.

Friday's matchup was much less eventful. Anderson scored his sixth of the year with three minutes left in the second. Kostka grabbed an empty- netter in that game as well.

It was the first weekend sweep for UMass since a Nov. 3 and 4 home-and-home series against Providence.

"I'm really proud of this team," Cahoon said. "I really think that what they did today was pretty special."

Jeremy Rice can be reached at jeremyr a student umass edu

Looking for business experience?

The Daily Collegian is currently seeking qualified applicants to work in the business department.

Contact Dan Hall at 545-3500 or stop by the office.

Journalism Program Lecture Series
on Broadcast and the Media

The Historian as Journalist, the Journalist as Historian

A panel featuring award winning Boston Globe reporter and author Charles Sennott and BBC Senior Producer Kate Peters.

The Boston Globe BBC

Tuesday, Feb. 27, 5:30-7pm Cape Cod Lounge

Free Parking in Campus Center Garage

Meyers stands strong for UM

Backup goaltender provides depth after Quick's injury

By Jon Pelland
Collegian Staff

BOSTON – The Massachusetts hockey team has suffered a rash of injuries recently, at the worst possible juncture in the season. In the midst of a chase for home-ice advantage in the Hockey East playoffs, goaltender Jon Quick was the latest edition to the Minutemen's scratched list.

Quick went down in the final minute of Friday night's 2-0 win over Northeastern. The Huskies turned up the pressure on Quick with 30 seconds to go in regulation. He hit the ice after making a save with traffic out front and trainer Bob Kuzmeski paid the goalie a visit while he was hunched over clutching his ankle. But Quick stayed in the game and finished off his second career shutout.

UMass coach Don Cahoon held Quick out of Sunday's lineup, opting to go with freshman Dan Meyers. Freshman defender Martin Nolet was also in street clothes in Boston. According to Meyers, it wasn't until an hour or two before the game that he got word of the change.

"Once we knew Jon [Quick] wasn't going to be at 100 percent, there was no sense in risking the possibility of retarding his recovery," Cahoon said, who added Quick could be back on the ice by midweek.

"I was brought here for a reason," Meyers said, who set a new career high with 29 saves. "This was my opportunity – you don't get a lot of them. So I just [went] out there and made the best of it. The team played unbelievable in front of me, let me see most of the shots. I felt pretty confident."

Meyers saw no shortage of action during the opening period. He faced 12 shots – stopping 11 of them. Cory Quirk helped Meyers out early, scoring his 11th of the season just under two minutes in, but not long after is when Meyers was first tested.

Freshman Brett Watson was whistled for hooking at 2:14, putting the Huskies on a 4-on-3 power play (Kevin Jarman and Randy Guzior were already in the box for roughing) and an eventual 5-on-4. Meyers deflected a rocketed one-timer to preserve UMass' early lead.

But then the Huskies tied the score up on a play in which Meyers had little chance to make the save. UMass found itself on the short end of a 3-on-1 – Joe Vitale being the third Huskies player as he exited the penalty box.

Vitale took a cross-crease pass from Bryan Esner and ripped a shot. Meyers made the save, but had no shot on the rebound as the traffic out front crashed into the cage.

"I slid over a little too much and overplayed it a little bit," Meyers said. "It happens."

Meyers had a rough time of it in the action-filled second period. He allowed two scores in the period, one shorthanded, but the Minutemen fought back and left the period with a 4-3 lead over the Huskies.

A bright spot in the period was the first five minutes of play. Forced to play a man-down for that period of time – Jarman was given a game misconduct for a hit from behind – Meyers stood his ground. He made a number of saves to keep the Minutemen on top for the time being.

Shortly after Justin Braun's score gave UMass the lead back, Meyers made a nice save to keep it that way. Vitale carried the puck diagonally into the attacking zone from the goaltender's left to right. He fired the puck from the middle slot, but Meyers got his pad in front of it and kicked it away to safety.

Once again Vitale put Meyers to the test, this time in the middle stages of the third. He took a long pass, which originated from the left boards at the blue line, to where he was skating at the right faceoff circle. Meyers went down to the split to stop Vitale's try and the subsequent rebound.

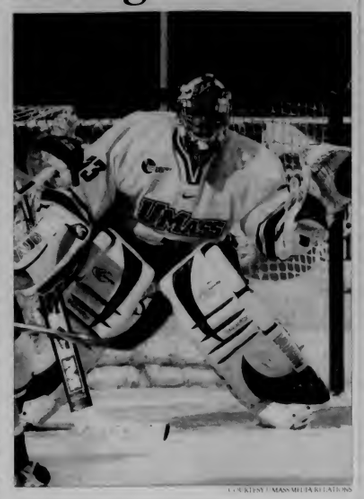
Before yesterday, Meyers hadn't seen any game action since winter break. He started the game against Alabama-Huntsville, giving up three goals on 11 shots in the first 20 minutes. Quick came in to finish out the 5-2 defeat of the Minutemen, but Meyers suffered the loss.

He then entered the game against New Hampshire on Jan. 20. Quick gave up five goals in that game and was relieved for the final 11:58 of play. Meyers saved three shots during his short stint in net.

After Quick was suspended for an undisclosed violation of team rules, Meyers' first career start was the Minutemen's first game of the 2006-07 season. It was also his first career win at UMass in that 3-2 game against Sacred Heart.

The Maroon and White's injured players list is becoming frighteningly long coming down to the last weekend of play. Joining Quick and Nolet in stands this past weekend was sophomore defenseman Topher Bevis and forward Zech Klann. Both of those players are out indefinitely.

Jon Pelland can be reached at jpelland@student.umass.edu



COURTESY UMASS MEDIA RELATIONS

Freshman goaltender Dan Meyers made 29 saves in a winning effort on Sunday against Northeastern. UMass won both games against the Huskies.

UMass ends regular season with win

By Dominic Poli
Collegian Staff

A win is a win.

This is a simple philosophy taken by many involved in competitive sports when reflecting on a narrow, sometimes ugly, victory – and it suits UMass coach Marnie Ducko and her Massachusetts women's basketball team (17-12, 7-7 A-10) just fine.

UMass	53
Ford	51

UMass' 53-51 win over Fordham University (3-25, 1-13 A-10) in the regular season finale yesterday may not have been the prettiest of triumphs, but, at the end of the day, it was still another win notched under the Maroon and White's belt.

"I think it was a huge nail-biter for everybody," Ducko said. "But winning ugly is fine by me."

It was hard to not be content with the game's outcome, seeing as how it helped wrap up the regular season with two consecutive road victories.

"Winning two on the road to finish our season was huge because our kids could have easily backed off and not applied pressure and given an open look, but they didn't," Ducko said. "I'm really proud of the way the team fought and stayed with things and made some defensive stops when they needed to and we came up big at the end. I think it's great for the team."

Though the Rams possess the A-10's worst record, Ducko said the school from the Bronx gave UMass a run for its money.

In a game in which category-leading numbers were unusually low, captain Alisha Tatham was the Minutewomen's leading scorer, registering a somewhat-dismal 14 points. Though Ducko says she played a gritty game, performing well both offensively and defensively.

The junior guard, who shot 7-for-12 on the afternoon, also contributed two steals and three rebounds to the winning effort.

Tatham's co-captain, Kate Mills, was the team's runner-up in the points category, finishing with 13.

The 6-foot-1 forward also recorded two assists, snatched five total boards and swatted down three Fordham shots.

As much as her opponents may have been aware of her presence on the court, Ducko says that the performance was sub-par for the junior powerhouse.

"It was a tough day for her," Ducko said. "She didn't really get in a rhythm. We were giving her the ball in bad positions and she got into early foul trouble."

When her team needed her most, however, the one referred to as the "go-to player" by her coach, came through in the clutch.

With six seconds remaining in a 51-48 UMass game, Mills pulled down a critical offensive rebound on a missed free throw by junior Pam Rosanio.

On the ensuing trip to the charity stripe, Mills drained both her attempts, boosting UMass' lead to five points.

The buckets locked up a win for the Maroon and White, as the successful 3-pointer with one tick on the clock by Fordham's LaToya Chambers was irrelevant.

The only two other Minutewomen with double-digit points were Rosanio and Tamara Tatham (10 each).

"[Rosanio] did a nice job on the boards, but she's just got to work on relaxing on the perimeter and making open looks and then she's got to get to the foul line and knock them down," Ducko said.

With 10 total boards, the junior guard was the team's leading rebounder, on top of adding a steal.

In addition to her 10 points, Tatham, the Maroon and White's lone senior, boarded the team bus having racked up two steals, six assists, nine rebounds and a block.

With their most recent victory – and the 2006-07 regular season – now in the rear-view mirror, the Minutewomen have secured the No. 7 seed in the upcoming A-10 tournament in Cincinnati.

Friday at 4 p.m. is the time scheduled for UMass to face St. Bonaventure (15-14, 5-9 A-10) in a first-round matchup, the winner of which goes on to play No. 2 seed Temple (23-5, 13-0 A-10) on Saturday.

Dominic Poli can be reached at dpoli@student.umass.edu.

Maroon and White go 2-3 in Columbus

By Dominic Poli
Collegian Staff

While the Boston Red Sox are still shaking off some of their winter rust, the Massachusetts softball team (4-5-1) has just concluded its second weekend tournament of the season, going 2-3 in the NFCA Leadoff Classic in Columbus, Ga., over the weekend.

The Minutewomen trumped Coastal Carolina (3-10) by a score of 6-1 yesterday before trekking back home with a nagging feeling of dissatisfaction.

"On the tournament as a whole I think we were disappointed with what we're coming home with," UMass coach Elaine Sortino said. "We had two heartbreaking games on Friday. We couldn't get our offense going when we needed to and we [missed] opportunities to win and/or tie and force the games into extra innings."

Despite the disappointment that the tourney left with the Maroon and White, Sortino was still happy to end the trip down south with a victory.

"I really thought we did a good job in terms of our at-bats," Sortino said. "I felt we really gave ourselves some opportunities to score and score big and I felt that even when we didn't necessarily have something to show for it, we drove the ball very well."

Sophomore shortstop Samantha Salato was UMass' key contributor, going 1-for-2 with a single, a walk, three RBIs and a run scored.

"I thought she drove the ball really well," Sortino said. "I thought she did a real good job driving the ball with runners on base and getting people the opportunity to tag-up and score a run. I thought she gave us some real good, quality at-bats."

Sortino said that Salato, batting .290, is an ever-improving ballplayer with plenty more potential in sight.

"[She] has definitely matured as a shortstop," Sortino says. "[She] understands what she needs to do for us on the field and is a major threat at the plate."

Leftfielder Lauren Proctor was the game's best hitter, going 3-for-4 with three singles and an RBI.

"[She did] outstanding," Sortino said after the game. "She had a great day at the plate."

Freshman right fielder Carly Normadin, senior center fielder Candice Molnar and senior first baseman Amanda Morin all had two hits on the day, going 2-for-3, 2-for-3 and 2-for-5, respectively.

Sophomore third baseman Whitney Mollica was the only other Minutewoman to record a hit, going 1-for-2 with a solo home run.

Sophomore pitcher Brandice Balschmiter went the distance against the Chanticleers, pitching 5 1/3 hitless innings.

She gave up only one earned run on three hits in seven frames, while striking out seven.

UMass finally ended its losing streak Saturday afternoon when it beat DePaul 9-2.

The Maroon and White had been the victim of a three-game losing skid, falling to Baylor, Florida and Georgia Tech over a short span of two days.

The Minutewomen are now gearing up to head to the Sunshine State for the yet another tournament – USF Adidas Spring Break Invitational in Clearwater.

Dominic Poli can be reached at dpoli@student.umass.edu.

Minutewomen upset No. 16 Terriers

Zwick, Typadis and Drown get job done against BU

By Kevin Dooley
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's lacrosse team learned well from the Holy Cross Crusaders.

Three days after the Minutewomen built a 5-0 lead only to surrender six unanswered goals in the second half to the Crusaders in a 7-6 loss, UMass erased a two-goal halftime deficit against the No. 16 Boston University Terriers Saturday, scoring six unanswered goals itself in the second frame to upset BU 13-11 at Nickerson Field.

UMass	13
BU	11

"This is by far the best team effort I have seen from this team so far," UMass coach Alexis Venechanos said. "Beating a team like BU is tremendous. It requires a total team effort. You couldn't do it with only one player."

Junior attacker Melynda Zwick led all scorers for UMass (1-1) with four goals. In just two games this year, Zwick has already matched her season total in goals from the 2006 campaign with five.

Zwick was helped by junior attacker Kathleen Typadis and midfielder Holly Drown, who each turned in hat-trick performances Saturday. With her three tallies, Typadis is now just four goals shy of getting her name on UMass' all-time Top 10 scoring list. The junior attacker has now posted at least one point in 26 consecutive games, a streak which goes back all the way to April 2005 during Typadis' debut season.

"Melynda Zwick and Kathleen Typadis have been working hard all season and everyone else on the team was trying to open up opportunities for them," Venechanos said. "And when they have opportunities they put them away."

Redshirt senior goaltender Lauren McCarthy, who Venechanos pointed to as one of the main reasons UMass was able to hang onto the victory Saturday, has donned the Maroon and White for nearly half a decade and couldn't recall a time when the Minutewomen played any better overall as a team than they did Saturday.

"The defense played as a unit in the second half and was able to keep BU from getting good, open shots," McCarthy said. "Everybody fought hard today for groundballs and we were able to get our transition going to help the offense. It's an amazing feeling to get the win as a team. Out of the five years I've been here this was the best we played as a group and it is rewarding to be able to get the win."

UMass' first win of the 2007 campaign snapped both the Terriers' 22-game winning streak at Nickerson Field and its own four-game losing skid to BU which dated back to March 17th, 1999. The BU faithful hadn't seen their team lose at home since April of 2004.

Venechanos' squad travels up north to the Green Mountain State Wednesday to battle the Vermont Catamounts in the third game of a four-game road trip. Game time is slated for 3 p.m.

The Minutewomen entered the second half down 7-5 after allowing BU to score twice to conclude the opening frame. The Terriers' two-goal lead quickly evaporated, as UMass unleashed an offensive firestorm to take an 11-7 lead.

"The start of the second half was what we were trying to work on," Venechanos said. "With what happened at Holy Cross, we knew how important those first 10 minutes were. And I'm happy how the team responded."

Even though the Terriers did little to advance the ball in UMass territory for the first 15 minutes of the second stanza, BU refused to go away. The Terriers registered three of the next four goals scored to cut the lead to 12-10 before UMass tallied its last goal of the game to put the game out of reach. UMass outscored its traded goals, BU lit up the scoreboard twice, only for the Minutewomen to respond right back with two goals of their own to tie the score at 5-5. The Minutewomen fell behind by two goals one last time before their second-half scoring frenzy.

Kevin Dooley can be reached at kdooley@student.umass.edu

KAREN WING-GOLLEGIAN

Junior defender Julie Papaleo recorded two ground balls and two turnovers in Saturday's 13-11 upset over Boston University.

Bay State rivals 8-4 in the second half.

Saturday's contest got off to a torrid start, as the teams combined for seven goals in the first 10 minutes of action.

BU had three two-goal leads erode throughout Saturday's contest. The Terriers jumped out to a 2-0 lead before UMass came back quickly to tie the score. After the two schools

Styles by Deborah & Co.
HAIR SALON & SPA
65 University Drive Amherst 549-5610
Paul Mitchell Signature Salon
FREE HAIRCUT with any Color Service (of $70 or more)
$15 OFF any Color Service (of $70 or more)
$5 OFF any Haircut
Also specializing in chemical relaxing, pressing, and styling ethnic hair.
Coupons may not be combined
Offers expire 3/30/07

Attention First-Year Students:
Have you completed MyStudentBody?
It's easy, interesting ... and required for all first-year students. To avoid a registration hold, you must take and pass the course no later than Monday, March 12th. For instructions, go to the University Health Services website,
www.umass.edu/uhs
Center for Alcohol and other Drug Abuse Prevention

Check out
WWW.DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM
for more sports action.

If You've Got a Plan We've Got a Van!
POTTER'S AUTO & TRUCK RENTAL
Insurance Replacement Rates
FREE PICK-UP
• Direct Billing to Insurance Company
• Locally Owned & Operated
• 7 & 15 Passenger Vans
• UMass Purchase Orders, MHEC Rates
Potter's Collision Repair
Collision Repair & Glass Replacement
at North Amherst Motors
78 Sunderland Rd., North Amherst, MA
(413) 549-RENT (7368)
www.pottersauto.com
(One mile North of UMass on bus route)

This UMass canine owned the Sudoku!

He's like Lassie only way better at math. Also, he may or may not have opposable thumbs.

Submit your pics of crossword and Sudoku completions to: collegiancomics@yahoo.com

Free Delivery to UMass
Menu Online @ andiamo.cc

			5		3
		1				3
8	3						2	4
		3	9		5	7
7	6						8	9
		4	7		1	2
1	9						3	2
		2				6
			1		6

Find all of today's puzzle solutions online!

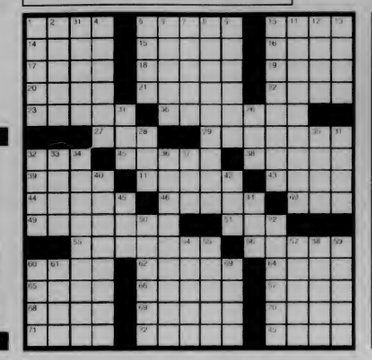
ACROSS
1 Fast letters
5 Kid of early TV
10 Put on
14 Fabled loser
15 Type of committee
16 Mimicked
17 Ludwig or Jennings
18 Bare minimum
19 Gross
20 Shelter a crook
21 Valletta's nation
22 Round dance
23 Bucolic valleys
25 Model positions
27 Pal gently
29 Prepared
32 6-pack muscles
35 Surgeon's tool
38 City near Helena
39 Takes to court
41 Seraglio
43 Actor Sean
44 Woodland path
46 Dismally
48 Pronounce
49 Erte's forte
51 Author Follett
53 "Love Is a Battlefield" singer Pat
56 Like a twangy voice
60 Dumbstruck
62 Munchausen, e.g.
64 Infielder Rose
65 "Persistence of Memory" painter
66 Cattike
67 Lo-cal
68 Handworking insects
69 Schon and Helh
70 Writer Bagnold
71 Screen material
72 Advantage
73 Brief time spans

DOWN
1 In the future
2 Brazilian dance
3 Sprite in "The Tempest"
4 Bombarded
5 Composed
6 Fruit of the mind
7 Biblical verb
8 Shared top billing
9 Fuel rating
10 Over the hill
11 Antitheses
12 Backside
13 Writer Ferber
24 Pitcher Maglie
26 Taxi
28 Scrooge exclamation
30 Sicilian volcano
31 Refuse to believe
32 Nora's dog
33 Hamilton's opponent
34 Passenger safeguards
36 Subverts intentionally
37 Bullpen stat
40 Main course adjunct
42 Jan. honoree
45 Writer Deighton
47 Hankering
50 Beach shelter
52 City near Marco Island
54 Dion's songs
55 Father of "Good Times"
57 Paris river
58 Top room
59 City SW of York
60 Curtis, Sandler
61 Decrease in strength
63 Viper collective

WWW.DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Two Down...

Brazilian Dance



Submit your comics!
collegiancomics@yahoo.com
Submit your classifieds!
(413) 545-3500

QUOTE OF THE DAY

"Hope never abandons you; you abandon it."

-George Weinberg

TWO DUDES By Aaron Warner

CHECK IT OUT, DUDE... I HOOKED THE SHOWER UP TO A KEG SO BEER COMES OUT OF IT!
IMAGINE: BATHING IN LIQUID PARADISE!
DUDE, BUT WHAT IF I WANT A LITE BEER?
DUDE, WAIT TILL I SHOW YOU THE TOILET!

THE FAMILY MONSTER By Josh Shalek

I'd feel guilty if I was responsible for sending people to die at war
Most of us would
That's why I wouldn't put myself in a position to make those decisions
Makes you wonder about the people who do want to make those decisions

A COLLEGE GIRL NAMED JOE By Aaron Warner

MY MOM CALLED JUST AS I WAS WALKING OUT THE DOOR.
SHE WAS ASKING ABOUT COLLEGE AND MOMS DO, WHERE THEY ASK YOU STUFF, BUT IN A WAY THEY'RE TELLING YOU WHAT YOU SHOULD DO.
SO WHAT'S SOMETHING YOU SHOULD DO?
BUY AN ANSWERING MACHINE.
www.cartoonstudies.com

WELCOME TO FALLING ROCK NATIONAL PARK By Josh Shalek

Have you ever seen something so odd you can't categorize it, and so you forget you even saw it?
Did that happen to you?
I can't remember

HOROSCOPES

aquarius Jan. 20-Feb. 18
College is a farm from which you can harvest a lifetime of vegetables.

pisces Feb. 19-Mar. 20
Spend your evening making a giant fort out of legos. Talk about rewarding!

aries Mar. 21-Apr. 19
Most people work way to hard, but not you...you don't really do anything at all.

taurus Apr. 20-May 20
Remember, if you do not get enough sleep your eyes will fall out of your head.

gemini May 21-Jun. 21
Your roommate's shoes are unlucky and unattractive, stop borrowing them.

cancer Jun. 22-Jul. 22
Everything is relative: denchers are better than no teeth at all.

leo Jul. 23-Aug. 22
Maintain your swagger no matter what...you've got a great butt.

virgo Aug. 23-Sept. 22
Give people a second chance, they might be saving the best of their zest for round 2.

libra Sept. 23-Oct. 22
Trust your gut, especially if you have the flu.

scorpio Oct. 23-Nov. 21
There's a thin line between grunge and stink, but you make it work.

sagittarius Nov. 22-Dec. 21
Cheese is a lot like the human race-it's best when you mix different kinds.

capricorn Dec. 22-Jan. 19
You hide feelings under a hard candy shell. Release them like spray from a skunk.

Your life has grown stagnant and repetative, fight the monotony by submitting a horde of comics for the masses to enjoy.

collegiancomics@yahoo.com

MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN MARKETPLACE

ANNOUNCEMENTS

Global Express Tours Spring Break Montreal Party Weekends from $99 Complete bus, hotels, & clubs. Montrealexpress.net 781-979-9001

APARTMENT FOR RENT

Hobart Condos 3 bedroom, hardwood floors, study area in basement. Cable telephone Internet access) in all bedrooms and study. NOW SHOWING for JUNE and SEPTEMBER. NO FEES. www.amherstlincolnrealty.com 253-7879

APARTMENT FOR RENT

Brandywine Apts. Now Leasing, 1&2 bedroom apts. Leases begin Jun, July, Aug or Sep. First Come First Serve. Get Them while they last. www.brandywineapts.com stop by or call 549-0600

Center of town, 1,2,3 bedrooms hardwood floors. NOW SHOWING for JUNE and SEPTEMBER. NO FEES www.amherstlincolnrealty.com 253-7879

EMPLOYMENT

Bartending $300/day potential. No experience necs. Training provided. 1-800-965-6520 ext.162

EMPLOYMENT

Camp Takajo, Naples Maine, Picturesque lakefront locations, exceptional facilities. Mid June thru Mid August. Counselor positions in tennis, swimming, land sports, water sports, tripping, outdoor skills, theatre arts, fine arts, music nature study. Call Camp Takajo at (866) 356-2267 Submit application online at www.takajo.com A rep will be on the Campus Center Concourse Mon. March 5th, 2007

Rent us your ears! Listening Experiments $10/hr English must be your first language. Email: phonetics_lab@linguist.umass.edu voicemail: 545-6837

EMPLOYMENT

Retail Sales/ Mattresses- Energetic, communication skills required. Oppurtunity to grow with company. Flexible PT. Do not call – Stop by 328 College St. RT. 9 Amherst Discount Mattress

Winter/ Spring positions available. Earn up to $150 per day Exp not required. Undercover shoppers needed To Judge Retail and Dining Establishments. Call 800-722-4791

Dell Campus Reps Needed Promote a top 30 company to gain real-world business & marketing experience! www.repnation.com/dell to apply.

HOUSE FOR RENT

Northampton Cathedral ceiling, skylites, hardwood floors, 4-5 bdrms. 9/1 $1950. 413-730-6660

SERVICES

Do you know your rights as a student, tenant, worker & consumer? The student Legal Services office can help with your questions. Stop by at 922 Center Center or call 545-1995

Call Someone who really cares. Birthright of Amherst Area 549-1906, 1800-550-4900 24 hour hotline Free Pregnancy test 233 N. Pleasant St. Amherst www.birthright.org

SERVICES

Pregnancy Testing, HIV Testing, Birth Control, and Emergency Contraception. STI Screening and Treatment. Affordable and confidential. Tapestry Health, 27 Pray Street, Amherst. 548-9992. www.tapestryhealth.com

TRAVEL

Global Express Tours Spring Break Montreal Party Weekends from $99 Complete bus, hotels, & clubs. Montrealexpress.net 781-979-9001

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

SPORTS MONDAY

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 26, 2007 SPORTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

A fight to the end

UMass defeats Saint Louis in nail-biter

BY MATT BETTENCOURT

On a night when the shots weren't falling for anyone donned in maroon and white, it was the player stuck in the team's worst shooting slump that led the Massachusetts men's basketball team to victory over Saint Louis, 53-50, in front of a sold-out crowd of 9,086 fans at the Mullins Center Saturday night.

UMass	53
SLU	50

UMass guard James Life, who had missed his last eight shot attempts and was mired in a dismal eight-game stretch – hitting only 22 percent (13-50) of his shots – nailed a key 3-pointer from 29 feet away to vault UMass into a 49-47 lead with just over a minute to play, and drained two free throws with 15.6 seconds to put his team up for good.

"That was a good college basketball game," UMass coach Travis Ford said. "It wasn't a pretty game, but we're excited we won. They literally took away our post, our driving lanes. We never got comfortable against their defense."

The Minutemen (21-7, 11-3 Atlantic 10) kept pace with Xavier for first place in the A-10, thanks to the Musketeers' 75-67 win over Dayton Saturday.

UMass prevailed despite the stingy defense of the Billikens (17-11, 7-7 A-10) that held Stephane Lasme and Rashuan

See M.BASKETBALL on page 7

Life ends slump in heroic final minutes

BY DANNY PICARD

Senior James Life is a shooter, nothing more, nothing less. But in the seven games prior to Saturday night's 53-50 win over Saint Louis nobody was colder than the Massachusetts men's basketball team's biggest 3-point threat.

Life even struggled mightily against the Billikens, but with 1:38 remaining in regulation, Life hit his only shot from the field – a deep 3-pointer that put UMass back on top at 49-47.

"He had that look in his face the last couple minutes of the game," UMass coach Travis Ford said. "Good players make good plays, and he made a good play. I think it says a lot about him because he has not made some shots lately."

"Some" doesn't even describe it. Since the Jan. 24 loss to Rhode Island in which he had 19 points on 6-for-12 shooting (5-for-10 from behind the arc), Life had shot a dreadful 27 percent from the field (12-of-44) and 23 percent from 3-point range (8-of-35).

Life finished the game with five points, and shot just 1-for-7 from the field. His only shot was the 3-pointer that sparked a last minute UMass win.

"That's the best shot he had all night," Ford said. "If he's

See LIFE on page 7

Junior Gary Forbes scored a team-high 13 points in Saturday night's 53-50 win over the Saint Louis Billikens at the Mullins Center. The Minutemen play their home finale on Wednesday night against La Salle before finishing the regular season against Saint Joseph's on Saturday.

Minutemen fall to Hofstra

Pride get revenge from last year's NCAA Tournament

BY JON PELLMAN

HEMPSTEAD, N.Y. – Hofstra succeeded in exacting revenge on the Massachusetts men's lacrosse team Saturday. After defeating the Pride for their only two losses a season ago, the Minutemen fell, 8-6, at Stuart Stadium.

UMass	6
Hofstra	8

"I thought we played with a lot of heart and a lot of intensity and I think we came out strong like we wanted to," said senior Brett Garber, who recorded his first two goals of the season against the Pride. "Both teams played real hard, both teams played outstanding, but at the end we just didn't capitalize on all of our opportunities."

UMass returns to Amherst this week for it's home-opener at Garber Field Saturday. Game time is set for 1 p.m. between the Minutemen and Yale.

See M. LAX on page 7

"You need to score more goals than six if you're going to win a college lacrosse game against a really good team like Hofstra," UMass coach Greg Cannella said afterwards. "We'd like to get a little better shooting performance, but a lot had to do with Hofstra and their goalie played really well."

Danny Orlando made the first start of his collegiate career against the Minutemen. He finished the day with 13 saves, compared to nine by UMass' Doc Schneider.

After a relatively low-scoring first half, both teams settled in during the third quarter and the scoring picked up. The Minutemen entered the game's second half with a slight advantage, 3-2.

That lead didn't last long, however, as Hofstra's Ryan Miller sn

Senior captain Brett Garber scored two goals for the Minutemen in Saturday's 8-6 loss to the Hofstra Pride in New York.

Cory Quirk (right) scored one goal in UMass' 5-3 win over Northeastern on Sunday. The Minutemen swept the Huskies over the weekend.

Mass Attack sweeps series with Huskies

BY JEREMY RICI

BOSTON – Only time will tell if it's too little, too late or just enough at the right time, but the Massachusetts hockey team did everything it could to stay in the Hunt for home-ice advantage in the Hockey East playoffs, gaining all four possible points from the Northeastern Huskies (12-16-5, 8-15-5 Hockey East) over the weekend.

The Minutemen (14-13-5, 10-9-5 HEA) now control their own destiny in the race for the fourth and final home playoff series. Trailing Boston College by two points with two games remaining, UMass (12-14-5, 10-9-5 HEA) must win both of its games against Boston University next weekend to secure home-ice advantage for the first round of the playoffs.

UMass	2
NU	0
UMass	5
NU	3

The Minutemen have already clinched a first round playoff series, but a sweep of the season series against the Huskies would give UMass the tiebreaker over Boston College.

"It was a real determined effort by a group of guys that were underestimated," UMass coach Don Cahoon said. "Because of the circumstance [with injuries] there were no set positions. We had a variety of line combinations."

The team's swing man, senior Mark Matheson played both center and defense at different points in the game as Cahoon shuffled all of his lines.

"Mark Matheson again amazed me with his ability to be able to move the forward position in defense seamlessly," Cahoon said.

Starting goaltender Jon Quick

See HOCKEY on page 7

Rematch ends with shoe on other foot

Rob Greenfield

HEMPSTEAD, N.Y. Hofstra men's lacrosse players didn't have a good offseason.

They left the La Valle Stadium lacrosse field on May 20 with the nails wedged firmly into their coffins. Their season ended on a last-second goal. The most gut-wrenching and cruel way to fall short of the place you worked so hard to get to.

And who was responsible for Hofstra's heartbreak?

Your Massachusetts Minutemen. They buried Hofstra's pride with a timely goal by freshman Jim Connolly, who capped the tremendous effort with the game-winner, his career-high fifth goal on the day.

And who did the Pride open the 2007 season against?

Your UMass Minutemen. And they took it to the men in maroon with an 8-6 victory on Saturday. There was vindication all over the happy faces popping out of the white jerseys when the final horn sounded, but the No. 10 Minutemen were on the losing end this time.

"We knew that they had something on their backs against us," a solemn captain Brett Garber said after the game. "We obviously took something away from them [last season]."

That "something" was their season. Connolly took Hofstra's year away with just under two minutes left in overtime on May 20. So there was plenty riding on it for Hofstra, which came out with enough intensity for both teams.

"They came out flying," captain Dan Whipple said. "We knew they were going to do that and I thought we matched it well early. They carried on the whole game. They were playing with heart and soul for the whole game."

For Hofstra, bulletin-board material wasn't in short supply. The Pride went 17-2 last season and both losses came at the steady hands of the Minutemen. Hofstra had lost its last two season openers to the Minutemen. UMass took it to the Pride exactly one year ago today at Garber Field, dealing No. 19 Hofstra an 11-7 loss to open things up.

The Pride won 17 straight games before the Minutemen ended their season the way they started it.

So this is the first we've seen of the Hofstra team since the playoff loss last season. It has a new coach and lost two 80-point scorers to graduation, but has returned with a new sense of urgency.

"There was so much on the line for Hofstra and us," UMass coach Greg Cannella said. "It's the first game and you want to start off the season well."

Both teams played well enough to win on Saturday. Intense play forced some early turnovers, and the score was knotted at one when the first quarter concluded.

Hofstra took the lead with a goal 4:19 into the second quarter and Garber tied things up on the day1 tied it up with a laser into the top-left corner about eight minutes later. The Minutemen put the pressure on the Pride with goal after goal, but the body shots didn't get the knock-out punch UMass was hoping for.

The Minutemen tied it at six

See GREENFIELD on page 7

Check out tomorrow's MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN for coverage of:
• Swimming and diving
• Track

UMASS MAKE WAVES IN BUFFALO | PAGE 10 EXHIBIT SHOWS BI-CULTURAL EXPERIENCE | PAGE 5

THE MASSACHUSETTS

DAILY COLLEGIAN

NEW ENGLAND'S LARGEST COLLEGE DAILY EST 1890

SNOW : HI: 38 LO: 24 WWW.DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 27, 2007

Mayer rolls out smart, sexy hits

Mayer gets 'Comfortable' inside Mullins

BY ALLIE ROTH

Lately John Mayer has moved towards channeling a rock-star and guitar idol persona. His new album "Continuum" and John Mayer Trio's "Try!" have already solidified his place as a musician with some serious guitar skills and an uncanny ability to write remarkable songs.

Last night at the Mullins Center, Mayer took this high-end rocking sound to the stage. For better or for worse, he showed the audience what high skill guitar solos are, and how to include these elements in the middle of fan favorites. Even at the beginning of the show, it was obvious that Mayer was moving away from "Room for Squares" and towards something more grandiose.

To open up the show, Mayer walked on stage to a beam of red lights. He played "Vultures," a song found on both "Continuum" and "Try!," followed by another John Mayer Trio song called "Good Love Is On the Way." Each song thereafter seemed to

See MAYER on page 6

John Mayer enthralled a thousands of fans last night with a passionate performance inside the Mullins Center. Mayer played songs form his newest album "Continuum," along with a mix of some his older albums, like "Room for Squares."

US college students' loans investigated

New York's Attorney General Andrew Cuomo believes students are being directed to lenders who provide incentives to schools' financial aid administrators.

BY DEBBIE FRIEDMAN

The relationship between colleges and the student loan industry has come under investigation by New York's Attorney General, Andrew Cuomo, who has launched a nationwide inquiry into apparent unethical practices behind school's bank preferences when refering to alternative loans.

"My office is seeking to ensure that students are being steered toward lenders offering the most competitive rates, not those who offer the best perks to schools of financial aid administers," Cuomo said.

In November 2006, six major lending firms were asked to submit information regarding their financial situations with universities. As of Feb. 1, 2007 the investigation has expanded to include nearly 60 universities, both public and private. The Attorney general's office has sent inquiries to these universities asking them to formally explain what factors lead to a lending company being placed on their preferred lender list.

According to a press release issued by the Office of the New York State Attorney general, eight schools in Massachusetts have received these requests. However, the names of the schools were not released.

"Financial Aid Services at UMass-Amherst and the University's General Counsel office at the Amherst campus are not aware of any request from the New York Attorney General," said Edward Blaguszewski, Director of the University of Massachusetts News Office.

As far as the allegations are concerned, Blaguszewski maintains that this University is not a preferred lender school.

"Financial Aid Services says it works with up to 30 lending institutions per year. It discusses a variety of lending options with students, and it fists options in its printed brochure and on its Web site," Blaguszewski explained in an e-mail.

On the Web site however, only seven lending companies are listed including Citibank, Bank One, Nellie Mae and AFC Campus Door.

A New York Times article published Feb. 1 reported that last year alone, $17 billion dollars were taken out in private student loans. Therefore, being placed on a preferred lender list gives loan companies a huge advantage.

UMass junior, Lauren Thorsell said that her parents were given many options by UMass's financial aid department but chose to use their credit union when it came time to taking out a loan.

"For parents who have a first time college student, recommending a company would probably be helpful. As long as you are not forced to do anything, I don't see the problem," Thorsell said.

The Director of Financial Aid at UMass, Kenneth Burnham could not be reached for further comment on this civil investigation, and there is no word on when this case should conclude.

Ringtones created to save endangered animals

BY SUSAN MONTOYA BRYAN

ALBUQUERQUE, N.M. — Amid the cacophony of cell phone ringtones these days, add these: the click-click-click of a rare Central American poison arrow dart frog, the howl of a Mexican gray wolf and the bellows of an Arctic beluga whale.

An environmental group is hoping that the more people hear these sounds from threatened animals, the more they'll wonder where they came from – and question the fate of the animals and birds that make them.

"The point here is education and inspiration," said Michael Robinson, a conservation advocate at the Center for Biological Diversity's office in Palos Altos, N.M.

Like other activist groups, the center is looking to the immediate attention cell phones can bring to its cause. Already, some 24,000 people have downloaded the rare rings for free from the center's Web site.

Four in five young-age Americans have cells phones, and that number is expected to keep growing. By 2008, as many as 30 percent of wireless users are likely to forego their land lines and nearly all cell phones will have Internet capabilities, according to a study by the New Politics Institute.

"With the ringtones, this is the tip of the iceberg," said Peter Leyden, director of the institute, which studies the impact of cell phones – what he and others call "mobile media" – on political and social campaigns.

Take for example the efforts of U2 front man Bono. He got thousands of people to sign up for the ONE Campaign, a nonprofit dedicated to fighting global AIDS and poverty, by asking fans to send a text message during the band's concerts.

Amnesty International also uses text messaging to send action notices to members around the world.

Kattin Vercles, executive director of the Nonprofit Technology Network and a coordinator with MobileActive.org, said there's a lot to be learned as campaigns – both political and social – try new ways to connect with people.

"Nonprofits have been using online tools such as Web sites and e-mail to get out a message, but the handwriting is on the wall as far as the possibilities for mobile devices to be added to that mix," she said. "Mobile phones are just another piece of the equation. There is still so much room or experimentation."

Peter Galvin, a co-founder of the Center for Biological Diversity, came up with the idea for the free ringtones of endangered and rare species as a way to educate people – especially the younger, technologically savvy generation.

In addition to the wolf and the whale, there are ringtones from several species of frogs from around the world, a few South American birds and North American owls.

The poison arrow dart frog will be added to the list once Galvin gets back from Panama. He spent three days in the jungle, patiently listening for the calls of the tiny frog.

It took similar efforts to capture the sounds of other rare animals.

Some at the center say the howl ringtone might be one of the only recordings of the Mexican gray wolf in the wild. Biologists began releasing wolves on the Arizona-New Mexico border in 1998 to re-establish the species in part of its historic range after it had been hunted to the brink of extinction in the early 1900s.

Local food systems discussed in first part of lecture series

BY CARA GRANNEMANN AND EDEN UNVER

Yesterday marked the beginning of the University of Massachusetts Amherst Environmental Institutes Spring 2007 Lecture Series.

Dr. Molly D. Anderson, an independent science consultant and research coordinator of the Farm and Food Policy Project, spoke at the first of a four-part series yesterday in the Cape Cod Lounge in Student Union. Her talk covered issues about the future of global and local food systems.

The Farm and Food Policy Project is an alliance of family farm, sustainable agriculture, rural, public health, anti-hunger, environmental, faith-based groups around the country.

Anderson began by discussing how "Society needs to pay more attention to the life cycle of food products and high-quality, affordable food for those who need it most."

She mentioned the Catch-22 that goes along with buying high-quality and local foods – price. She points out that the people who benefit most from highly nutritious food are the ones who are unable to afford them. Many cheaper foods, she said, are higher in calories in fat, therefore explaining how "the percentage of young people that are overweight have tripled since 1980," according to Anderson.

Senior and Food Science major Pawel Domiejczyk agreed with Anderson.

"I think any of the food used should be a balance between the most nutritous and the most cost effective," Domiejczyk said. "Local or non-local, whatever is more nutritional."

Locally grown food isn't always easily accessible. According to Anderson's statistics, food on average travels approximately 1700 miles. She also added that imported food products in the U.S. have risen from 7 percent to 9 percent from 1992-2000. But Anderson also explains that many people are unaware of the full benefits of having locally grown food.

In terms of produce contamination, like the E. coli outbreak in spinach earlier this year, the affected crops would have been easily contained and removed had they been locally grown Anderson said.

According to Massachusetts Farm to School, a program that assists schools to serve locally grown produce, 21 colleges, universities, and private schools across Massachusetts are currently housing locally grown food. UMass is slowly being included in that number with the Franklin Dining Common advertising its servings of locally grown food. Not only is the University acknowledging the benefits of locally grown food, but so are some of its students.

"I am aware [of locally grown foods] and try to pick the sticker [on food] that is not from the other side of the world," said senior Dan Levison, Food Science Major, at the lecture.

Upcoming lectures for the series, which will be held every month until May, will discuss the environmental benefits of genetically engineered foods, buttermilk and nutrition and environmental impacts of federal food advertising.

"It [the lecture series] really has to be a topic that can bring a lot of people from different disciplines together," said Sharon Tracey, special projects coordinator of the UMass The Environmental Institute and lecture coordinator. "This is a lecture that speaks to students."

The next lecture will be held on March 13 dealing with the topic of Genetically Engineered Foods followed by two more lectures on April 3 and May 1.

Dr. Molly Anderson, researcher at the Farm and Food Policy Project.

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian
CXVII
Issue 91

113 Campus Center University of Massachusetts Amherst, MA 01003
• 413-545-3500 •
• Fax 413-545-3699 •
www.dailycollegian.com

Editor in Chief Eric Athas
Managing Editor Rob Greenfield
Business Manager Dan Conti
Production Manager Amanda Allen
Night Supervisor Sherd Wolnik
Advertising Manager Jameson Porter
Advertising Production Molly Eggleston
Arts & Living Editor Morgan Rousseau
Comics Editor Adam Stagin
Editorial Editor Tucker Merrick
News Editor Matt Belliveau
Sports Editor Danny Picard
Sports Editor Jon Pelland
Circulation Manager Jeff Pentz
Finance Manager David Valade
Assistant Operations Linda Wallack
Assistant Advertising Nicole Paddester
Asst. Arts & Living Tim McCall
Asst. Arts & Living Sydnes Town
Assistant News Anna Dolianitis
Assistant News Nicole Boonjakuakul
Assistant Editorial Brendan Hall
Assistant Sports Jeremy Rice
Web Editor James Hale
Photo Editor Toan Trinh

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian is published Monday through Friday during the University of Massachusetts calendar semester. The Collegian is independently funded, operating on advertising revenue. Founded in 1890, the paper began as Aggie Life, became the College Signal in 1901, the Weekly Collegian in 1914 and the Tri-Weekly Collegian in 1956. Published daily since 1967, the Collegian has been broadsheet since January 1994. For advertising rates and information, call weekdays between 8:30 a.m. and 3:30 p.m.

Production Crew
On staff today

NIGHT EDITOR
Matt Belliveau

COPY EDITOR
Jamie Mason

PRODUCTION SUPERVISOR
Tiffany Van Langen

Write for news!
news@dailycollegian.com

Quality of FDA food safety inspections languish

By Andrew Bridges and Seth Borenstein
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The federal agency that's been front and center in warning the public about tainted spinach and contaminated peanut butter is conducting just half the food safety inspections it did three years ago.

The cuts by the Food and Drug Administration come despite a barrage of high-profile food recalls.

"We have a food safety crisis on the horizon," said Michael Doyle, director of the Center for Food Safety at the University of Georgia.

Between 2003 and 2006, FDA food safety inspections dropped 47 percent, according to a database analysis of federal records by The Associated Press.

That's not all that's dropping at the FDA in terms of food safety. The analysis also shows that there are 12 percent fewer FDA employees in field offices who concentrate on food issues.

Safety tests for U.S.-produced food have dropped nearly 75 percent, from 9,748 in 2003 to 2,455 last year, according to the agency's own statistics.

After the Sept. 11 attacks, the FDA, at the urging of Congress, increased the number of food inspectors and inspections amid fears that the nation's food system was vulnerable to terrorists.

Consumer safety officers inspect spices at the port of Baltimore. The FDA conducts about half the number of food inspections than it did three years ago.

Inspectors and inspections spiked in 2003, but now both have fallen enough to erase the gains.

"The only difference is now it's worse, because there are more inspections to do — more facilities — and more food coming into America, which requires more inspections," said Tommy Thompson, who as secretary of the Department of Health and Human Services pushed to increase the numbers. He's now part of a coalition lobbying to turn around several years of stagnant spending.

The Bush administration's budget request for 2008 includes an additional $10.6 million for food safety at the FDA; the lobbying group said 10 times that increase is needed. Even though the FDA increased its overall spending on food between 2003 and 2006, those increases failed to keep pace with rising personnel costs.

"It's not just outsiders like us who have been watching it for a while. People who worked in the Bush administration are coming out and saying the agency is not working at its current resource levels. It just can't manage the job," said Caroline Smith DeWaal, director of food safety at the Center for Science in the Public Interest, an advocacy group.

Members of Congress also have renewed the focus on the safety of the nation's food supply amid highly publicized recalls sparked by food poisoning, including last year when E. coli was found to taint fresh spinach sold coast to coast. That outbreak killed three people and sickened nearly 200.

Secretary of the Department of Health and Human Services Tommy Thompson explains that the reason for decrease in quality of FDA inspections is due to an increase demand of inspections of facilities and food coming into the U.S.

The latest big recall involves peanut butter believed tainted with salmonella, a bacterium found in feces that can cause severe diarrhea. The outbreak has sickened at least 329 people in 41 states since August, federal health officials say.

Food safety experts say it would be impossible to know whether increased numbers of inspectors and inspections would have prevented the outbreak, linked to Peter Pan and Great Value brands made by ConAgra Foods Inc., or other recent food poisoning scares.

The FDA had last inspected ConAgra's peanut butter plant in Sylvester, Ga., in February 2005 and had found no problems, agency spokesman Michael Herndon said.

FDA food inspectors look for filth, decomposition, adulteration with pesticides and industrial chemicals and the illegal use of color or food additives, according to the agency. Firms that produce high-risk foods more susceptible to contamination, such as fresh fruit and vegetables, are supposed to be inspected every year or two.

Inspections also look for sources of possible contamination, such as flies. For instance, inspectors are asked to count flies, as well as how often they land on a food product. They're also told to look for any open doors or damaged window screens that could allow the insects to flit back and forth between the product and, say, a toilet, floor drain or garbage can, according to agency documents.

The shrunken ranks of inspectors have left the nation once again vulnerable, especially to problems in imported food, Thompson and others said. Doyle, whose center studies ways to improve food safety, called the nation's growing appetite for imported foods the "coming threat."

The United States last year imported about $10 billion more in food, feed and beverages than it exported, according to Census figures. Even as imports grow in volume and diversity, the number of FDA inspections is shrinking; agency inspectors physically examined just 1.3 percent of food imports last year, about three-quarters as much as in 2003.

The FDA, meanwhile, says it is concentrating its efforts on areas where the potential threat to the public's health is greatest.

"We're applying resources to targeted areas. So in a way, it's not a matter of 'Are you inspecting one out of 100 or 10 out of 100?' The real issue is if you can define risk. Are you applying the 10 inspectors to the 10 areas of concern? Then it's essentially you're covering 100 percent of your problem, which is not covering 100 percent of the universe," FDA commissioner Dr. Andrew von Eschenbach said.

FDA inspectors, for example, visited the ConAgra plant on Feb. 14, a day after the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention told the agency it suspected the company's peanut butter was the source of the outbreak.

For one member of Congress, that's not good enough.

"We are reacting to crises rather than preventing or minimizing them," said Rep. Rosa DeLauro (news, bio, voting record), D-Conn., chairwoman of the House subcommittee that oversees the FDA and its budget. DeLauro said she worried food inspections were becoming a "stepchild" of the regulatory agency.

Von Eschenbach said the agency's food safety system can be reactive but is aggressive nonetheless.

"What you saw with the spinach and certainly what you saw with the peanut butter, is when we see those signals we're going to act to protect the public health," von Eschenbach said.

In the meantime, the House Committee on Energy and Commerce is investigating the adequacy of the FDA's efforts to protect the nation's food supply. Rep. Bart Stupak (news, bio, voting record), D-Mich., said.

A recent Government Accountability Office report noted that most of the $1.7 billion the federal government allocates to food safety goes to the Agriculture Department, which is responsible for regulating about 20 percent of the food supply. The FDA, responsible for most of the other 80 percent, gets about 24 percent of the total.

When the FDA finds violations with a food product, it asks companies to voluntarily fix any problems. The agency also can request a company to recall a product or it can ask that a product be seized by law enforcement.

The Agriculture Department said this month it also would switch to a "risk-based" inspection plan for plants that process poultry, pork and beef. Plants that make products with a high risk for contamination, like hamburger, and that have had past violations would face greater scrutiny. Others than make less risky products, like cooked, canned ham, and have clean records would be inspected less.

Shiite vice president of Iraq narrowly escapes assasination

By Brian Murphy
Associated Press

BAGHDAD, Iraq — Iraq's Shiite vice president narrowly escaped assassination Monday as a blast ripped through a government meeting hall just hours after it was searched by U.S. teams with bomb-sniffing dogs. At least 10 people were killed.

Adel Abdul-Mahdi was slightly wounded in the explosion, which splintered chairs, destroyed a speakers' podium and sent a chilling message that suspected Sunni militants can strike anywhere despite a major security crackdown across Baghdad.

As U.S. forces sealed off the area around the municipal building, investigators grappled with the troubling question of how the bomb was smuggled into the ministry of public works, a seven-story structure with crack surveillance systems from its days as offices for Saddam Hussein's feared intelligence service.

The bomb, possibly hidden in the podium, went off moments after the minister for public works finished a speech in the third-floor chamber, witnesses said. Abdul-Mahdi had made a welcoming address a few minutes earlier, raising speculation the bomb could have been on a timer-trigger that missed the vice president by sheer luck.

Among those killed were several ministry employees, police said. More than 25 were wounded, including the public works minister, Riyad Ghanb.

Abdul-Mahdi smothered by his bodyguards in an instant suffered minor leg injuries and was hospitalized for tests, his office said.

See IRAQ on page 3

African refugee children abused

By Vincent Mayanja
Associated Press

KAMPALA, Uganda — More than 50 percent of children in refugee camps around Africa's volatile Great Lakes area have experienced some form of sexual abuse, a humanitarian group said in report Monday.

World Vision said more than half of about 1.4 million children displaced by a string of wars in one of the world's most violent regions were victims of sexual exploitation and needed urgent help.

"The forms of abuse experienced include rape, attempted rape and threat to be raped," according to the report, titled: "The future in our hands: Children displaced by conflicts in Africas Great Lakes Region."

"Children are compelled to have sex in exchange of money to go to hospital, to buy food, even sometimes for their families," added the report released in Ugandan capital Kampala.

"The high vulnerability of girls to sexual abuse and exploitation has roots in the social-cultural relations between male and females," the report added.

In some communities, people even believe that having sex with virgins helps cure deadly HIV/AIDS, which is sweeping across the region.

World Vision Regional Coordinator Valarie Kamatsiko said the situation would worsen if the authorities did not step in.

"Sexual abuse was prevalent among displaced children in the camps that were targeted (for study). The situation of children in these camps is precarious," she said at the launch in Kampala.

The report, compiled from data collected in camps in the Democratic Republic of Congo (DRC), Burundi, Tanzania, northern Uganda and Rwanda, said widespread poverty made children vulnerable to abuses.

The study was compiled from 304 questionnaires that were distributed to children between 10 and 18 years in age.

It said fellow refugees, security forces, teachers, medical and aid workers are to blame for many of the abuses.

"Data indicates that it is people known to children, people with whom they closely interact with on a daily basis and trust that sexually abuse them," the report explained.

World Vision pressed regional governments to introduce policies to protect and help displaced people, to ensure that children have access to basic health care and education, and to reunite and integrate children with their families.

Millions of people have been killed and millions more displaced by years of unrest in the Great Lakes, the theater for Rwanda's 1994 genocide, Burundi's civil war and the 1998-2003 conflict that embroiled the DRC and drew in a dozen other African nations.

Meanwhile in northern Uganda, a two decade conflict between the government and Lord's Resistance Army (LRA) rebels has displaced about two million people, 80 percent of them women and children.

Marijuana buckets delivered

PHILADELPHIA — Workers at a downtown boutique called police after unexpectedly receiving two buckets of marijuana worth $90,000. Police were called to Fusion on Saturday after employees received the two packages of marijuana totaling about 20 pounds.

"Officers received a call that the manager of the store had received a package from FedEx and when he opened it there was a five-gallon bucket inside," said Capt. Chris Werner. Inside that bucket was 10 pounds of marijuana.

Both packages were from California and addressed to the store.

Looking for business experience??

The Daily Collegian is currently seeking qualified applicants to fill the positions of:

- Business Manager
- Assistant Business Manager
- Distribution Manager

RSOs:
Put Your Advertisement in the Daily Collegian!
RSOs receive a discounted rate for advertising. Advertise your group's events at low cost.

NYC's largest homeless shelter closing

By Michael Hill
Associated Press

CHESTER, N.Y. — Every day, a bus picks up homeless men off the streets of New York City and takes them 70 miles out into the countryside to a shelter, in a practice that has been going on quietly since the Depression, when homeless people were called Bowery bums and fresh air was the solution to just about all ills.

The 1,001-bed Camp LaGuardia is New York City's biggest homeless shelter — and the only one surrounded by farms and trees — but its very existence is probably a surprise to many lifelong New Yorkers.

Now the city is closing it down.

While 73-year-old Camp LaGuardia was born of good intentions and what was then considered progressive thinking, some activists disapprove of it as an out-of-sight, out-of-mind answer to the city's homeless problem.

City Hall says its decision to shut down the shelter was more practical: It is too far outside New York, and the city wants to move away from temporary shelters to subsidized housing.

The shelter opened in 1934 on the site of a women's prison. It was named for the city's exuberant mayor, Fiorello LaGuardia, a year later. The place was expanded greatly in the 1980s with the growth of New York's homeless population.

Old jail cells in the main brick building are still used to house older, frailer men, though most of the men are assigned a cot and a squat locker in dorm-style rooms in other buildings, some of which were built in recent decades. The rooms and halls are careworn, and some of the paint is peeling.

In the camp's early decades, the homeless men could rustle up summer work in the kitchens at the big Catskills-style hotels, grow potatoes on the camp's farm, even relax over beer at the tap room — yes, a tap room — though they were not allowed to get drunk.

Nowadays, some of the men work day jobs at places such as a chicken-plucking plant operated by a community of Hasidic Jews.

Homeless men who seek shelter from the city and are assigned to Camp LaGuardia can refuse, and go back on the streets, or they can seek a transfer. Once they are here, they can come and go from the 300-acre camp, but there are not many places to go. The commercial center of Chester, a town of about 12,000, is more than a mile down the road.

About a third of the men leave on the daily buses to New York City for medical appointments, housing searches or family visits. Some work in the city.

Mohamed Chakdouf, 58, lost his job as a concierge at a big New York City hotel, separated from his wife, became depressed, fell behind in his rent and was evicted. By 2001, the Moroccan immigrant was camping out in a park in Manhattan. Breathing problems made winters tough on the street, and he came here by bus one night in January 2005.

"First day I woke up I'm surrounded by mountains," he recalled. "I say, OK, I have no problem here, but it's so far away."

Isolation is a big complaint among homeless men used to urban hubbub. Richard Berlly said he considered staging a fistfight to get kicked out. Celso Trinidad said the 90-minute bus ride back to the city is tiring, so he stays in his room studying maps of the city, hoping to get another job driving a bus.

"It's not a fun place," he said.

Patrick Markee of the Coalition for the Homeless in New York said the big problem with LaGuardia is that it is so far from the city. That makes it difficult for the men to look for jobs and housing or take advantage of other services.

Though LaGuardia was started for the right reason, Markee said city leaders found the shelter especially useful when homelessness soared in the '80s.

"The city expanded Camp Laguardia and made it into the largest homeless shelter in New York in part to sort of keep the homeless out of sight of the general population," Markee said. He commended Mayor Michael Bloomberg's administration for "doing the right thing" by closing LaGuardia.

With a homeless population estimated at 35,000, the city wants to spend LaGuardia's $19 million budget on longer-term solutions such as subsidized housing with social services.

Robert Hess, city commissioner of homeless services, said the goal is to reduce the shelter population by at least two-thirds by 2009.

Hess said local opposition to the camp was also a factor in the decision to close the place. For decades, people have complained about LaGuardia men wandering into town, getting drunk, urinating in public and, once, slashing a woman.

Michele Murphy, a mother of two children who lives next to the camp, said: "You're afraid to have them play outside because you're not sure."

Still, some men have turned themselves around at LaGuardia.

Chakdouf has become a full-time liaison between homeless people and caseworkers. Berlly, 60, has become a full-fledged caseworker at LaGuardia.

A year ago, all of Camp LaGuardia's beds were full. The last new arrival came in November, and the camp is now down to about 360 men. The last will leave by May 31.

Orange County is buying the place for $8.5 million, perhaps for a senior-citizen dining center, voting machine storage, an office park or affordable housing for workers in the county, which is undergoing a housing boom.

Remaining staff members like Berlly are looking for other jobs. He is still interested in social work.

"I'm going to miss it," he said. "It's like a family, almost."

Mohamed Chakdouf and Richard Berlly work at Camp LaGuardia in Chester, N.Y. The Camp has housed homeless men in the state since 1934 and is closing this year as the city turns away from temporary shelters.

Iraqi vice president wounded in explosion

IRAQ from page 2

He was later released.

"I heard a big explosion," said Jagrid Ali, a public works ministry employee who attended the gathering to honor outstanding workers. "I fell to the ground, and the whole place was filled with black smoke."

Suspicion for the attack fell on Sunni insurgents, who have waged nonstop bombings and attacks against Iraq's majority Shiites for cooperating with the U.S.-backed government.

Adbul-Mahdi is one of two vice presidents. The other, Tariq al-Hashemi, is Sunni.

An Associated Press photographer witnessed security forces hustling a man from the building, but there were no immediate reports of any arrests.

"The aggression against you this day is further proof that these groups are doing their best to destroy Iraq's unity," said a message to the vice president from Abdul-Aziz al-Hakim, who heads the country's largest Shiite political group.

Even as Iraqis learned of the attack, word was coming from neighboring Jordan that their president, Jalal Talabani, was facing more medical tests.

Talabani, from Iraq's Kurdish north, was taken to Amman after falling unconscious Sunday. His son, Qubad Talabani, said the 73-year-old leader was "up and about" and blamed the episode on fatigue and exhaustion.

But his private physician, Dr. Yedkar Hikmat, would give no timetable on his discharge, saying only that rumors Talabani had heart problems were "categorically wrong."

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice has stressed the importance of making rapid progress on the oil law as a way to strengthen unity in the deeply fractured nation and encourage foreign investment in one of OPEC's former heavyweights.

Iraq's Appeals Council, meanwhile, agreed to review the case of Saddam Hussein's deputy, Taha Yassin Ramadan, who was sentenced to death by hanging Feb. 12 for his role in the massacre of Shiite civilians in 1982 following an assassination attempt against the former Iraqi leader.

Shiite Vice President of Iraq Adel Abdul-Mahdi escaped death after fleeing a bomb, which exploded inside a government meeting hall.

Taste of Japan
ESCAPE FOR AN EVENING TO JAPAN

Sample the Traditional Flavors of Japanese Cuisine and Explore the Culture of Japan

WEDNESDAY
FEBRUARY 28, 2007
FROM 5-8 PM

EXCLUSIVELY AT THE OAKROOM
WORCESTER
DINING COMMONS

Soba Noodle Salad そばサラダ
Japanese wheat noodle with sesame dressing
Tonjiru Miso Soup 豚汁
With vegetables and tofu or pork
Sushi-roll 巻き寿司
Cucumber with avocado & eel with fish eggs
Tempura 天ぷら
Mushrooms, sweet potato, zucchini or shrimp
Teriyaki Wild Salmon 鮭の照り焼き
Wild Salman baked with homemade teriyaki sauce
Nikujaga 肉じゃが
Potato, peas, and onions
Gyu-Don 牛丼
Bowl of rice topped with seasoned beef
Oyako-Don 親子丼
Bowl of rice topped with boiled chicken & eggs
Tofu-Don 豆腐丼
Bowl of rice topped with tofu and eggs
Sticky Rice ご飯
Yakisoba Noodles 焼きそば
Ramen noodles stir-fried with sweet-spicy sauce
Greenie グリーニー
Brownie made with white chocolate and green tea powder
Fruit Kanten フルーツ寒天
Seaweed gelatin with fruit

Traditional Japanese Music
Origami Demonstration (paper art form)
Japanese Trivia Contest with prizes

UMass Dining Services partnering with IPO International Programs Office/ Jones Library/ Japan National Tourist Organization
Coordinated by UMass student Kaoru Kikuwada

DINING SERVICES UMassAmherst

Guest Chef Series
Tues., Feb. 27th 5 to 9 pm in the Berkshire DC
LOOK WHO'S COOKING DINNER FOR US!

Ralph Coughenour
Executive Chef
of UNH C.E.C.

As part of a friendly wager between UMass & UNH Dining Services for the NCAA Quarterfinals, Ralph will be serving UMass, UNH Student Favorites

Come savor the sweet taste of victory & enjoy the fun!

Menu:
- Chicken Chesterfield
- Roast Wild Salmon
- London Broil
- Warm Brownie Pudding
- Chocolate Cheesecake Bar

DINING SERVICES UMassAmherst
GO UMass!!! Atlantic 10 Champion
www.umass.edu/diningservices

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

EDITORIAL OPINION

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 27, 2007

"I may not agree with what you say but I will defend to the death your right to say it." Voltaire

EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Making 'natural' a sin

Brad Leibowitz

Do you like sex? Do you enjoy a drink from time to time? How many of you out there remember those pubescent high school days in which all you could think about was how to sleep with your crush from across the class? In most cases, those fantasies stayed just that, fantasies. But then college came to your rescue. Now, the hottie across the class who you are eyeing, due to alcohol in most cases, seems somewhat attainable.

Now don't get me wrong, for a decent amount of high school students, alcohol did play a big part in the social lubrication and advancement of your pubescent cause. However, as time progressed, a difference between then and now emerged: back then, when you told your friends that something would or did happen with your across the class crush, they laughed at you…now this is not so.

On any given night, for some odd reason, to go along with the advancement of age, it seems to me, comes the easiness of a hookup. I have done a tremendous amount of…self investigation into this topic and I still have not reached a conclusive reason to why this is. However, I do have a theory:

Growing up, we as Americans are raised to believe all the wrong things when pertaining to sex and alcohol. Our parents, from a young age, gave us bibles and torahs (and whatever other religious book you prefer), which invariably preached how bad sex and alcohol are. One of the first stories we are all told is that of Adam and Eve in the Garden of Eden.

As you recall, once Adam and Eve tasted the apple, they were immediately ashamed of their bodies and had to put clothing on to cover up. This, above all things in westernized thought, is considered to be the first and highest moral sin. The basic lesson: nudity and sex are to be scorned upon.

Alcohol though, is the oddity of the pair. Unlike sex, alcohol, specifically wine, is considered a sacrament in westernized thought. Both major western religions have become known to incorporate wine into their spiritual rituals (Christianity: Jesus' blood as wine & Judaism: the Kiddush). Nonetheless, over the years, the sacrament has become tarnished by the over saturation of different varieties of alcohol, especially foreign alcohol.

For the vast majority of us, we grow up with a premature shadow placed over our heads concerning alcohol and sex – one we had no part in making.

When our ancestors came in search of a better home, they brought with them European wines. Over the years, wanting to continue drinking wine, they built vineyards of their own. However, once the mass importation of other liquors drowned the market, the traditional wine makers, now losing money, attempted to mark drinking as a cultural sin (obviously, with the exception of their sacrament). The basic lesson: any alcohol which isn't based in westernized sacrifice is a sin to drink.

So, for the vast majority of us, we grow up with a premature shadow placed over our heads concerning alcohol and sex – one we had no part in making. In this fact, I find myself an outsider.

When I was 12 years old, my parents, on New Years Eve, got me drunk (later explaining its better to learn around those who love you instead of those who don't). To go along with this, the topic of sex was always open for discussion in my house. Essentially, I was raised with a European upbringing in which I could have a drink and talk about sex openly, without any weight of guilt prematurely placed upon my shoulders.

Here in lies the problem. The American upbringing, in the belief that abstinence is better than knowledge, has failed its young people. When the vast majority of young people finally get to experience alcohol and sex, they do so irresponsibly because of the prior guilt placed on them. Somewhere along the way, for whatever reason, be it uptight parents or religious teachings, our culture has turned two natural things into two un-natural sins.

Drinking and sex, although different functions all together, are in one important way exactly the same. Both require the user to learn a lesson. Good sex comes from learning, practice makes perfect. On the same level, knowing your alcohol limits comes from learning your body and how much you can drink. Don't get me wrong, I'm not advocating irresponsible use of both, but I am also not advocating the teaching of abstinence.

In both cases, moderation is the best tool. Sex and alcohol should not be looked at as a sin and scorned upon – rather they should be viewed as natural and embraced for what they are.

Back to my original point. When we reach college, we go through so much disappointment in both categories because our culture has denied us the basic tools in both applications. By the time we get here, sex and alcohol, should be as fluent a language as the one with which we were raised in, sadly they are not.

So for now, continue eyeing that crush and hopefully make something of it. This way, when your parents ask you what you learned in school, you can simply tell them, "what's natural."

Brad Leibowitz can be reached at bleibowi@student.umass.edu.

Save the celebrities

Debbie Friedman

Britney shaved all the hair off her head. A week before that, Anna Nicole was found dead. In January, we learned alcoholics anonymous had a new red headed member. And I'm pretty sure Nicole Richie hasn't seen food since last December. The girls of Hollywood are falling apart. And all I can wonder is, how did this start?

It seems like every day, another female celebrity bites the dust – their demise documented through shocking photos which splash throughout the media, leaving us no choice but to look. And once we look, our eyes are glued to the sights, as if the girls were cars smashed together on an I-A Freeway. It's clear our time could be better spent on other things. But questioning the attraction ordinary people have towards celebrities is a waste of time, since the answer is simple. Celebrities are fascinating. The extravagance of their lives is exciting and our culture is drawn to the drama because it allows us to escape from more pressing matters of reality.

So instead of examining the obvious, we should think about why all of this is happening, and how idolizing absurd standards of beauty has hurt the average female just as much as the female celebrity.

Stars of the past could keep their personal struggles hidden from the public eye.

Women are under extreme pressure in this culture. All of us are bombarded by images of beautiful, thin, models and made to think we ought to look the same way. That is why when we see glamorous women like Britney, they become instant idols and sometimes even role models.

However, it's easy to forget that their physical and personal images undergo serious airbrushing; therefore making it impossible to attain the ideal they project. It's also easy to forget that they are never fully satisfied with what they have or how they look either. We forget these things until events unfold to dissolve each cleverly crafted facade.

Yet, no matter how many times we are reminded of how imperfect these women are, nothing changes. The troubles facing Anna Nicole were eerily similar to what plagued Marilyn Monroe over 45 years ago. And many other female celebrities of the past have also suffered from eating disorders, reckless behavior, messy marriages and substance abuse. The only difference is that stars of the past could keep their personal struggles hidden from the public eye.

At any rate, our failure to learn from these cautionary tales over the years, has allowed the distorted perception of female celebrity to remain. As a result, all females from Jane Doe to Paris Hilton have been, and continue to be hurt.

For the average woman, the negative consequences that have resulted take form in tightly fastened constraints, which force us to agree to the standards of superficiality. These constraints also shred to pieces our self esteem and discourage many of us from spending our time, money and energy on our interests and passions, instead of teeth whitener and tanning passes.

The consequences on female celebrities are what lead to the incredibly public meltdowns, which are occurring more and more everyday. These meltdowns happen because being labeled a role model is too heavy a burden to put on the backs of women like Britney, Nicole, Anna and Lindsay. Women like them are not role models. They aren't supposed to be either. These women are entertainers, and while we should enjoy their talents (or lack there of in some cases) we can't expect them to lead us anywhere. Instead, we need to look elsewhere for leaders and role models. Just outside the Hollywood spotlight, lie a tremendous amount of remarkable women who merit our respect and attention.

Women like Nancy Pelosi, the first female speaker of the house, deserve to be called a role model. The sole female columnist for the New York Times, Maureen Dowd, is someone who is worthy of our attention. Strong single moms who work day and night to support their kids are the true inspirations. Female professionals who are our doctors, lawyers, teachers and professors are all something to aspire towards. These kinds of women have the ability to carry the weight of the term role model on their backs. If we choose to follow, they can lead us somewhere great too.

For things to really change, we need to distinguish between looking up to someone, and looking at someone. Obviously our culture will always look at celebrities, and that's okay. But when it comes to looking up, we've got to re-direct our gaze. If not for ourselves, than at least for Britney.

Debbie Friedman writes on Tuesdays. She can be reached at dbfriedm@student.umass.edu

Our neglected heroes

Lauren Modisette

When healthy veterans return to the United States, they come home to family, friends, and the lives they used to live. Those veterans who return scar free are obviously the lucky ones. But for some, returning to the states is where the discomfort continues.

Unfortunately, many veterans who return from an overseas conflict find themselves registered into transitional housing much like the now infamous Walter Reed Army Medical Center. Recently it has been brought to the public's attention that the living conditions in one of Walter Reed's buildings are far from comfortable.

In building 18 at Walter Reed, the living conditions were observed and recorded. Of these were the lack of snow and ice removal from the sidewalks, the repair of a broken elevator, and mold growing on the walls of state rooms and behind wallpaper.

Since many veterans are amputees the issue of snow and ice could be devastating to their health. Also, many of the handicap accessible ramps are too steep for patients who have had limbs amputated. This is a greater inconvenience because now they are forced to find alternative routes to accomplish everyday tasks like filling prescriptions and seeking psychological help. Along with the mold there is also shower rot and an infestation of mice and cockroaches.

Has the Walter Reed issue hit a nerve that is forcing the government to better themselves in the eyes of their citizens?

Some patients also noted that their military supervisors didn't make them feel like patients at all. Complaints of emotional abuse were made by amputees who said that their supervisors made them feel lazy and weak because they had difficulty getting around.

It has also been observed that there is a very high stress rate in the 700 outpatients that Walter Reed accommodates.

Once news of this dilemma reached President Bush he was quoted on saying "find out what the problem is and fix it."

While these problems are being addressed, some others are as well. But, they are not to benefit the young veterans anticipated to return. The Department of Veteran Affairs now has a $25 million budget to construct and repair the transitional housing in the United States. The pentagon didn't anticipate there to be such a surplus of injured soldiers. Even so, these funds aren't being directed to the young veterans that will someday return to the states.

Jim Nicholson, Secretary of Veteran Affairs, visited Veterans Village in San Diego, California to discuss the plans for the transitional housing. Most veterans in this facility returned to the states somewhere between one and three decades ago.

According to NPR's Andrea Hsu, tens of thousands of Iraq veterans are expected to return to the states. At this time there are still several hundred homeless Vietnam veterans residing in the nooks and crannies of America. This $25 million budget isn't aiming towards making the lives of Veterans more comfortable, it's simply to accommodate more of them.

The unfortunate part of this is the morality of these facilities. It isn't a surprise that the surface of the Walter Reed problems have had an impact on other issues involving those who have served our country. The big question is: why have they waited so long?

If the government knew that they had the funds to provide a couple thousand more beds for our veterans, why haven't they done it already? Has the Walter Reed issue hit a nerve that is forcing the government to better themselves in the eyes of their citizens? They aren't even addressing the living conditions of these facilities they are simply trying to pack more people into them.

As said before, these facilities are mainly for those who have serious battle injuries like amputations, brain, and spinal injuries. Alcohol and drug abuse among veterans is also at a high rate which these services accommodate and attempt to alleviate. But if these heroes are suffering and in pain, then why aren't we trying to make their lives easier and more comfortable?

Walter Reed knew about their mouse problem and addressed it this past October. Even after addressing it the issue still isn't solved. Sure, they say that the rodents are now at a manageable level, but why haven't steps been taken to completely solve this problem?

Even if you are against the war in Iraq, there still should be a place in your heart for the soldiers who are fighting in our name. Every single one of them has or will see things that you and I never will. Death and destruction is an everyday hazard they experience. If the government values their participation and devotion to our country, they would provide them with a higher quality of transitional housing and do everything possible to make their lives more comfortable. It seems like such a simple thing and it's disgusting how the government seems to be disrespecting them.

Lauren Modisette can be reached at lmodiset@student.umass.edu.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

LIKE HE WASN'T EVEN THERE

Rob Greenfield's article entitled "Controversial Doctor speaks at UMass" was severely disappointing. It might as well have been titled "Controversial Doctor is Controversial," because there was virtually no reporting on what Dr. Diggs said at his lecture here.

I'm sure that he made some substantial claims that could be held up for public scrutiny by the audience of this paper. The article offers us no arguments of his with which to agree or disagree. This leads me to believe that the article could have been written whether or not the author actually attended the event, so what's the point?

Here's my last title suggestion: "Scary Social Conservative Who Said Some Scary, Socially Conservat ive Things at Some Places Said Some Things Here, Too."

Ian Callahan
UMass Graduate Student

AN APOLOGY IS OWED

After thoroughly enjoying the UMass lacrosse team's championship exploits last spring, I was equally engaged by the women's soccer team success last fall and the football team's advance through the playoffs, capped by an exciting and well played championship game against Appalachian State. I eagerly awaited my weekly Sports Illustrated to enjoy reading some richly deserved national accolades for Coach Brown, Steve Baylark and the entire Minutemen squad.

Instead, all SI reported was the rioting on campus after the game. What an embarrassment and disappointment. Do these knucklehead rioters have any clue about the damage they inflict upon their own and UMass' reputation by engaging in this kind of criminal behavior in these circumstances? A chance for the school, its athletes and students to shine in the national spotlight but instead, all we hear are more ZooMass jokes.

Have any of these individuals apologized to anyone for the damage they've caused and the disrespect they've shown to the entire UMass community? For starters, what if The Daily Collegian set aside space in this newspaper for the rioters who can summon the courage, to publicly apologize to Coach Brown, the football squad and the UMass community.

Or perhaps the University or the prosecutor's office should make a dose of good old fashioned public pillory a condition of their discipline. Well not quite. Anonymous public apologies should be acceptable, but public apologies of some sort are in order as a starting point to repair the damage done to the rioters' own self respect and the University's reputation.

Paul M. Toulouse
UMass Alumnus

WOULD OTHERWISE BE UNKNOWN

With so many different RSO's, private clubs, and sports teams on campus it's hard to really recognize any one. I had the honor and privilege this past weekend to watch Mission: IMPROVable compete in the Boston Improv Bean Pot.

The five players that UMass sent went head to head against all of the top schools in New England. True underdogs with little outside support, (most schools brought a fan club with them) they went on to win the whole tournament, not mention both Misch Whitaker and Natlie Basemen taking home MVP's for the tournament (Do you know how hard it is to be a funny woman in comedy?)

Now as cast member of Improv Boston I can honestly say that it was my time in Student Valley productions that shaped me as a comedian. Steph, Dave, Pat, Misch, and Natalie—I'm very proud. UMass should be too.

Shannon Connolly
Proud as heck

E-mail: editorial@dailycollegian.com

SUBMIT A LETTER OR OPINION

Fax: 413-545-3699

Mail: Letters to the Editor 113 Campus Center Amherst, MA 01003

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

ARTS & LIVING

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 27, 2007

ARTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

In between homes, art is created

Art exhibit livens watercolors

NICK MIRELLO
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

The room is small, but spread with a sense of space and freedom, a stowed away place even the artist was first unable to locate. And yet the gallery is of no consequence, for the art inside it fits with a calmness; finding solace with simplicity Mercedes Taylor's new exhibition "Desplazimientos" reveals both a resolution in the work and the artist.

The three titles on exhibition at the Augusta Savage Gallery "Tension," "Fusion," and "Connections" compute in visual success exactly what they mean. The art is both revealing in its visual journey as it is in its emotional. If one were to read the generic overview of the exhibition, one would follow the familiar story of an artist found out of her element (returning to Argentina).

The artist reveals that this is much the case, that in fact what she went through is very common It is in that understanding that the art created itself. In conversation, Taylor is a very kind presence She is calm, engaging and most importantly comfortable with her state as both a person and an artist. But Taylor admits her present state is a result of struggle and inner work. This is where the artwork "Desplazimientos" finds its intrigue.

The title work begins with "Tension" where the use of deep red watercolor as well as sharp edges helps explain the inner predicament at hand. The two bare white blotches amongst the red portray simply the great divide and anxiety felt by the artist. Through a stream of paintings one approaches "Fusion" where the artwork begins to shift with various shades of blue watercolor.

While playing with the emotions implicit in color the artist also uses water as a medium to alter and create images. And finally the epiphany; which is discovered in "Connections" (where the artist literally sees herself) allows both the viewer and the artwork to feel resolved, free of the tension so clear in the beginning stages.

When done viewing, the spectator much like the artist feels a sense of ending and resolution. Its natural stream of emotion and realizations is entirely organic. The artist reveals that she made only two conscious decisions when starting this work: the size of the paper and the medium (watercolor). The rest, Taylor says, was following where the art wanted to go. She warmly says that it was a "natural unconscious flow" that came out of her and what resulted is "Desplazimientos." This art exhibition is both interesting and visually appealing. It's worth noting that it's quite abstract work, yet the guidance through titles tends to help one understand the artist's intentions.

With constant ridicule and tension amongst the world today, where so much is left unresolved, it's pleasant to witness an abstract art exhibition that begins and ends, answering the questions for itself and only asking the viewer to witness it. There is something to be said in resolutions, especially in art and the artist. The exhibition will be showing from Feb 13 to March 13 in the Augusta Savage Art Gallery

Nick Mirello can be reached at nmirell@student.umass.edu

Mercedes Taylor developed her series of watercolors in Buenos Aries, Argentina. Taylor's abstract images capture her bi-cultural experience and her yearning for home.

Whitaker takes Best Actor

"...And God, God who believes in us all. And who's given me this moment, in this lifetime, that I will hopefully carry to the end of my lifetime into the next lifetime. Thank you." - Forest Whitaker at the end of his acceptance speech for the Best Actor award at Sunday night's Oscars. For in-depth coverage of the 79th Academy Awards, check out the tomorrow's Arts and Living section of the Daily Collegian.

SEAA points to pros of nat'l organizations

The Cape Cod National Seashore is protected by environmental conservation efforts. The great Outer Beach in Cape Cod, is home to miles of marshes, ponds and diverse wildlife species.

BY CLAYTON BROSTOWIN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

So you want to help protect the environment, but you don't know where to start. Today the Students for Environmental Awareness and Action (SEAA) has created a comprehensive guide to the various groups, organizations, and governmental agencies that are glad to have more supporters and are working to protect the environment.

Some of these organizations are more widely known than others, for instance: the Audubon Society, Greenpeace, and the National Park Service are known, at least by name, to almost anyone who lives in the United States. In addition there is the Sierra Club, Natural Resources Defense Council, Student Environmental Action Coalition, the Nature Conservancy and many more international, national and local groups. Each of these organizations has similar goals but also has different plans on how to accomplish their goals.

The Sierra Club is the oldest environmental group and was created before the National Park Service existed. According to Sierraclub.org, its mission is to "explore, enjoy, and protect the wild places of the earth" and if you are looking to go hiking, backpacking, skiing or participate in many other outdoor experiences as well as learn more about the environment, then the Sierra Club is your best choice.

The Sierra Club focuses on conservation which allows for recreation. Their founder, John Muir, was one of the largest activists for the creation of the National Park System. They are the only large environmental organization that manages recreational activities for their members. The club has more than a hundred different national and international trips, and there are local chapters of the Sierra Club all over the country that offer smaller excursions outdoors. They also have an e-mail newsletter and an online magazine. For those more concerned about protecting the environment they also have internships and accept donations.

The Natural Resource Defense Council (NRDC) is for those who are more concerned about the political aspect of environmental protection. The NRDC is one of the leading environmental groups in pursuing legislative and judicial action. They monitor environmental laws and regulations and send news updates to its email members. Often these newsletters ask for members to add their names to petitions, or ask members to call their state senators or one of the various environmental regulation agencies such as the National Park Service or the Environmental Protection Agency. After the issue has been resolved the next newsletter will describe how it went. Unfortunately the NRDC does not have any hands

See SEAA on page 6

"Reno 911!: Miami" funny, but fizzles in end

BY KATE BAUER
COLLEGIAN STAFF

In its own right, Reno 911! Miami is not a movie. A comedy series now in its fourth season, Reno 911! has been transformed into a feature length film, and has moved to Miami Beach. The same documentary style camera movements, the same cast and slapstick humor; they've been moved to the big screen. But it certainly doesn't mean all the fun's been removed.

The film is based around Lieutenant Jim Dangle (Thomas Lennon), and his miscreant crew of hapless police officers of the Reno Sheriff's Department's invitation to attend an annual Law Enforcement Convention in Miami Beach. But upon arriving at the convention the group is told their reservations have been lost and access to the convention is denied.

What exactly happens next is never made clear, but thanks to a kind of contamination, all visiting

The cast of "Reno 911: Miami" gather for a group cheer on the set of the farcical comedy, which is based on Comedy Central's television show "Reno 911!"

See RENO on page 6

Kerri Kenney-Silver stars as Deputy Trudy Wiegel in 20th Century Fox's "Reno 911!: Miami."

Mayer delivers half-enthused set

Mullins show left something to be desired from 'bored' musician

Last night the Mullins Center stage was filled with the musical stylings of John Mayer, whose performance offered little excitement and lots of the 'old' Mayer.

Oregon-born singer-songwriter Mat Kearney opened for John Mayer at last night's concert, offering romantic ballads and spoken interludes.

MAYER from page 1

reflect a formula of verse, followed by guitar solo, followed again by verse.

Before playing old fan favorite "No Such Thing," he expressed to the audience the boredom felt by the band because it was the end of the tour. Mayer's straightforward admission of that sentiment basically set the bar low for the rest of the show and, unfortunately, it never rose back up.

Much of old Mayer was present, though. He still tapped his foot wildly during the upbeat songs and throughout his guitar solos. He presented wacky facial expressions during each of the emotionally charged songs, like "I'm Gonna Find Another You" and "I Don't Trust Myself (With Loving You)." His behavior was expressive. He rocked out during the guitar solos and raised to the balls of his feet to further emphasize the lyrics "Someday I'll fly. Someday I'll soar. Someday I'll be something much more" in "Bigger Than My Body."

Three of the more inspiring songs from "Continuum" came out in a rapid fire. The one that stood out the most, "The Heart of Life," included a banter piece about thinking retrospectively when bad things happen. He shared with the audience that whenever things get hard, he just thinks of himself at age 80 and "99 percent of the time it's no big deal." He boasted "Pain throws your heart to the ground. I just turns the whole thing around. Not it won't all go the way. It should. But I know the heart of life is good" and the audience knew the exact outlook on life that Mayer was trying to convey. At the end of the song, Mayer teased the audience with one verse of "In Repair." Unfortunately, one unsatisfying verse is all the audience got. Then he continued with "Belief" and "Waiting on the World to Change," two of the most politically charged songs on the record. This set of songs just further cemented the fact that Mayer is living in the future with his new material, and to a large extent has left his "Room for Squares" persona behind.

Every good rock star needs an encore and that is just what Mayer did. He played three songs of varying origin: "Wait Until Tomorrow" from "Try," "Your Body is a Wonderland" from "Room for Squares," and "Gravity" from "Continuum." After an extended guitar rock session, the concert ended. The encore set list pointed to a movement towards placating all types of fans, but in the end it left many yearning for the days of acoustic audience sing-alongs.

Mayer has a lot of musical talent, and he showed every chance he got. His new songs are complex and wonderful — they should not be sent aside to any extent. But sometimes he has to know when to stop trying to channel Dave Matthews and learn how to evenly mix his old acoustic guitar style with the new complicated rock sound.

Mayer's opening act is what stood out about the concert the most. Mat Kearney is a singer-songwriter who blends together several musical elements into one fluid sound. Musically, Kearney writes songs that are guitar and piano driven with elements of hip-hop. Vocally, Kearney's echoes a mix of Chris Martin of Coldplay and the rap-rock style of 311. Throughout his set, he used spoken word interludes to break up the romantic lyrics and lovely songs.

He played songs from his album "Nothing Left to Lose." He opened with "Bullet," followed by "Can't Break Her Fall" and "Crashing Down," a song with the strongest element of hip-hop. A piano ballad called "All I Need" was the centerpiece of his set. Its romantic lyrics, like "Maybe it's all we got but it's all I need. You're all I need," had the large amount of couples who were in attendance swaying back and forth.

At the end of his eight song set, he played the song he's most recognized for, "Nothing Left to Lose." This song is a straight-forward romantic ballad and the only song in his set not to include a spoken-word interlude. This song, when compared to the seven other songs, displayed Kearney's range and ability to exist both as a commercially successful artist and a credible musician.

Allie Roth is a Collegian Staff writer, and can be reached at aroth@student.umass.edu

TV based cop flick falls short of superb and local police forces are trapped inside the convention center, and the Reno police force are hired to protect the city until an antidote is found. Hilarity, high jinks, and outrageous absurdities guarantee to ensue.

RENO from page 5

A spoof on the TV show Cops, both the Reno TV series and movie poke fun at the ridiculous, everyday civilians that populate Hicksville (and apparently swanky Miami), but unlike its counterpart, Reno also pokes fun at its clueless police force. Deputies Raineesha (Niecy Nash) and Trudy (Kerri Kenney) even bust out their own version of the eighteen-year show's signature tune, Bad Boys (1987) by Ian Lewis and the music group Inner Circle.

Certainly deserving of its R rating, most of Reno's comedy relies on the embarrassingly funny Lt. Dangle's short-shorts, rivaling those of Daisy Duke, give new meaning to a police uniform, and Trudy's attempt at "being more like" Raineesha results in some uncomfortable laughter. Yet some of Reno's sexual humor could be omitted, including a five-minute tracking shot that just seemed to be meant to include a lot of unnecessary horny guy and girl references.

Paul Rudd, The Rock, David Koechner (Anchorman's Champ Kind), Michael Ian Black (of VH1 Best Week Ever fame) and even Paul Reubens as Terry's dad make cameo appearances. Look close enough you'll even see Ian Roberts, better known as Mr. Spirit Fingers Sparky Polastri in Bring It On. But it's Rudd who steals the show, acting out his version of Al Pacino from Scarface, and it's a shame he's not in the movie long enough. Yet as much fun as the cameos are, they do take away from the 'reality' a bit.

Terry (Nick Swardson), a regular character from the show, shows up to deliver some of the best scenes in the movie, and the rest of the cast rounds out a mix of side stories that look like they were meant just to be fillers, but still deliver some guffaws.

There's certainly nothing special about Miami from the TV series, unless you count the fact that Trudy gets to play around with an Apache helicopter (with some disastrous and hilarious results). The story runs dry towards the end, but Miami delivers enough chuckle and chortles, as well as some heartfelt laughs, to keep you entertained. Stick around for the credits for some extended and deleted scenes — their worth the extra laughs.

Thomas Lennon and Robert Ben Garant play two sorry excuses for police officers in "Reno 911!: Miami," of which Garant directed and also co-wrote with Lennon.

Kate Bauer is a Daily Collegian staff writer, and can be reached at Kbauer@student.umass.edu

Green-groups are active in awareness on programs available for those who want to help.

SEAA from page 5

Greenpeace is well known for its controversial problem solving techniques. Almost everyone has heard about environmentalists placing themselves between a whale and a whaling ship. Greenpeace calls this "non-violent creative confrontation to expose global environmental problems" and that's really what it is.

Greenpeace was created in the early 1970s and instantly jumped into action. The organization sets itself apart from other environmental groups in a few ways. The first is that it is willing to occasionally break the law to do what it believes is right. Greenpeace also does not accept donations from any government or business agencies. While some of what they do may be considered extreme, there are approximately 2.5 million members who probably live ordinary lives like everyone else. If you want to get involved there are many different choices. Greenpeace has a newsletter similar to NRDC, and it also has internships. Another option that sets Greenpeace apart is that it offers Greenpeace Organizing Term, in which applicants spend a term with Greenpeace where participants learn about protecting the environment.

The National Park Service is a governmental agency whose mission is to "preserve unimpaired the natural and cultural resources and values of the National Park System for the enjoyment, education and inspiration of this and future generations." In this way, the Park Service is more similar to the Sierra Club or the Audubon Society than it is to other more political environmental groups. It's important to remember that all land operated by the National Park Service is owned by citizens of the U.S. and members have a say in what is done to the land.

Chances are you've been to a National Park or National Monument. If you've been to the Cape you might have been to the Cape Cod National Seashore, and if you've visited the Battle of Lexington-Concord then you've been to a National Monument. The larger parks are in the Western half of the country, and include well known names like Yellowstone, Yosemite, the Grand Canyon and many others. The national park service is always looking for volunteers, staff or tourists. The Park Service also asks for public opinion on many matters of how to manage parks, especially when major changes are being considered. Anyone can offer their opinion because the parks belong to everyone.

All of these groups have Web sites that have more information for those who are interested in getting involved. Also don't forget that while it is great to join and participate in national organizations, there are also state environmental organizations as well as groups on campus, such as the UMass Outing Club, MASSPIRG, Campus Climate Challenge, Umass Wildlife Society and many more.

This has been another weekly article written by a group member of Students for Environmental Awareness and Action.

Clayton Brostrom can be reached at dogdrop@hotmail.com

UMass resumes its reign in Atlantic 10

M. SWIMMING from page 10

lier in the day, Priest had to step in on the butterfly leg. Priest's time of 48.61 was the fastest butterfly leg in the race.

"I had to pick my teammates up," Priest said. "I wasn't expecting to go that fast in the relay but it's a great feeling. And I'm really happy I was a part of the relay."

Three Minutemen suffered from an unknown illness throughout the tournament and all of them returned to swim and score points for the Maroon and White.

Priest also stepped in on the 100-yard butterfly and finished in second place while Bromage took eighth in the event despite his ailment.

Senior Mike Herald spent time in the hospital but returned to score points in the 100-yard freestyle for the Minutemen.

Freshman Tim Smith recovered enough from the virus to take part in the 1,650-yard freestyle. He finished in eighth place and scored 11 points for the Minutemen.

"Except for the virus, we hit on all cylinders," Yarworth said. "I saw some of the toughest swimming that I've seen in my career out of this year's team. I'm so proud of how hard they worked this weekend and all season. They're a great representation of what we want as student athletes. Tim Smith came back from being in the hospital to finish eighth in the [1,650-yard freestyle]."

Junior diver R.J. Rappe finished second in the 3-meter diving event for the third consecutive season. La Salle's Karo Isajan won the event for the fourth straight time and won the tournament's Most Outstanding Diver award.

"R.J. wasn't on his game for the finals but you can always count on R.J. to give 100 percent," Yarworth said. "He's another guy whose hard work sets the tone for the rest of the team."

Hogue, a senior and two-year captain, and junior John Weaver led the Minutemen's breaststroke unit. Weaver finished in fourth in the 200-yard breaststroke, 2:07.61, and Hogue took fifth, 2:07.65. The duo combined to register 29 points for the Minutemen.

In the 100-yard breaststroke, Hogue took second place behind Saint Bonaventure's Scott Jordan. Weaver and senior Mike Cordes finished in sixth and eighth place respectively for UMass. Cordes also finished in seventh place for the Minutemen in the 100-yard butterfly.

"Mike Cordes swam well," Yarworth said. "He was a finalist in two events on Friday. It's hard when you've been swimming this long to keep going."

Freshman Mike Berthaume took fifth place in the 100-yard butterfly. Although the Minutemen didn't win the event, their four finalists in the event scored a combined 54 points.

Senior Greg Chartier, fifth place (1:52.79), and junior Derek Castellana, seventh place (1:54.55), were finalists in the 200-yard butterfly.

"Greg Chartier had a great meet," Yarworth said. "He finished with a personal best in the 200-[yard butterfly]."

Joe Melott can be reached at jmelott@student.umass.edu

Senior Jake Hogue finished fifth in the 200-yard breaststroke and second in the 100-yard breaststroke. The second-year captain was also part of the 400-yard medley relay unit that set a new school record with a time of 3 minutes, 21.23 seconds.

UM moves up a spot in A-10s for fourth-consecutive season eighth-place finish netted 11 points for UMass. Her best finish of the weekend came in the 400-yard individual medley. She took fourth place in the event with a time of 4:33.20, scoring 15 points.

W. SWIMMING from page 10

"[Demity], in the 400-[yard individual medley] destroyed her best time," Newcomb said. "It was 4:40 going in and she went 4:33, the second-best time in UMass history."

A strong performance from the UMass diving crew helped the Minutewomen maintain a healthy lead heading into the event's final day. Although Saint Louis freshman Anna Larson won the 3-meter diving event, unseating UMass sophomore Karen Upperco as champion, UMass took four of the top six spots.

Upperco led after the preliminary round and performed well but Larson was too much for the defending champion to handle. Upperco finished in second place in front of seniors Mary Jenkins and Melissa Pond who took third and fourth place respectively. Sophomore Sarah Horstmann finished in sixth place for the Minutewomen. The group's efforts resulted in 61 points for the Minutewomen.

"Our diving was huge," Newcomb said. "Those four women did a great job. Mandy Hixon is by far the best diving coach, period. She did an outstanding job with that group."

At times, UMass' position in second place was in jeopardy, but in the end, the small contributions made from swimmers who didn't finish in the top-eight were the difference. Volpe, sophomore Jackie Porter, senior Vanessa Hegauel and freshman Elizabeth Walsh combined for 18 points on Saturday.

Hegauel finished eighth in the 200-yard backstroke with a time of 2:10.75. Richmond swimmers finished in the top three spots in the event — junior Jessica Witt won with a time of 2:02.48.

Richmond sophomore Lauren Beaudreau broke two of her own A-10 records in the last two days of the meet. In the 100-yard breaststroke, Beaudreau's time of 1:01.81 broke the 1:02.2 mark she established at last year's event.

Earlier in the meet she tied her own record in the 200-yard individual medley at 2:01.7. And in her last individual race of the event, the 200-yard breaststroke, she broke another of her own records with a time of 2:14.87.

The A-10 named Beaudreau the tournament's Most Outstanding Performer. She won the tournament's Most Outstanding Rookie Performer as a freshman last season.

Joe Melott can be reached at jmelott@student.umass.edu.

Sophomore Christa Narus led UMass to its best finish in the A-10s since 2001 by setting a new school record in the 200-yard butterfly.

Junior Sam Demity submitted a personal best 4:33.20 in the 400-yard individual medley, good enough for fourth place in the event.

Tranfer Forbes proving worth

FORBES from page 10

placed back into his original starting role.

And it's done him and his team well. Forbes has averaged 17 points per game since Ford threw him back into the starting lineup eight games ago, leading to the Minutemen's end-of-the-season surge.

UMass didn't know how to handle big wins throughout most of the season, and it showed once again in a loss to lowly Temple just three days after it moved into first place in the A-10 for the first time since 1997-98 with a 77-55 win over Rhode Island nearly three weeks ago.

Forbes began to come into his own in the win over URI, scoring a game-high 22 points in what was the biggest game of the year at the time for UMass.

"[Gary] still has a long way to go," Ford said after the win over URI. "I think you're seeing glimpses of what he's capable of doing."

What you're seeing now is what's expected of Gary Forbes, and because of that the Minutemen have won four straight games for the only the second time this season. The last winning streak that long was broken up by BC, about the same time Forbes started to look like he didn't really care.

Well he cares now, and his steal on Saturday night was just one of the many examples of how Forbes has been a catalyst for UMass' "right things at the right time" motto.

UMass has Stephane Lasme and Rashaun Freeman. We all knew what they were capable of doing coming into the season. You knew what you were going to get out of the two senior captains on a nightly basis. What you didn't know was what you were going to get out of Gary Forbes.

Until now.

Danny Picard is a Collegian columnist. He can be reached at dpicard@student.umass.edu.

UMass coach Travis Ford and junior forward Gary Forbes have led the Minutemen into a tie for first place in the A-10 while going 7-1 over their last eight games. Forbes is averaging over 17 points per game over that stretch.

Katrina's PURIM
The needs of the people affected by Katrina are still momumental.
Thursday, March 1
7:30pm, Cape Cod Lounge
Student Union, UMass
Come for Purim fun.
Come for them.
DJ, Prizes for Costumes, Food,
Grogger and Maskmaking, Fundraising for Katrina relief.
sponsor: Hillel's Cultural Council
(5-College Hillel Megillah Reading: March 3, 7:30pm Amherst College Alumni House)

Seeking Advice?
Starting Mon. March 5th, The Daily Collegian will print an advice column. If you'd like some advice about anything, email Veronica Garrett, Advice Columnist, at vgarrett@student.umass.edu

Journalism Program Lecture Series
on Broadcast and the Media
The Historian as Journalist, the Journalist as Historian
A panel featuring award winning Boston Globe reporter and author Charles Sennott and BBC Senior Producer Kate Peters.
The Boston Globe BBC
Tuesday, Feb. 27, 5:30-7pm Cape Cod Lounge
Free Pizza & door prizes starting @ 5pm

FRUSTRATED?
PUZZLED?
DO YOU HAVE
A grade dispute?
Teacher, roomate or job concerns?
Billing problems?
overdue
...or any other University related problems?
THE OMBUDS OFFICE CAN HELP
(confidentially, of course)
Serving the students, faculty, and staff of the Umass Community
823 Campus Center
Office Hours: 8:00 a.m. - 5:00 p.m.
Telephone: 413 - 545 - 0867
fax: 413 - 545 - 9720
e-mail: ombuds@ombuds.umass.edu

Lasme, Freeman outmatched

M. BASKETBALL from page 10

him a little too jacked up to play offense when we were on him to stop the big kid. I thought he did a good job defensively."

Youyoukas finished with a team-high 18 points while Freeman and Lasme had a combined 13. However, the UMass big men grabbed 21 rebounds between them compared to the eight combined rebounds from Youyoukas and Husak.

SLU coach Brad Soderberg spent a lengthy amount of time preparing for Lasme and Freeman and he had his big guys sag off of them in order to help his team's rebounding chances. UMass' twin towers weren't their usual, dominant selves, but Soderberg had nothing but praise for Lasme and Freeman.

Senior Rashaun Freeman was held to just four points but recorded a game-high 12 boards in Saturday's victory over Saint Louis.

"We watched tape on them and they are incredible around the basket," Soderberg said. "We calculated that they've recovered 50 percent of the shots they've missed. We played North Carolina at Christmas time and they retrieve 44 percent of theirs and I thought that was good."

"I mainly just had our bigs sag off of them to give us a chance to rebound. Because if we start going out to guard them and the shot goes up, both of them are quicker than my four and five, so I don't want to give them the inside track to the rim. I was going to take my chances that they had to make a couple of shots from out there. The plan was fine."

NO TURNOVER PROBLEMS

The Minutemen had only nine turnovers in Saturday's game, something that Ford cited as a key to the victory. SLU is known for playing at an ugly, slow pace, so the emphasis on every possession increased significantly.

In last year's meeting between the two teams, UMass turned the ball over 22 times and lost a heart-breaker on the road. On Saturday, the Minutemen took care of the basketball and beat the Billikens in just the second meeting between the two teams.

"In games like this, when the score is going to be very low, possessions are going to be crucial," Ford said. "Every time we get a shot it's going to be very important. You don't need to limit you're shot attempts. The turnovers were key. They were a huge, huge part of it. If we had a few more then we would've been in trouble."

...UMass used a full-court press to try and speed things up, and SLU committed several turnovers (including a five-second violation in the first half and a traveling violation in the seco nd) from the press . . . Lasme and Freeman each got their fourth personal fouls on over-the-back calls . . . Freshman guard Ricky Harris tried to take opponents off of the dribble more on Saturday and got to the line once, going 2-for-2 from the stripe and 2-for-8 from the field . . . UMass' 53 points was the lowest point total of the season for the Minutemen.

Rob Greenfield can be reached at rgreenfi@student.umass.edu.

Streak ends, career begins with big win

By Michael King
Collegian Staff

It's probably the most significant win the program has seen in a few years. Not only did the Minutewomen (1-1) knock off a ranked opponent, they ended several droughts, marked a series of firsts and it was a special game for one UMass midfielder.

First off, Saturday's 13-11 win over No. 16 Boston University (0-1) was the first career victory for coach Alexis Venechanos. Coming to the university after a three-year apprenticeship as an assistant with perennial power Northeastern, Venechanos was looking for her first win after the team dropped a close decision to Holy Cross (1-0) on Wednesday.

But the fact that UMass defeated BU in Boston is also highly significant, as the rivalry between the two schools in the past decade had become decidedly one-sided. The Maroon and White had not defeated the Terriers since the 1998 season, losing four times over that period including the past three seasons.

"BU has an experienced team and we were trying to keep things close at crucial points in the game," Venechanos said. "We just wanted to give ourselves a chance to win, and when you're given a chance to win, anything can happen."

In addition, the Minutewomen did something that no other school has done since the 2004 season – defeat BU on their home turf. Before Saturday, the Terriers were sporting a 22-game winning streak at Nickerson Field.

The Minutewomen also have a less-than-stellar record against ranked teams over the past several years. A victory against a ranked team this early in the season bodes well for UMass, especially since it plays four teams ranked in the top 20 of the Preseason Media Poll of Inside Lacrosse Magazine. The other teams include No. 1 Northwestern, No. 9 Dartmouth and conference rival, No. 12 Richmond.

In 2006, the Maroon and White lost to BU, Dartmouth, Syracuse and Richmond (once in the regular season and another in the A-10 Semifinal), all of which were ranked in the top 15 in the nation at the time the games were played.

The Feb. 26 edition of the poll has the Terriers ranked at No. 20. UMass also received five votes, enough to effectively put the team at No. 24 among the 20 ranked teams.

The victory was even more memorable for midfielder Holly Drown. She scored three goals and added an assist as the leading point scorer for UMass in the contest. The numbers are a personal single-game high and the assist was the second of her season and career. In this one game, the Nashua, N.H. native matched half of her point total from last year.

"Holly had a good game today and her teammates were looking for her," Venechanos said. "I think off the ball, everyone else was looking to get her opportunities. She is one of those players who could dominate every game."

Not only did the sophomore play a good all around game, she was playing in front of her sister. However, Drown's sister, Tracey, was not in the stands. She was instead sitting on the opponent's bench, serving in her first game as an assistant coach for the Terriers.

The UMass connection for the elder Drown does not end there. She played for the Maroon and White from 2002 to 2004 and was a third-team All-American during her senior year. Drown also scored 47 goals and 17 assists during the 2004 season, which is the second highest goal total in UMass single-season history.

Before Venechanos took over the program during the summer of 2006, Drown spent her first two years after graduation as an assistant to the Minutewomen.

Michael King can be reached at mking@student.umass.edu

Junior Kathleen Typadis notched one of three hat-tricks for UMass in a 13-11 defeat of BU, their first win over the Terriers in five tries.

UM caps season at N.E. Championships

By Kevin Dooley
Collegian Staff

Thirty-two schools converged on the campus of Boston University this past weekend to compete at the New England Indoor Track Championships, including the Massachusetts indoor track and field teams.

The Minutemen followed up their strong outing at last week's Atlantic 10 Championships by finishing 12th out of 32 schools with 22 points.

UMass had nobody finish in first place in any of the events it participated in and was hurt by the fact that it didn't have anyone represent the team in the pole vault, shot put or weight throw competitions.

Coach Julie LaFreniere's young and upcoming squad wasn't able to duplicate the success the Minutemen had this weekend, finishing 23rd out of 30 schools competing with just 4 points.

The University of Connecticut's men's and women's teams both took first place at the event.

The men's and women's teams will go their separate ways for the first time in a long while this upcoming weekend, as coach Ken O'Brien's squad will make a return trip to Boston to compete at the ECAA Championships, while the Minutewomen travel to Roxbury, Mass. to take part in the ECAC Championships. Only those athletes who qualified for the two respective events during the course of the season are eligible to participate this weekend.

O'Brien has acknowledged this season that the Minutemen must perform well in the areas that they are strong in, including the long-distance competitions and the jumping events.

That's just what UMass' long-time coach got this weekend.

Senior Erik Hoagland, who has been a steady source of points and strong outings all season for UMass, finished third out of 21 athletes in the long jump competition with a leap of 23 feet, 0.75 inches. At last year's New England Championships, Hoagland took first place in the long jump event with a jump of 23 feet, 3.25 inches. Hoagland also qualified for the finals of the 200-meter dash, where he finished eighth with a time of 22.25 seconds.

Sophomore Jonathan Pierce and freshman Andrew McCann didn't disappoint this past weekend, either, each finishing in seventh place in the 3,000-meter and 5,000-meter runs, respectively. Pierce clocked in at 8:32.90 and McCann came in at 14:55.55.

The 4 x 800 meter relay team of sophomore Josh Boone, freshman Ryan DiOrio, junior Ryan Durkin and sophomore Peter Fortunato provided another impressive performance this past weekend, finishing fourth out of 23 schools with a time 7:45.46 and contributed five points for the team overall. Boone, DiOrio, Durkin and Fortuanto also represented the Minutemen in the distance medley race, taking sixth place out of 20 schools.

Up to the challenge as well was the 4 x 400 meter relay team of junior Nathan Barksdale, senior James Godinho, senior Manuel Harris-Lopes and sophomore Kevin Ianetta, which came in seventh, clocking in at 3:17.83. It was also the best time posted by the 4 x 400 meter relay team this season.

Godinho also qualified for the finals in the 400-meter dash and ended up coming in eighth out of nine athletes with a time of 49.05 seconds.

LaFreniere, who called her team's 10th-place performance at the A-10 Championships "awful and unacceptable", made it clear that she was fed up with mediocrity. As a result, LaFreniere is hoping that eliminating all short-sprinters, who will now train with the long-distance runners to provide more depth in those events, will benefit the team in the long-run. Consequentially, UMass had no one compete in the 55-meter dash, the 200-meter dash, and the 400-meter dash this weekend.

Junior Christina DeRosa turned in the best performance of the day for the Minutewomen, taking fifth place in the 5,000-meter run with a time of 17:22.96. DeRosa's fifth-place finish Saturday was her best time in the 5,000-meter run this indoor season. Her previous best time came at the A-10 Championships when she clocked in at 17:38.73.

DeRosa's time in the 5,000-meter run was also the fourth fastest time in that event in school history and she has now qualified to compete at the ECAC Championships this weekend.

Kevin Dooley can be reached at kdooley@student.umass.edu.

Magic. Experience. PAID INTERNSHIP.

Disney college program

Are you a college student who is looking for:

- A paid internship opportunity that will stand out on a resume?
- A chance to gain real-world experience with the company recently named #1 in BusinessWeek's first-ever ranking of "50 Best Places to Launch a Career"?
- A custom-designed learning curriculum that could earn you college credit?
- An opportunity to meet people from around the world, make lifelong friends, and have fun?

As a part of the Disney College Program at the Walt Disney World® Resort near Orlando, FL, participants can experience an internship of a lifetime. Attend our upcoming presentation and discover why the Disney College Program is an opportunity you just can't miss!

University Of Massachusetts-Amherst
Wednesday • February 28th • 5:00pm
LGRT - Room 103
Thursday • March 1st • 5:00pm
Holdsworth 203

Scheduling conflict? View our online E-Presentation.
disneycollegeprogram.com/epresentation

Skiers headed back to Nationals

Hawkins, Small and co. do just enough at ECSC's to advance

By Justin McGrail
Collegian Correspondent

The Massachusetts' men's ski team is one step closer to earning a national championship. The team finished in third place in both the slalom and giant slalom at the ECSC Regionals. The team wasn't the only representative from UMass. Standout junior Eliza Hawkins was the sole representative for the women's team. She was invited to compete based on her individual results from the regular season.

"This was a case of us being a team," UMass coach Skip Fox said of his team's performance this weekend.

It was very true for the men's team this past weekend. Their efforts helped UMass reach its third consecutive USCSA National Championship.

The Minutemen kept their momentum going with strong team efforts on both days of racing. Jason Small led the Minutemen in Sunday's giant slalom by finishing fourth with a time of 2 minutes, 9.66 seconds. Ian Hohmeister had a career day, coming in 17th place with a time of 2:13.65. Right behind him was Andrew Hawes who placed 18th in 2:14.33. Even though he did not place, Alex Zahuriko had a solid 22nd finishing with a time of 2:15.84. Senior Rush Hawkins fell in one of his runs, but strong finishes from the rest of his teammates gave UMass a third place overall finish.

On Saturday the roles were reversed, but the outcome was the same. Jason Small fell in one of his runs, but the rest of the team rallied and came away with the first of two third-place finishes. Rush Hawkins was the top skier for the Minutemen. He came in fourth place with a time of 1:33.35. The next finisher for the men was Andrew Hawes who placed eighth in 1:34.40. Ian Hohmeister rounded out the top three for UMass with an 11th-place finish in 1:35.40.

Coach Skip Fox described this weekend as a team effort and added that he's happy the team pulled together when both of the stars fell.

"I'm happy we came together as a team this weekend," Fox said Monday. "When Jason (Small) went down on Saturday, the team picked up the slack. When Rush (Hawkins) went down on Sunday, the team pitched in. We got third place on both days which is good enough to qualify for nationals."

In the overall standings for the weekend, Rush Hawkins and Jason Small tied for tenth place, Andrew Hawes came in 13th and Ian Hohmeister finished in 16th place.

On the women's side, Eliza Hawkins competed in the Regionals based on her individual results from the regular season. She finished third place overall in the MacConnell Division. She had a great finish to what began as a rough weekend, finishing fifth place overall in the giant slalom on Sunday with a time of 2:17.44. Saturday was a different story, though. She finished in 17th place with a final time of 1:44.86.

"She came to almost a full stop during her run on Saturday," Fox said of her poor showing in the slalom.

Despite her struggles, Hawkins did well enough to earn a spot in next week's Nationals. She will be looking to repeat as USCSA Individual National Champion. She finished the weekend in ninth place overall.

The Minutemen have a long way to travel to get to their ultimate goal of National Champions. This season, the competition will be held out on the West Coast in Winter Park, Colorado. The championships start on March 7 and continue to March 10.

Historically, the Minutemen have finished their season strong at the Nationals. In 2005, the team placed third, the highest in school history and last season it placed fifth.

Justin McGrail can be reached at jsmcgrai@student.umass.edu

Seven O's

Every Wednesday:
♦ KARAOKE ♦
Every Thursday:
♦ OPEN MIC ♦
Live Bands
Friday, March 2nd, 2007:
"On The Rocks"
Saturday, March 3rd, 2007:
Shut Up & Dance
♦ Student Band Wanted ♦
Need a place to play?
Come to Seven O's!

Route 116, 330 Amherst Rd
Sunderland, MA 01375
(413) 665-5766

3 PM to 1 AM M-F
1 PM to 1 AM Saturday
Next to Cumpton Apts.

Free Delivery to UMass
Menu Online @ andiamo.cc

	2				9
3								7
8		7	9			1	6
	6			5		8
4			7		6			5
		5		9			7
	1	8			7	5		4
2								6
		4					8

Find all of today's puzzle solutions online!

ACROSS
1 Centers of activity
5 Wager
8 Legal 14 Border on
15 "Norma ___"
16 Narcotic
17 Tender
18 Period
19 Bequeathed
20 Balcony railing
22 Swings of the bat
23 Breadbasket
24 Sentence analysis
27 Aims
29 Enemy
30 Fabric fold
34 Opposite of WSW
35 Y
36 Baseball scores
37 Frolic
39 Quilters' gatherings
40 Winds up
41 Individual
42 Edge along furtively
43 Freudian topic
44 Endure longer than
47 Carriage return
49 Gushed forth suddenly in a jet
54 Barley sprouts
55 Banquet VIP
56 Hot dog
58 Male offspring
59 Tip off
60 Closet item
61 Work unit
62 Prepare for publication
63 Aquatic mammals
64 Golfer's gadget
65 Sandra and Ruby

DOWN
1 Hinged fasteners
2 Sub
3 Pack animal
4 Fulton's power
5 Rifle part
6 Singer Kitt
7 Darjeeling, e.g.
8 Ebb tide maximum
9 Beekeeper's milieu
10 Shrivels
11 Altered fraudulently
12 Shoshone
13 Guided
21 Agreement
22 Backbone
25 Innovative
26 Gaggle members
28 Beat back
30 Clean with a bill
31 Thrust
32 Natural ability
33 Silly person
35 J. Edgar Hoover's org.
37 Returns blow for blow
38 Feeds the kitty
42 Knock senseless
44 Even more unctuous
45 On land
46 Freeloader
48 Jessica or Hope
50 Propelled a shell
51 Exchange
52 Uncanny
53 Small depressions
56 Which person?
57 Have a meal
58 Tennis unit

WWW.DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

THE HARP

SPECIALS!
Honey Brown, Molson
$2.00 a pint / $6.50 a pitcher
TONIGHT: • Trivia Night
WED: • Open Mic Night
(all are welcome)
Pizza 'til midnight 7 days a week
Voted best Neighborhood bar
East of the River 2005 & 2006
Valley Advocate Readers Poll
OCMPA All Credit Cards Accepted
163 Sunderland Rd (N. Amherst
Just north of the apartments
413-548-6900 www.theharp.net

Quote of the Day

"The eyes say a lot more than anything."

-Mark Wahlberg

Paul By Billy O'Keefe

I WILL BE TAKING CARE OF YOU ALONE SINCE MOMMY DUMPED ME FOR SOME STUPID PRETTY-BOY JERKWAD.
HELLO, FISH. I'M PAUL I'M YOUR NEW DADDY.
OH SHUT UP, PAUL!!

Two Dudes By Aaron Warner

I THOUGHT IT WOULD BE FUN, BEING ROOMMATES WITH MY BEST FRIEND.
BUT ALL MONICA AND I DO LATELY IS FIGHT.
MAYBE YOU SHOULD TAKE UP A NEW HOBBY, DUDE.
LIKE WHAT?
NOT FIGHTING.

A College Girl Named Joe By Aaron Warner

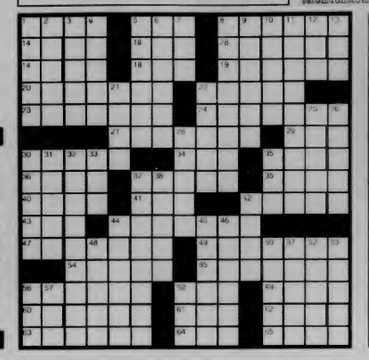
WHAT ARE YOU GUYS DOING FOR SPRING BREAK?
SINCE I'M SO CLOSE TO GRADUATING, I'M JUST FINISHING PAPERS AND SCHOOL STUFF.
AND I DON'T HAVE ANY EXTRA MONEY TO GO ANYWHERE THIS YEAR.
HOW ARE WE SUPPOSED TO GET CRAZY AND GO WILD WITH YOU TWO OLD MOTHER HUBBARDS?!
I HAVEN'T WASHED MY BRA IN LIKE A WEEK. THAT'S PRETTY CRAZY.

Welcome To Falling Rock National Park By Josh Shalek

The more you protest, the more right I am
And the more silly you look
You don't need to run every argument
Everyone knows I'm right, yet I'm the only one willing to admit it

Give us you tired, give us your poor, give us your comics.

collegiancomics@yahoo.com



Submit your comics!
collegiancomics@yahoo.com

Submit your classifieds!
(413) 545-3500

Horoscopes

aquarius Jan. 20-Feb. 18
You are as mysterious as the little pellets in tapioca pudding, but much less tasty.

pisces Feb. 19-Mar. 20
If they can invent a way to erase pen, perhaps it is possible to erase time.

aries Mar. 21-Apr. 19
Speed up the entire campus by screaming "Chop,Chop!" everywhere you go today.

taurus Apr. 20-May 20
Financial support is far less important than a can-do attitude and blissful ignorance.

gemini May 21-Jun. 21
Nothing about extrapolating milk from a soy bean was a good idea. Nothing.

cancer Jun. 22-Jul. 22
Like Woolly Mammoths of yesteryear, your greatest potential is frozen deep inside you.

leo Jul. 23-Aug. 22
Deep in the dark bowels of winter, a beautiful world is sprouting around you.

virgo Aug. 23-Sept. 22
Wisdom comes with age, experience, and most often some type of facial hair.

libra Sept. 23-Oct. 22
It's time for a new look, I suggest completely shaving your eyebrows.

scorpio Oct. 23-Nov. 21
Everything is good in moderation; even nose picking!

sagittarius Nov. 22-Dec. 21
Consider the catastrophic consequences of actually having ants in your pants.

capricorn Dec. 22-Jan. 19
Save some energy and jump on someone's back demanding a piggy-back to class.

Massachusetts Daily Collegian Marketplace

Announcements

Global Express Tours Spring Break Montreal Party Weekends from $99 Complete bus, hotels, & clubs. Montrealexpress.net 781-979-9001

Apartments for Rent

Brandywine Apts. Now Leasing, 1&2 bedroom apts. Leases begin Jun, July, Aug or Sep. First Come First Serve. Get Them while they last. www.brandywineapts.com stop by or call 549-0600

Apartments for Rent

Center of town, 1,2,3 bedrooms hardwood floors. NOW SHOWING for JUNE and SEPTEMBER. NO FEES www.amherstlincolnrealty.com 253-7879

Employment

Retail Sales/ Mattresses- Energetic, communication skills required. Oppurtunity to grow with company. Flexible PT. Do not call – Stop by 328 College St. RT. 9 Amherst Discount Mattress

Employment

Winter/ Spring positions available. Earn up to $150 per day Exp not required. Undercover shoppers needed To Judge Retail and Dining Establishments. Call 800-722-4791

Rent us your ears! Listening Experiments $10/hr English must be your first language. Email: phonetics_lab@linguist.umass.edu voicemail: 545-6837

Employment

Bartending $300/ day potential. No experience necs. Training provided. 1-800-965-6520 ext.162

Dell Campus Reps Needed Promote a top 30 company to gain real-world business & marketing experience! www.repnation.com/dell to apply.

House for Rent

Northampton Cathedral ceiling, sky-lites, hardwood floors, 4-5 bdrms. 9/1 $1950. 413-730-6660

Services

Have you been ripped off by a retailer? Contact the Student Legal Services Office regarding your rights as a consumer. Stop by at 922 Campus Center or call 545-1995

Pregnancy Testing, HIV Testing, Birth Control, and Emergency Contraception. STI Screening and Treatment. Affordable and confidential. Tapestry Health, 27 Pray Street, Amherst. 548-9992. www.tapestryhealth.com

Travel

Global Express Tours Spring Break Montreal Party Weekends from $99 Complete bus, hotels, & clubs. Montrealexpress.net 781-979-9001

Advertisng with the Daily Collegian Marketplace is easy!

Submit your classified online at www.daily collegian.com

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

SPORTS TUESDAY

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 27, 2007 SPORTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Senior Evan Swisher set one UMass record and one conference record at the A-10 Championships this weekend. He earned the Most Outstanding Performer award after winning the 100- and 200-meter backstroke.

UM returns to glory

Men's swimming and diving makes 'statement' at A-10s

By Joe Meloni
Collegian Staff

BUFFALO, N.Y. – The 2007 Atlantic 10 Swimming and Diving Championship was about more than just winning to the Massachusetts men's swimming and diving team. The Minutemen wanted to make it perfectly clear to the rest of the A-10 that the conference's best team resides in Amherst, Mass.

"We wanted to make a statement to the rest of the conference that last year was a fluke. We are the best team in the A-10," UMass captain Jake Hogue said. "That's all we're here to prove."

The Minutemen never trailed throughout the four day event, winning the program's ninth A-10 Championship, sixth in seven years, and avenging last year's nine-point loss to Saint Bonaventure. The Minutemen scored 733 points – 223 more than Saint Bonaventure's 510. Duquesne (486.5) took third place in the conference.

UMass senior Evan Swisher was the star of the meet winning both the 100- and 200-yard backstroke. His time of 49.71 in the 100-yard backstroke set a new UMass school record while his 1:46.69 mark in the 200-yard backstroke established a new A-10 record. His individual showing, paired with sensational performances in three relays, earned Swisher the tournament's Most Outstanding Performer Award.

He is the third swimmer from UMass to win the award.

"The MVP has to be [Swisher]," Yarworth said. "He decided he was going to do it and has really carried the team all year long. Tonight's swim was just special. It was inspirational not just because of what he does in competition. Evan is one of the hardest workers we have. He never misses a practice, sick or not. He's always there grinding it out. He really sets the tone for the rest of the team."

The time Swisher posted in the 200-yard backstroke, 1:46.69, beat the previous A-10 mark, 1:47.09, by .4 seconds.

"I haven't won that 200-[yard backstroke] since freshman year and it's nice to sort of mark myself as the top backstroker in the A-10," Swisher said. "Before the race I was sitting here and was just super relaxed. The past few years I sort of doubted myself but I've had [Yarworth] and [assistant coach Scott Whitbeck] telling me all year that I'm a 1:46 backstroker."

Freshman Justin Brooks added to UMass' final-day onslaught. In the day's opening race, the 1,650-yard freestyle, the freshman took first place – establishing a new school record, 15:52.17. After a shaky performance in the 500-yard freestyle, Brooks' showing in the mile pleased Yarworth and scored 20 points for the Minutemen. Sophomore Brad Sloan finished in fifth place in the event with a time of 16:04.63.

"Justin Brooks coming from behind to win the mile, I knew he had a sub-16 minute mile in him," Yarworth said. "He just turned it on. I can't say enough about him."

Yarworth knew the success of his team would correlate directly with the performance of his freshman and Brooks wasn't the only rookie to establish himself as one of the conference's best swimmers. Juan Moliere won the 100-yard freestyle for the Minutemen. His time of 45.88 seconds edged out Duquesne's Ed Wicker (45.93) by 0.7 seconds.

"[Moliere] learned so much this weekend," Yarworth said. "By the time he was swimming that final, he was swimming the way I want him to."

Moliere also took part in the record-setting 400-yard medley relay for UMass – the Minutemen's time of 3:21.23 beat the previous of mark of 3:22.11. The unit also included Swisher, Hogue and junior Zack Priest. After the Minutemen's top butterfly specialist, sophomore Nate Bromage, fell ill earlier in the day, Moliere also took part in the butterfly event.

See M. SWIMMING on page 7

UMass one better than last year, again

Women's squad climbs A-10 ranks, finishes second overall

By Joe Meloni
Collegian Staff

BUFFALO, N.Y. – The Massachusetts women's swimming and diving team finished in second place at the Atlantic 10 Championships this past weekend, realizing the goal set by head coach Bob Newcomb after last season's third-place finish. The Richmond Spiders (747 points) won their sixth straight A-10 Championship while the Minutewomen (453) and Fordham (425.5) rounded out the top three.

The Minutewomen have improved their finish in the last four seasons, moving from fifth place at the A-10 finals in 2003 to their second-place finish at this year's event.

"One year ago [Saturday] I stood at our banquet after [the A-10 Championships] and I raised my hand and counted down, five, four, three and challenged them to finish out the numbers, they rose to it," Newcomb said. "I couldn't ask anything more of a group like this. Divers, swimmers, this whole group rose up and did it. We had 12 different swimmers score and we scored in all but one of the events. It's just a great way to end the season."

Sophomore Christa Narus and senior Liz Lovejoy propelled the Minutewomen to their best finish since winning the 2001 A-10 Championship.

Narus finished third in the 200-yard butterfly on Saturday. Her time of 2:06.31 eclipsed her own school record by .02 seconds. She also won a bronze medal for her performance in the 100-yard butterfly. Narus was also a part of UMass' 400-yard freestyle relay team. The Minutewomen posted a time of 3:34.10 which, although good enough for just seventh place, solidified UMass' second-place finish in the tournament.

Lovejoy anchored the relay for the Minutewomen – it was her third race of the day. In the 100-yard freestyle, Lovejoy's time of 52.67 was good enough for third place. The strong showing from the UMass captain was a large reason the Minutewomen finished in second place.

"Liz Lovejoy," Newcomb said when asked who he'd pick as the MVP of the tournament. "She anchored four out of our five relays. She set a school record in the 200-[yard freestyle] and took third in the 100-[yard freestyle] then came back 40 minutes later and swam well in the 200-[yard butterfly]."

In her final meet for UMass, Lovejoy made a permanent place for herself as one of the best swimmers in program history.

"Her school record in the 200-[yard freestyle] was probably the oldest record that we had up there," Newcomb said. "To replace a name like Michele Leary is just phenomenal."

Also scoring points for the Minutewomen in the 200-yard butterfly was junior Sam Demty whose

See W. SWIMMING on page 7

Senior Liz Lovejoy led the Minutewomen to a second-place finish at the A-10 Championships and set a school record in the 200-yard freestyle.

Life all about trash-talk on the court

UM sharpshooter fires away from the line and with words

By Rob Goldblatt
Collegian Staff

Senior guard Jonas Life hit some big shots on Saturday against the Saint Louis Billikens to give his Massachusetts men's basketball team a 53-50 victory in one of the last homes games of the season.

Life, a known trash-talker, was at it again Saturday, and got into some heated discussions with Saint Louis' Ian Vouyoukas, the 6-foot-10 star big man who had 18 points on the night.

Life hit a 3-pointer from way behind the line with 1:34 left in regulation to give UMass a 49-47 lead and also knocked down two free throws in the final minutes to seal the victory. Vouyoukas was screaming at Life after hitting a couple of free throws a few minutes earlier, and Life admitted that there was some jarring between him and the SLU big guy.

UMass Basketball

"[Vouyoukas] made his free throws. I came back down to the line. He was talking the whole time and couple of those other guys were talking," Life said. "I hit my first free throw and gave them a little stare down. [Saint Louis] called timeout and those guys were talking while I was walking, came back out, I was talking, knocked it down. There definitely was talking."

"I talk the whole game," Life added. "Sometimes you won't think I'm talking and I just won't be moving my lips. Trust me. I talk the whole game. Bad, horrible, good. I talk the whole game."

Bigs against Bigs

Saturday's game featured a pair of UMass big guys against a pair of SLU's bigger guys. Between Vouyoukas and center Bryce Husak, the Billikens have 13 feet and 10 inches from the four and five positions alone. That was an issue for senior captains Stephane Lasme and Rashaun Freeman, who struggled with SLU's size on the interior.

"Size is a problem. We couldn't rebound either," UMass coach Travis Ford said. "[Vouyoukas and Husak] did a great job, no question. We missed some shots too, though. Give Saint Louis credit, they had a great defensive game plan. It doesn't hurt when you have guys like, two huge, huge guys."

"I think Ray came in focused more on defense than he was on offense," he added. "I think we got

See M. BASKETBALL on page 8

Senior James Life tallied his point, one rebound, an assist and a blocked shot in the Minutemen's 53-50 victory over Saint Louis. All five points came in the final 1:34s of regulation as UMass put away the Billikens.

Forbes heating up at the perfect time

Now this is the Gary Forbes you've been waiting for.

This is the Gary Forbes that dropped 23 points at North Carolina and had a double-double (17 points, 10 rebounds) at Duke in 2005.

He was playing for Virginia then, and averaged 8.5 points in two seasons in the ACC.

His arrival at UMass was highly publicized, but Forbes just recently began to show how good he really is.

Massachusetts men's basketball coach Travis Ford has always made it clear that Rashaun Freeman and Stephane Lasme are "the men" on the Minutemen. But Forbes was brought in to be the difference maker.

His game-changing effort in Saturday night's 53-50 win over Saint Louis at the Mullins Center was just the latest example of how his turnaround has made UMass nearly unbeatable down the stretch.

The Billikens took a 20-18 lead with 2:45 left in a first half that saw the lead change six different times. Forbes – who only had one point prior – decided to take the game into his own hands and drove the lane for the last four points of the half.

Forbes' determination to take the ball to the net gave UMass a 22-20 halftime lead, which he added to in the opening minutes of the second half.

In fact, Forbes came back out on the floor and answered an Ian Vouyoukas jumper by scoring six of the Minutemen's next 11 points.

Forbes finished the game with 13 points and five rebounds, decent numbers for arguably UMass' third option offensively. But it wasn't his eight consecutive points (carrying over from the first half) to regain the lead that made the difference in the game.

Just ask Saint Louis guard Tommie Liddell.

Forbes spoiled the Billikens' final possession by picking Liddell's pocket at the top of the key with six seconds remaining in the game. He was fouled as he came in all alone, and the pair of free throws he made with 1.9 seconds left sealed the deal for UMass' seventh win in its last eight games.

Danny Picard

Part of the Minutemen's late-season success has to do with the progression of Forbes.

His career with the Maroon and White began on a positive note, helping UMass get off to a 6-1 start with the only loss coming at No. 4 Pittsburgh. But when Forbes failed to show up for one of the biggest games of the year against Boston College (11 points on 4-for-17 shooting), the critics emerged.

The very next game, he put up only two points on two free throws in a grind-it-out win at Boston University.

Forbes slowly went from an early-season starter to a bench player. He didn't start in the game after BU – against Central Connecticut – and struggled in the next two biggest games of the year at No. 20 Louisville (five points) and at Kentucky (seven points).

When UMass returned home for its final two non-conference matchups, Forbes was replaced as a starter and came off the bench for eight consecutive games.

His final game on the bench came in the Jan. 24 loss to Rhode Island. Forbes only had four points in that game, but since then, he has been

See FORBES on page 9

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

NEW ENGLAND'S LARGEST COLLEGE DAILY EST 1890

SCORSESE FINALLY WINS THE GOLD PAGE 6 | UMASS BIDS FAREWELL TO SENIORS PAGE 12

PARTLY CLOUDY : HI: 42 LO: 19 WWW.DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 28, 2007

BU incident sparks fire safety dialog

By Jamie Mason
Collegian Staff

Two Boston University students were killed and a third was critically injured in a fire caused by a candle last Saturday morning.

While news of the deaths of 21-year-old students Rhiannon McCuish and Stephen Adelipour continues to tear through the BU campus, over 100 fires were reported last year at the University of Massachusetts, according to the Amherst Fire Department.

Last year, the Amherst Fire Department responded to 157 calls at UMass and 102 calls to fraternities and sororities, according to Keith Hoyle, the Amherst Fire Chief.

"The last large fire UMass had was five years ago when the art building behind the Morrill Science building burnt down," said Hoyle. "In 1976 there was a fire in the Cance dorm, which was contained in the room of origin and in 1962 the Abigail Adams burned down due to a hotplate."

Last February, the Coolidge dormitory in Southwest Residential Area caught fire due to an unattended candle on the floor, which got knocked over and ignited a wooden wardrobe. The sprinkler system extinguished the flames before the fire department arrived, said Mike Swain, the Campus Fire Prevention Officer.

This semester there have been three malicious incidents due to students lighting things like paper and toilet paper on fire in their dorms, said Swain.

"The University has only one fire drill per semester, all the others are false alarms, caused by people pulling the alarm or system-unwanted errors such as steam," said Swain.

The University is in the process of upgrading the fire alarms on campus and installing sprinklers in the residential building. Last summer, Orchard Hill and Van Meter Hall had sprinklers installed, said Swain.

In the last year, fire safety work has been done in Goodell Hall, Fernald Hall, the Morrill Science Center, Goessmann Hall, Orchard Hill Residential area, Cance, Pierpont and Moore Residence Halls, said Jim Hunt, Communications Manager for Facilities and Campus Planning.

According to Hoyle, The most common causes of fires are candles, smoking, electrical issues (such as computers, extension cords and appliances) and dryers.

UMASS FIRE SAFETY

On Campus

1. Always evacuate immediately when you hear an alarm.
2. Be aware of your surroundings.
3. No candles or cooking is allowed in dorm rooms.
4. Always know where two exits are.

Off Campus

1. Make sure that you have working smoke detectors.
2. Always have two ways out of the building.
3. Be aware of your surroundings.
4. Make sure that all cigarettes are disposed of properly.

UM student's behind gets him put behind bars

By Derrick Perkins
Collegian Staff

A student at the University of Massachusetts was placed under arrest on the morning of Sunday, Feb. 18 for exposing himself to a police officer on North Pleasant Street in Amherst.

Sophomore, pre-English major Patrick Fitzmaurice of Tewksbury, Mass. was charged by a University of Massachusetts Police Department officer with disorderly conduct and open and gross lewdness at 1:10 a.m. on Sunday morning after exposing himself in public while crossing North Pleasant Street.

According to UMPD Deputy Chief Patrick Archibald, two male individuals were crossing the south lane of North Pleasant Street when one of the individuals stopped short directly in front of an oncoming UMPD cruiser, forcing the officer and the cars following the cruiser to come to a quick stop. The officer on the scene reported that one of the two males then undid his pants and dropped them to his knees, completely exposing his buttocks to the officer in the cruiser.

The officer immediately pulled over, exited the police cruiser and identified Fitzmaurice as the individual who had exposed himself. Fitzmaurice was subsequently placed under arrest.

The incident was witnessed by a number of individuals, both male and female, at a nearby bus stop and caused traffic to momentarily stop in both directions along North Pleasant Street, according to Archibald.

—Derrick Perkins can be reached at dperkins@student.umass.edu.

Alum Charles Sennott visits UM

Sennott, Peters discuss problems facing modern journalism

By Alana Melanson
Collegian Staff

Last night the Journalism Program Lecture Series on Broadcast and the Media, in conjunction with the University of Massachusetts History Department, played host to a panel entitled "The Journalist as Historian, The Historian as Journalist: Understanding the Past to Prepare for the Future." Featured on the panel were award-winning Boston Globe reporter and author Charles M. Sennott, also a University of Massachusetts alumnus, and BBC senior producer Kate Peters, who spoke to a packed Cape Cod Lounge at the Student Union.

Sennott and Peters discussed the important role of history and understanding the past as a means for effecting change in the future, as well as the need to put current events in a wider context so that the public can understand why certain things are happening and why they matter. They also touched upon many issues journalists and media consumers alike are being faced with in today's digitally driven world, noting how the Internet can be both a blessing and a curse in

See SENNOTT on page 3

University of Massachusetts alum, Boston Globe reporter and author Charles M. Sennott, along with BBC senior producer Kate Peters, spoke to a packed Cape Cod Lounge at the Student Union last night.

Students can 'poke' their presidential candidate

Obama, Clinton using Facebook to connect voters

By Alyssa Montalbano
Collegian Staff

Acquiring the support of young voters has proved to be a near-impossible task for political hopefuls in the past few decades. But recently, in hopes of gaining an edge in the 2008 Presidential elections, some politicians have begun using a tactic that speaks to the very core of young adults: Facebook.

This method has sparked intrigue among administrators and avid Facebook users.

Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) who has gained popularity early-on in the campaign, is one of a handful of presidential candidates to create and maintain a Facebook page.

"So many people are dependent on the Internet these days for communication, the news, etc.," said sophomore Christina Alfonso. "I think using the Internet is a great and clever way for politicians to campaign. It draws the people in, and keeps them clicking."

Obama is one of many candidates with a presence on social networking Web sites. All the major presidential hopefuls, including Sen. Hillary Clinton (D-N.Y.), Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), former Sen. John Edwards (D-N.C.), Gov. Bill Richardson (D-N.M.) and Republican Rudy Giuliani, the former mayor of New York, have groups supporting them on Facebook and MySpace.

"With Facebook, not only do you get college students together for a candidate, but you also get them networking and creating events with one another," said UMass junior Matt Giancola, a member of the Barack Obama Facebook group. "One Million Strong for Barack."

Ranging from the group "One Million Strong for Barack" with 305,942 members, to "Anybody That Would Support Barack Obama is a Moronic Liberal" with 469 members, the groups on Facebook have provided thousands of young people with a new platform through which to debate and decide issues.

Obama currently has over 500 groups supporting him in the election on Facebook created by college students. He also has 3,708 wall posts, which are comments that the members leave.

Obama's has posted 10 "notes" on his page in topics ranging from explaining his plans for 2008 to thanking the people who are planning to vote for him. On his page he also includes two email addresses and an address that members can write letters too. There is a button under his picture that allows the person using the program to support him.

Also, during the month of February, the Susan G. Komen for the Cure foundation is advertising that for one dollar the user can buy a gift (a picture of a duck, flower, troll, etc.) and give it to someone Obama has received 185 gifts from supporters.

Obama is not only taking advantage of Facebook to reach younger audiences, but he is also campaigning on other sites as well. On his Facebook site, there is a link that allows the user to go to his main Web site. Once the user is navigated to that Web site, there are other Web sites that the user can be linked too, such as www.Democrats.org partybuilder, YouTube.com and flickr.com. On YouTube, the user can watch 16 videos about Obama and make comments on them.

"In support of Obama, he is really reaching out to students, getting them involved and Internet savvy," added Giancola.

Barbara McGlynn, journalism administrator and advisor at UMass, thinks using Internet sources popular with young people will help candidates get their message out.

See FACEBOOK on page 3

Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) is one of a handful of presidential candidates to create and maintain a Facebook page.

Cooking up some competition

From left to right, chefs Tony Jung, Ralph Coughenour, and Willie Sng pose with Sam the Minuteman during the second installment of Dining Services Guest Chef Series.

UMass' chef Tony Jung looks on as UNH chef Ralph Coughenour prepares some of his student's favorite meals, after his school lost a friendly food wager.

Tomb could be of Jesus, wife and son

WASHINGTON — The burial site of Jesus has been found and suggests he had a wife and son, according to highly sensitive claims in a documentary by "Titanic" director James Cameron and Israel-born Simcha Jacobovici.

The claims inject controversy into the issue of resurrection central to Christianity and, if accurate, could reignite questions about Jesus' earthy family life popularized in the book "The Da Vinci Code."

Cameron and Jacobovici, an award-winning documentary director, said their research suggested Jesus married Mary Magdalene and had a son, Judah.

"DNA analysis conducted at one of the world's foremost molecular genetics laboratories, as well as studies by leading scholars, suggest a 2,000-year-old Jerusalem tomb could have once held the remains of Jesus of Nazareth and his family," a statement from Discovery, which will broadcast the documentary, said.

The tomb was located in Talpiot, Jerusalem, Mar. 28, 1980 by a construction crew developing an apartment complex.

Scholar L.Y. Rahmani later published "A Catalogue of Jewish Ossuaries" that described 10 ossuaries, or limestone bone boxes, found in the tomb, the Discovery statement said.

Five of the 10 discovered boxes in the Talpiot tomb were inscribed with names believed to be associated with key figures in the New Testament: Jesus, Mary, Matthew, Joseph and Mary Magdalene. A sixth inscription, written in Aramaic, translates to "Judah Son of Jesus."

"Such tombs are very typical for that region," Aaron Brody, associate professor of Bible and archaeology at the Pacific School of Religion and director of California's Bade Museum, told Discovery News.

In addition to the "Judah son of Jesus" inscription, which is written in Aramaic on one of the ossuaries, another limestone burial box is labeled in Aramaic with "Jesus Son of Joseph." Another bears the Hebrew inscription "Maria," a Latin version of "Miriam," or, in English, "Mary."

Yet another ossuary inscription, written in Hebrew, reads "Matia," the original Hebrew word for "Matthew." Only one of the inscriptions is written in Greek. It reads, "Mariamene e Mara," which can be translated as, "Mary known as the master," the television network said.

Jacobovici, director, producer and writer of "The Lost Tomb of Jesus," and his team obtained two sets of samples from the ossuaries for DNA and chemical analysis. The first set consisted of bits of matter taken from the "Jesus Son of Joseph" and "Mariamene e Mara" ossuaries. The second set consisted of patina, a chemical film encrustation on one of the limestone boxes.

The human remains were analyzed by Carney Matheson, a scientist at the Paleo-DNA Laboratory at Lakehead University in Ontario, Canada. Mitochondrial DNA examination determined the individual in the Jesus ossuary and the person in the ossuary linked to Mary Magdalene were not related.

Since tombs normally contain either blood relations or spouses, Jacobovici and his team suggest Jesus and Mary Magdalene could have been a couple. "Judah," whom they indicate may have been their son, could have been the "lad" described in the Gospel of John as sleeping in Jesus' lap at the Last Supper, they argue in their documentary.

Israeli archaeologist and professor Amos Kloner, who documented the tomb as the Jewish burial cave of a well-off family more than 10 years ago, is adamant there is no evidence to support claims that it was the burial site of Jesus.

"I'm a scholar. I do scholarly work which has nothing to do with documentary film-making. There's no way to take a religious story and to turn it into something scientific," he told AFP in a telephone interview.

"I still insist that it is a regular burial chamber from the 1st century BC," Kloner said, adding that the names were a coincidence.

"Who says that 'Maria' is Magdalena and 'Judah' is the son of Jesus? It cannot be proved. These are very popular and common names from the 1st century BC," said the academic at Israel's Bar Ilan University.

Associated Press

Stocks plummet, worst day since 9/11 attacks

A trader on the floor of the New York Stock Exchange holds his head in his hand during the closing minutes of the trading session in New York, yesterday.

By Malden Read
Associated Press

NEW YORK — Stocks had their worst day of trading since the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks Tuesday, hurtling the Dow Jones industrials down more than 400 points on a worldwide tide of concern that the U.S. and Chinese economies are stumbling and that share prices have become overinflated.

The steepness of the market's drop, as well as its global breadth, signaled a possible correction after a long period of stable and steadily rising stock markets that had not been shaken by such a volatile day of trading in several years.

A nice percent slide in Chinese stocks, which came a day after investors sent Shanghai's benchmark index to a record-high close, set the tone for U.S. trading. The Dow began the day falling sharply, and the decline accelerated throughout the course of the session before stocks took a huge plunge in late afternoon as computer-driven sell programs kicked in, and also as a computer glitch caused a delay in the recording of a large number of trades.

The Dow fell 546.02, or 4.3 percent, to 12,086.06 before recovering some ground in the last hour of trading to close down 416.02, or 3.29 percent, at 12,216.24, leaving it in negative territory for the year. Because the worst of the plunge took place after 2:30 p.m., the New York Stock Exchange's trading limits, designed to halt such precipitous moves, were not activated.

The decline was the Dow's worst since Sept. 17, 2001, the first trading day after the terror attacks, when the blue chips closed down 684.81, or 7.13 percent.

The drop hit every sector across the market. Riskier issues such as small-cap and technology stocks suffered some of the biggest declines, but big industrial companies, those that are often hurt the most in an economic downturn, also were pummeled, with raw materials producers among the hardest hit.

But analysts who have been expecting a pullback after a huge rally that began last October and sent the Dow to a series of record highs, were unfazed by Tuesday's drop.

"This corrective consolidation phase isn't just going to be one day, but we don't believe this is going to be a bear market," said Bob Doll, BlackRock's global chief investment officer of equities.

Some investors also tried to put Tuesday's slide into a longer-term perspective.

"All who invest should feel grateful that we've had a great run for the last 12 to 18 months," said Joel Kleinman, a Washington, D.C. attorney, adding that he has learned to not read too much into any short-term ups and downs. "This is another day in the market."

Still, traders' dwindling confidence was knocked down further by data showing that the economy may be decelerating more than anticipated. A Commerce Department report that orders for durable goods in January dropped by the largest amount in three months exacerbated jitters about the direction of the U.S. economy, just a day after former Federal Reserve Chairman Alan Greenspan said the United States may be headed for a recession.

"It looks more and more like the economy is a slow growth economy," said Michael Strauss, chief economist at Commonfund. "Moderate economic growth is good — an abrupt stop in economic growth scares people."

The market had been expecting the government on Wednesday to revise its estimate of fourth-quarter GDP growth down to an annual rate of about 2.3 percent from an initial forecast of 3.5 percent, and grew increasingly nervous on Tuesday that the figure could come in even lower.

The housing market, which the Street had been hoping had bottomed out, also looked far from recovery after a Standard & Poor's index indicated that single-family home prices across the nation were flat in December. A later report from the National Association of Realtors said existing home sales climbed in January by the largest amount in two years, but the data didn't erase housing-related concerns, as median home prices fell for a sixth straight month.

But a growing feeling that Wall Street, which has had a big run-up since October, was due for a correction also played into Tuesday's decline.

"I think that the market was prepared to pull back. The constellation of issues that were worrying the market came to a head," said Quincy Krosby, chief investment strategist at The Hartford.

Still, the market will need to pull back further before its decline can officially be called a correction, which is considered a 10 percent decline in a bull market. Just a week ago, the Dow had reached new closing and trading highs, rising as high as 12,795.92; it's now down 4.5 percent from that level.

The Dow's decline accelerated at a faster than normal pace during the afternoon after a computer glitch kept some trades from being immediately reflected in the index of 30 blue chip stocks. Dow Jones & Co., the media company which manages the flagship index, said the problem occurred after it was discovered computers were not properly calculating trades, prompting a switch to a backup computer.

The result was a massive plunge in the average in the seconds it took Dow Jones to switch to its secondary computers.

The broader Standard & Poor's 500 index fell 50.33, or 3.47 percent, Tuesday to 1,399.04, and the tech-dominated Nasdaq composite index was off 96.65, or 3.86 percent, at 2,407.87. Both indexes have also turned negative for the year.

The Russell 2000 index of smaller companies dropped 31.03, or 3.77 percent, to 792.66.

A suicide bomber attack on the main U.S. military base in Afghanistan where Vice President Dick Cheney was visiting also rattled the market Tuesday.

China's stock market plummeted from record highs as investors took profits when concerns arose that the Chinese government may try to temper its ballooning economy by raising interest rates again or reducing more of the money available for lending.

"Corrections usually happen because of a catalyst, and this may be it," said Ed Peters, chief investment officer at PanAgora Asset Management. "The move in China was a surprise, and when a major market has a shock it ripples through the rest of the market. With all the trade that goes on with China, there tends to be a knee-jerk reaction with that kind of drop."

The Shanghai Composite Index tumbled 8.8 percent to close at 2,771.79, its biggest decline since it fell 8.9 percent on Feb. 18, 1997. Since Chinese share prices doubled last year as investors poured money into the market after the completion of shareholding reforms, trading in Shanghai has been very volatile.

Hong Kong's benchmark Hang Seng Index dropped 1.8 percent, and Malaysia's Kuala Lumpur Composite Index fell 2.8 percent. Japan's Nikkei stock average fell a more moderate 0.52 percent, but European markets were rattled — Britain's FTSE 100 lost 2.31 percent, Germany's DAX index dropped 2.96 percent and France's CAC-40 fell 3.02 percent.

Bond prices shot higher as investors bought into the safe-haven Treasury market, pushing the yield on the benchmark 10-year Treasury briefly note down to 4.47 percent, its lowest level so far this year, from 4.63 percent late Monday; the yield settled at 4.52 percent.

The durable goods drop mised the chance of the Federal Reserve easing interest rates later in the year — a possibility that makes the bond market an attractive place to be right now.

Pollutants change 'he' frogs into 'she'

By Marlowe Hood
Associated Press

PARIS — Frogs that started life as male tadpoles were changed in an experiment into females by estrogen-like pollutants similar to those found in the environment, according to a new study.

The results may shed light on at least one reason that up to a third of frog species around the world are threatened with extinction, suggests the study, set to appear in the journal Environmental Toxicology and Chemistry in May.

In a laboratory at Uppsala University in Sweden, two species of frogs were exposed to levels of estrogen similar to those detected in natural bodies of water in Europe, the United States and Canada.

The results were startling: whereas the percentage of females in two control groups was under 50 percent — not unusual among frogs — the sex ratio in three pairs of groups maturing in water dosed with different levels of estrogen were significantly skewed.

Even tadpoles exposed to the weakest concentration of the hormone were, in one of two groups, twice as likely to become females.

The population of the two groups receiving the heaviest dose of estrogen became 95 percent female in one case, and 100 percent in the other.

"The results are quite alarming," said co-author Cecilia Berg, a researcher in environmental toxicology. "We see these dramatic changes by exposing the frogs to a single substance. In nature there could be lots of other compounds acting together."

Earlier studies in the United States, Berg explained, linked a similar sex-reversal of Rana pipiens male frogs – one of the two species used in the experiment – in the wild to a pesticide that produced estrogen-like compounds.

"Pesticides and other industrial chemicals have the ability to act like estrogen in the body," Berg said. "That is what inspired us to do the experiment," she said referring to her collaborator and lead author of the article, Irina Pettersson, also a researcher at Uppsala.

The other species examined was the European common frog, Rana temporaria.

Some of sex-altered males became fully functioning females, but other had ovaries but no oviducts, making them sterile, Berg explained.

The study does not measure the potential impact of pollutant-driven sex change for frog species, but the implications, said Berg, are disquieting.

"Obviously if all the frogs become female it could have a detrimental effect on the population," she said.

The only immediate remedy, she continued, would be to improve sewage treatment in areas where frogs and other amphibians might be affected to filter out estrogen concentrations coming from contraceptive pills and from industrial pollutants.

POWERED RED
TO MAKE A STATEMENT.
Get 300 free text messages a month for one year.
Sign up for new service and show a valid college ID at the Sprint store. After 12 months, pay the regular monthly fee.
RED MOTORAZR™ V3m
Motorola and Sprint are collaborating with (PRODUCT) RED™ to help eliminate AIDS in Africa.
JOINRED.COM
This feature-packed phone is the only RED MOTORAZR that lets you download music wirelessly from the Sprint Music Store℠
$59.99
$109.99 2-year price
Plus $50 mail-in rebate with new line activation and 2-year agreement
CALL 1-800-Sprint-1
CLICK sprint.com/powered
GO to the nearest Sprint or Nextel store
Sprint POWER UP
Sprint stores
BROOKLINE 301 Harvard Street 617-277-0600
BURLINGTON 91 Middlesex Turnpike 781-221-1447
CAMBRIDGE Cambridgeside Galleria 617-374-9936
DANVERS Liberty Tree Mall 978-774-4325
FRAMINGHAM 215 Worcester Road 508-628-0600
HINGHAM 92 Derby Street, Ste 127 781-749-7727
HOLYOKE Holyoke Mall 413-534-6074
HYANNIS Cape Cod Mall 508-775-3834
KINGSTON Independence Mall 781-585-5637
LAWRENCE 160 Winthrop Ave 978-975-5650
LEOMINSTER 14 Commercial Way 978-840-4273
MARLBOROUGH Solomon Pond Mall 508-786-0696
MILLBURY Shoppes at Blackstone Valley 508-865-8125
NATICK Natick Mall 508-651-2955
Natick Mall 508-647-0461
NEWTON 210 Needham St. 617-244-2898
NORTH ATTLEBORO Emerald Square 508-699-3656
1400 S. Washington St. (Rte. 1) 508-695-3451
NORTH DARTMOUTH 127 Faunce Corner Road 508-997-6205
NORWOOD 1337 Boston Providence Highway (Rte. 1) 781-255-5566
PEABODY 232 Andover St. 978-977-7346
North Shore Mall 978-532-0250
9 Sylvan Street 978-573-3500
SAUGUS Square One Mall 781-233-3302
114 Broadway Turnpike Rte. 1 N 781-233-7676
SHREWSBURY 196 Boston Turnpike Rd. 508 798 3300
SWANSEA Swansea Mall 508-675-3647
TAUNTON Silver City Galleria 508-822-5452
WEST SPRINGFIELD 1920 Riverdale St. 413-733-8262
PREFERRED DEALERS
AUBURN Online Communications 508-832-9886
CHICOPEE Focal Point Communications 413-552-4100
FITCHBURG The Cell Phone Store 800 NEXTCALL
HOPEDALE Online Communications 508-473-8805
MARLBOROUGH Online Communications 508-480-0055
MEDWAY Online Communications 508-533-5565
MILFORD Nextgen Wireless 508-473-6996
SPRINGFIELD Focal Point Communications 413-730-4424
TOWNSEND Datalink Communications 978-597-0300
WORCESTER Nextgen Wireless Greendale Mall, 7 Neponset Street 508-852-3299
◆ Hablamos Español
Nextel Store with Sprint products
Coverage not available everywhere. Available features and services will vary by phone and network. The Nationwide Sprint PCS Network reaches over 250 million people. Voice calling area reaches over 165 million people in the U.S., Puerto Rico, U.S. Virgin Islands and Guam. Offers not available in all markets. Additional terms and restrictions apply. Subject to credit approval. See store or sprint.com for details. Phone Offer: Offer ends 03/31/07 or while supplies last. Requires a new line of service with a new two-year subscriber agreement. Taxes excluded. Service Plan: Up to $36 activation and $200 early termination fees apply per line. Deposit may be required. Instant Savings: Activation at time of purchase required. No cash back. Mail-in Rebate: Requires purchase by 03/31/07 and activation by 04/14/07. Rebates cannot exceed purchase price. Taxes excluded. Limit must be active 30 consecutive days. Allow 8 to 12 weeks for rebate. Free Text Messaging: Text message overage is $0.10 per message. To avoid charges, you must contact us prior to the billing end date of the 12th plan month. Risk-Free Guarantee: Call us to deactivate and return (to place of purchase) complete, undamaged phone with receipt within 30 days of activation. You are responsible for all charges based on actual usage (partial monthly service charges, Taxes, Sprint Fees, etc.). Project RED: Motorola and Sprint will collectively make a $51 contribution on the sale of each RED MOTORAZR V3m phone to the Global Fund to fight AIDS, Tuberculosis and Malaria. See www.motorola.com/red, JOINRED.com, or www.theglobalfund.org/en for more details. ©2007 Sprint Nextel. All rights reserved. SPRINT, the logo and other trademarks are trademarks of Sprint Nextel. All third-party product or service names are property of their respective owners. All rights reserved.
FOCUS on driving

BOSTON BARTENDERS SCHOOL - W. SPFLD
Special Student Rate
Local-National Placement
Includes Certification
1-800-357-3210
BostonBartender.com

Deep-sea squid seen as aggressive predator

By Charlie Okah
Associated Press

The first live videos of the deep-sea eight-armed squid in its natural environment reveal it to be a fast, aggressive predator that flashes light shows potentially to blind prey or woo mates.

Zoologist Tsunemi Kubodera at Japan's National Science Museum in Tokyo and his colleagues, the same researchers who caught the first live giant squid (Architeuthis) footage two years ago, recorded the deep-sea eight-armed squid Taningia danae using a newly developed underwater high-definition video camera system.

Swimming forwards and backwards around bait. Attacking a rig line that researchers dangled bait on. Flashing light at prey, potentially to blind it. Attacking the halogen light researchers used to observe it.

The deep-sea eight-armed squid is the largest known bioluminescent or light-emitting creature in the world. The largest known specimen grows up to 7.5-feet long and 130 lbs., with eyes the size of large grapefruits. Hundreds of their beaks have been found in sperm whale stomachs, suggesting these are very abundant in tropical and subtropical oceans.

The researchers tracked the squid off the Ogasawara Islands, roughly 600 miles south of Tokyo. They suspended their cameras from about 750 to 3,000 feet deep, and on a pole attached to the cameras, Kubodera and his colleagues dangled tiny flashlights and bait, either a smaller squid or a mackerel.

The squid naturally possesses many tiny cavities of ammonia solution within its flesh to help maintain buoyancy, making the bodies of captured specimens flabby and soft to the touch. This led scientists to suspect it moved sluggishly.

Japanese zoologist Tsunemi Kubodera displays a specimen of a giant squid, about eight meters in total length, at Japan's National Science Museum in Tokyo in September 2005.

However, the new videos reveal the squid is far from sluggish. T. danae can flap its large, muscular, triangular fins to swim both forward and backward and is highly maneuverable, rapidly changing direction by bending its flexible body.

The squid not only attacked bait, but the flashlights as well.

"Blue light seemed provocative," the researchers noted in their online report in the Feb. 13 issue of the journal Proceedings of the Royal Society B.

The researchers also saw the squids emit short bright light flashes from large glowing organs at the tips of their tentacles before their final assaults. Kubodera and his colleagues speculate these flashes might blind prey or help the squids measure distance to their targets in the dark depths of the sea.

As the squids wandered around the red flashlights attached to the bait rig, the scientists also saw the animals pulse long and short glows. These might be attempts at communication or even "potential courtship behaviors," Kubodera and his colleagues wrote.

Facebook becomes campaign tool

FACEBOOK from page 1

"I think it's really important for candidates to reach young people wherever they are and hopefully this will encourage young people to get involved and vote," said McGlynn.

This is not the first time that Presidential Candidates have tried to use popular media among the younger generations to speak out. Facebook, MySpace, etc., is just a new form of being able to be connected to younger generations. In 1992, the then-Governor of Arkansas, and later President, Bill Clinton, made an hour long appearance on MTV, answering questions from a group of 18 to 24 year olds.

Facebook, one of the Internet's largest social networking sites which currently has nearly 17 million registered users, according to the Associated Press.

Alum, Globe reporter Sennott visits UM

SENNOTT from page 1

news coverage.

"I look at history as a multiplicity of points of view," Sennott, an experienced foreign correspondent in the Middle East and Europe, said. "[Journalism] is an active craft of trying to shape what we're seeing and present it in a form you can understand. [In the U.S.,] we present news as if it's Doppler weather radar — we cover the events but never explain the processes behind them, especially in the Middle East."

"In many conflict areas, people use history as a weapon," as a means to justify their actions, Peters said. As this is something terrorists and religious fanatics, as well as dictators and tyrants, often do, it makes the task of understanding history even more important for the rest of us. "How are you ever going to stop corrupt governments if you don't know what they're up to?" Peters said.

Sennott has covered the Middle East and Central Asia for nearly 15 years, serving as the Middle East bureau chief and the Europe bureau chief for the Boston Globe from 1997 to 2005 and is now a member of the paper's special projects team. He is the author of three books, including "The Body and The Blood: A Reporter's Journey Through the Holy Land."

Peters also tackled such subjects as the selection and presentation of news stories and the effect these have on audiences. She pointed out that what we see in print and broadcast media is presented to the public because it is what a few people deem to be worth reporting. Peters warned that audiences need to "approach all news reports carefully," because "an understanding of history is just one factor in this decision" and it is not always the main factor, especially when commercial pressures come into play.

Peters, a senior foreign news producer for the British Broadcasting Corporation based in London, is currently serving as the 2006-07 Nieman Foundation for Journalism Fellow at Harvard University. Earlier in her career she covered the conflicts in Chechnya and later in Afghanistan, and has always been closely involved in covering Israeli-Palestinian affairs. She has been bureau chief of Baghdad since 2002.

The Journalism Lecture Series is funded by David '79 and Teena Kantor, and will be hosting another panel of journalists this April.

Alana Melanson can be reached at amelanso@student.umass.edu

'Potter' debuts on stage

By Jill Lawless
Associated Press

LONDON — Harry Potter is all grown up. Daniel Radcliffe, who plays the boy wizard in the film adaptations of J.K. Rowling's best-sellers, sheds his magician's robes — and everything else — for his West End stage debut as a troubled stable boy in Peter Shaffer's "Equus."

Radcliffe, 17, has said he took the role of Alan Strang, a disturbed young man whose obsession drives him to blind horses with a metal spike, partly from a desire "to shake up people's perception of me."

Radcliffe said he saw the stage nudity that comes with the role as "a rite of passage."

Democrats stall war fund plan

By Anne Flaherty
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — House Democratic leaders are backing away from a plan to scale back U.S. involvement in the Iraq war by using Congress' most powerful tool — withholding money in the budget.

Instead, party officials said Tuesday, leaders are weighing a proposal that would attempt to embarrass Bush into abandoning his war strategy. Under a plan discussed behind closed doors, Democrats probably would fund President Bush's entire $93.4 billion request for war spending this year but require that any troops sent into battle that don't meet certain standards receive a presidential waiver and that Congress be notified of the shortcoming.

The compromise is an attempt to please members who want to end the war immediately by cutting funding and others who do not want to appear as though Democrats are turning their back on troops.

"I think it's a responsible approach," said Rep. Chet Edwards (news, bio, voting record), D-Texas.

Democratic leaders also were considering adding money to help wounded troops, improve health care for veterans and speed funding assistance for hurricane-damaged communities.

The draft proposal, pitched to party members in a private caucus meeting, is considered by Democrats to be the next step in challenging the president's Iraq war policy. Emboldened by the Nov. 7 elections, House Democrats this month pushed through a non-binding resolution denouncing Bush's decision to send 21,500 more troops to Iraq in addition to the some 130,000 already there.

But the next step has been a difficult one for a party divided on how far to go to end the war. Many Democrats favor the initial proposal by Rep. John Murtha (news, bio, voting record) to withhold money for war missions unless troops meet certain standards.

For example, Murtha, D-Pa., wants the military to adhere to its own goal of not extending a unit's combat tour beyond a year and allowing troops one full year before going back. Murtha, a Vietnam War veteran, also wanted the military to enforce its own traditional training and readiness requirements, such as training with the same equipment they would use in combat.

Democratic leaders are backing away from a plan to scale back U.S. involvement in the Iraq war by using Congress' most powerful tool—withholding money.

With the war reaching its fourth anniversary this spring, military officials have said these goals have become unrealistic and the force stretched thin by repeated deployments.

The latest proposal is intended to put the pressure on Bush; if troops are sent into battle without meeting the military's prewar standards for battle, he would have to sign a waiver and notify Congress.

Body parts found scattered in Calif.

By Allison Hoffman
Associated Press

SAN DIEGO — A human head and a hand found Tuesday along two busy San Diego freeways may belong to an unidentified body discovered floating in a river, police said.

A tow truck driver spotted a black plastic bag containing the head on southbound Interstate 5 around 6:30 a.m., San Diego police Lt. Kevin Rooney said. The left hand was found by a freeway maintenance worker less than two hours later about 10 miles north on Route 163.

Police believe the body parts belong to a man whose torso was found Monday floating in the Otay River under the Interstate 5 overpass.

The area is not far from where the head was discovered and just 10 miles north of the U.S.-Mexico border, and investigators have alerted Mexican law enforcement, Rooney said.

Authorities had no leads on the man's identity and asked the public for help.

They described the victim as a balding, 60-year-old white male with a mustache and glasses who was wearing a plaid shirt and jeans.

"There are no matches through missing people and to my knowledge no leads identifying him," Rooney said. "It's incredibly important to know who he is, because otherwise it's difficult to have a starting point for researching his work life, home life, love life, friends, enemies."

Supermarket surveillance photographs released Monday evening showed a man police believe to be the victim wearing a black backpack.

An autopsy was scheduled for Tuesday afternoon.

Taste of Japan
ESCAPE FOR AN EVENING TO JAPAN
Sample the Traditional Flavors of Japanese Cuisine and Explore the Culture of Japan
WEDNESDAY FEBRUARY 28, 2007 FROM 5–8 PM
EXCLUSIVELY AT THE OAKROOM WORCESTER DINING COMMONS
UMass Dining Services partnering with IPO (International Programs Office) Jones Library Japan National Tourist Organization
Coordinated by UMass student Kaoru Kikowada
DINING SERVICES UMassAmherst
Soba Noodle Salad そばサラダ
Japanese wheat noodle with sesame dressing
Tonjiru Miso Soup 豚汁
With vegetables and tofu or pork
Sushi-roll 巻き寿司
Cucumber with avocado & eel with fish eggs
Tempura 天ぷら
Mushrooms, sweet potato, zucchini or shrimp
Teriyaki Wild Salmon 鮭の照り焼き
Wild Salmon baked with homemade teriyaki sauce
Nikujaga 肉じゃが
Potato, peas, and onions
Gyu-Don 牛丼
Bowl of rice topped with seasoned beef
Oyako-Don 親子丼
Bowl of rice topped with boiled chicken & eggs
Tofu-Don 豆腐丼
Bowl of rice topped with tofu and eggs
Sticky Rice ご飯
Yakisoba Noodles 焼きそば
Ramen noodles stir-fried with sweet-spicy sauce
Greenie グリーニー
Brownie made with white chocolate and green tea powder
Fruit Kanten フルーツ寒天
Seaweed gelatin with fruit
Traditional Japanese Music
Origami demonstration (paper art form)
Japanese Trivia Contest with prizes

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN CXVII ISSUE 90
113 Campus Center University of Massachusetts Amherst, MA 01003
• 413-545-3500 •
• Fax 413-545-3699 •
www.dailycollegian.com
EDITOR IN CHIEF Eric Athas
MANAGING EDITOR Rob Greenfield
BUSINESS MANAGER Dan Conti
PRODUCTION MANAGER Amanda Allen
NIGHT SUPERVISOR Sheryl Wolnik
ADVERTISING MANAGER Jaimeson Porter
ADVERTISING PRODUCTION Molly Eggleston
ARTS & LIVING EDITOR Morgan Rousseau
COMICS EDITOR Adam Seagin
EDITORIAL EDITOR Tucker Merrick
NEWS EDITOR Matt Bellisseau
SPORTS EDITOR Danny Picard
SPORTS EDITOR Joe Pelland
CIRCULATION MANAGER Jeff Pentz
ASST. BUSINESS David Valade
ASSISTANT OPERATIONS Linda Wallack
ASSISTANT ADVERTISING Nicole Puddester
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Tim McCall
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Sidney Towne
ASSISTANT NEWS Anna Delionista
ASSISTANT NEWS Nicole Boonpakuakul
ASSISTANT EDITORIAL Brendan Hall
ASSISTANT SPORTS Jeremy Rice
WEB EDITOR James Hale
PHOTO EDITOR Toan Trinh
THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN IS PUBLISHED MONDAY THROUGH FRIDAY DURING THE UNIVERSITY OF MASSACHUSETTS ACADEMIC SEMESTER. THE COLLEGIAN IS INDEPENDENTLY FUNDED, OPERATING ON ADVERTISING REVENUE. FOUNDED IN 1890, THE PAPER BEGAN AS AUGIE LIFE; BY 1895 THE COLLEGE SIGNAL; IN 1901, THE WEEKLY COLLEGIAN; IN 1914 AND, THE TRI-WEEKLY COLLEGIAN IN 1956. PUBLISHED DAILY SINCE 1967, THE COLLEGIAN HAS BEEN BROADSHEET-SIZE SINCE JANUARY 1994. FOR ADVERTISING RATES AND INFORMATION, CALL WEEKDAYS BETWEEN 8:30 A.M. AND 3:30 P.M.

PRODUCTION CREW
On staff today

NIGHT EDITOR
Eric Athas

COPY EDITOR
Caillie Willaims

PRODUCTION SUPERVISOR
Amanda Allen

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

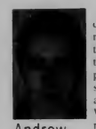
EDITORIAL OPINION

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 28, 2007

"I may not agree with what you say, but I will defend to the death your right to say it." Voltaire

EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

The wicked Wikipedia



Andrew Freeman

Last semester I wrote a brief paper on the subject of technological determinism for a science history class. As this concept was completely unfamiliar to me, I went to the free online encyclopedia, Wikipedia, for a definition. I was subsequently admonished by the TA and warned on the unreliability of that Web site. Such experiences are growing more common, contributing to debate over Wikipedia.

Wikipedia is the chief project of the non-profit Wikimedia foundation. This organization has the goal of "providing free knowledge to every person in the world," according to one of its documents. Much of its work is performed by volunteers, and it relies primarily on donations to operate, collecting $1.3 million last year alone. Other projects include a dictionary, library and curriculum materials, all freely available online.

Wikipedia allows users to write and edit articles on any subject. This has resulted in an amazing proliferation of information, far more diffuse than any print encyclopedia. However, the ease with which individuals can change entries creates the potential for abuse. Inaccurate information can be inserted into an article, turning it into a vehicle for misinformation or propaganda.

The Internet is full of disinformation and propaganda, which infiltrates sites like Wikipedia.

Recently, the history department of Middlebury College banned students from citing Wikipedia as a source in papers. This decision, reported in The New York Times, was prompted by a professor of Japanese history whose students wrote erroneously about the Shimabara Rebellion on an exam. They overstated the role of Jesuits in this incident, based on faulty information on Wikipedia.

The issue of historical accuracy on Wikipedia is particularly contentious, since history often plays an important role in modern political debates. Two years ago, one of my history professors introduced the subject of Wahhabism, an Islamic movement, by having us read the Wikipedia entry for it. Subsequent readings and lectures revealed that most of the article was incorrect – it misrepresented the beliefs espoused by Wahhabis. These errors are significant because Wahhabism is often incorrectly blamed for Islamic terrorism.

Wikipedia has methods of combating inaccuracy. Users can discuss changes to articles on the Web site's forums, report vandalism or abuse or correct errors themselves. Over a thousand entries are semi-protected, meaning that they cannot be edited except by registered users.

A system of rules, enforced by users and administrators, govern the site. The most important is that articles should been written from a neutral point of view, focusing upon facts for which there is consensus. Debates over an issue should be presented, but should not be the main focus of the entry. Moreover, articles should be based on sources, whether online or in print, allowing for verification of claims.

There is a conscious effort to improve Wikipedia. Some articles are tagged, requesting that an expert revise them, such as the entry for the Shimabara Rebellion. Considering the democratic nature of the Web site, the call for expert assistance is ironic.

Wikipedia represents the Internet's potential for the democratization of knowledge. Information, rather than being a restricted, proprietary commodity held by elites, becomes free and widely accessible. The whole notion of the "expert" falls into question, as anyone with a computer can cultivate specialized knowledge and disseminate it to millions. With thousands of contributors revising each others' work, the community can collectively perfect information, thereby advancing a more accurate understanding of the world.

In practice, this theory falls apart. The Internet is full of disinformation and propaganda, which infiltrates sites like Wikipedia. Moreover, many specialized concepts are not discussed or not analyzed in detail, while there is a profusion of pop culture and pornography. Information becomes a sprawling mass, and parsing the useful from the useless requires a hierarchy – it requires experts.

For this reason, the Internet does not yet pose an existential threat to academia. Academics are respected as sources and their works are cited in Wikipedia. They are even called on to contribute.

In fairness, one finds some of the same problems in a university as on Wikipedia. Vandals deface books or bathrooms here, just as they attack articles online. There can be disinformation in lectures and textbooks, and conspiracy theories abound. I received an email last week about professors who suspected the government was complicit in Sept. 11th.

No institution can credibly claim a monopoly on the truth, because truth is an ideal, one that can never be achieved in totality and one that people often deviate from. In the future, Wikipedia may become as reliable as academic journals, and it is certainly affecting our lives in the present. Technological determinism, by the way, is the belief that technology, on its own, can change society, and Wikipedia provides an excellent example of this.

Andrew Freeman writes on Wednesdays. He can be reached at daltreem@student.umass.edu

Equality for all

Ben Duffy

The "Fairness Doctrine" is no longer the law of the land, but Representative Dennis Kucinich (D-Ohio) wants to bring it back. Kucinich, unabashedly on the left side of America's center-left party, the Democrats, is going down a slippery slope.

To summarize the "Fairness Doctrine," it simply requires broadcasters to present "both sides" of important issues in a balanced fashion. While it may sound simple and even "fair" in theory, it's something else in practice. Political issues are not easily defined, and it's even harder to determine what a balanced view of them might be. There aren't always two easily recognizable "sides" to every debate. Sometimes people can agree with each other on the same issue for very different reasons. In other situations, the two sides of the debate may not even be able to determine what the issue is.

Liberals want the doctrine reinstated not for purposes of fairness, but because liberal radio has never been able to compete with conservative radio.

The doctrine has other problems. If we require that both conservatives and liberals be represented, does that mean that hardliners of the Left and Right need to be invited to the table as well? Are there some issues that are simply silly to debate? Is it appropriate to balance a speech on global warming or evolution with someone who believes in neither? Do we need to balance a discussion on the terrorism of 9/11 with someone who thinks that the Mossad engineered the attacks? Which topics deserve thoughtful debate, and which topics are really so straightforward that dissenting voices can legitimately be called crackpots?

Liberals want the doctrine reinstated not for purposes of fairness, but because liberal radio has never been able to compete with conservative radio. While the liberals have hailed each liberal broadcasting newcomer as the "Limbaugh of the Left," no clear rival has ever emerged. As of 2003, Rush Limbaugh was reaching an estimated 20 million listeners. That same year, he signed an eight-year, $250 million contract. Limbaugh's success launched an entire industry that included conservative competitors Sean Hannity and Laura Ingraham. No liberal challenger has ever emerged, though many have tried. The failed challengers include Mario Cuomo, Jim and Al Franken. Franken's performance is probably the least laughable, but he still can't reach Limbaugh's altitudes.

The failure of Air America Radio illustrates this wonderfully. When the network was launched in 2004, they had all the bluster that you might expect from liberals. They believed that they would quickly dwarf conservative radio. They thought wrong. In October 2006, the Bush-hating network filed for Chapter 11 bankruptcy protection. Limbaugh is rolling in the dough, and Air America can't pay its bills.

Considering that the "Fairness Doctrine" is a concern of the Left, I would suggest practicing some "fairness" right here in our liberal-left backyard. The Amherst-Northampton radio market is incredibly imbalanced, and no one seems to care.

I've always loved to listen to politics on the radio. If I want to hear my favorite conservatives, they have to be piped in from outside of the Amherst-Northampton bubble. As I deliver pizzas around Amherst, I am constantly scanning the airwaves and rarely do I find a conservative voice. Limbaugh, Hannity and other conservatives are available only on the weekdays during daylight hours. I work nights and weekends, so what I get is blandly uniform. Sure I get a "range" of programming, stretching the spectrum from snotty liberal NPR to angry leftist Valley Free Radio. That's the type of "balance" we get around here.

Selling the "Fairness Doctrine" should be pretty easy in Amherst and Northampton. Both communities are very liberal, and both like to complain about the state of our media. So let's start regulating the programming of local radio stations to bring balance to the airwaves. Among the many stations that could use some balancing is the River, "the Valley's Progressive Radio" on 93.9 and 101.5 FM. Let's not forget the UMass NPR affiliate, 88.5 WFCR and our own campus radio 91.1 WMUA. The most vile and extreme of them all is Northampton's WXOJ-LP 103.3 "Valley Free Radio" (VFR).

I don't think that any of these broadcasters would appreciate the government meddling in their programming, but I don't really care. As any good liberal will tell you, the airwaves are public property; radio stations are simply licensed to use them. So lets make VFR dedicate half of its airtime to opposing views. Their content is so far to the Left that we might need to bring in some fire-breathing right-wingers just to balance them. I would suggest Michael Savage, but I don't think that even he's extreme enough to be VFR's counterweight. WMUA should balance Amy Goodman with Mark Levin, and so on.

It's all a pipedream, I know. While local liberals complain about the imbalance of radio in the national scope, they fail to see that they live in one of the most imbalanced radio markets in the country. Liberals don't care about bringing "fairness" to the radio. Liberals care about bringing yet more liberalism to the radio, by government edict, if need be. We don't need Congress regulating the radio. The slightest of political ideas doesn't need a moderator to make sure that everything is "fair."

Ben Duffy writes on Wednesdays. He can be reached at baduffy@student.umass.edu

Should we Gard against HPV?

Teresa Franco

Gardasil, the breakthrough vaccine which protects against several forms of the Human Papillomavirus (HPV), is stirring widespread controversy throughout the nation. Some states are pushing to make the vaccine mandatory, meaning it would be a requirement for girls between the ages of nine and 26 when entering public schools. HPV is one of the more prevalent sexually transmitted infections today, and if left untreated can eventually lead to cervical cancer. The question is, should all girls be vaccinated?

The main argument over the shot becoming mandatory is parents and conservatives are concerned children will not practice proper safe sex. They fear that those who are vaccinated will believe Gardasil will protect them against other STDs such as HIV, which it does not. Another concern of parents is that having their daughters vaccinated against the virus will promote promiscuous sexually activity.

The idea of the vaccine is a smart one. Women who feel they are potentially be at risk for the virus will be able to easily access the vaccine with few problems. Many colleges are starting to offer vaccinations available on campus. Realistically, girls of college age have knowledge and understanding of other intimacy risks. They know that their bodies are still susceptible to other dangers when having sex, even if they have been vaccinated against the HPV virus.

Yet, there has been some controversy over administration of the medicine on college campuses. The belief of some conservative legislators is that the availability of the Gardasil will increase promiscuity within colleges, creating more unwanted pregnancies and the spreading of other sexually transmitted diseases. The reality of this happening is slim, based on the fact Gardasil only protects against HPV, and young adults will know that. The only change is that having the vaccine is just one less predicament to worry about. Every college campus is filled with pamphlets and brightly colored posters with information on contraceptives, there's no way any college student can avoid the knowledge available right in front of them. As long as colleges continue to spread knowledge about safe sex, students will remain cautious.

Since Gardasil prevents some forms of cervical cancer from happening, it would be a waste not to distribute this new frontier in health to the medicinal world. It could possibly lead to other discoveries of cures for other types of cancers. It's a shame there are those who are opposed to giving it out, despite the fact that it will help save lives.

The choice of whether or not to get the HPV vaccine is a personal matter, considering it involves a person's sex life.

The purpose of this vaccine can be compared to taking medication to prevent malaria before embarking on a trip to a continent like Africa. The reason for vaccination before going on such a trip is because there is a chance of being exposed to the disease. Someone who is protected against malaria is still going to be cautious of other diseases, they could contract while on their trip, but they can feel less worrisome knowing they are protected against one illness.

So, someone who has been vaccinated against HPV is not going to immediately start having careless sex with multiple people because they are protected against one strand of a virus. They are still going to be careful of other STDs they could contract, but feel a little more at ease now that one is off the list. As long as the shot is administered with proper knowledge of safe sex, to the recipients, there should be no complaints.

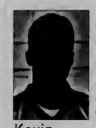
Finally, it comes down to the debate of whether or not the vaccine should be mandatory for every girl between the ages of nine and 26. This is unnecessary, simply because HPV is not an airborne virus. It is not a disease like polio that can be transmitted from person to person through drinking water or bathrooms. If a woman decides she does not want to have sex, she should not have to get the vaccine.

The choice of whether or not to get the HPV vaccine is a personal matter, considering it involves a person's sex life. Those with morality opposing premarital sexual activity would probably not want to be vaccinated for something which they are not yet at risk for. The shot should be as birth control is treated, meaning those who wish to have it should be able to obtain it, and those who have no need for it do not have to automatically go on it.

The intentions of this new vaccine are positive ones. It's a huge step in the direction of finding even more treatments and cures for other sorts of incurable diseases. On campuses, such as UMass, the vaccine will soon become readily available for those who want it. But it should be your choice, not an order.

Teresa Franco can be reached at tfranco@student.umass.edu

Double standards add up



Kevin Dooley

Is it alright to be a hypocrite in some situations? Can you change your mind on an issue and not live in fear you will get the H-bomb dropped or labeled on you?

That's the question this columnist was asking himself when conservative radio and TV talk-show host Glenn Beck took the junior senator from New York and presidential candidate Hillary Clinton to task on his show two weeks ago. Evidently, Clinton is guilty of taking actions in 2002 that are blatantly in contrast to what she believes today.

Beck, who is part of a growing list of broadcasters who don't know how to conduct an interview, was outraged and flabbergasted that Clinton is now firmly against the catastrophe in Iraq that has resulted in over 3,000 American lives being lost and many more Iraqi civilians now dead. But there is a source to Beck's insanity.

According to Beck, since Clinton voted for the authorization of this war and was in full support to send American troops to Iraq, she therefore must still be committed to winning the war in February of 2007. In other words, Clinton is now a hypocrite, a word which all too often is associated with someone who wants it both ways and will lie for their own benefit.

Let's think about Beck's logic for a second and try to get inside his head. If we are to subscribe to the world according to Beck, Clinton must competently ignore everything that has gone down in the blood bath nation since The Coalition of the Willing marched into Iraq under false pretenses in 2003.

We were told, and so was Clinton, that we had to invade Iraq because there was enough proof that Saddam Hussein had built up an arsenal of weapons that he was prepared to use against the U.S. or its allies–not to build a Democracy and keep the peace.

So far, no weapons of mass destruction have turned up. Iraq is now in the midst of brutal sectarian violence that has made it one of the most dangerous places on Earth to inhabit. And the government in Iraq is desperately trying to curtail chaos and turmoil in a made-up country that in reality is three tribal federations battling for supremacy over the other.

Yes, with all this knowledge, Beck fully expects Clinton to still be in full support of this war and still be committed to "winning" the war. If not, she deserves to be reprimanded for being a hypocrite.

Unfortunately, yours truly is finding it tough to muster too much enthusiasm to join Beck's Clinton-bashing bandwagon. Admittedly, Clinton is now falling in line with her fellow Democrats in trying to paint themselves as being a bunch of peace doves (sadly hasn't always been the case), but why can't she change her mind?

Beck fully expects Clinton to still be in full support for this war and still be committed to "winning" the war.

In a New York Times article on Feb. 18, it was reported that Democratic strategists are in a panic and pleading with Clinton to call her Senate vote in 2002 a mistake and apologize to the nation in an effort to show she was wrong and not someone who changes their mind when they see fit.

I say, why should she apologize to everyone? Clinton should take the high ground and relish in her hypocrisy. Need we be reminded that this was a country full of war hawks that was told by its leader that we were in danger of losing our lives and freedom if Saddam's regime wasn't toppled in the immediate future? But there aren't too many people who are willing to be called a hypocrite.

I bet you would have a better chance of finding someone who doesn't puke when being reminded of the deplorable state of the NBA or when watching the soap opera gone bad World Wrestling Entertainment than finding someone who enjoys being called a hypocrite.

Just as an aside for wrestling fans, the tagline for WrestleMania 23 this year is "All Grown Up." Now wasn't this the same tagline that spelt disaster for Nickelodeon's "Rugrats" series?

Boston Globe columnist Jeff Jacoby jumped on the hypocrite-labeling bandwagon on Feb 18 when he wrote in his column that it's impossible to be in support of our troops in Iraq and at the same time be against the cause they are fighting for Jacoby called the two positions "irreconcilable," going on to blast the non-binding resolution issued by the House of Representatives – a resolution which stated Congress's lower house was against the war but still in support of the troops.

What planet are Beck and Jacoby calling home lately? How can one not support our troops while they are putting their lives on the line, but still be in opposition to why they were sent there in the first place? If that makes someone a hypocrite, he or she should embrace hypocrisy with open arms.

And it's now time for our president to adopt hypocrisy as the tagline for the next two years of his administration, or maybe one which says: "Grow Up." I'm sure the WWE wouldn't mind the resemblance to its own tagline.

Kevin Dooley can be reached at kdooley@student.umass.edu

WRITE US A LETTER

(550 WORD LIMIT)

Email at: editorial@dailycollegian.com

Take the money and run

Michael Cartwright

Would you be more upset if someone swung a sword at your torso in the "World of Warcraft" than if someone hit you with a real-life punch to the face? If you answered "yes" then you perhaps spend too much time and money playing a video game.

In fact, you are probably so passionate about this game that if you were to actually get punched in the face while playing it, you'd opt to let blood flow freely from your mouth and nose until the keyboard short-circuited. You'd have little problem looking like you blew a bunch of overcut cocaine with Pete Doherty because you'd ironically be far more focused on maintaining your character's health meter. It's quite possible you have sadly spent thousands of dollars on gaming guides, cheat codes and character points.

But maybe I'm the one missing something here? After all, lots of addicted gamers seem to be enjoying great financial success creating new plug-ins and selling their virtual souls online.

I recently met someone who sold his "World of Warcraft" character on eBay for $3,500. With any luck, the buyer is now satisfied enough with his "World of Warcraft" status to pay a visit to the World of Earth, and hopefully, the seller will take the $3,500 he bagged in exchange for his fantasy existence and begin saving up to buy a real one of his own, complete with non-pixilated human interaction.

Please don't take that the wrong way gamers; I have the utmost respect for each and every one of you Warcraft heads out there. I mean, honestly, I wish I cared half as much about my real life as you do your fake ones.

Now, I am in no way knocking video games – Sega Genesis helped me become the clueless derelict I am today. But let's pretend for a second that Sonic the Hedgehog was able to earn character points online with Tails and the rest of the gang back in 1995. Well, see, something tells me that no one in his right mind would have paid 350 bucks for a videogame character, never mind $3,500.

I recently met someone who sold his "World of Warcraft" character on eBay for $3,500.

Now Sonic simply ran, rolled and spun his way through simplistic 2-D levels. On the other hand, "World of Warcraft," at least superficially, is a computer game in the same complex vein as card and dice games "Magic: The Gathering" and the original uber-geek's game of choice, "Dungeons and Dragons." As much as I'd love to keep an open mind when it comes to these kinds of RPGs, I know that three and a half grand can fly you all over the globe, and people are out there spending it on something as intangible as a videogame character.

I realize I am late in addressing this "World of Warcraft" phenomenon. Hardcore gamers have been at it for quite a while now, but I haven't been able to go more than a few days this semester without hearing somebody mention it. It was only somewhat recently that I learned how absurdly the game's culture has progressed.

Three thousand five hundred dollars? Are you kidding me? Take the money, set it all aside and play the lottery everyday for the next nine and half years. Or invest it in the newest stock that crazy guy from "Mad Money" is talking about. Or better yet, take that mad money and hire a hit man to off the guy from "Mad Money." If none of those ideas seem appealing, how about walking up to a roulette table at Foxwoods and throwing it all down on double-zero?

These might be not be completely appropriate ways to spend $3,500, but somehow, each seems far more sensible than blowing nearly four G's on a computerized Warlock or Wizard or any other man of mysticism.

If one were truly a dedicated gamer, wouldn't he or she relish the challenge of building up a character his or herself, without any assistance? How many college kids can afford to spend this kind of money on a video game? And of those kids, who actually feels like it's something worth doing? Paying for character points seems just like searching online for cheat-codes, except you must dish out a half-semester's tuition to access the information.

OK, so I'm admittedly unaware of all the ins and outs of "World of Warcraft," but when we're talking about paying $3,500 to cheat a video game, how much more do I really need to know?

Well, now I'm almost considering taking a crack at this game computer geeks won't stop talking about. If I built up enough character points, I could get rid of some serious student debt. At the same time, I would be forced to sacrifice my social life entirely and would likely be unable to find a date for the next five to 10 years.

Ah, who the hell am I kidding? I may not be the guy who spends nights playing fantasy role-playing games, but I am the guy who just spent a night writing about people who do. I guess might as well give this thing a shot.

Attention members of the World of Warcraft: take me to your leader.

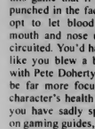
Michael Cartwright can be reached at mcartwri@student.umass.edu

Building U

...t present, a...ture:

...part se...

...tive We...s, we will ...develop ...and will be...



James Mathews

John W. Lederle, who served as University of Massachusetts President from 1960 to 1970, passed away two weeks ago this Tuesday. His influence on our school, visible to most in the ramshackle jungle of architecture that his many building initiatives left behind, is inescapable. It is certainly not the place of this or any publication to transform one man's death into an open debate on the value of his life or character, so in examining the monumental impact of Lederle's tenure, it is best that we proceed with reverence.

It was an act of reverence that, in 1983, bestowed his name upon the newly constructed Graduate Research Center, now known as the Lederle Graduate Research Center (LGRC). In 1994, a more popular act of reverence bestowed a far more esteemed name upon our much-loved library, dwarfing until now the importance of Lederle's legacy. Although it is hard for many students to imagine a UMass without the looming concrete façades of the central campus, the paved urban jungle of Southwest or the domineering Alexandrian library that seems somehow to tie it all together, each of these came under Lederle.

Also under his leadership came the approach to education that such construction inevitably represents – a push towards research as our campus's central emphasis, a near tripling of the number of paid professors and a massive increase in enrollment. In the short decade over which he helmed UMass, the seeds of our present academic environment had been sown.

What these contrasted images say about the place of our University in that turbulent time of American history is well beyond the capacity of words.

A quick tour of the campus has the potential to be more indicative of Lederle's complex legacy than any column or obituary. The LGRC itself, both in its black-lettered name and in the purposeful, industrial and towering scope of its edifice, speaks volumes to the changes in academic tenor that come with the rigors of research. Empty bookshelves in Goodell, the main library before the erection of the tower in 1974, give a glimpse of life on an older, smaller campus. In the Campus Center itself, two broad paintings on the ground level concourse, one of the old Agricultural Campus and another of the 1912 rope-pull, recall an even earlier era. However, to find the most potent illustration of the indefinable complexity of the Lederle years, one must take the escalators down to the basement level, ignore the sounds of ATMs and the network news on continuous play and simply look up.

The painting on the north wall of the campus center basement is concerned with nothing but UMass, the United States and the 1960s. The Beatles stare out from the campus pond. Martin Luther King, Jr. is reflected in the water. Juxtaposed with the Fine Arts Center is the famous image of a protester placing flowers in the barrels of National Guardsmen's guns. The lunar landscape looms large above. A lone astronaut stands dwarfed by his shadow. A rocket launches, an atomic bomb explodes and helmeted soldiers duck as they run past a silent Student Union. John F. Kennedy points off into the distance. The old North College is barely visible behind a half-constructed library. In front of the Campus Center lawn, two school dignitaries go about their ceremonious duties. The old Indian Chief on the lawn, reliable as a statue can be, looks to the horizon, his back turned.

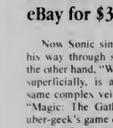
What these contrasted images say about the place of our University in that turbulent time of American history is well beyond the capacity of words. Safe it is to say that for better or worse, in a time of upheaval and uncertainty, Lederle went on steadily building, steadily bringing his institutional vision to life.

Today we live with that vision. We are comfortably funded, heavily involved in the world of grants, assistantship and graduate studies and buckled down under the weight of the bureaucracy that follows. However, as a large state school, we have yet to firmly establish our identity. There is a bit of irony to the fact that the SPIRE system, which has created more than its share of difficulties in attempting to do away with the nuisance of big-school paperwork, takes both its name and its symbol from the quaint Old Chapel at the center of the old campus. UMass may use such images from its past – be they of recreation, protest or architectural simplicity, in order to sell its image, but it is the Lederle legacy of research, spending and expansive construction that continues to define us today.

Any student of history is aware that the study of our cultural past is tied to more than just "learning from mistakes." Identity is always intertwined with history. Any young adult is aware that to understand themselves is in part to understand their parents, and their parents and so on. Without going too far into the realm of social psychology, I propose that the John W. Lederle be seen as the father of UMass as we know it. As his monumental story comes to an end, the time seems ripe to begin the task of understanding our University in its present state, in both its downfalls and its triumphs, so that we may leave own footprints on its future.

James Mathews can be reached at jhmathew@student.umass.edu

Not a Charlie-horse



Nick Milano

I was just trying to meet my friend at Downtown Crossing. I wanted to pay my five dollars, get my four tokens and board my train, but the Massachusetts Bay Transportation Authority (MBTA or simply the T) would have none of it. A surprisingly friendly T employee gave me a plastic card and showed me how to use a new metallic-silver machine to put five dollars on the card. I had to pinch myself. Could this really be the T I know?

The one with the same copper tokens in circulation since the turn of the century? The one with token machines that did not work half the time? The one with employees whose mission was to treat customers so badly they would never ride the T again?

This new system, the CharlieCard and CharlieTicket, faced much animosity before being fully implemented, but may be genius enough to wipe away most memories of occasions when the T failed miserably.

Having been away at school for four months, I came home to a different T. While still not enough has changed to cast aside the notion it will forever be the same government agency plagued by bureaucratic red tape and ill-advised decisions, there has been widespread improvement.

Anyone who has ever ridden the T has a reason to hate it. The unkempt buses and trains, inconsistent schedules and rude employees are enough to infuriate even the most laid-back passengers, but it is absolutely necessary for Boston to function. Without the T, which carries the fifth most passengers per day in the country, hundreds of thousands of people would be without a ride to work or school. As surely as mistakes do not go unnoticed, neither do the smallest of improvements. CharlieCard, a smart card that works like a debit card, finally stepped in and sent the token system to its long awaited grave.

Because Boston is the home of the first underground transit line in the United States, certain baggage comes with this long history. The stations, especially the older ones, are filthy and dank with very little circulation of air. Warm, rainy days are a disaster. Worst of all, for the past 80 years tokens were the means to pay for rides on the T.

In contrast to purchasing a token for every single ride and carrying the coins around like a child's first piggybank, one puts a certain amount of money on the card and each ride the fare is subtracted electronically. Cash is also no longer necessary because money can be added at a machine or over the Internet with a debit or credit card. The computers that put money on the card can be tricky, but the T has attempted to create a friendlier environment by having employees available at the machines to show how they are used.

Because Boston is the home of the first underground transit line in the United States, certain baggage comes with this long history.

Luckily, I did not have to figure out the puzzle on my own, but can understand why the T has received complaints. As with all new systems, it will take people time to get used to it, but riders will realize things work more smoothly in the computer age, shocking but true. When the money on the card runs down, the rider adds more to the same card, reusing infinite times.

The name of the card is taken from a 1948 folksong to which Charlie is stuck riding the Green Line because he does not have enough money to pay the exit fare because of a recent increase. Ironically, the CharlieCard will enable the T to raise fares with less controversy. When rides are bought individually, the person buying the token knows exactly how much he is spending. The smart card is like a credit card in how its user often does not realize how much money is actually being spent.

The T has far more detractors than defenders; there are several blogs, most famously "Charlie on the MBTA," dedicated solely to passengers who need to vent their frustrations. Furthermore, notorious incidents, like the purchase of 100 Green Line trains that do not even work, will always outweigh success stories like the CharlieCard.

Two hundred and fifteen million dollars was the preliminary cost for the new trains, but, as with all public projects, it failed to stay on budget. Twelve years and $316 million later, the procured trains are still restricted from operating on some portions of the Green Line. Now, the T is going through the process of introducing 94 new Blue Line cars, two of which recently arrived for testing. Another $250 million was spent on acquiring these cars and the obvious hope is there will no derailments like those that plagued the Green Line.

As a Taxachussetts resident, every time I pay sales tax, I am funding the MBTA, and all other taxpayers, wish taxes did not exist, but like the T they are a necessary evil. Therefore, I want to believe my money will not be wasted especially with the nightmare of the Big Dig fresh in my mind. The MBTA has, at times, put my tax dollars to waste, but should be praised when it uses them to install a system as sound as the CharlieCard.

Nick Milano can be reached at nmilano@student.umass.edu

The new system for the Boston subway seems to be working, but how well?

A daring music proposal

John Gruenenfelder

The online battlefield that is digital rights management (DRM) on music files. In the essay, Jobs presents some surprising views on the effectiveness of DRM, all the more interesting given Apple's place in the online music marketplace. Needless to say, his essay has generated quite a flurry of opinions and posturing by other companies involved in DRM and music.

For those of you who are unaware, DRM is a type of technology used to prevent you from performing certain actions with your digital media (i.e. music, movies, digital cable, etc.). A much better name for this would be Digital Copy Control, since that's really what is at the heart of the matter. For example, a common use is to prevent a person from copying a song from one iPod to another, or from having free control of an album you got off of Ruckus.

DRM extends far beyond music, too. Many computer software CDs contain DRM to prevent copying as do some music CDs. Even the connection between, say, a digital VCR and an HDTV is filled with encrypted signals designed to prevent you from doing anything with the signal that the media's producers don't want you to do.

In Jobs' essay he owns up to the fact that DRM "is a cat-and-mouse game" that will likely never be won, at least not in a fashion likely to placate the big music companies. Apple's iTunes music store uses a system called FairPlay to keep its customers in line. Every tune FairPlay is updated to address a new threat, enterprising hackers on the Internet release a new version of PlayFair which strips iTunes music files of their DRM. It's a never ending cycle. Realizing this, Jobs has suggested that everybody would be better off if music was sold without DRM just like ordinary music CDs are.

As this would be fantastic for customers, it goes without saying that the music industry is, on the whole, not very happy with the idea. To the big music companies, DRM-free music is a sign of the digital apocalypse.

As this would be fantastic for customers, it goes without saying that the music industry is, on the whole, not very happy with the idea.

DRM's problems extend beyond iTunes, too. Nearly every DRM format to date has been broken. That includes DVDs, CDs, online music and TV encryption. Even the brand-new controls on HD-DVDs and Blu-Ray discs have already been broken. Companies spend a fortune on these control schemes with grand promises made by their creators, and receive little in return. Anybody who seriously wants to copy a particular media format will find a way, and the Internet makes this a lot easier than you might think. And of course, DRM has an almost built-in ability to annoy customers.

It goes without saying that annoying customers is bad business, but the big music companies keep trying as hard as they can to spin it in a positive light. One of their favorite refrains is to claim that DRM is good for customers. As Macrovision, a company whose primary business is DRM, put it "DRM increases not decreases consumer value." Ok, sure. And water is not wet. The rational behind this claim is that the big studios won't sell their media online if there is no DRM. In reality, however, if customers really want to buy a particular product, then eventually some company will begin to sell that product. If people want to give you money (and we're talking about a lot of money here) then a company would be foolish to ignore that desire.

So, in this new battle we have companies who want to distribute music (Apple, Yahoo! Real Networks, etc.) on the DRM-free side, and the big music companies (EMI, Sony BMG, Universal and Warner) who are steadfastly pro-DRM. Customers aren't in that equation because right now it is a matter of money and control between large companies. Perhaps Jobs' essay was prompted by some moral standing, but more likely it's a business move. DRM costs money and without it, Apple and friends would make more profits on their music sales. Still customers can make a difference by supporting distributors that have taken the DRM-free stance.

Like nearly every music listener, I am wholly on the side of DRM-free music. To date the only music I have ever purchased online was from eMusic, a site which sells songs in plain DRM-free, MP3 format, though their catalog is necessarily limited. I can listen to that music effortlessly on my PC, my laptop and my portable player. If I could purchase DRM-free music from any store, I'd definitely do it more often, and the current battle of words indicates that there are many others who feel the same way.

John Gruenenfelder can be reached at jgruenen@student.umass.edu

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

ARTS & LIVING

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 28, 2007

ARTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

79th Oscar's have few surprises

An Inconvenient Truth and The Departed among highlights

An Inconvenient Truth director Davis Guggenheim celebrates with environmentalist Al Gore for winning the best documentary film award at the 79th Academy Awards at the Kodak Theater in Los Angeles, Calif. this past Sunday.

BY KATE BAUER
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Every year, weeks leading up to the Oscars are filled with a feverish frenzy of excitement. Movie experts analyze who will win what category and why, designers throw themselves at celebrities in hopes of getting them to name-drop on the red carpet. Barbara Walters and Oprah host Oscar specials. Stage production workers begin the laborious job of rolling out that 800-foot red carpet.

And yet with all the hype, this year's Oscars were a surprisingly unexciting affair, despite a wide open Best Picture race and some surprising wins in other categories. Focusing on its most diverse group of nominees in its history, the Oscars were all about celebrating the historic event. The Academy also took the time to honor those other categories — the ones everyone usually likes to refer to as the fillers. Salute to foreign films, costume design, screenwriting and American movies were acknowledged categories often put in second place to bigger-name categories like Best Director or Actor, showing that this year's ceremony was a humble affair. And who better to make it a humble year with a humble host?

Ellen DeGeneres started off the ceremony a bit awkwardly, with a rather mundane monologue and a weird interruption of choir singers. The host played it safe for her first trip to the Oscars, but the emcee made up for the slow start throughout the ceremony with some truly funny and original moments, including vacuuming the theatre's carpet and casually handing her script to Martin Scorsese in the audience. Probably her biggest laughs of the night had to go to the mention of her own Ellen Oscar Bjorn Carrier.

The Oscars also tried to shake things up a bit this year. Instead of following the tradition of past ceremonies, this year's Oscars changed up its awards list, choosing Art Direction as the first award to be announced instead of the traditional Best Supporting Actress award. Why? Thanks to falling ratings, the Academy probably hoped hype would build for the bigger awards at the end. While this strategy did work, some early surprises proved that this year's award winners weren't who we expected them to be.

Some attempts were made to liven the ceremony, including a crack from Inconvenient Truth winner Al Gore's refuted attempt at announcing his campaign to run for President. Will Smith and Jack Black, along with John C. Reilly, delivered a funny number about the Academy's lack of nominations for comedies. The Dreamgirls cast's song numbers helped to get the crowd clapping along and proving why Hudson earned her Oscar, though it looked during the performance like she was in danger of falling out of her dress.

Overall the ceremony's production went smoothly, except for some interesting bumps and bangs from what sounded like sound problems. And what was with the camera switching over to a snoring Jack Nicholson during Thelma Schoonmaker's acceptance speech for Best Achievement in Editing for The Departed? Did he think the film was really boring, or the acceptance speech? As for the contortionist dancers, while creating entertaining silhouettes of the crack from Inconvenient Truth winner Al Gore's refuted attempt at announcing his campaign to run for President. Will Smith and Jack Black, along with John C. Reilly, delivered a funny number about the Academy's lack of nominations for comedies. The Dreamgirls cast's song numbers helped to get the crowd clapping along and proving why Hudson earned her Oscar, though it looked during the performance like she was in danger of falling out of her dress.

See OSCARS on page 7

Philly songwriter to perform tonight

Mirah from Philadelphia signed with K Records in 2000 after performing backing vocals and guitar for Phil Elvrum's debut album.

BY ALEX HORNBECK
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Tonight Mirah will be playing the Iron Horse in Northampton, a fact most likely unimpressive to those unfamiliar with the artist. This marks the first time in three and a half years that Mirah has toured the Northeast. In November 2003 she played at Smith College and fans have been eagerly awaiting another appearance ever since.

Born and raised outside of Philadelphia, Mirah (full name Mirah Yom Tov Zeitlyn) attended school in Olympia, Wash. and resides there now. After befriending Phil Elvrum of The Microphones, Mirah provided backing vocals and guitar for his group's 1999 debut album, "Don't Wake Me Up." Soon after its release, she signed to K Records and, with the help of Elvrum, released her own debut in 2000, "You Think It's Like This But Really It's Like This." Mirah presented a set of intimate songs with decidedly lo-fi instrumentation built around her stunning voice, reportedly known in Olympia as "the sexiest voice in rock."

The album was a success, and with her sophomore album "Advisory Committee" released a year later in 2001, Mirah began to generate substantial attention in the world of independent music. Though Mirah's voice remains the centerpiece of her second album, its heightened production makes for an almost theatrical feeling, successfully creating a freshly dramatic set for her intimate songs.

She released two collaborative albums in the years to come: "Songs from the Black Mountain Project" with Ginger Brooks Takahashi debuted in 2003, followed by "To All We Stretch the Open Arm" with the Black Cat Orchestra in 2004. Later that year, Mirah released her eagerly-anticipated third solo album, "C'mon Miracle." The album found her experimenting even further with

See MIRAH on page 7

Amherst College hosts "Monologues"

The "Vagina Monologues" has been performed for the past 10 years at Amherst College. The play is a staple on college campuses nationwide.

BY ALEXANDRA LAPKIN
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

Amherst College held its 10th annual performance of Eve Ensler's award-winning play, "The Vagina Monologues," this past weekend, to participate in worldwide V-day benefits. This year's V-day theme is "Seeking Peace," which, as described by Sexual Assault Counselor at Amherst College, Gretchen Krull, connects the desire to end armed conflict to the desire to find peace from sexual violence. To compile "The Vagina Monologues,"

Ensler interviewed hundreds of women in the U.S. and abroad to get a sense of how women approached their sexuality. She asked such questions as "Have you ever had an orgasm?" or "What do you call your vagina?" Among others, Ensler told the stories of a Bosnian refugee who survived rape camps and a Long Island antiques dealer who's never had an orgasm. Out of these interviews, she created stories, which ranged from outrageous, scandalous, empowering and tragic to heartwarming and funny.

The 18 monologues of the play, directed by Ellen Ferrin, are intended to both entertain and educate its audience, as the mystique, humor, pain, wisdom and excitement of female sexuality are explored. More importantly, however, "The Vagina Monologues" spread awareness about violence against women during World War II and the Bosnian conflict, in addition to sexual assault, experienced by many women in the U.S every day. Ensler's play is as relevant today as it was 10 years ago, because these crimes have continued to occur in Iraq, Darfur and Sudan.

"The Vagina Monologues" are especially pertinent to college students, since sexual assault is prevalent on college campuses throughout the country: as many as one out of five college women is raped in her lifetime. The final monologue, "Women of Amherst," was dedicated to this issue, as the cast shared personal stories. The coordinator of the performance, Krull,

See MONOLOGUES on page 7

Tally Hall returning to Pioneer Valley

Detroit rock band last appeared in Valley in 2006

BY MATTHEW CARMALIADES
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

Looking for something interesting, entertaining and most of all, fun to do this week? Check out the Iron Horse Music Hall in Northampton where the zany pop-rock quintet Tally Hall will be performing Thursday night, Feb. 29. The band, which prides itself on its genre-defying, flippant music, has built a rabid following in its native Ann Arbor, Mich. and keep growing in popularity as it tours across South America. This is their second performance in the Pioneer Valley. Last year the band opened for Zox.

Tally Hall formed in 2002 when the five musicians attended the University of Michigan and soon became a cult hit in the Northwest region. Today their concerts routinely sell out. The band's rise to popularity, nationally began in 2004 when keyboardist Adam Horowitz [illegible] awarded the John Lennon Scholarship by Lennon's widow Yoko Ono and BMI music group, for his song "Good Day."

The group parlayed that honor with fame into a full-length album, 2005's "Marvin's Marvelous Mechanical Museum." The album is named after a local museum of mechanical wonders in Michigan. The disc, featuring "Good Day" as the album's first track. Since then, they have played on MTV's "You Hear it First," as well as the "Late Late Show with Craig Ferguson" and late last year, "Good Day" was featured on the FOX show "The OC."

Their popularity can be [illegible] attributed to grassroots online efforts than any of their forays into the mainstream media. Joe Hawley, one of the lead guitarists and singers, [illegible]

See TALLY on page 7

Tally Hall may sound nothing like The Beatles, but that does not stop them from dressing like them for their concerts.

Scorsese finally wins Oscar

Martin Scorsese finally won his first Oscar for Best Director last Sunday night. Scorsese had been previously nominated five times.

Jerry Seinfeld on stage at the 79th Academy Awards at the Kodak Theater in Los Angeles, Calif. last Sunday.

OSCARS from page 6

head? It's for the film The Bucket List, in the film Nicholson plays a cancer patient.

THE WINNERS

Letters From Iwo Jima was the big winner for Best Sound Editing, beating out Pirates of the Caribbean. More surprisingly Happy Feet beat out Disney's star studded Cars for Best Animated Feature. Many, including me, thought Children of Men would take Best Cinematography, but alas it lost out to Pan's Labyrinth. As for Best Supporting Actor, though Alan Arkin's win for Little Miss Sunshine over Eddie Murphy in Dreamgirls wasn't entirely unexpected, it proved that maybe it's not a good idea to release a film like Norbit during Oscar season, especially if you're a nominee.

Probably the biggest surprise of the night? The Best Original Song category. Almost a guaranteed win for Dreamgirls, who had three out of the five nominations for "Listen," "I Love You I Do" and "Patience," the film lost out to An Inconvenient Truth's "I Need To Wake Up," which was written and composed by Melissa Etheridge. Biggest upset? I'd have to go with Pan's Labyrinth, which picked up Best Art Direction, Cinematography and Makeup before losing to Germany's The Lives of Others.

Most moving speech had to go to Forest Whitaker, who gave a nod to his first experience with movies and hopes to carry the honor of winning throughout the rest of his career.

The ceremony also included some international acceptance speeches, for the Documentary Short winner The Blood of Yingzhou District, and Honorary Oscar Winner Ennio Morricone.

The ceremony was also filled with a large number of presenters, including Jessica Biel (the white version of J.Lo's butt), and Bond himself, Daniel Craig. Anne Hathaway and Emily Blunt delivered the best in-character moment, presenting for Best Costume Design, stepping into their The Devil Wears Prada characters, who forgot to get "Miranda" her coffee. The camera eventually cut away to reveal Meryl Streep, who played the devil incarnate magazine editor Miranda Priestly in The Devil Wears Prada, playing along with the monologue giving the girls her "stare of death."

By the end of the over-extended night, thanks to all those movie montages, all five nominees for Best Picture had taken at least one trophy, with Little Miss Sunshine and The Departed tied for two wins each. Thanks to Scorsese's long overdue win for Best Director, The Departed raised its count to three. Chuckling during his acceptance speech, Scorsese commented, "could you double check the envelope?"

Finally reaching the last award of the night, Jack Nicholson and Diane Keaton took the stage to present the Best Picture Award. The award went to The Departed, proving that even movies with all that cussing and death can take the top prize.

Kate Bauer can be reached at kbauer a student umass edu

Notable Winners for 79th Academy Awards

Best Motion Picture: The Departed

Lead Actor: Forest Whitaker, The Last King of Scotland

Lead Actress: Helen Mirren, The Queen

Supporting Actor: Alan Arkin, Little Miss Sunshine

Supporting Actress: Jennifer Hudson, Dreamgirls

Directing: Martin Scorsese, The Departed

Adapted Screenplay: William Monahan, The Departed

Original Screenplay: Michael Arndt, Little Miss Sunshine

Animated Feature Film: Happy Feet

Art Direction: Pan's Labyrinth

Documentary Feature: An Inconvenient Truth

Northwest artists bring music to Noho

Even though Mirah has only released three solo albums, she is highly regarded as one of today's best up and coming singer songwriters.

MIRAH from page 6

her sound, adding electronic beats to some songs, loud distorted guitars to others and even including a fleeting accordion.

In November of last year, Mirah released "Joyride," a remix album containing contributions from a variety of musicians including pop producer Guy Sigsworth, fellow K Records artists Tender Forever and Elvrum (here as Mt. Eerie) and many others. Though she's only released three actual solo albums, Mirah stands out as one of the most talented songwriters today.

Tonight's show is a co-bill and Mirah will be sharing the stage with Portland-based The Blow. After spending time playing with Elvrum as part of The Microphones, Khaela Maricich, one half of the band known as The Blow, began to self-released music under the name of "Get the Hell Out of the Way of the Volcano" in 2001. In 2002, she released an EP on K Records under the name The Blow and has been known as such ever since.

She released her first full-length album as The Blow, "The Concussive Caress," in 2003. The year after that she began playing music with electronic artist Jona Bechtolt, the second half of the pop-duo (who has his own one-man band YACHT) and the two released a limited-edition EP, "Poor Aim," in 2005. Maricich was so pleased with the collaboration that she invited Bechtolt to permanently join the group. The two released "Paper Television," their first full-length as a duo, at the end of 2006.

The Blow last played the Northampton area in September of last year, opening for Architecture in Helsinki. Bechtolt was then on tour as YACHT and Maricich performed solo. This year Bechtolt is the one touring with Architecture in Helsinki, which means audiences can again expect an energetic solo show from Maricich. Her personal songs with an often humorous bend are backed by quirky electronic beats programmed by Bechtolt. Concertgoers can expect to dance, especially when aided by Maricich's playful prancing about the stage.

Tonight's show brings together two extremely talented songwriters from the Northwest. Seeing how infrequently Mirah tours, this is truly a rare opportunity and any fans of great songwriting would be remiss in not looking tonight's concert. The show starts at 8:30 p.m. Tickets are $10 in advance and $12 at the door.

Alex Hornbeck can be reached at ahornbeck a student umass edu

Tally Hall gathering popularity on Web

TALLY from page 6

ers, a former film major at the University of Michigan added enormously popular on video site albinoblacksheep.com, their obtuse, short and hilarious clips. This translated into even more exposure and their videos soon spread to YouTube.com and other video sites.

Explaining their sound is a bit like explaining the taste of the wings at The Hangar, it might be the same chicken, but it all depends on which flavor you pick. Each song has its own style and they like to jump around, whether it be a Franz Ferdinand-esque tune in "The Bidding," a reggae beat in "Banana Man" or even a bit of electro in "Taken for a Ride," the band usually pulls it off with all the required zeal of a band belonging on the Billboard charts.

While each has his own instrument specialty, all but their drummer Ross Federman share in the singing duties, frequently using harmony to enhance the overall sound. Much like the Beatles in the early 1960's, they have made a trademark of their clothing with all five guys dressing in unassuming, white button down shirts, each with a different solid color tie for all public appearances and performances.

The Casual Fiasco, another genre-eschewing band from Burlington, Vt. will be opening the show.

The concert starts at 10 p.m., with doors opening at 9 p.m. Tickets are $8 advanced purchase, $10 at the door. Tickets are selling out, act fast.

Matthew Caballaldes can be reached at mcaballa student umass edu

"Monologues" to donate profit to NELCWIT

MONOLOGUES from page 6

informed the audience of the various services to the victims of sexual assault the Five Colleges provide, such as counseling and health services. Advocates from counseling services were present in the audience to provide support and assistance to those who were seeking help.

The proceeds from the performance will go the New England Learning Center for Women in Transition (NELCWIT), which supports local women and children who have experienced sexual and domestic violence. The cast hopes to raise $6,000 this year for donation to NELCWIT, which is a non-profit organization located in Greenfield, Mass. Massachusetts State Representative Ellen Story and local business owners have donated memorabilia, gift certificates and other prizes to "The Vagina Monologues raffle," in support of NELCWIT.

Alexandra Lapkin can be reached at alapkin a student umass. edu

Seeking Advice?

Starting Mon. March 5th, The Daily Collegian will print an advice column. If you'd like some advice about anything, email Veronica Garrett, Advice Columnist, at vgarrett@student.umass.edu

BITE ME!

Pizza Shark Plus presents Two-for-one Mondays

Buy any large pizza, get a second large pizza FREE with your UMass ID

Cheese $12.00	Pepperoni $14.00	Pesto $17.00
Teriyaki Steak $18.00	BBQ Chicken $17.00	Antipasto $18.00
Buffalo Chicken $17.00	Seafood $18.00	White Pizza $14.00
Mediterranean $17.00	Roasted Veggie $17.00	Margherita $17.00
Shark Therapy $17.00	Honey Mustard Chicken $18.00

(413) 259-4259

17B Montague Road, Amherst MA 01002

higher price prevails, must show UMass ID at time of purchase, offer expires 9/17/06

Observatory to open for annual lunar eclipse

By Teresa Reilly
Collegian Staff

The moon will turn red on Mar. 3. The Earth will stand perfectly in-between the sun and moon creating the first total lunar eclipse visible this year.

Starting at 6 p.m., the Orchard Hill Observatory will open its doors to curious students. This rare event lasts only two to three hours, but will go through a couple of different stages.

When the people of Amherst see it, the eclipse will have been already happening for a few hours. So when the sun sets and the moon rises, it will already be in full force.

A full lunar eclipse only happens once or twice a year. A couple of things have to happen perfectly in order for us to see it.

Ross Dubois, the man in charge of the observatory, explained it well. He grabbed a plastic cup that was lying on the cement floor and a flashlight off the shelf – "A good thing about astronomy is that you can use almost anything to demonstrate," said Dubois.

The massive telescope in the middle of the room was the sun. The plastic cup was the Earth and the flashlight was the moon. The cup revolved around the telescope. The flashlight revolved around the cup. The telescope "emits light." When the flashlight gets in between the telescope and cup, the cup can't see the lighted side of the flashlight. But as the flashlight rotates, the cup can gradually see more and more of the lighted side of the flashlight. When the cup can see all of the lighted side of the flashlight, that is our full moon..

However, the flashlight doesn't move perfectly around the cup. It rotates at a five-degree angle (the trick to remember here is that everything is on a three dimensional plane). So once or twice a year, the flashlight moves perfectly into the shadow of the cup, giving us our lunar eclipse.

But the moon will be a "midnight wine red" that night. This is all thanks to prisms. "Have you ever seen the cover of the Pink Floyd album 'Dark Side of the Moon?'" asked Dubois. The cover shows a triangle (a prism) that has a ray of white light coming in on one side with red, yellow and blue coming out the other. The sun gives off that ray of white light and our atmosphere acts as the prism. Only our atmosphere doesn't allow blue light to pass through, so the red and yellow colors will be reflected onto the moon that is in the Earth's shadow, giving it its red tint.

The moon won't be the only thing interesting in the sky that night. "Saturn is always a show stopper," said Dubois. On any given clear Thursday night, the observatory is open for visitors from 7:30-9:30 p.m. They regularly have about 60 students come up to see the stars.

Dubois undertook the project of running the observatory only a year ago and has already began to make some improvements. The lunar eclipse will be the second event that the Observatory has held. The first was the meteor shower on Dec. 14, 2006.

An estimated 200 students showed up to gaze at the Geminid meteor shower. There were supposed to be about 70-80 meteors per hour but because of poor conditions, students only got to see approximately ten per hour. "I don't think people left disappointed though," said Dubois.

Getting 200 people to the top of Orchard Hill in the middle of December isn't an easy task for one man. Dubois is trying to make the observatory much more apart of the UMass campus.

"We think [the telescope] is about 40 years old," said Dubois. Rust stains line the crevices and more than one part of it doesn't work quite right. A function that is suppose to rotate the telescope at the same rate as the night sky only stays on track for about five minutes.

As he closes the small circular brick room before he leaves, Dubois throws a large clear tarp over the telescope so that the rain or snow that leaks through the crack in the dome doesn't ruin it. telescope.

Teresa Reilly can be reached at treilly@student.umass.edu.

Due to Amherst's location, the lunar eclipse on Saturday will be already in progress as the sun begins to set. The Orchard Hill Observatory will be the best spot on campus to observe the lunar eclipse.

Insight comes from all directions.
You bring something unique to the table, and at Ernst & Young, you'll be encouraged to speak up and contribute. Because we know that bringing together people with different backgrounds and perspectives lets us deliver quality results for our clients. It's why we've created a work environment of mutual respect that promotes your personal and professional growth and success. So visit us on campus or at ey.com/us/careers
FORTUNE 100 BEST COMPANIES TO WORK FOR 2007
Audit • Tax • Transaction Advisory Services
ERNST & YOUNG
Quality In Everything We Do

Classic books on tape

Classic Kurt Vonnegut novels are being re-released in audio formats.

By Sandy Baebs
The Philadelphia Inquirer

There's something undeniably eerie about listening to Kurt Vonnegut's 1973 novel "Breakfast of Champions" he says it's a 50th birthday present to himself – and realizing it's just as relevant today as it was then.

It has such glorious rants, like the one about Veterans Day, which he still reveres as Armistice Day.

On that day in 1918, "millions upon millions of human beings stopped butchering one other," he writes. "I have talked to old men who were on battlefields during that minute. They have told me in one way or another that the sudden silence was the voice of God. So we still have among us some men who can remember clearly when God spoke to mankind."

Armistice Day, he says, is "sacred. Veterans Day is not."

He carries on about the "evil nonsense" taught to U.S. schoolchildren – such as that 1492 was the date North America was discovered, when "actually, millions of human beings were already living full and imaginative lives on the continent in 1492. That was simply the year in which sea pirates began to cheat and rob and kill them."

And so on. What's not to love?

Maybe that's the reason so many of his books are still available and coming out on audio.

This month, Brilliance Audio released an MP3 recording of "Hocus Pocus", read by George Ralph.

It's the fictional autobiography of a soldier who was in charge of the evacuation of Saigon at the close of the Vietnam War. In 2001, he's arrested for helping 10,000 convicts escape from prison.

Brilliance's Eileen Hutton thinks Vonnegut resonates today "because our lives have been made more – not less – complicated by all the layers of technology and the glut of information constantly swirling around us. He made no secret of his dislike for the way science and technology can dehumanize life in our civilization."

She recalls him saying in an interview that "life happens too fast for you ever to think about it. If you could just persuade people of this, but they insist on amassing information."

Junior Gary Forbes is playing his best basketball of the season at the perfect time. He scored 13 points in Saturday's 53-50 win over Saint Louis, and is tied for second on the team in scoring with 13.4 points per game. The Minutemen host La Salle in the final home game of the season tonight.

Minutemen host Explorers

M. BASKETBALL from page 12

be crowned co-champions, but Xavier will be the No. 2 seed in the A-10 Tournament and UMass will be the No. 3 seed.

The Minutemen's three losses in the conference came against Xavier, Rhode Island and Temple all on the road. After the Fordham win the Minutemen visited Dayton before UMass beat the Flyers, 77-69, the first time Dayton was defeated at home all season. The Flyers were 14-0 at home, but 14 home games before the loss to UMass.

St. Bonaventure fell victim to a UMass squad firing on all cylinders. The Minutemen smashed the Bonnies, 93-61. Sophomore Luke Bonner scored a career-high 23 points and freshman guard Ricky Harris also notched a career-high 14 points.

Junior James Life recovered from a scoreless game with a huge 3-pointer with just under two minutes left in the game to give the Minutemen a 49-47 lead. Life finished with a 3-point play down two free throws in the final minute.

The Minutemen will honor the seniors before they take the court for the last time at the Mullins Center. Seniors Rashaun Freeman, Stephane Lasme, Jason Sola, Alex Peters and Brandon Thomas will all be playing their last home game tonight.

Lasme and Freeman have had prolific careers as members of the Minutemen. They've compiled a 140-61 overall record in their time wearing a UMass jersey and the Minutemen have been 20-4 at the Mullins Center over the last two years.

Life is eighth in career 3-pointers with 141 and needs one more to tie for 10th in the single-season list. Life was transferred to UMass from junior college for the second time and for UMass coach Travis Ford's first year in the 2005-06 season.

Rob Greenfield can be reached at rgreenfi@umass.edu

Freeman and Lasme deserve much praise

PICARD from page 12

But with everything he has accomplished as a Minuteman, Freeman has never tasted victory in the Atlantic 10 Tournament.

There's still one more chance.

"He has deserved to have success as a team in the win column because of everything he's done," Ford said. "Ray has put a lot of hard work and sweat into this basketball program. He has represented UMass in a first-class manner, and not only on the court, but off the court as well."

Then you have his partner in crime, Lasme. This guy isn't just tall. He's the longest individual on the face of the earth. And maybe that has something to do with him being the No. 2 shot-blocker in the nation with 140 this season.

Lasme is averaging five rejections per game, and surpassed Cambly earlier this year as the top shot-blocker in UMass history.

His offense hasn't lacked either. Lasme became just the eighth player in NCAA history to record three triple-doubles in a single season with his 18-point, 12-rebound and 11-block performance against Rhode Island nearly three weeks ago.

"[Stephane] is a leader on this basketball team," Ford said. "He gains the utmost respect because I think all the players realize there's no hidden agenda to Stephane Lasme. He works extremely hard everyday. He's not going to pull any punches.

"He's got the ultimate respect from all his teammates because he is a very mature individual, and he calls it the way he sees it. He's really improved as a basketball player."

But maybe you haven't seen their dominance. Actually, you probably haven't, given there's an average of a few thousand empty seats every game.

Now I'm not here to tell you what to do with your free time, but I can tell you what Freeman and Lasme do with theirs. They practice free throws, work on their defense and run plays. And, oh yeah, they carry the team every game on their backs, all in an effort to bring your beloved Minutemen into the NCAA Tournament so you can riot your life away on Selection Sunday.

So there you have it.

The Rashaun Freeman and Stephane Lasme farewell tour leaves tonight. And they're never walking back through that door.

The least you could do is thank them.

Danny Picard is a Collegian columnist. He can be reached at dpicard@student.umass.edu

Senior Stephane Lasme (left) plays his final game at the Mullins Center tonight in the second-to-last game of the year.

Kostka continues to take advantage

HOCKEY from page 12

Anderson's best statistical year was his freshman campaign, when he recorded 31 points over 36 games, netting 10 goals and adding 21 assists.

After redshirting his sophomore year with an injury, Anderson returned in 2004-05, scoring 20 points in just 18 games, with seven goals and 13 helpers. His numbers began to decline during his junior year, when he recorded identical numbers to the previous season, but over double the number of games.

This year started out similarly for the West Islip, N.Y. native – he did not score his first goal until the sixth game of the year, at Providence – and Calhoun took notice, relegating his team captain to the fourth line.

However, down the stretch, Anderson has shown glimpses of the sometimes-flashy, sometimes-gritty play he brings to the rink. The center man has scored five points in his last eight games – essentially since the spring semester began.

Excluding a weekend split with Vermont in Burlington, Anderson is averaging a point per game over the last month of the season.

Taking what they give you

Junior Mike Kostka's offensive tendencies this year could best be described as, well, opportunistic. The assistant captain has tallied three goals this year while playing in all 32 games for the Minutemen.

What makes this statistic so interesting is that while Kostka has found the net three different times, he has yet to have to beat a goaltender to do so. That's right, every one of Kostka's goals has come via the empty net.

His first goal came in against UMass Lowell on Jan. 26 in a 6-3 victory for the Minutemen. UMass had already scored four goals in the third period to go up 5-3 when Kostka found the back of the net with 28 seconds remaining.

The Ajax, Ont. native added two more freebies this weekend, scoring on an unattended net in each of UMass' wins over Northeastern.

Kostka iced a 1-0 game Friday night with just 11 seconds left, sending a shot from the red line into the Huskies' goal, while netminder Brad Thiessen watched from the bench.

Then in another one-goal game, Kostka did the same thing Sunday afternoon, this time from the UMass blue line. With the score 4-3, he added some insurance with just over a minute left, bring Thiessen back onto the ice for the final minute of play. Anyone watching hockey inside the Mullins Center this weekend should make sure they get to the game in time for the opening face off. The Black Bears and the Minutemen rank first and second, respectively, in first-period goals. Maine has netted 35 goals in the opening frame, while UMass has scored 32. The Minutemen could be the most explosive team in the game this weekend. The Black Bears lead all teams in Hockey East in shots per game, converting [illegible] time. Conversely, UMass [illegible] in the league, while posting a [illegible] percent.

Jerom Riley can be reached at jeriley@student.umass.edu

With injuries hampering Chris Davis, Matt Burtt[illegible] seen a lot of time on the Minutemen's top line recently.

Hairston earns Player of the Year honor

A-10 Basketball

By Mike Gillmeister
Collegian Correspondent

The Temple Owls continue to produce quality basketball players. After the two-year reign of Candice Dupree, senior forward Kamesha Hairston has achieved the Atlantic 10 Player of the Year accolade. She was also named to the All-Conference First-Team.

Hairston had a stellar season, earning five Conference Player of the Week awards and statistics show her progress as well. A Toledo native, Hairston boasted 19.3 points per game (first in A-10) 11 double-doubles (tied for first) and 8.8 rebounds per game (third).

The Owls have won 19 of their last 21 games en route to a 23-6 record (13-1 A-10), marking their fourth straight 20-win season.

Northern comfort

Proving that "southern comfort" is not indicative of the entire country, junior center Lady Comfort of the Temple Owls was named the A-10 Most Improved Player of the Year. Comfort has improved significantly from a solid rookie season as a role player to a dominant emerging leader. She has improved in various areas of the game such as points per game (from 7.4 to 13.0 per game) and rebounds (from 6.2 to 6.8 per game).

Comfort also headlines an All-Conference Second Team that includes Saint Joseph's senior guard Ayahna Comish, Xavier guard Suntana Granderson, George Washington junior guard Sara-Jo Lawrence and senior forward Crista Ricketts of La Salle.

The Owls look to rebound in the A-10 Tournament after a disappointing loss to the mighty George Washington Colonials by a score of 56-53. Comfort notched nine points and 13 rebounds in 34 minutes of action.

One more for the trophy case

GW junior guard Kimberly Beck has had quite the decorated season.

In addition to being named the top point guard in the country by the Rotary Club of Detroit and being named to the A-10 All-Conference First Team and A-10 Defensive Team, Beck has been named the A-10 Defensive Player of the year as well.

She also proved that she deserved such awards by putting up six points and three steals in the No. 9 Colonials' narrow victory over Temple.

Beck has become a staple within the league this year by earning Co-Player of the Week on three occasions. However, she has demonstrated unselfish play by leading the conference in assists (5.48 per game).

One of the many reasons that the Colonials are such a force this season is the scoring numbers they put up on both sides of the ball. GW ranks 19th in the nation in scoring defense [illegible] with Beck leading the way. She led George Washington to a 20-win record [illegible] its highest [illegible] since the 1996-97 season.

[illegible] GW [illegible] at Hofstra.

Check out WWW.DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM for more sports action.

Looking for business experience??

The Daily Collegian is currently seeking qualified applicants to fill the positions of:

- Business Manager
- Assistant Business Manager
- Distribution Manager

Contact Daniel Conti at 413-545-3500 for more information or stop by The Collegian in the basement of the Campus Center.

FRUSTRATED? PUZZLED? DO YOU HAVE:

A grade dispute?

Teacher, roomate or job concerns?

Billing problems?

...or any other University related problems?

THE OMBUDS OFFICE CAN HELP

(confidentially, of course)

Serving the students, faculty, and staff of the Umass Community

823 Campus Center
Office Hours: 8:00 a.m. - 5:00 p.m.
Telephone: 413 - 545 - 0867
fax: 413 - 545 - 9720
e-mail: ombuds@ombuds.umass.edu

Hawks can get on map

A-10 BASKETBALL from page 12

Cintas Center. The Hawks got the win over the Musketeers in Philadelphia on Jan. 21, 82-74.

Their last A-10 defeat came at the hands of the Duquesne Dukes (10-17, 6-9 A-10) on Jan. 31, 93-91. In Xavier's last six games, which have included wins over A-10 contenders Rhode Island (17-12, 10-5 A-10) and George Washington (18-8, 9-5 A-10), the Musketeers are out-scoring opponents by an astounding 22 points a night. Their most recent win came on the road against the Dayton Flyers (16-11, 8-8 A-10), a team which has lost only twice at home all season in 16 games. The other team to take down the Flyers at home were the Massachusetts Minutemen (21-7, 11-3 A-10).

The Musketeers also have strong non-conference wins to add to their NCAA Tournament resume, including two wins over Villanova and Illinois.

Xavier is no stranger to the NCAA Tournament, having earned a spot in the Field of 64 seven times in the last 10 years, including a trip to the Elite Eight in 2004.

Individual accolades have also come Xavier's way during this winning streak, as guard Drew Lavender was named A-10 Player of the Week Sunday. In two wins over URI and Dayton, the junior guard averaged 24.5 points and shot 60 percent from the field. Lavender was also a perfect 16-of-16 from the charity stripe. For the season, Lavender is averaging 10.4 points a game and is ranked second in the conference in assists (4.4). George Washington senior guard Carl Elliot is still the only player averaging over five assists per game in the conference.

SLEEPER TEAM?

Even though Saint Joseph's has been flying under the radar this season, it would actually be the fifth seed if the postseason started today. The Hawks will have a chance to put their names on the map and possibly earn a first-round bye in the conference tournament if they are able to win one of their two remaining games against the top dogs in the league, Xavier and UMass.

Hawks coach Phil Martelli's squad already has quality wins notched under its belt over two of the top four teams in the conference, including Rhode Island and George Washington. They also battled the Musketeers in a losing effort earlier in the season, 86-81.

The Hawks are a gritty bunch on the defensive side of the ball, coming into Wednesday's game ranked third in the league in scoring defense, allowing 66.7 points a night, which is only behind the Fordham Rams (15-11, 8-6 A-10) and the St. Louis Billikens (17-11, 7-7 A-10). St. Joe's may have an advantage come tournament time over these two schools, however, considering the Hawks are averaging over seven more points a night than the Rams and Billikens.

Also in St. Joe's favor heading into the A-10 Tourney is the fact that they are currently the top ranked free-throw shooting team in the conference. The Hawks are shooting a solid 77 percent from the charity stripe.

But history may not be on the side of the Hawks come tournament time. Only one other fifth seed, the West Virginia Mountaineers in 1984, has won the A-10 Championship. The lowest seed to win the tournament was Xavier in last season when they were the 10th seed.

THE RACE FOR THE LAST SPOT

No, it's not the race all A-10 fanatics will be glued to Gametracker watching, but its worth mentioning that there is still one spot left in the A-10 Tournament field of 12 teams. The St. Bonaventure Bonnies (7-20, 4-10 A-10), Richmond Spiders (3-11, 7-20) and La Salle Explorers (10-18, 3-11 A-10) all have two games left and are all vying to grab the last spot in the tournament.

If the season were to end today, the Bonnies would have the 12th spot secured and play St. Joe's in the first round. St. Bonaventure may also have the easiest road to the postseason among the three last-place contenders, as their final two game come against teams with a combined 14-14 record. The Bonnies host Fordham tonight, a team which they lost to, 67-61, earlier in the season and then travel to play the Charlotte 49ers (13-14, 6-8 A-10) on Saturday.

If La Salle is to clinch a spot in the A-10 fourney, they will not only need St. Bonaventure to lose both of its games, but also have to win their final two games of the year, which may be a harder end of the bargain to keep. The Explorers have dates with the top two teams in conference to close out the regular season, as they take on UMass tonight at the Mullins Center and then must play Xavier at home.

The Richmond Spiders may have the toughest road to hoe, however, as they must win their final two games against St. Louis at home and then travel to Rhode Island Saturday. If they're able to accomplish that daunting task, they then have to hope for St. Bonaventure to lose at least one of its remaining games and for La Salle to lose their remaining two games since the Explorers would win the tiebreaker over the Rams.

Kevin Dunley can be reached at kdunley@student.umass.edu

Saint Joseph's is currently in fifth place in the Atlantic 10 standings with a 9-5 conference record and a 17-11 overall record. The Hawks finish their regular season with games against Xavier and UMass.

style profile

1. tank
2. eyewear
3. animal print
4. shorts
5. patent

ZANNA
downtown Amherst

Inconsistency hasn't hurt BC

Eagles sit at No. 9 in latest USCHO.com national poll

BY MICHAEL KING

The talent is certainly there, but inconsistency has plagued Boston College this season. Yet the team has played well enough during the season to remain in the Top 15 of the USCHO.com CSTV Poll; it sits at No. 9 in this week's edition.

But even captain Brian Boyle and teammate Cory Schneider are still looking to vindicate their decisions to return to school, so it will be hard for the Eagles (20-11-1, 16-8-1 Hockey East) to improve upon their second-place finish in the NCAA Tournament. Coming off four straight Hockey East wins, coach Jerry York hopes his team can continue its winning ways through the last weekend of the regular season.

"During the course of the year we had some fluctuations between being a very good team and a very average team," York said. "I thought in the BU game and the two Maine games we were much more consistently competitive, a much more consistent, solid [effort] game."

The Eagles have a chance to pass archrival No. 5 Boston University (18-6-9, 13-5-8 HEA) and clinch second place in the conference. The team needs three points in its final two games, since it owns the tiebreaker with BU (the Eagles won the regular season head-to-head matchup, 2-1).

However, BC faces first place, No. 1 New Hampshire (23-7-2, 18-5-2 HEA) in the final. The Wildcats appear to be at their most vulnerable of the season, with a record of 1-2-1 in their last four games. And there won't be much motivation for UNH to overwork its best players, as the school has already secured the Hockey East regular season title.

Regardless, the line of Boyle and sophomores Nathan Gerbe and Brock Bradford is one of the main reasons for the Eagles' strong play of late. Each player has registered eight points in the past four games, for a total of nine goals and 15 assists.

"I think it's a threesome, with Brian Boyle involved there in the middle," York said in a conference call on Feb. 20. "I think Brock [Bradford] and Nathan [Gerbe] have probably pushed the big guy and he's playing his best hockey of the year. That is a major factor in our success. I do think Brock and Nathan are two of the real catalysts for our club. They're making terrific plays. We always talk to our team about making hockey plays ... whatever zone it's in – but they make plays."

With Gerbe and Boyle playing together on the ice, it gives BC's offense a dynamic it would otherwise not have. Gerbe uses his speed and puck handling skills to make plays, while Boyle uses his size and strength to take advantage of second chance opportunities in front of the net.

And as their leader and top scorer, the Eagles will only go as far as Boyle takes them. But the senior has quietly amassed respectable numbers – taking over as the league's scoring leader two weeks ago. He has 33 points on 13 goals and 20 assists.

"I don't think he's played as well as he did his junior year most of this year," York said. "But he has caught fire recently. He's playing the best hockey of his four-year career at BC. So we're really pleased. But it kind of has to do with the chemistry of the line. Nathan [Gerbe] and Brock [Bradford] have really helped him. He's a man out there now, there's no question. The last three games he has controlled a lot of the pace of the game. He's got his strength involved, and he's got much more focused and he's become a dominant player for us."

A RHEAULT RESURGENCE?

It may be a little too late for Providence College (18-21-3, 7-15-3 HEA). The school that came close to unseating the big four last year can only finish in seventh place at best this year.

The biggest reason for the team's falling off is its lack of offensive production. Forward Jon Rheault finished fourth in the league in individual goal scoring with 15 during the regular season last year as a junior. The assistant captain had only 12 points this year at the end of January, but the junior nearly doubled his point total during February to 22.

Rheault also had a seven-point weekend against UNH, scoring three goals and four assists on Friday and Saturday. The effort also earned him Hockey East Player of the Week honors. The 11 goals the Friars scored against the league's top team are by far the most of any two-game stretch this year.

Just like every other team in Hockey East, the Friars have been victimized by injuries over the course of the season. One of the team's most costly injuries was the loss of forward John Cavanaugh on Dec. 30.

"John was playing so well before he got hurt out in Wisconsin," coach Tim Army said. "He was leading the team in assists before his injury. He's such a good passer and sees the ice very well. There is a possibility we'll see him before the end of the season."

Although the freshman has yet to score his first collegiate goal, his 10 helpers were the highest on the team before the injury.

BIG D

Last weekend's matchup between BU and No. 15 Vermont (17-13-4, 12-9-4 HEA) featured the two best defenses in the conference, as well as the two leading candidates for HEA Goaltender of the Year.

Having the best scoring defense for much of the season, the Catamounts have been statistically eclipsed by BU's stout play in front of its own net as of late. The Terriers allow an average of only 1.81 goals per game, while UVM's figure is just over two.

But any good defense needs a strong goalie to be effective – an area where both teams certainly do not fall short. John Curry of BU and Joe Fallon of UVM have the second and third best goals-against averages in the country, respectively. In a season series between the league's second-best power play unit and the worst penalty kill, No. 11 Maine (21-10-2, 14-10-1 HEA) scored eight of its 12 total goals in three games on the power play against Merrimack (3-25-4, 3-20-2 HEA). BC has the most shorthanded goals (7) in Hockey East. Meanwhile, Vermont, Massachusetts (16-11-5, 13-9-3 HEA), UMass Lowell (7-21-6, 6-16-3 HEA) and Merrimack have not scored during an opponent's power play this year.

Michael King can be reached at mking@student.umass.edu

Despite taking a lot of hits, Boston College sophomore Nathan Gerbe has still managed to record four shorthanded goals. That number ranks as the most in Hockey East.

Captain Michel Leveille and Maine are tied with UMass for fourth place in Hockey East. The two teams play each other twice this weekend.

BOCCHIOS on the go
Specials of the Week
Buy 2 Calzones GET 1 FREE
5 FREE WINGS With Purchase of any Large Pizza
(413) 256-4110 Call Now!
Sun-Wed Open 'til 1am
Thur. Open 'til 2am
Fri-Sat. Open 'til 3am

Free Delivery to UMass
Menu Online @ andlamo.cc

		2					5
	9	1	5
			1	8				7
					5	4		6
3	6						9	8
4		8	6
9				6	1
					3	2	7
	3						9

Find all of today's puzzle solutions online!
WWW.DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

ACROSS
1 Comic Imogene
5 Flows out
9 Employment
14 Install, as software
15 Order to a broker
16 More kind
17 Surrounded by
18 Guilty or not guilty
19 Evil characters
20 Binge
22 Davison word
24 Brooding place
25 Gave off bright light
26 Channel swimmer Gertrude
28 Was the designated one
30 Element 53
34 Hosiery hue
37 Individual
39 Actor Beatty
40 Flicker of light
42 Freed of obstructions
44 Firearm
45 Guarantee
47 Extremely
48 Tranquilize
50 American of Japanese descent
52 Rivulet
54 Billiards stroke
58 Depend
61 Lose traction
62 Editor's marks
63 Of age
65 Mine entrance
67 Pupil setting
68 Happen once more
69 Billfold fillers
70 Eyeball impolitely
71 Other side
72 Advantage
73 New Jersey NBA team

DOWN
1 Set of students
2 Spirited vigor
3 Capital on the Nile
4 Addition to a contract
5 6th sense
6 Those with faith
7 Kitchen device
8 Roofing material
9 One in Toledo
10 Inked
11 Farmland parcel
12 Turns right
13 Before, before
21 Pamphlet ending?
23 Baltimore's birds
27 Solitary
29 Jacks or better
31 Memo heading
32 ___-do-well
33 Countercurrent
34 Ovi
35 Mystery board
36 Peer
38 Cutting corners
41 Catcher's need
43 Pilot's twist
46 Solo
49 Safe haven
51 Mummy's three
53 Uplift
55 Suit fabric
56 Long-legged wading bird
57 Sibilant letters
58 Hard to come by
59 Fest garden
60 Clare Booth or Henry
64 Endeavor
66 Either part of a fly?

THE HARP
SPECIALS!
Honey Brown, Molson
$2.00 a pint / $6.50 a pitcher
THURSDAY: Rudy Brown
SATURDAY: The Glisten Effect
Pizza 'til midnight 7 days a week
Voted Best Neighborhood Bar East of the River 2005 & 2006 Valley Advocate Readers Poll
OCMC & All Credit cards accepted
163 Sunderland Rd. N. Amherst
Just north of the apartments
413-548-1900 www.theharp.net

QUOTE OF THE DAY

"It is a shameful thing for the soul to faint while the body still perseveres."
-Marcus Aurelius Antonimus

TWO DUDES BY AARON WARNER

REMEMBER HOW THE TELEVISION WAS BROKE LAST NIGHT, DUDE?
TODAY I FIXED IT SO IT'S ALL BETTER NOW.
REALLY? IT LOOKS LIKE ALL THE SAME STUPID JUNK THAT WAS ON THERE BEFORE.

THE FAMILY MONSTER BY JOSH SHALEK

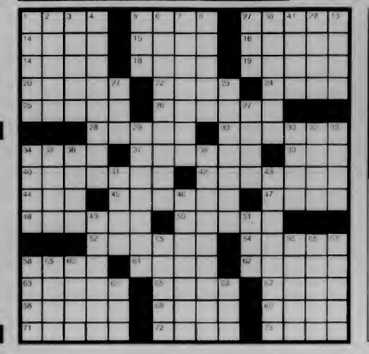
Stop talking for God because an atheist
I don't want to be an atheist
Sure you do. Atheism needs a cute potter child
You could put a friendlier face on godlessness!
You'd be the cutest little heathen

A COLLEGE GIRL NAMED JOE BY AARON WARNER

RYAN AND I TALKED ALL NIGHT. IT WAS SO AMAZING. THEN, WHEN WE WERE LEAVING, I WANTED TO TELL HIM I STILL CARED FOR HIM.
BUT I COULDN'T DO IT. I COULDN'T SAY ANYTHING.
WHY NOT? WERE YOU NERVOUS? WERE YOU SCARED?
WE WERE KISSING.

WELCOME TO FALLING ROCK NATIONAL PARK BY JOSH SHALEK

Do you feel useless since you retired?
Like a tape collection? Like a political commentator? Like an albino alligator?
Albino alligators aren't useless, and neither am I
We can both eat owls
And I, for one, salute you



Submit your comics!
collegiancomics@yahoo.com
Submit your classifieds!
(413) 545-3500

HOROSCOPES

aquarius JAN. 20-FEB. 18
Approach everyday with the same amount of joy and gusto as you would a snow day.

pisces FEB. 19-MAR. 20
I hope your birthday isn't February 29. That would stink worse than modern art.

aries MAR. 21-APR. 19
It would behoove you to befriend a lonely inanimate object such as a lefty desk.

taurus APR. 20-MAY 20
Pretend you are someone you are not. Oh wait, you're already doing that aren't you?

gemini MAY 21-JUN. 21
It's funny, judges actually do have the right to judge people. Go figure.

cancer JUN. 22-JUL. 22
Imagine a world without tofu. Cool, isn't it?

leo JUL. 23-AUG. 22
You are like ketchup, you make almost every experience a wee bit better.

virgo AUG. 23-SEPT. 22
Adventures and risk taking are like Viagra for the soul.

libra SEPT. 23-OCT. 22
Considering you evolved from a glob of ooze, you did pretty well for yourself.

scorpio OCT. 23-NOV. 21
Money can't buy happiness, but it can buy Prozac and a go-kart. That should work.

sagittarius NOV. 22-DEC. 21
Smurf the whole day long by wearing a little white hat and singing a happy song.

capricorn DEC. 22-JAN. 19
It's incredibly hard to justify your perpetual desire to comb your eyebrows.

Visit The Amherst Brewing Company
mount snow
Promo Wednesday Nights
Win Lift Passes, Equipment & Merchandise.
Join This ABC Bartender at... mount snow VERMONT
Jukebox Available Downstairs
Get more info about our menu and calendar of events at amherstbrewing.com

MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN MARKETPLACE

ANNOUNCEMENTS

Global Express Tours Spring Break Montreal Party Weekends from $99 Complete bus, hotels, & clubs. Montrealexpress.net 781-979-9001

APARTMENTS FOR RENT

Brandywine Apts. Now Leasing, 1&2 bedroom apts. Leases begin Jun, July, Aug or Sep. First Come First Serve. Get Them while they last. www.brandywineapts.com stop by or call 549-0600

Center of town, 1,2,3 bedrooms hardwood floors. NOW SHOWING for JUNE and SEPTEMBER. NO FEES www.amherstlincolnrealty.com 253-7879

EMPLOYMENT

Work Online at Home 23 people needed immediately.Earn PT/FT income. Apply FREE online and get started! 800-807-5176 www.wahusa.com Enter Ad Code 9053

Retail Sales/ Mattresses-Energetic, communication skills required. Oppurtunity to grow with company. Flexible PT. Do not call – Stop by 328 College St. RT. 9 Amherst Discount Mattress

Bartending $300/day potential. No experience necs. Training provided. 1-800-965-6520 ext.162

EMPLOYMENT

Winter/ Spring positions available. Earn up to $150 per day Exp not required. Undercover shoppers needed To Judge Retail and Dining Establishments. Call 800-722-4791

Rent us your ears! Listening Experiments $10/hr English must be your first language. Email: phonetics_lab@linguist.umass.edu voicemail: 545-6837

Dell Campus Reps Needed Promote a top 30 company to gain real-world business & marketing experience! www.repnation.com/dell to apply.

EMPLOYMENT

Camp Takajo, Naples Maine, Picturesque lakefront locations, exceptional facilities. Mid June thru Mid August. Counselor positions in tennis, swimming, land sports, water sports, tripping, outdoor skills, theatre arts, fine arts, music nature study. Call Camp Takajo at (866) 356-2267 Submit application online at www.takajo.com A rep will be on the Campus Center Concourse Mon. March 5th, 2007

HOUSE FOR RENT

Northampton Cathedral ceiling, skylites, hardwood floors, 4-5 bdrms. 9/1 $1950. 413-730-6660

SERVICES

Do you need help filling out Immigration Forms? Do you want advice on arranging documents for filing with the INS? Contact the Student Legal Services Office at 922 Campus Center or call 545-1995

Pregnancy Testing. HIV Testing, Birth Control, and Emergency Contraception. STI Screening and Treatment. Affordable and confidential. Tapestry Health, 27 Pray Street, Amherst. 548-9992. www.tapestryhealth.com

SERVICES

Call Someone who really cares. Birthright of Amherst Area 549-1906, 1800-550-4900 24 hour hotline Free Pregnancy test 233 N. Pleasant St. Amherst www.birthright.org

TRAVEL

Global Express Tours Spring Break Montreal Party Weekends from $99 Complete bus, hotels, & clubs. Montrealexpress.net 781-979-9001

www.daily collegian .com

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

SPORTS WEDNESDAY

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 28, 2007 SPORTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Last call for Minutemen seniors

UMass hosts La Salle in final home game

By Rob Greenfield
COLLEGIAN STAFF

This is the last hardwood adventure at the Mullins Center for the Massachusetts men's basketball team this season.

The Minutemen are 20-4 in the last two years inside the friendly home confines and have treated the UMass fans to a plethora of wins in Amherst this season.

Now, the La Salle Explorers visit Amherst as one of the lost causes of the Atlantic 10 conference, battling for the final spot in the conference tournament on March 7 in Atlantic City.

UMass is coming off of a triumphant 53-50 win over the Saint Louis Billikens Saturday in front of 9,000-plus fans on Saturday night, the most for an Atlantic 10 home game in over four years.

The Minutemen are 11-7 all time against tonight's opponent, the La Salle Explorers, and defeated them, 79-71, earlier this season in Philadelphia. La Salle has won five of the last seven meetings between the two teams in the last four years. UMass won six straight meetings from 1991-98.

La Salle won both meetings with the Minutemen last season and holds a 5-3 record against UMass at the Mullins Center while UMass has the edge in La Salle's building, going 5-2 in the last seven games.

The Explorers are responsible for the ousting of the Minutemen in the 2004-05 A-10 Tournament. The loss was the final game for Steve Lappas as the head coach of the Minutemen.

The Minutemen have won four in a row dating back to the victory over the Fordham Rams in the Bronx on ESPN, and with a win against the Explorers tonight will have their first five-game winning streak in six years.

UMass and Xavier are tied atop the Atlantic 10 conference with identical 11-3 records. Xavier, however, holds the tiebreaker with UMass after an 83-77 defeat at Xavier. So if the two teams win both games this week (they play the same teams this week, La Salle and Saint Joseph's) then they will

See M. BASKETBALL on page 9

Rashaun Freeman plays his final home game tonight at 7 p.m. at the Mullins Center. All five seniors will be honored prior to the game. The other four seniors are Stephane Lasme, James Life, Brandon Thomas and Matt Pennie.

Freeman and Lasme deserve to be thanked

Their farewell tour leaves Amherst tonight.

Five seniors will be playing their last game at the Mullins Center this evening for the Massachusetts men's basketball team, but no loss is bigger than that of Rashaun Freeman and Stephane Lasme.

Not to take anything away from James Life, Brandon Thomas or Matt Pennie. It's just that Freeman and Lasme are the two players responsible for putting UMass basketball back on the map.

Danny Picard

When was the last time you heard Dick Vitale talking about the Minutemen while he was covering a Big East game? Or how about seeing several Top 10 plays on SportsCenter?

It's been a while.

And it isn't because of UMass coach Travis Ford's constant attempt to get the team some press, whether it be Yale Genton commercials or just shaking your hand at Rafters.

They're getting the publicity because of the two beasts dominating the low posts night in and night out.

Freeman will go down as one of the greatest players to ever wear the maroon and white. He has been the face of the team, and school, in his four seasons with the Minutemen, and it's well deserved.

"Rashaun is going to go down as one of the top five, six, seven players to ever play at UMass," Ford said. "I don't think there's any debate in that because you just look at the stats and the achievements he's made as an individual basketball player."

Freeman surpassed two of the most well-known players in UMass history this season, moving into fifth all-time in scoring with 1,676 career points heading into tonight's game against La Salle.

Julius Erving (1,370) and Marcus Camby (1,393) stood 12th and 10th, respectively, on UMass' all-time scoring list when Freeman passed them.

See PICARD on page 9

Senior captain Matt Anderson recorded three points this weekend. He had two goals and one assist in last weekend's sweep over NU.

Catamounts on tap for Minutewomen

Steve Games
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Massachusetts women's lacrosse team is not overlooking the Vermont Catamounts. After taking down No. 16 Boston University 13-11, the Minutewomen (1-1) want to carry their momentum into Vermont.

The Maroon and White will be playing its third road game in seven days. It travels to Moulton Winder Field to face the Catamounts, who are hosting their first game of the season. Last year, UMass defeated Vermont 16-9. The 16 goals were the Minutewomen's second highest output of the season. Sophomore midfielder Holly Drown led the way, scoring three goals.

Vermont cannot be overlooked as it is a talented but very young team. The Catamounts are the youngest team in the America East conference with 13 freshmen and nine sophomores. The Catamounts have nine returning starters, including sophomore midfielder Kristen Millar, who is coming off a stellar freshman season. She is the only freshman in Vermont history to lead the team in scoring, as she totaled 53 points on 27 goals and 26 assists. Vermont finished 6-10 last season.

"Vermont is a much-improved team. They have strong players in their freshmen and sophomore class," UMass coach Alexis Venechanos said. "When those young kids get going and their goalie [junior Meaghan Hanley] is hot, they're definitely going to be a tough team to beat."

In practice this week, Venechanos is having the team going over fundamental drills, working on draws and ground balls. It is still early in the season and they want to look as sharp as possible.

"It's been pretty consistent, it's still early in the season," Venechanos said. "I don't think we're a high-octane offense or defense yet, but I think we've been getting better since last week's practice."

The offense seemed to be in full force against the Terriers on Saturday. Three of the Minutewomen scored hat tricks. Junior attacker Melynda Zwick led the charge with four goals. Junior attacker Kathleen Typadis scored three goals and Drown totaled three goals and one assist.

As the scorers clog up the headlines it's the defense that helps solidify the team. The defense is anchored by junior Julie Papaleo, sophomore Jackie Rosenzweig and freshman Ashley King.

"Our defense does a great job because that's where our leadership is from," Venechanos said. "Everyone is on the same page from the midfield to the attack."

"Our midfielders kind of go both ways and they get tired sometimes so [the defense] has to make sure everyone is on the same page, they are definitely the vocal leaders in the back."

The team could be a little fatigued, as it plays its third straight away game with another road contest on Saturday. Last week the Minutewomen played at Holy Cross, losing 7-6, and then defeated BU on Saturday. Venechanos hopes that if the team is physically fatigued they should still be in the game mentally. Having a mental edge could give the Minutewomen a boost in what will be a tough test against the Catamounts.

"I think it's going to be a hard battle, we've played them in the fall and it was a tough game," Venechanos said. "It's going to be about what team is going to come up with the ground balls and draws. That is going to make the big difference."

Steve Games can be reached at sgames@student.umass.edu.

KASEY WINOGRAD/COLLEGIAN

Samantha Sepulveda scored a goal against Holy Cross in the first game of the season. The Minutewomen head to Vermont this weekend.

Mass Attack looks to stay consistent

By Jeremy Rice
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Massachusetts hockey team is having one the best seasons in the program's history, but it's certainly been an up-and-down one as well.

With Maine in town this weekend for a historic showdown for the final home-ice spot in the Hockey East Tournament, the Mass Attack will be looking for one thing that has escaped them for most of the season: consistency.

UMass Hockey

The Minutemen may have found that quality this weekend after taking a pair from Northeastern, which trailed UMass by one spot in the Hockey East standings. However, it was the first time UMass swept a weekend's games since Nov. 4, when it won the second of two contests in a home-and-home series against Providence.

On top of that, the Maroon and White has struggled to consistently perform at the same level, beating a top-ranked New Hampshire one week after falling to lowly Merrimack, or defeating Boston College, 5-3, on the road the night before dropping a home game to ninth-place UMass Lowell.

UMass coach Don Cahoon commented on the team finally finding its rhythm after Sunday's win.

"It's not an easy thing to do," Cahoon said of sweeping the weekend series. "We've worked real hard, and you never say never. You just keep battling all year long."

With the playoffs looming ahead, Cahoon understands how important it is to play at the same level every night.

"I think it was important to be able to put a sweep together because in playoff time, you need to be able to do that if you want to keep advancing," Cahoon said. "We've got a taste of it now. Hopefully we'll want to taste it a lot more."

Improvement Starts at the Top

Through more than half of the 2006-07 regular season, captain Matt Anderson's final season was beginning to look like a letdown.

The former line-mate of players like Stephen Werner, Anderson has had 20-point season in each of his first three years with UMass. Now entering the final weekend of the regular season, Anderson has just 16, and will need a big weekend to reach that plateau again.

See HOCKEY on page 9

Atlantic 10 Tournament on the horizon

Kevin Lisch and the Saint Louis Billikens stand in seventh place in the Atlantic 10 standings with a 7-7 conference record and a 17-11 overall record.

By Kevin Dooley
COLLEGIAN STAFF

With just one week before the Atlantic 10 postseason commences in Atlantic City, N.J., now is a better time than ever to look at which handful of teams have the best shot of taking the A-10 crown, and clinching an automatic bid into the NCAA Tournament.

But the search may not have to go any further than the Xavier Musketeers (21-7, 11-3 A-10), who right now are playing the best basketball of any team in the conference and should be the favorites to win their second postseason tournament in a row. Xavier has won four A-10 Championships in the last 12 years.

Even if Xavier is to falter in the tournament next week, the Musketeers have built a solid case for earning an at-large bid into the NCAA Tournament.

Often, the NCAA selection committee looks to see which teams are playing the best basketball when deciding who earns the at-large bids. The Musketeers more than fit that criterion.

Xavier is undefeated in the month of February, having reeled off six-straight conferenee wins coming into tonight's crucial matchup with the Saint Joseph's Hawks (17-11, 9-5 A-10) at the

See A-10 BASKETBALL on page 10

MARCH

UMASS SAYS GOODBYE TO SENIORS PAGE 12

COLLEGIAN CRIBS WINNERS ANNOUNCED PAGE 5

THE MASSACHUSETTS

DAILY COLLEGIAN

NEW ENGLAND'S LARGEST COLLEGE DAILY EST 1890

SUNNY : HI: 42 LO: 29 WWW.DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM THURSDAY, MARCH 1, 2007

UMass Financial Aid Department refutes investigation claims

By Debbie Freidman
Collegian Staff

The Financial Aid department at the University of Massachusetts is not being investigated by the New York State Attorney General, says Director of Financial Aid, Kenneth Burnham.

"This investigation is mostly targeted towards private institutions that are not in the federal direct lending program," Burnham said.

UMass is a federal direct loan school, which means that students are awarded a majority of their loans from the government and not private lending companies.

Schools who do not take part in this program offer Stafford loans in place of Direct Federal loans, and therefore must rely on private lenders. As a result, students are given a limited amount of choices over which companies they can use.

New York Attorney General Andrew Cuomo launched an investigation at the beginning of this month to see how these schools select loan companies to place on their preferred lender list.

He has suggested that certain unethical practices may be involved in the process and that some schools may not be keeping their students' best interests in mind.

While UMass does not have direct relationships with lenders, they recommend loan companies to students who do not qualify for federal loans.

On the Financial Aid Department's Web site, seven lending companies are listed under the alternative loans section.

Burnham says UMass highlights certain companies because they "have a uniqueness that we think benefits a student or parent."

"We deal with more than 30 companies and rotate them in and out each year as far as actual publicity," he said.

Although the investigation does not pertain to UMass, it is still a growing concern among politicians and college students alike who want to make sure paying for college is as fair a process as possible.

For more information on the investigation, visit the New York State's Attorney General's Web site, http://www.oag.state.ny.us/.

Fans meet the real Sam

UMass mascot Sam the Minuteman participates in final sporting event

By Joe Meloni
Collegian Staff

University of Massachusetts senior Josh DuBoff participated in his final basketball game at the Mullins Center last night. Until the four-minute timeout of the game's second half, most people in attendance knew him by a different name – Sam the Minuteman.

Those in attendance honored DuBoff with a standing ovation during the four-minute timeout of the game's second half.

DuBoff began his time in the suit as a freshman in the fall of 2003. Looking for something unusual to enhance his college experience, DuBoff contacted the necessary people to make his hope of playing Sam the Minuteman a reality.

"I contacted [then]-cheerleading coach Kelly Proctor about the job," DuBoff said. "I showed her some pictures and the next thing I knew I was wearing the suit during the second half of all the football games."

As a freshman, DuBoff rotated with another student as Sam the Minuteman. The two would switch off halves of football games and every other game during basketball season. Since then, however, he donned the Minuteman costume for every UMass football game and all men's and women's basketball games. The only sport DuBoff doesn't work as Sam is hockey. Being able to confidently skate while wearing a foam head is something he just hasn't been able to master.

"Since my freshman year, I've been the primary mascot," DuBoff said. "We've had a few other kids come into the suit but I've basically been the only one."

DuBoff directs his attention to all UMass sports, not just the high profile ones. Earlier this season, he purchased a large pair of swim trunks and wore them at a swim meet between UMass and Army.

See SAM on page 3

Sam the Minuteman participated in the 2005 Capital One Mascot Challenge, finishing second to the University of Nebraska's Herbie Husker as the nation's top mascot.

Senior Josh DuBoff, who suited up as UMass' mascot Sam the Minuteman since 2003, enjoyed a standing ovation during a four-minute timeout in last night's basketball game against La Salle.

Nursing School construction project draws criticism

The current interior of Skinner Hall, which houses the UMass Nursing Program.

By Derrick Perkins
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts has drawn criticism from members of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers (IBEW) Local 7 for negotiating with contractor Wayne J. Griffin Electric over the cost of replacing previously installed conduits in Skinner Hall.

The University is requesting a change of order from the flexible metal conduits originally installed by Griffin Electric during the ongoing renovation of Skinner Hall, to rigid metal conduits in strategic locations throughout the building. According to Jim Cahill, Director of Facilities and Campus Planning, the rigid metal conduit requirement was not made clear in the original contract bid documents.

"The University has accepted the flexible metal conduit in locations where it has been installed and has requested that the wiring system be supplemented by adding rigid metal conduit in strategic areas to provide an inexpensive means for installing future wiring," Cahill said in an e-mail.

Robert Wilson, Assistant Business Agent for IBEW Local 7, believes that even if the requirement was left ambiguous, the specifications book was clear in directing contractors to adopt the more rigorous requirement in the case of such a conflict.

According to the specifications book "where branch circuits are shown to be different between plans, and/or between plans and riser diagrams, details or specifications, the most stringent requirement will be included in the Contract."

The specification book also stipulates that any work that appears to be in conflict should be brought to the attention of the architect for further direction before the ordering of parts or installation.

According to Wilson, the specifications book had contradicted itself by calling for both metal clad cable and rigid metal conduit to be used on the electrical work during the renovation. Wilson said Griffin Electric had originally installed the metal clad cable throughout Skinner Hall.

"For one reason or another there seem to be a lot of cases where Griffin Electric seems to get away with not following the specifications exactly," Wilson said.

Griffin Electric could not be reached for comment on the matter.

By using metal clad cable instead of rigid metal conduits the cost of future maintenance and electrical work in Skinner Hall will become more expensive, according to Paul Gore, Business Agent for IBEW Local 7.

See RENOVATION on page 3

Students 'Die-In' Student Union

Members of the Radical Student Union (RSU) and the Anti-War Coalition (AWC) participated in a die-in Tuesday in the Student Union lobby during passing time between classes. The die-in was a reaction against the war in Iraq and against military recruiting tactics.

SGA discusses housing policy, calendar

By Amber Vallaincourt
Collegian Staff

The Student Government Association met last night with 26 senators in hand. With the agenda presented digitally on a large projector screen showcasing a few long motions, and several short ones, the Student Senate went into discussion about connections with the students whom it represents.

Karina Martinez reported to the Senate about the Finance Committee, which she chairs, and commented on the current budget, "It's at about $30,000 if all the loans come back, which they will," she said.

Last week at the SGA meeting, a $2800 loan was approved for Casa Dominica's 14th Annual Dominican Independence event taking place on March 2.

The Chair of the Committee for University Policy, Matt Giancola, also shared with the Senate how his committee has been discussing the new housing policy regarding the end to same room reservations, meal plans concerning North residents, as well as the new proposed academic calendar.

The SGA decided to table motion 2007-S11, in which the SGA would support the new proposed academic calendar. There was speculation as to how the new calendar would affect the Five College community and course schedules.

Giancola, who personally supported the new calendar, responded to that concern, "I think we should make decisions on what is good for UMass students, and not the other four colleges."

Several Senators also told the SGA that the Faculty Senate had disseminated surveys to students, which would provide additional evidence as to whether the student body would be in support of the new proposed academic calendar.

SGA President Elvis Mendez suggested an open forum hosted by the SGA where students could discuss and voice their opinions concerning the new proposed academic calendar. Mendez was concerned with the survey currently circulating on the Facebook.com Web site, because he wasn't sure "how well they gauge" students.

Resolution 2007-S12 was a motion to amend Title II, Chapter 8 of the SGA Bylaws, which called on Senators to hold two "Back To The People" meetings, with students whom the Senators represent each semester. These meetings would be held to reconnect with students and to better explain to students what role the SGA plays on the UMass campus.

The point of the resolution that was most discussed was the section which explained that senators would receive one full absence if they did not attend

See SGA on page 2

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN
CXVII
ISSUE 93

113 Campus Center University of Massachusetts Amherst, MA 01003
• 413-545-3500 •
• Fax 413-545-3699 •
www.dailycollegian.com

EDITOR IN CHIEF Eric Athas
MANAGING EDITOR Rob Greenfield
BUSINESS MANAGER Dan Conti
PRODUCTION MANAGER Amanda Allen
NIGHT SUPERVISOR Sheryl Wolnik
ADVERTISING MANAGER Jamieson Pieter
ADVERTISING PRODUCTION Molly Eggleston
ARTS & LIVING EDITOR Morgan Rousseau
COPIES EDITOR Adam Scaggs
EDITORIAL EDITOR Tucker Merrick
NEWS EDITOR Matt Belliveau
SPORTS EDITOR Danny Picard
SPORTS EDITOR Jon Pelland
CIRCULATION MANAGER Jeff Pentz
FINANCE MANAGER David Valade
ASSISTANT OPERATIONS Linda Wallack
ASSISTANT ADVERTISING Nicole Puddester
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Tim McCall
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Sydney Towne
ASSISTANT NEWS Anna Dolimitis
ASSISTANT NEWS Nicole Boonjakuakul
ASSISTANT EDITORIAL Brendan Hall
ASSISTANT SPORTS Jeremy Rice
WEB EDITOR James Hale
PHOTO EDITOR Tom Trinh

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN IS PUBLISHED MONDAY THROUGH FRIDAY DURING THE UNIVERSITY OF MASSACHUSETTS ACADEMIC SEMESTER. THE COLLEGIAN IS INDEPENDENTLY FUNDED, OPERATING ON ADVERTISING REVENUE. FOUNDED IN 1890, THE PAPER BEGAN AS ALMA LIFE, BECAME THE COLLEGE SCRAWL IN 1901, THE WEEKLY COLLEGIAN IN 1914 AND THE TRI-WEEKLY COLLEGIAN IN 1956. PUBLISHED DAILY SINCE 1967, THE COLLEGIAN HAS BEEN HEADQUARTERED SINCE JANUARY 1994. FOR ADVERTISING RATES AND INFORMATION, CALL WEEKDAYS BETWEEN 8:30 A.M. AND 3:30 P.M.

PRODUCTION CREW
On staff today

NIGHT EDITOR
Sheryl Wolnik

COPY EDITOR
Nicole Boonjakuakul

PRODUCTION SUPERVISOR
Chris Martin

If you see news happening, call us at 545-1809 and snap a photo with your cell phone, then send it to news@daily-collegian.com

SGA addresses meeting absences

SGA from page 1

the "Back To The People" meetings. The debate focused around the current problem of retaining Senators and fulfilling the time commitment.

Ruth Thompson, who oversees the Ways and Means Committee, reported that her committee meets three times a week, for three hours each session.

According to Thompson, in addition to a weekly SGA meeting that generally runs for about two hours, that adds up to about 11 hours of time spent in SGA meetings, not including whether a Senator is involved in another committee or other SGA related activities.

Thompson was concerned with adding additional hours to senators' schedules who are also serving on committees, taking classes, working, or involved in other extra curricular activities.

Martinez said her main concern was the value of missing a committee meeting counted as one half absence, and questioned whether missing a "Back To The People" meeting should be worth one whole absence.

Senators are allowed three full absences a semester before they are removed from the Senate, after which they are able to appeal their third absence.

Resolution 2007-S12 allows for absences for things such as personal and family illness, previously scheduled work commitments, religious observances, and academic commitments.

The Resolution was passed with one amendment, which clarified where funds would come from in order to provide refreshments for "Back To The People" meetings.

Several people were appointed to vacant senator slots near the close of the meeting. Kevin Bolduc, a former Northeast senator was appointed to a Southwest South position, Ryan Gillespie was appointed to a vacant senator position in Northeast, and Eric Mwangi was appointed as a senator for a vacant commuter seat.

Sarah Morgan was also appointed as the Chancellor of Elections for the upcoming SGA elections this semester. Additionally, another Lobby and Convention Day was announced for April 25, which will be sponsored by PHENOM.

Officials offer suggestions to curb populations growth of elephants

BY CLARE NULLIS
ASSOCIATED PRESS

ADDO ELEPHANT PARK, South Africa — The majestic male elephant ambled through the dense bush to the water hole, extending his trunk in greeting to two young females, April and Aqua, their mother Aran and grandmother Agatha.

The captivating scene is repeated in parks throughout South Africa, where the elephant population has catapulted from near extinction to explosion – prompting the government to reconsider its ban on killing the mighty beasts.

Environment Minister Marthinus van Schalkwyk said Wednesday that South Africa might have to resume slaughtering elephants as part of a package of measures that also includes contraception and relocation to try to prevent the world's mightiest mammal from wreaking havoc on more delicate animal and plant species.

The idea of reversing a 1995 ban on killing elephants in South Africa is especially striking given that populations in other countries are low, and that, globally, the elephant is classed as "vulnerable" and trade in ivory has been banned since 1989 to combat poaching.

"The government will never give a blank check to culling," van Schalkwyk said Wednesday, but added that South Africa had to preserve the balance of nature in the flagship Kruger National Park and other wildlife reserves.

"We have about 20,000 elephants in South Africa, more or less 14,000 in the Kruger National Park. In 1995, when we stopped culling, we had around 8,000 elephants. The population growth of elephants is 6 to 7 percent," van Schalkwyk said.

"This is the hard reality," he told a news conference overlooking a watering hole in Addo Elephant Park, where the elephant population is set to double by 2020 – as is the population in Kruger.

Although this is good news for tourists hoping to spot the Big Five – elephants, rhinos, lions, leopards and buffalos – it is inflicting a heavy toll on vegetation and other animal species.

A single elephant devours up to 660 pounds of grass, leaves and twigs a day.

Van Schalkwyk said the elephant management proposals included moving them to other areas, creating special enclosures to protect other species, expanding parks, contraception and shooting selected animals.

"I would have preferred not to consider the options of both culling and contraception," he said.

Interested parties have until May 4 to comment and then after that it may take many more months to bring the measures into force.

The initial reaction was positive.

The World Wildlife Fund said it recognized the problem posed by elephant overpopulation and hailed the government for consulting with conservation groups.

"Although WWF does not advocate culling as the preferred management alternative, we recognize that it is a management option and reiterate our view that all other options should first be explored," said Rob Little, acting chief executive of WWF South Africa.

The International Fund for Animal Welfare welcomed the promise by the minister to invest in scientific research. "We dearly hope this indicates a long-term intention to ensure an ethical approach to elephant management," it said.

There are still vivid memories of elephants being shot in a 1967-1994 campaign in which 14,562 were killed. Without that slaughter their numbers would have rocketed by now to 80,000, according to national park estimates.

See ELEPHANTS on page 3

Amherst Police log

Student arrested, pipe confiscated

Tuesday
February 27

12:17 a.m.

A Toyota Tacoma slipped off the road and flipped on its side. AAA was contacted; the operator and three passengers had no reported injuries.

1:40 a.m.

An ambulance was requested to pick up a 21-year-old male on Main Street. Friends told police that the party allegedly took 10-15 shots of hard alcohol at Delano's.

6:09 a.m.

A Hyundai sedan slid on ice on College Street into a curb, popping three tires. The vehicle was removed, and the operator was not injured.

7:26 p.m.

Police arrived at 85 Amity Street due to a noise complaint and arrested Eli Berman, 18, for possession of a class D substance. Upon arriving at the listed residence, police reported freshly-burnt marijuana and confiscated a smoking pipe.

10:29 p.m.

A suspicious vehicle was parked on South East Street. Reports said the Toyota Corolla had been parked at the location for several days, unattended. Police investigated and found the vehicle to be unharmed.

Wednesday
February 28

1:27 a.m.

A party was stranded in Amherst Center after leaving The Pub on East Pleasant Street. The party reported to police that they wanted to avoid confrontation with an approaching group of males with "a negative history," and received a courtesy transport back to campus.

—Compiled by Holly Seabury

Study finds women's desks have more germs than men's

BY TARA SUMMERS
THE DAILY REVEILLE (LSU)

BATON ROUGE, La. — A recent study conducted by the University of Arizona shows that women's offices contain more germs than men's offices, CBSnews.com reported.

The study tested eight sites in 59 women's and 54 men's offices that were located in New York City, Los Angeles, San Francisco, Oregon and Washington, D.C.

Researchers tested eight points in participants' offices – the phone, desktop, computer mouse, computer keyboard, exclamation key on the computer keyboard, a pen, the bottom of a desk drawer and handles of each desk drawer. The study showed that women participants' desks had twice the amount of bacteria than men's desks.

Cathy Agan, extension service home economist, said office germs are not surprising to her because office workers come in contact with so many people throughout the day. People are not as careful in their own offices as they are in other public places such as a restroom, she said.

She said people do not regularly clean their offices as often as places such as public restrooms get cleaned. A public restroom is generally cleaned at least once a day, but an office may not be cleaned for a week or two, she said.

Agan said bacteria grows in areas that have moisture, food and a temperature ranging from 40 to 140 degrees, which is where average room temperatures fall.

Taglit-birthright israel provides the gift of free, ten-day educational trips to Israel for Jewish young adults 18 to 26. Register now for summer trips at www.birthrightisrael.com

TAGLIT · תגלית
birthright israel
www.birthrightisrael.com

Skinner Hall to serve as new facility for Nursing School

The site plan for the renovation of the UMass School of Nursing, left, and the plan for the West Elevation of Skinner Hall, right.

RENOVATION from page 1

"When you put a [rigid metal conduit] in instead, you can pull a circuit all the way across. You do not have to open the whole ceiling and do it all over again. You just pull another wire through it," he said.

"It is cheaper to put the cable in," Wilson said. "But in the long run it will cost you more because they have no means to add circuits on the other end of the building."

Griffin Electric had been temporarily removed from the job, according to Wilson, for failing to follow the specifications for electrical work on Skinner Hall, but University officials deny that allegation.

"Griffin Electric is continuing to work on the renovation of Skinner Hall at the University of Massachusetts Amherst. At no time have they been taken off the job," Cahill said in a statement.

Skinner Hall, originally built in 1948, will serve as a new facility for the UMass School of Nursing after the construction of a two-story addition on the east side of the building. The building will be updated with new electrical and mechanical systems, the addition of patient bed teaching labs, and wireless Ethernet, according to the UMass Facilities and Campus Planning Web site.

Renovation on Skinner Hall began in July 2006 and is expected to be complete by October 2007 at a total budgeted cost of $18.8 million. The additional cost for replacing the flexible metal conduits will come out of a change order contingency fund designed specifically to cover changes in work.

According to Cahill the cost of supplementing the flexible metal conduits will have no impact on either the schedule or the total project cost.

It's going to cost UMass after [Griffin] is gone," Gore said. "It is going to cost more money to service [Skinner Hall]."

Private college donations on rise

BY RYAN MCVEIGH
THE COLLEGIATE TIMES (VIRGINIA TECH)

BLACKSBURG, Va. — Charitable contributions to colleges and universities across the country continued to climb in 2006, increasing by 9.4 percent from the previous year. Over $28 billion was donated to colleges and universities last year, despite the continuing drop in the percentage of alumni that contribute.

This drop in number of donating alumni was slight, at less than 1 percent, but it has been falling slowly for several years. Surprisingly, as fewer alumni donate to their alma maters, the amount that they give is increasing, rising to 18 percent in 2006.

"The most benign reason for the drop in alumni participation is that new technology allows more and more alumni to be reached," said Ann Kaplan of the council for aid to education.

Kaplan also suggested that the types of gifts colleges and universities are looking for has affected participation.

"Universities do not want to neglect small gifts, but putting a great deal of effort into five or 10 dollars is not very beneficial," Kaplan said. "They are more focused on the large gifts coming from a smaller group of people."

In 2006, a staggering 88 percent of all private gifts came from just 80 individual donors.

Alumni are still the greatest contributors, accounting for almost one-third of the total gifts received. Their donations make up a little over half of all charitable contributions to higher education institutions. Other contributions come from foundations ($7.1 billion), corporations ($4.6 billion), other organizations ($1.83 billion), and religious organizations ($380 million).

One reason for the dramatic increase in contributions across the country in 2006 is major fund-raising campaigns held by some of the wealthiest colleges and universities.

Another reason for the dramatic upswing in giving to higher education is the state of the economy in 2006. From July 1, 2005 (the beginning of the 2006 academic fiscal year) until the end of December, major stock indexes enjoyed double-digit increases, prompting increased giving during that time.

During the second half of the academic fiscal year, the markets did not fare as well, possibly affecting year-end giving.

Sam says goodbye to UMass

SAM from page 1

"I try to make it to every sporting event that happens on campus," DuBoff said. "I do everything, except hockey."

He took the position to make his time at UMass more memorable and to be a part of UMass Athletics in a tangible manner.

"Mascotting is my experience at UMass," DuBoff said. "My whole college experience is different. Whether it's going to games or traveling, I love traveling. But traveling as Sam, whether it's just up to New Hampshire or to Boston or something, it provides a change from Amherst. I've been to Vancouver and Los Angeles and going to Montana and Chattanooga with the football team was amazing. Also, when UMass wins, I get to go on the court or the field to celebrate which is something I wouldn't be able to do if I were just another student."

The most memorable experience for the Emerson, N.J., native was the chance he got to work with tennis star Andy Roddick on an ESPN commercial. DuBoff, or Sam the Minuteman, appeared knocking a racket and ball out of Roddick's hand. He also was part of the 2005 Capital One Mascot Challenge where he finished second to the University of Nebraska's Herbie Husker as the nation's top mascot.

"Everything I've been able to do outside of UMass like the ESPN commercial with Andy Roddick and all the stuff with Capital One, that whole thing was just a timeline of events that happened one right after the other," DuBoff said. "That time was just crazy."

But one time stands out most to DuBoff as the most memorable of all he's experienced in the suit.

"If I had to pick one, the most memorable thing was this past December," DuBoff said. "The football playoffs were amazing. When [the UMass football team] beat UNH here and then [huhUMass] played Boston College later that day, I was in the suit for 11 straight hours because the women's basketball team had a game at noon."

Working with tennis superstars and traveling around the country are one thing, but DuBoff's favorite moments took place at home in Amherst.

"Fan interaction is what it's all about," said DuBoff. "Being to make someone smile or laugh when they're having a bad day is great. And I love pumping up the crowd during games."

DuBoff will leave UMass in May with his dual-degree in Sport Management and Political Science. Although his education is the most important thing gained while at UMass, the memories from his time as Sam the Minuteman are what he cherishes most.

Joe Meloni can be reached at jmeloni@student.umass.edu.

S. African government, WWF confer over elephant problem

ELEPHANTS from page 2

Van Schalkwyk declined to predict how many elephants might die if slaughter does get the final green light.

Although contraception is an alternative, it is fraught with problems. A female normally breeds every four years and doesn't mate while nursing. With contraception, a female goes into heat every four months but doesn't become pregnant – and so suffers the physical stress of frequent copulation with bulls four times her weight.

Moving elephants to different areas is expensive. Conservation experts say there are signs that elephants are beginning to move from the Kruger into Mozambique, where populations are more sparse because of the long civil war. The removal of national fences in a new trans-frontier park has made that possible, but space is limited.

South Africa, Namibia and Botswana all have booming elephant populations, while East African nations like Kenya are struggling from the impact of poaching and loss of habitat.

Rick Ostfeld, an animal ecologist at the Institute of Ecosystem Studies in Millbrook, N.Y., said that "just in the last two years or so, the level of poaching has risen to an unprecedented rate," after nearly two decades during which the international community had managed to get the illicit ivory trade under control.

Some African countries have called for the right to resume controlled sales of ivory, saying the proceeds can benefit local populations and help pay for conservation efforts. But Kenya and Mali are seeking a 20-year ban on all trade in raw or worked ivory.

Most ivory comes from the much larger populations of African elephants, with even Asian countries importing African ivory. The Asian elephant – smaller than its African counterpart – is classed as endangered by the International Union for the Conservation of Nature. Encroachment on its habitat by humans has slashed the population to an estimated 30,000 to 50,000 animals in the wild in countries like Thailand, Vietnam and Myanmar.

African countries, too, faced extinction of their elephant populations. South Africa had just 200 elephants at the start of the 20th century.

Botswana has by far the biggest elephant population, with an estimated 165,000 elephants, according to van Schalkwyk. He said Zimbabwe had an estimated 80,000 and Mozambique some 20,000.

In Addo, the elephants feed on 146 different plant species – of which 75 are classed as rare, he said. Addo is about an hour's drive from the southern coastal city of Port Elizabeth.

Authorities have reintroduced the endangered black rhino into the park, where it lives in harmony with the elephant, but fear they could start competing for food.

Already, crowding is leading to tensions, according to Graham Kerley, an elephant expert who works with officials at Addo National Park, which currently has some 450 elephants.

For you, good enough just isn't good enough.

Temple's programs in Tourism, Hospitality, Sport, and Recreation Management will help you be a winner in the game of life by providing you with leadership tools and networking resources that will ultimately lead you to success. The ball is in your court; take it and run with it.

To learn more, visit us at www.temple.edu/STHM or join us for one of our upcoming Monday information sessions on main campus, 1700 N. Broad St., Room 412, at noon or 5 p.m.:

March 12 | April 9 | May 7

School of Tourism and Hospitality Management TEMPLE UNIVERSITY

Guest Chef Series

Meet Betty Rosbottom

- Syndicated food columnist
- Cookbook author
- Cooking teacher
- Television personality
- Cooking school director

DINING SERVICES
UMassAmherst

Betty's recipes from
"Big Book of Backyard Cooking" will be featured at Berkshire DC

www.umass.edu/diningservices

Monday, March 5th from 5 to 9 pm.

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

EDITORIAL OPINION

THURSDAY, MARCH 1, 2007

"I may not agree with what you say but I will defend to the death your right to say it" -Voltaire

EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

The SGA needs tools to govern

Matt Giancola

"The SGA never does anything." These words are heard very often around campus. They are spoken by well-intentioned students who are frustrated by the process. As a member of the SGA, I share that same frustration. With so many problems on campus, the SGA has the unique position to help students meet certain needs. After all, the organization is made up of students. But unfortunately, the organization does not have the tools it needs to effectively make or change policy on campus. The administration has either taken powers from the group or has burdened its budget with costs that no student government should pay for.

There are a number of solutions that could be implemented immediately that would enhance the reputation and ability of the SGA. First and most simply, the president of the SGA should be allowed to send campus-wide e-mails. Every other day, I receive an e-mail from JoAnne Vanin, Chancellor Mike Gargano, and other random administrators about announcements, handy travel tips, career fairs, and literally, everything else. That's great; they should be doing that to keep us connected. If we don't want the e-mail, we just delete it.

However, the administration will not allow the SGA to send out campus-wide e-mails. Think of how much good these announcements would do. We could easily promote the multitude of RSO events that go on every day, but which very few students are aware of. Hey, administration, here's your chance to get the word out about things to do on campus that don't involve drinking. I'm even willing to make the deal that we won't send out more than one e-mail every two weeks. Would that really tax our inboxes too much?

A more serious and damaging aspect of the current state of affairs is the budget of the SGA. There are a number of costs that should be paid for by other departments. Currently, the SGA funds club teams such as women's hockey, wrestling and ultimate frisbee. These teams should not be paid for by the student government, but instead, by the UMass Athletics Department. These teams are consistently some of the best in their leagues and give this school a great name. The women's ice hockey team pays $1000 per player out of their own pockets just to be funded at the level they need. This is a shameful way to treat a great team. When prospective students find out they'll have to pay a grand to play a sport, what does that say about our university?

If it were not for the SGA, we wouldn't even have weekly newspapers.

Remember our Sunday New York Times and the Boston Globe? Vice Chancellor Gargano took away the funding for that. If it weren't for the SGA, we wouldn't even have weekly newspapers, like the Republican who graciously donates free copies. This is yet another expense that should be covered by the administration. Do they not want us to read about current events? If it were not for the SGA, UMass would be in much poorer shape.

Freeing up all these expenses for teams and newspapers would allow us to use that money for new events. At the beginning of fall semester, there should be a free concert on campus or some other campus-wide event to welcome students back to school.

True, the SGA has been caught up with larger, more complicated issues that affect the entire state and nation, such as the high cost of education, the police in our dorms, and the diversity of our campus. But these matters have a direct impact upon our lives. The high cost of education, the high police presence, and the student that pays $1000 to play a sport are all interconnected.

Students are being denied the ability to exercise political power. They are threatened with arrest if they protest on campus; they have to constantly be on the look-out for the undercover officer in their hallway, and the political organizations that do exist don't even have the money to put on events! Last time I checked, free-speech zones ran from sea to shining sea, and the Constitution was applicable in all 50 states.

I don't want to give the impression that the administration is evil and is simply out to get us. They have many great ideas that are good for students – the proposed revised academic calendar and Student Union renovations. But for any idea to be successful, they must reach out to the SGA, and together, the two can take UMass to the next level.

The Student Government Association can be very effective, but it can't work on its own. It needs the support and input of the student body. Submit ideas, go to meetings and call its leaders. When the presidential elections come around, talk to the candidates and go out and vote in force. Let's show the administration that we are serious about saving money, putting on great events and regaining our rights.

Matt Giancola can be reached at mgiancol@student.umass.edu.

Troop withdrawals don't mean Dick

S.P. Sullivan

It's become a common cliché for columnists and satirists to draw parallels between the Bush administration and 1984's, "The Party." It could also be argued that, for the most part, these half-assed juxtapositions are a bit of a stretch. But the reaction of Vice President Dick Cheney to Britain's recently proposed troop withdrawal can't be described as anything less than Doublespeak – and a poorly constructed contradiction at that.

For the unfamiliar, Cheney recently described a proposed British troop withdrawal as "a good sign," – an interesting perspective considering that any mention of an American troop withdrawal has been received as sheer, un-American sedition.

But a good sign?

There was, of course, some rice-paper reasoning behind Cheney's statement; politicians often find that salvation can be found in the semantics – the tax cuts will trickle down, (I was given the same false intelligence you were, but I didn't inhale) and now, it's all about geography.

Apparently, since the troop withdrawal in question is occurring mainly in the southern part of the country – namely in Basra, Iraq's second-largest city – it's a sign of progress. But troop withdrawal from a U.S. perspective – concentrated more heavily in strife-ridden Baghdad – would send the terrorists the wrong message.

Not once did it occur to Cheney, or any of his brood, that perhaps the British troops who are no longer needed in Basra could come in handy in Baghdad. Yes, it is a "good sign" that British troops are no longer needed in Basra, but withdrawing rather than relocating troops to Iraq's more contentious provinces seems a bit counterproductive.

Why should the British get to withdraw when Iraq on the whole has yet to be stabilized? They signed up for the war on the same misinformation we did.

In Britain's defense, they have been good sports about this whole war thing; they've even sacrificed some of their royalty for the cause. Prince Harry (dubbed "Bullet Magnet" by his peers) was recently deployed in Iraq.

Well, southern Iraq – but at least they're trying.

I doubt we'll see the Bush twins or Mary Cheney sporting fatigues anytime soon. Prince Harry's deployment in Iraq is indicative of a dedication to the effort during a time when everyone's dedication is suspect.

Not once did it occur to Cheney, or any of his brood, that perhaps the British troops who are no longer needed in Basra could come handy in Baghdad.

But this is a war, not a game of chess or Risk. One prince for a couple thousand pawns is not a fair trade and certainly not a good sign. Likewise, withdrawing troops from Iraq after stabilizing one province is a bit like an auto-mechanic telling you your car is in working order without looking under the hood. Well I can't speak for the condition of the brakes or shocks, but the stereo is A-OK.

White House spokesman Tony Snow told the press that the difference between British withdrawal and a Senate-proposed U.S. withdrawal was a little less semantic. "What you had is progress first, and then the removal." Thank you Tony, for solving the U.S. troop problem in Iraq. Progress needs to be made before withdrawal can proceed – there's some novel military stratagem from the people who brought you the Patriot Act.

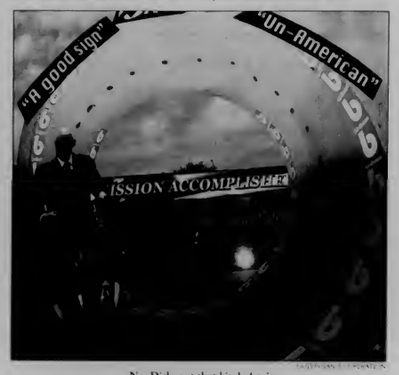
Liberals in the United States have a tendency to over-analyze anything that comes from the mouth of a Bush administration official, and often it proves to be nothing more than a dissection of rhetoric. But semantics aside, calling a British troop withdrawal a "good sign" while simultaneously calling a similar effort in the United States a "validation of al-Qaeda strategy," is some serious spin.

Whether a U.S. withdrawal is appropriate is another issue in itself, but Cheney's reaction to the British withdrawal raises the question of the strategic competence of this administration. What it also makes one examine, however, is the growing divide between what the Bush administration feels appropriate to say and what is actually true.

This isn't breaking news – politicians have never been strangers to the disingenuous, but at least they used to be sneaky about it. While journalist Bob Woodward had to do some serious research to oust Nixon in the Watergate scandal, Dick Cheney contradicts himself outright on national television. If you're going to try to pull the wool over our eyes, Dick, at least remember to bring the sweater.

I would love to believe that this charade is an example of disingenuousness and not incompetence, because I like to think that Dick Cheney is the brains behind this operation. But there's a lesson to be learned from it all – albeit a depressing one. Presidential hopeful Barack Obama put it best at a rally in Austin, Texas last Friday. "When Dick Cheney says it's a good thing," said Obama, "you know that you've probably got some big problems."

S.P. Sullivan can be reached at spsulliv@student.umass.edu.



No, Dick, not that kind of spin.

Not all news is good news

Brad Leibowitz

Am I the only one who doesn't care how Anna Nicole Smith died? It's like I'm the only one who doesn't care about her death. You might call me cold, but the death of a famous-for-no-good-reason blonde doesn't strike me as a pressing issue that needs to be discussed. Nonetheless, the news media (which should be renamed "the circus media"), is up in arms about what truly killed her.

According to our national circus, it doesn't matter what President Bush said in his State of the Union address a few weeks back, and it doesn't matter what global warming is doing to our environment. As long as Anna Nicole Smith's death remains unknown, our news is going to ask the hard-hitting questions that no one cares about (if you do care what killed her, please, stop reading).

As I write this article, I sit in front of a 17-inch television flipping around news channels to see what's happening in the world. To my lack of astonishment, the only important event, which took place in the past two days, is the mental health of the newly bald Britney Spears. According to CNN, or as I call Circus News Network, the newly cue-balled Britney Spears deserves a 15-minute segment. I disagree.

Alright, so I have been watching this particular broadcast of CNN for 45 minutes now. This is what I have learned: Anna Nicole Smith has died of an unknown reason; Britney Spears is slowly turning into an odd mental patient with a puppy-like scalp of hair; Ghost Rider claimed the number one spot at the box office this weekend; The NBA took over Las Vegas for their annual lack of talent exhibition and – oh yeah, Anna Nicole Smith, still dead.

What the hell has happened to our news broadcastings? There was once a time when the news was just that: news. Back in the day when channels 2, 4 and 7 were the only television stations, the news broadcast informed citizens of legitimate current events. Be it a story about a congressional vote, an actual presidential scandal (Watergate counts, sleeping with an intern does not) or a new tax referendum, the news conveyed pertinent information.

I understand CNN, Fox News, CNBC and others have a 24-hour period to fill with interesting broadcasting. But if that interesting broadcasting has to do with Wolf Gang Puck's new culinary creations, I advocate silencing the given network.

Off the top of my head, here are five issues I think should be in the news but aren't because the NASCAR Daytona 500 had a photo finish today: the situation in Darfur; the still devastated New Orleans; Global warming; the possible deployment of 40,000 more troops to Iraq; the political stances which our presidential candidates for 2008 are taking.

Back in the days when channel 2, 4, and 7 were the only television stations, the news broadcast informed citizens of legitimate current events.

In today's news market, these five issues, along with a multitude of others, have taken a back seat to Madonna adopting an African child or Bradgelina. From Justin Timberlake possibly wooing Scarlett Johansson to the start of Major League Baseball's spring training, our news has become entertainment.

Worst of all, in a recent retort with CNN's Anderson Cooper, John Gibson of Fox News, in response to Cooper's on-going war coverage, was quoted saying, "People want to hear about the Anna Nicole story. I'm happy to tell them." Well Mr. Gibson, I believe the E! Channel is looking for a new Entertainment Tonight anchor…go get 'em big guy.

Here's the thing. When I watch the news, I watch it because either a) I am too tired to pick up the New York Times or Boston Globe, or b) they are out of reach at the moment. Thus, when I turn on CNN, I want to see what I could have read on the front page of either one of those papers, and I want it conveyed in a simple manner without distractions. Sadly though, these days news broadcasts are anything but informative and simple.

As such, here are some basic guidelines I think our news should use to get back on track. Sports has no place on a news broadcast. If they did, ESPN's SportsCenter wouldn't exist. Anything to do with celebrities has no place on the news. As much as I enjoy the cinema, I don't care about Brad Pitt's personal life. Finally, entertainment of any kind has no place on a news broadcast. I don't care what Britney Spears does, I don't care what 50 Cent's views are on the war on terror, and I don't care about the death of Anna Nicole Smith.

Lastly, the major networks need to decide between either having the scroll bar or not. I am tired of hearing broadcasters speak about the effects of global warming while the scroll bar informs me of the annual net gain of Exxon Mobil.

So for now, I will be crossing my fingers that the news shapes up. But if not, which is very likely, I guess we will all find out what killed Anna Nicole Smith in about a month.

Brad Leibowitz can be reached at bleibowi@student.umass.edu.

YOU HAVEN'T SEEN HIM, HAVE YOU? THAT OLD, YAPPY LITTLE BUGGER LOOKS YOUR FACE IF YOU CALL HIM TONY! HARD TO BELIEVE HE'D RUN OFF LIKE THAT!

Do you have opinions?
Do you have a word processor?
The Daily Collegian is looking for Ed/Op contributors!
Contact Editorial@DailyCollegian.com to apply.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

DO NOT SPEAK FOR ME

The article by Jeff Napolitano, "To the People of Iran" parodies itself. He apologizes for our "insufferable lack of democracy" to a country that has not seen a free election (as Napolitano himself notes) in over 50 years.

On this, the author cannot even make up his own mind: either the administration he decries is made up of evil masterminds who can steal elections and conceal genocide or hapless fools who can only fight weak and poor countries – but they cannot be both. Napolitano rails against "the genocide…he and his cabal have incurred."

I submit to you, Mr. Napolitano, that if you want to discuss genocide, you might want to consider talking to the mustard-gassed Kurds or Iraqi Marsh Arabs. Don't cheapen a powerful and awful word with frivolous use. The ignorance presented in this article is startling.

If Iraq was "only [a] helpless population" compared to the robust Iran, then how did she prosecute and nearly win a devastating and prolonged war against Iran in the 1980s, and yet, still have the strength to assail Kuwait while mustard-gassing her own people? If Afghanistan were easy prey, why is it called the 'graveyard of empires?'

I must commend your knowledge of the fall of the Mossadegh government and the shameful American conduct in her overthrow, but your position is hardly one from which to assault the historical knowledge of others with any strength. Left unmentioned is ever the notion that Iran might be developing nuclear weapons.

Omitted is ever the idea that Iran might be involved with the violence in Iraq (you will note that Muqtada al-Sadr fled to Tehran just recently). Passed over is ever that Iran may have a head of state who declares Israel a "one-bomb state" and one that must be "wiped off the map."

Cast aside are ever the cries by Iranian mullah-aristocrats to deliver death to the Great Satan (the U.S.) and the Little Satan (Israel). Kept out are ever the beheadings of 'unchaste' women or the stoning of homosexuals in this Islamic Republic of Iran. Unmentioned are the Iranian human wave attacks using unarmed children (the basees) as shields. The Iranians built fountains of flowing red water to commemorate the sea of blacod.

They are of course, ever omitted because they have no place in what you are writing. I have read such documents before; the sounds of mingled apologies and prostrations for clemency ("if you could avoid blowing up Springfield…") come through quite clear.

Mr. Napolitano, if you want to pen your surrender, go ahead, but know that it is only your surrender and that I will not join you in it. Perhaps one might ask those who have experienced the tender mercies of the Guardian Council of Iran to explain how the Islamic Republic accepts surrenders. But do not surrender for me. For once, you surrender – there is nothing left but vae victis.

Bret Devereaux
UMass student

IT'S ALREADY HERE

Your Feb. 28 story on Gardasil, a vaccination that protects against the human papillomavirus (HPV), noted that the vaccine "would soon become readily available" on campus. Actually, the vaccine has been available at University Health Services (UHS) since shortly after its introduction.

Gardasil is given as a series of three injections over a six-month period. For an appointment with a UHS healthcare provider, call 577-5101. The new UHS Web site has information on Gardasil, HPV and much more; visit www.umass.edu/uhs.

Karen Dunbar Scully
Communications & Marketing
University Health Services

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

ARTS & LIVING

THURSDAY, MARCH 1, 2007

ARTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

DC Dish goes to Berkshire

Berkshire Dining Common makes meal time special again

By Mary-Frances Heck
COLLEGIAN COLUMNIST

At the beginning of this academic year, University of Massachusetts Amherst Dining Services unveiled the newly renovated and redesigned Berkshire Dining Commons. It boasts numerous display cooking areas where students can watch their lunch or dinner being prepared. These cooking areas serve brick oven pizza, vegetarian and vegan entrees, made-to-order stir-fry, and pho noodle bowls – just to name a few.

In addition there are pasta, sandwich, and salad bars and a display area showcasing beautifully plated desserts. The friendly staff, well-trained cooks, and clean environment keep Berkshire packed from noon until midnight.

"I really like their stir-fry," says junior Andrea Hoey. "It is more authentic because it is cooked in a wok, and there are lots of fresh vegetables to choose from. The freshly grilled chicken is really good, too."

Everyone seems to enjoy desserts at Berkshire.

"The bakery section is to die for," says sophomore Katarina Karottki. "I have waited for over half an hour just to get a big, hot, gooey chocolate chip cookie straight from the oven."

Some of Karottki's other favorites include the dinner time sushi bar, the fresh salad bar available all day long, and the eclectic mix of pizzas that come out of the brick oven.

Jeanine Ledoux also agrees with the quality and freshness of the food options.

"Sushi made to order makes my day," she says.

Another added benefit of Berkshire is the private dining room available upon reservation – available for the entire campus population, even sport teams.

"The ambience at dinner time is great. With the lights low, your favorite foods, friends, and big flat screen televisions to watch ESPN highlights or CNN, the dining experience is like no other," says Karottki.

Keren Plevock, who travels from Central Residential Area to the dining hall located in Southwest, agrees that the food is delicious. "I think it is cool that they cook the food in front of you because you know it is fresh."

Despite the high quality, freshness, and creativity with which meals are prepared, one flaw stands out: the cumbersome floor plan of Berkshire. Long lines for entrees keep some students from enjoying their meals for many minutes following their arrival.

Molly Morgan, who lives in Central, finds Berkshire completely overwhelming. "The layout is confusing and there are crazy traffic jams. I would rather eat at Franklin where it is more relaxed and flows better."

"I feel like I am on a scavenger hunt for food," exclaimed Plevock on a recent night in Berkshire. She bemoaned the fact that she had to walk around for several minutes before knowing what her options were. After finally making her choice she asked, "Where the heck is the silverware?" and trudged off to locate a fork.

According to some students, another problem with the layout is that drinks are clustered in one area, creating an additional hassle.

"The drink station is extremely inconvenient," according to Holster. "It is small and hidden to those unfamiliar with the dining hall."

Andrea Morand, who lives in Orchard Hill, feels that Berkshire is too chaotic to eat there everyday. She likes going there on occasion to get a change from eating at Worcester or Franklin dining halls. "It feels like you are eating out. The food is a lot better and Berkshire looks nicer than the older dining halls."

Not every student is worried about waiting in lines. "In the beginning," says Karottki, "there was a great deal of confusion with the flow of traffic. People were literally banging trays into each other. However, once the hype settled and people learned the ropes, traffic flow has been much better."

Morand and Karottki agreed that Berkshire should be open earlier for breakfast. "A great deal of money was spent on the remodeling of Berkshire. It's great that it is open so late, but they should consider opening it earlier for breakfast to get the most benefit out of the investment," says Morand.

Karottki did have one negative comment about Berkshire.

"I think at times the various stations get repetitive. However, there are many stations so people still have a large variety of choices at every meal."

The overall consensus about Berkshire is that despite the clumsy layout of the food and beverage stations and seating areas, the food is worth the frustration. Andy Holster puts it well: "Even though I've spent twenty minutes looking for dinner, this is the best meal I've had all week."

Mary-Frances Heck can be reached at mheck@student.umass.edu.

Students from all over campus enjoy eating at the Berkshire Dining Common because it has the largest variety of food on campus. This demand has caused long lines at the entrance of the building.

Dylan documentary released on DVD

By Jonathan Storm
The Philadelphia Inquirer

The dee-luxe, 2-DVD, collector's edition of "Don't Look Back," famously called "one of the most influential rock films ever made," arrived in stores nationwide Tuesday.

To present the Bob Dylan documentary to the public 40 years ago, legendary filmmaker D.A. Pennebaker released it through a porno distributor.

"I went around to theaters, schools and universities," he said in a telephone interview, "and I couldn't get the people who dealt with that audience to even think about it.

"Finally, a guy from the Art Theater Guild, they ran a lot of porn houses in the West, took it on. 'It looks like a porn film, and it's not,' he said. It ran at the Presidio in San Francisco for almost a year."

"Don't Look Back" may have the production values of those black-socks-porn shorts of yore, but it's an intimately beautiful study of Dylan and some of his cronies, filmed with breakthrough technique, at a crucial moment in the development of his career and legend.

"Bringing It All Back Home," an album with gasp! rock songs, was already in the can, the insane indignation provoked by his first electric set at the 1965 Newport Folk Festival was still a few months away, and Dylan toured grimy England, Liverpool, Newcastle, Manchester and other cities, standing on stages all by himself with three microphones, an acoustic guitar, and a stool with a glass of water and bunch of harmonicas on it.

Dylan deconstructionists and lifelong fans endlessly pick the movie apart. You don't get to see the notoriously aloof poet musician-jester in such close quarters very often.

One of the themes of the movie itself is the tension between outsiders' attempts to figure him out, and Dylan's resistance to being figured.

"I'm glad I'm not me," he says after reading one egregious profile.

Keren Plevock, who travels from Central Residential Area to the dining hall located in Southwest, agrees that the food is delicious. "I think it is cool that they cook the food in front of you because you know it is fresh."

Pennebaker acknowledges the general interest "in resolving some peculiar mystery that seems to overhang our whole generation."

And, perhaps, the misguided nature of it. "Why is Dylan such a big deal?" asks the filmmaker. "I don't know."

But you don't need to be a Dylan fan to marvel at the work Pennebaker did three years before Andy Warhol made his observation about fame, and to marvel at the distance the culture has come since then.

Trained as an engineer, Pennebaker built the relatively lightweight 16mm cameras that he toted around. Most film cameras before that were so big they needed tripods and so clunky they were often wrapped in fur coats to deaden their noise.

The people Pennebaker shot, except for Dylan, who seems to sense that all life is a performance, paid no attention whatsoever because nobody really understood what Pennebaker was doing.

"You couldn't have done it at all five years ago," he says in commentary on the DVD, "and now a child can do this."

"The whole thing is still being figured out," he said in the interview. "We're at the beginning of a new kind of language. At first it was a few people like me in New York, all going broke. Now, everybody goes out and gets a camera.

"It's the same thing that happened when Byron came along. 'Gee,' people thought, 'I can write a poem. I can write a book.' Five hundred years ago, they didn't know how to do it. They didn't know what to do."

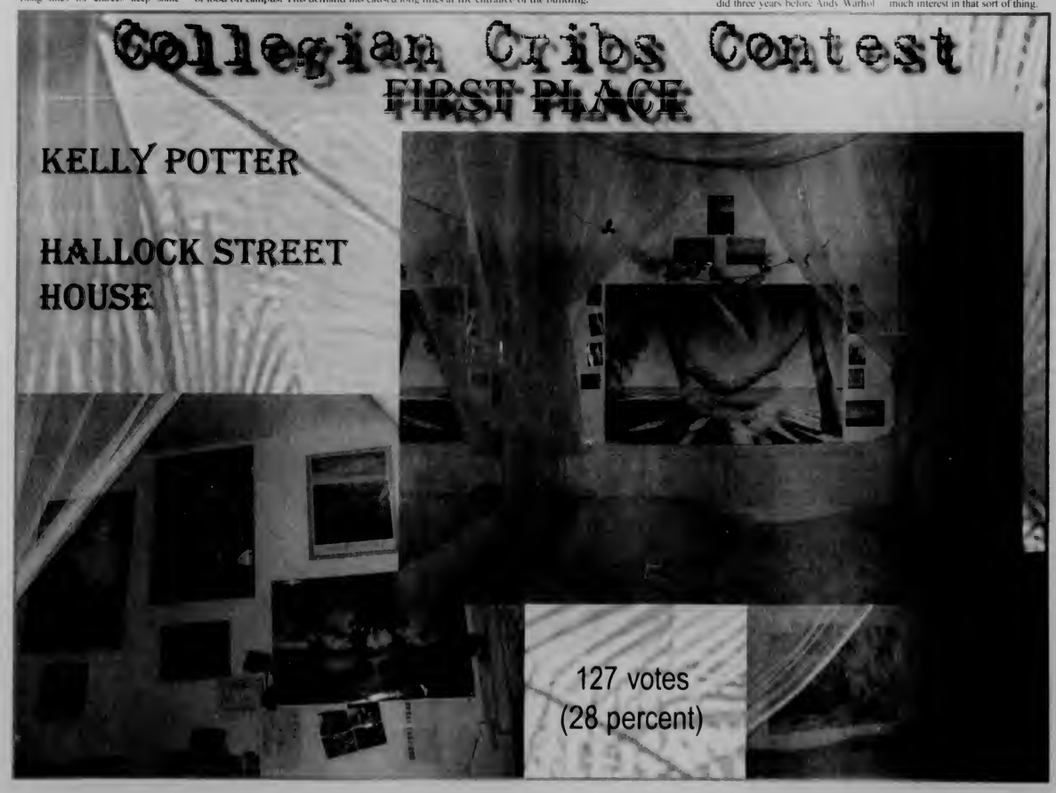
The line from "Don't Look Back" to YouTube is so clear that watching the film is like looking through a telescope propped up into a wormhole in the fabric of time.

And if you want to work out why the lamppost stands with folded arms or the vandals took the handles, go right ahead.

The movie, with commentary by Pennebaker and Dylan confidant and then-road manager Bob Neuwirth, includes five Dylan performances from the tour, curiously accompanied only with still photographs, as an extra.

The new set includes a flip book of the "Subterranean Homesick Blues" film intro, generally considered the first music video, a reprint of the "Don't Look Back" book Pennebaker made to try to squeeze some money out of the project, and a brand-new film of "Don't Look Back" outtakes, "Bob Dylan 65 Revisited."

It's packed with stunning straight-through stage performances of "To Ramona," "It's Alright Ma," "Don't Think Twice" and others. Back in the '60s, nobody thought there would be much interest in that sort of thing.



Collegian Cribs Contest
SECOND PLACE

BRITTANY ANDERSON
SHAWNA SHAPPY
AND
BRIANNE VELAZQUEZ

JOHNSON DORMITORY

84 votes (19 percent)

Collegian Cribs Contest
THIRD PLACE

CALLIE FISHER
AND KATE EAGAN

WASHINGTON TOWER

81 votes (18 percent)

Honorable Mention
Crib No. 7 – 58 votes (13 percent)
Crib No. 1 – 33 votes (7 percent)
Crib No. 3 – 28 votes (6 percent)
Crib No. 4 – 20 votes (4 percent)
Crib No. 8 – 14 votes (3 percent)
Crib No. 5 – 11 votes (2 percent)

WHERE IMAGINATION MEETS INNOVATION

UMass Amherst Fine Arts Center Series Spring 2007

Joffrey Ballet
Monday, March 5 at 7:30 pm
Concert Hall
For pure breathtaking beauty of the otherworldly sort, Joffrey is unmistakable. The company will perform Apollo, Dence Coupe, and The Green Table, one of the most powerfull and important anti-war statements ever created for the stage.
Sponsored by limited tickets available

The Tempest La Tempête by William Shakspeare
Produced by 4D Art Directed by Michel Lemieux, Victor Pilon and Denise Guilbault
Monday, March 19 at 7:30 pm
Concert Hall
Blowing a virtual wind on The Tempest, the team of 4-D Art have succeeded in creating a spectacle that combines reality and virtual reality through the combination of live actors and holographic projections. From the moment the curtain rises, you will be astonished! In French with English supertitles.
Sponsored by

Funded in part by the Lilly Endowment

Trio Mediaeval
Thursday, March 29 at 7:30 pm
Bowker Auditorium
These three vibrant sopranos specialize in a diverse repertoire that juxtaposes early medieval music, new works composed for the ensemble, and traditional Norwegian ballads and songs
Funded in part by the Expedition program of the New England Foundation for the Arts

TICKETS ARE ON SALE NOW!
UMass Amherst FINE ARTS CENTER
CALL 545-2511 OR 1-800-999-UMAS WWW.FINEARTSCENTER.COM

SKYPLEX
SPRINGFIELD'S HOTTEST NIGHTCLUB
3 CLUBS & 3 DJ'S ALL UNDER ONE ROOF!!!
"A & NYC NIGHTLIFE COMES TO SPRINGFIELD"

Thursday - 18+ College Night "Hot Body Contest"
Friday - 18+ "Underground Electronic Dance Party" Downstairs
"Top 40" Upstairs
Saturday - 21+ "Party VIP Style"

WANTED: HIP YOUNG PROMOTERS/HOSTS • EARN $$$$

Calling all DJ's

Do you do campus and house parties? Looking for a chance to work at the HOTTEST Nightclub? Here's your chance to become a Club DJ! Signup online at www.info.skyplex.us

18+ $2.00 off admission before midnight with this ad

21+ FREE admission before midnight with this ad
code:umass

10 Stearns Square Springfield, MA 413-827-9000

Looking for business experience??

The Daily Collegian is currently seeking qualified applicants to fill the positions of:

- Business Manager
- Assistant Business Manager
- Distribution Manager

IMPORTANT NOTICE FROM THE

SGA
Student Government Association

The SGA will be having elections for the positions of Student Government President, Student Trustee and Area Governors.

Nomination Process

Nominations open at 10:00 a.m. on Thursday, March 1st and close at noon on Thursday, March 15th.

Nomination forms are available in the SGA office, 420 Student Union, from 10:00 a.m. - 5:00 p.m. on weekdays.

Students running for SGA President or Trustee must gather 250 signatures, while students running for Area Government must gather 100 signatures, in order to be nominated.

Voting Process

Date:
Wednesday, March 28th and Thursday, March 29th

Time:
10:00 a.m. - 2:00 p.m. and 5:00 p.m. - 8:00 p.m.

Location:
All the Dining Commons and in the Campus Center Concourse

For More Infomation:
Email sga@stuaf.umass.edu or call 413-545-0341

The Atlantic 10 recently named Kate Mills to its All-Conference Third Team. Some believe the junior deserved a higher honor after leading the Minutewomen with 16.1 points per game.

Mills is an underrated leader

Maroon and White's captain team's Most Valuable Player

Domenic Poli

She is a towering 6-foot-1. She is described by UMass coach Marnie Dacko as being the squad's go-to player. She is also hands-down the best interview on the team. This 'she' to whom I refer is junior captain Kate Mills and to this sportswriter — she is the Massachusetts women's basketball team's Most Valuable Player this season.

The 21-year-old powerhouse is, more often than not, the biggest thing out there on the court. She has the strength of a bull and the touch of an angel. She uses her grit and strong build to outmuscle opponents under the basket, but stills maintains the poise and grace to throw the ball through the nylon. Rare it is that one sees her type of vigor cocktailed with such polished style and finesse. And if you think I'm exaggerating her dominance, just take a look at the stats.

She has amassed a total of 468 points in the regular season's 29 games – an average of 16.1 per game (both marks are team-highs). And she doesn't let her overwhelming altitude go to waste, as she is second on the Maroon and White in rebounding, pulling down 194 total boards so far.

Impressed yet? Yeah, so am I – but I've just scratched the surface.

Mills manages to possess the qualities of two of the most polar-opposite players (in terms of height) in NBA history – she has the selflessness and passing ability of 5-foot-3 Muggsy Bogues and the impenetrable forcefield aspect of 7-foot-7 Manute Bol.

Third on the team with 70 assists, she doesn't hesitate to shovel the ball off to a more-open teammate. And, having batted down an unprecedented 63 shots (a UMass single-season record), she has a mind-boggling 56 blocks more than the team's runner-up, senior forward Tamara Tatham.

It was, in fact, Tatham who Dacko expected to carry the team on her back, but it seems as though Mills has picked up that job.

She has been the high-scorer in a team-leading 14 games and has pulled down the most rebounds in nine of the season's contests, second most on the Minutewomen.

Freshman guard Kim Benton started off her collegiate career the way every basketball player dreams of – she began draining threes left and right. When she's on her game she gives the ball and the net a type of relationship that is nothing short of romantic.

But on the extremely atypical night when the jump shot of the 5-foot-5 guard (this should give you an idea of exactly how small Mr. Bogues actually is) can't seem to find its mark, Mills is always there to pick up the slack. You can rely on Mills to be moving around near the baseline looking for room to work with – and getting just enough of it to do her thing.

It's just never a bad idea to dish it to No. 41 when she's near the basket. She is shooting 53.9 percent from the floor and 82.1 percent from the free-throw line. Mills always uses her raw strength and natural ability to employ, what I have dubbed, the four steps of the official Kate Mills Style of Execution: 1) Receive pass, 2) Get one's bearings and look for an option, 3) Elevate, 4) Use a little backboard and a lot of touch to deposit a bucket.

And never did Mills use this seemingly-flawless method better than in UMass' game versus Dayton on Feb. 22.

She registered a career-high 28 points in the 66-58 win over the Flyers that temporarily put the Minutewomen in a four-way tie with Dayton, La Salle and Richmond for sixth place in the Atlantic 10 Tournament. (They are now the seventh seed.)

And this was no fluke either.

It was actually the second straight game in which the Elkton, Md., native established a career-high in the points category.

The game before Dayton, a 75-67 loss to Xavier on the Feb. 18, Mills racked up 25 points, passing her old personal record of 24. The 12 rebounds that she added in the losing effort allowed for her second consecutive double-double.

Last week, the A-10 finally recognized Mills' excellence by naming her a third-team All-Conference selection.

Dacko says she is disappointed that UMass wasn't represented by more players in the voting, which is conducted by the league's coaches. But that should not take away from the honor bestowed upon Mills, who was a second-team All-Conference selection last season.

There are over 150 women's basketball players in the A-10 and your Kate Mills has been placed among some of the finest.

First-team, second-team, third-team – it doesn't matter. All that matters is that a panel of A-10 coaches has decided that one of our beloved Minutewomen is one of the top 15 players in the conference. Though, I'll admit, she almost definitely should have been placed even higher.

The Maroon and White are leaving today for its first game in the one-and-done A-10 Tournament – a matchup against St. Bonaventure on Friday.

Though an immaculate trip to the tournament's championship is unlikely, any success the Minutewomen have will stem from the performance of Mills.

Check this same exact page on Monday and if UMass is triumphant and Mills is not the main factor – color me surprised.

Either way, no matter what this weekend holds, next December take a seat in the Mullins Center for a women's basketball game. When you ask yourself, "Who is that lofting player dominating under the hoop?" you'll remember that it is one Kate Mills, unofficial MVP of the UMass women's basketball team.

Domenic Poli is a Collegian columnist. He can be reached at dpoli@student.umass.edu

This way up.

Start at Ernst & Young, and your career is headed in the right direction. With our award-winning training programs, you'll have the resources you need to enhance your skills. It's an environment that promotes your personal and professional growth and success. So there's only one way to go—up. Visit us on campus or at ey.com/us/careers.

FORTUNE 100 BEST COMPANIES TO WORK FOR 2006

Audit • Tax • Transaction Advisory Services

ERNST & YOUNG
Quality In Everything We Do

Bulldogs visit Minutemen

M. LACROSSE from page 12

who lost All-American Jake Deane over 62 percent winning percentage on faceoffs – to graduation last year.

Bulldog attackman Christopher Kempner scored four goals and dished out two assists in Yale's win, and Cannella describes him as "the best player they have right now."

Cannella admits that it has been hard to prepare for this Yale team simply because of its turnover at the attack position and in the coaching staff. Assistant coaches on offense and defense have flip-flopped over the last year, so it will be difficult to game plan for any specific style of play.

"We've looked at tape from last year on certain personnel," Cannella said. "Their coaches have changed their duties, one coach used to coach defense, now he's coaching offense and vice versa. They have some fantastic players though."

The Minutemen do know about Kempner's prolific scoring ability (20 goals last season with at least one point in all 14 games) and attackman Kyle Washabaugh, who stands at a towering 6-foot-7, 235 pounds.

Washabaugh finished the 2006 season with 33 points on 19 goals and 14 assists, giving the Minutemen much-needed momentum entering the NCAA Tournament.

UMass was even better at Garber the year before. In 2005 the Minutemen went a perfect 8-0 next to Tobin Hall. That was also the year they took down the mighty Syracuse Orange twice in a span of three weeks, both at Garber Field.

"I think there's a comfort level, playing at Garber, for a lot of our players," Cannella said. "They take a lot of pride in that, it means a lot to them."

According to Cannella, one factor that goes into UMass' comfort level at Garber is fact that the team is around the field so often. Each day the Minutemen practice on their game field, giving them unmatched familiarity with all the ins and outs of the playing surface.

"We enjoy the advantage and we get to practice out there everyday as well," Cannella noted. "You get the sight-lines and get familiar with where it is and what it is, besides what it means for us."

Jon Pelland can be reached at jpelland@student.umass.edu

Garber Field is special place for lacrosse

GARBER from page 12

the all-time college lacrosse wins list – 26 victories behind Jack Emmer's 326.

UMass reached the NCAA Tournament in each of Garber's final five years in Amherst, making it to the quarterfinals in 1986 and 1989. Cannella was part of the latter performance before graduating from UMass in 1988. Despite being just 41-years old, Cannella took the reigns of the Minutemen in 1995 and recently recorded his 100th career win.

That victory came in March of last year, and is one of many at Garber Field. It has been said that UMass enjoys one of the best home-field advantages in collegiate lacrosse.

Last season the Maroon and White went 7-1 on its own Astroturf. The only blemish was a 9-8 loss to Albany on March 14 – the Minutemen haven't beaten the Great Danes in three years. At one point, UMass reeled off five consecutive wins at home. Those were also the final five home games of the season, giving the Minutemen much-needed momentum entering the NCAA Tournament.

UMass was even better at Garber the year before. In 2005 the Minutemen went a perfect 8-0 next to Tobin Hall. That was also the year they took down the mighty Syracuse Orange twice in a span of three weeks, both at Garber Field.

"I think there's a comfort level, playing at Garber, for a lot of our players," Cannella said. "They take a lot of pride in that, it means a lot to them."

According to Cannella, one factor that goes into UMass' comfort level at Garber is fact that the team is around the field so often. Each day the Minutemen practice on their game field, giving them unmatched familiarity with all the ins and outs of the playing surface.

"We enjoy the advantage and we get to practice out there everyday as well," Cannella noted. "You get the sight-lines and get familiar with where it is and what it is, besides what it means for us."

Jon Pelland can be reached at jpelland@student.umass.edu

Minutewomen playing role of spoiler

By Kevin Dooley
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's lacrosse team has now spoiled the season- and home-opening games of two schools this year, thanks to a 13-8 win over the Vermont Catamounts (0-1) Wednesday afternoon at Moulton Winder Field.

Vermont nearly brought back nightmares of UMass' second half collapse against the Holy Cross Crusaders, coming just one goal shy of erasing an 8-4 deficit at the beginning of the second half. The Minutewomen (2-1) kept Vermont at bay for the remainder of the contest, tallying five of the last six goals scored Wednesday to pick up their second victory of the young season.

The Maroon and White makes one last stop on its four-game road trip when it battles the Harvard Crimson Saturday afternoon at Jordan Field. Game time is slated for 1 p.m. in Cambridge.

"I was happy with the way we responded to the run Vermont made in the second half," UMass coach Alexis Venechanos said. "That's been a problem for us early this season."

It took only one half of play for sophomore midfielder Holly Drown to record her second straight hat-trick of the season, while reliable junior attacker Kathleen Typadis also finished with three goals on Wednesday. Typadis' 15th career hat-trick leaves her just one goal away from entering UMass' all-time Top 10 scoring club.

Sophomore attackers Julie Pasquantonio and Claire Mancini both recorded their first career goals to cap off UMass' five-goal second half performance.

"I think we have a strong balance this year and have different people who can step up in different positions," Venechanos said. "It's different from the last couple of years when we depended on only a few players who could score."

UMass is now 10-2 all-time against the Catamounts and have won the last nine straight meetings between the two schools. The Minutewomen have not dropped a game to Vermont since April 23, 1994.

Venechanos said entering Wednesday's affair that coming up with ground balls and winning control of the draws was going to be the key. Drown must have heard her coach's message loud and clear, winning 10 draws by day's end.

"That was huge for us," Venechanos said of Drown's performance. "Possession starts with the draw. She played a great game for us today."

Drown had 20 draw controls last season in her freshman campaign.

The Maroon and White carried the momentum from last Saturday's 13-11 upset win over the Boston University Terriers, jumping out to a 3-0 lead in the first five minutes of action. All three tallies came off free-position shots. The Catamounts withstood the early scoring attack by the Minutewomen, registering the game's next two goals before UMass scored five of the next seven goals to conclude the opening 30 minutes of action.

UMass has now scored 13 goals in two straight contests this year. The Minutewomen notched 13 or more goals only twice in 18 games during the 2006 campaign. They have also held two of their three opponents this season to under 10 goals, something they also did only twice all of last season.

Kevin Dooley can be reached at kdooley@student.umass.edu

UM starting cold in recent tourneys

By Jeremy Rice
Collegian Staff

It is unfair to call the Massachusetts softball team a slow starter, but it certainly hasn't come bursting out of the gate.

UMass (4-5-1) has played 10 games over two tournaments to begin the 2007 regular season but has struggled early in both events, taking at least a couple of games to warm up.

At the Campbell/Cartier Classic in San Diego, Calif., the Minutewomen lost both opening-day games to UC-Santa Barbara and No. 6 Oregon State, only to get very hot, very quickly on Saturday en route to upsetting No. 10 California, 1-0, and blasting a San Diego State team that has received votes in both polls, 16-1.

The Sunday finale in the classic against Kansas was rained out, resulting in a rare tie for the Maroon and White.

This past weekend, a similar scenario took place at the NFCA Leadoff Classic in Columbus, Ga. After two weeks off, the Minutewomen were slow – at least in terms of wins – to get started. UMass dropped a pair of games Friday to No. 17 16 Baylor, 2-1, then to No. 19 Florida, 1-0.

This time, the struggles carried over to Saturday, as the Maroon and White fell to Georgia Tech in another close game, 3-0.

However, in their final two games of the tournament, the UMass bats exploded, beating DePaul, 9-2, later on Saturday and beating up on Coastal Carolina, 6-1, on Sunday.

The pitching was never an issue, as the opponent never crossed the plate more than three times in a game (and that happened just once). Freshman Bailey Sander and sophomore Brandice Balschmiter turned in five games of solid pitching.

Sanders started against Florida and DePaul, giving up just two earned runs in two games while striking out seven. Balschmiter pitched against Baylor, Georgia Tech and Coastal Carolina, allowing five earned runs in three games pitched.

But scoring just one run in the first three games can give any pitcher nightmares. The Minutewomen proved they still remembered how to hit against the Blue Demons, scoring nine runs on 10 hits, and followed that up with another strong outing against the Chanticleers, plating six base runners with 11 hits.

No Slouch Herself

Balschmiter has garnered plenty of attention since joining the Minutewomen last year as a freshman, and with good cause, earning the Atlantic 10 Pitcher of the Year award as a rookie. She shared the honor with Charlotte's Christy Murray.

However, she's not the only hurler collecting honors for UMass.

Bailey Sanders has yet to leave the impression that she is only a freshman. Her efforts were rewarded this week. She was named the A-10 Pitcher of the Week after going 1-1 over the weekend.

She recorded a 1.08 ERA and held opposing offenses to an impressive .152 batting average. Her season totals now come to 2.15 ERA and .202 opponents' batting average while going 2-2 in four starts.

UMass has owned the two of the first three Pitcher of the Week honors in the A-10 this season. Balschmiter won the first of the new season after her performance in the Campbell Cartier Classic.

UMass still young

Last season, Balschmiter and third baseman Whitney Mollica led UMass in nearly every statistical category on the way to sweeping the A-10 end-of-year awards.

No comparisons to their breakout rookie campaigns are being made yet, but the Minutewomen have the early makings of another pair of rookie stars.

Along with Sanders in the circle, freshman Carly Normandin led the Maroon and White in her first collegiate action this season, batting .400 on 4-of-10 hitting.

The outfielder hit a home run in her first career at-bat in the win over DePaul. She finished the classic with a .800 slugging percentage and a .400 on-base percentage.

She joined Sanders in the A-10 honors as the conference's Rookies of the Week.

Jeremy Rice can be reached at jeremyr@student.umass.edu.

FOUR Seasons
WINE • LIQUOR • CIGARS
333 Russell St., Rt. 9
Hadley, MA 01035
584-8174
Sale date: 3/01/07-3/07/07
not responsible for typographical errors

Beer

Heineken & Heineken Light 4 pk btl	Sierra Nevada Pale Ale pk btl	Busch Light 2 pk btl	J W Dundee pk btl
Milwaukee's Best pk btl	Magic Hat Ales pk btl	Cerveza pk btl	Reef Reserve pk btl
Pabst Blue Ribbon pk btl $10.99*	Red Hook Ales pk btl $10.99*	Kilkans Irish Red pk btl $9.99*	Ithaca Brewery 6 pk btl $6

Liquor

Kelt Cognac VSOP 750ml	$34.99
The Speyside Single Malt Scotch 750 ml.	$24.99
Ballantine Scotch 1.75 lt.	$21.99
Pinnacle Vodka 1.75 lt.	$19.99
Godiva Chocolate Liqueurs 750 ml.	$18.99
Jose Cuervo Flavored Tequila 750 ml. (Citrico, Tropica, Orange)	$18.99
Denaka Vodka 80° 1.75 liter	$14.99
Lamb Cognac VS 750 ml.	$14.99
Durango Gold Tequila 1liter	$12.99
Admiral Nelson Raspberry Rum 1liter.	$9.99
UV Flavored Vodka 1liter.	$9.99
Cherry Wave Flavored Vodka 1 liter.	$6.99

Tasting Notes
Tonight!!
House of Dewars Scotch Dinner With Dewars
Ambassador Ewan Gunn Thursday March 1,
2007 6:30 p.m.
Lone Wolf Restaurant
Reserve your seat now. Call our Four Seasons
584-8174
Email foursseasons01035@aol.com
Hours: Monday - Saturday 9am - 11pm Sunday 12pm - 11pm 10% off 6 bottles of wine EVERYDAY

CHEAPCOMPUTERS4U.COM
BRAND NAME ELECTRONICS FOR LESS
Apple, Mac, Sony, Dell, Gateway, Intel, Ipods, GPS, Bluetooth, Printers, & more!
Laptops $139 and up
PCS $69 and up
Apple G4s $199 and up
LCDS $59 and up
STUDENTS $3 OFF ADMISSION with AD
THE CLARION NORTHAMPTON SAT. MARCH 3RD COGAN FAIRS
91 EXIT 18 TAKE RIGHT OFF RAMP

BITE ME!
Pizza Shark Plus presents
Two-for-one Mondays
Buy any large pizza, get a second large pizza FREE with your UMass ID

Cheese $12.00	Pepperoni $14.00	Pesto $17.00
Teriyaki Steak $18.00	BBQ Chicken $17.00	Antipasto $18.00
Buffalo Chicken $17.00	Seafood $18.00	White Pizza $14.00
Mediterranean $17.00	Roasted Veggie $17.00	Margherita $17.00
Shark Therapy $17.00	Honey Mustard Chicken $18.00

(413) 259-4259
17B Montague Road, Amherst MA 01002
*higher price prevails. must show UMass ID at time of purchase. offer expires 3/17/07

HAMPSHIRE FITNESS club
90 Gatehouse Rd. (At Echo Hill)
Amherst • 256-6446
Off Rte. 9, two miles east of Amherst College
OPEN 6AM-10PM MON-FRI
8AM-9PM SAT & SUN
★Swimming ★Tennis
★Basketball ★Fitness
COMPETITIVE BASKETBALL GAMES w/JERRY Mon/Thurs 6-8pm
OVER 30 FREE CLASSES WEEKLY
HAMPFIT.COM for Rates & Info
Join Now
Spring Special
$149/ 10 Weeks
Student Rate
EFT available

UMass coasts past La Salle

M. BASKETBALL from page 12

Freeman said. "To even be close is just ridiculous. Not a lot of people have done what Steph did this year, and he deserves it because he came a long way."

The Minutemen began and ended the game firing on all cylinders. Freeman followed his pre-recorded performance of the Star Spangled Banner with his 89th-career double-double. He finished the night with 20 points and 12 rebounds.

"We knew that regardless of how emotional this game was, we still had to take care of business," Freeman said. "We're still competing for an A-10 championship. We just turned that emotion into competitiveness, and it showed."

Brandon Thomas came out of the gate looking as if he was a permanent starter all season long, finishing the game with 11 points.

Thomas, who has given UMass a spark off the bench down the stretch, scored seven first-half points and his presence on the court helped the Minutemen to a 55-22 halftime lead.

"He came out like a mad-man," Freeman said. "And he just showed what he can do out there."

As did senior James Life.

Life's clutch 3-pointer with 1:38 remaining in the game against Saint Louis on Saturday certainly snapped his cold streak from behind the arc. His 17 points to end the game came on five 3-pointers, four of which came in the first 16 minutes.

UMass kept the pressure on the entire game, even continuing to use the full-court press while up 36 points in the second half.

It didn't seem to bother La Salle coach John Giannini.

"I worry about my own team," Giannini said. "Some coaches get upset about that sort of thing, but I never do.

"I think it's extremely immature of coaches when their team is struggling and they're worried about what the other coach does. I'll never do that."

In the type of emotional night that could have easily made for an upset on the Explorer's part, UMass kept its composure.

"Before the game I was so nervous, I didn't know what to expect," Freeman said. "But everything fell into place tonight, just like this whole season. It's a wonderful thing."

Danny Picard can be reached at dpicard@student.umass.edu

Sophomore Chris Lowe tallied four points and a team-high eight assists in 21 minutes played last night in the win over La Salle.

Final block leaves question marks

GREENFIELD from page 12

But he was credited with a triple-double that he didn't actually get.

The big man had a terrific night. The athletes staff played the Gabon national anthem and raised its flag before the game in honor of Lasme's last game at the Mullins Center.

Lasme had eight blocks in the first half and the Minutemen stormed to a 55-23 halftime lead. Freeman had 16 points and all was right in the world.

But then things started to get a little sketchy. UMass had the game in hand at halftime, and the second half was just a test of Travis Ford's ability to manage playing time with an insurmountable lead.

Lasme inched toward the triple-double as the minutes ticked away on his Mullins Center career. He got his ninth block about five minutes into the second half and his ninth rebound at the 12:34 mark.

Then the circus showed up.

Ford took Lasme out of the lineup with 11:34 left in the game. His team had a 75-35 lead and the contest was firmly in hand.

However, Ford was informed about Lasme's nearing of the triple-double and put him back in at the 9:23 mark with the intention of getting him the milestone.

"Yeah, absolutely," Ford answered when asked if he put Lasme in to get the triple-double. "We knew how close he was. He deserved it."

He deserved it more than anyone else in the building but the way he got it was bogus.

Lasme registered his 10th block on a phantom tally by the official scorer, who thought Lasme tipped a runner in the lane by a La Salle driver. The ball didn't change spin or alter its course. It wasn't a block, but if Lasme breathed in the direction of the ball, the homers at the scorers table still would have given it to him.

Then it was onto the 10th rebound. This is where everyone crossed the line. In an attempt to get Lasme his 10th board, Freeman tossed the ball over the rim basically, a pass and because Freeman threw it in the vicinity of the rim, the scorers awarded Lasme with the rebound off of the "missed shot."

Of course, the UMass athletics staff drooled over the idea of Lasme's fourth triple-double of the season, and everyone seemed to forget that how Lasme got this triple-double is a violation of sports ethics.

The scorers should be ashamed of their lack of neutrality and objectivity in that situation. Instead, they gave in to the occasion and allowed the rah-rah stuff to get in the way.

Now, Lasme has four triple-doubles. But he is the same tremendous player that he was two nights ago. Nothing has changed. The fourth triple-double didn't make him into a superstar. He already was one.

But in the overwhelming urge to see greatness, everyone forgot that it was already there. There was no need to doctor the statistics.

As stated before, Stephane Lasme is a one-of-a-kind basketball player who will go down as one of the best to ever don the UMass uniform. He is the career blocked shots leader and the single-season record holder for blocked shots.

He has changed UMass' fortune with his defense, and has had a tremendous career for the Minutemen, improving from season to season and ultimately becoming the NBA prospect that he is today.

Did they really need to taint his legend?

Rob Greenfield is a Collegian columnist. He can be reached at rgreenfi@student.umass.edu.

UM needs A-10 title to reach NCAA's

By Eli Rosenwald
Collegian Staff

With the grind of the regular season now complete, it's win or go home for the Massachusetts women's basketball team in the Atlantic 10 Championship. An NIT appearance is unlikely, so without a conference tournament title, the Minutewomen's season is over.

The tournament commences on Friday in Cincinnati, Ohio, where UMass (17-12, 7-7 A-10) will square off against St. Bonaventure (15-14, 5-9 A-10) in the opening round. The winner moves on to face Temple in the second round on Saturday.

style profile

1. dress
2. bangles
3. headband
4. bag
5. wedge

ZANNA
downtown Amherst

The Bonnies and the Minutewomen met earlier this month in Olean, N.Y., and the Maroon and White held on to a 53-49 victory. UMass overcame 22 turnovers to register the win, thanks in large part to the 29 percent shooting by the Bonnies.

UMass Basketball

The Minutewomen enter Friday's contest having won five of their last six contests, while St. Bonaventure has lost five of its last seven.

A-10 tournament history

The A-10 tournament hasn't been kind to the Minutewomen. Since joining the A-10 in 1983-84, UMass has failed to capture the title in each of its 23 tournament appearances. Under UMass coach Marnie Ducko, the Minutewomen are 1-4 in the tournament, with their lone win coming against Duquesne in 2004-05.

The Minutewomen have a 13-24 (.351) all-time record in the tournament, and have been bounced out in the first round 12 times. UMass has only reached the tournament final once, in 1997-98, when it fell to Virginia Tech, 64-66, in overtime. The Maroon and White notched its first tournament victory during the 1987-88 season, against Friday's opponent, St. Bonaventure.

Accolades pile up for Mills

Last season, Kate Mills averaged 12.4 points, 5.3 rebounds and 1.3 blocks per game, earning her a Second Team All-Conference selection. The junior co-captain has improved in virtually every statistical category this season, averaging 16.1 points, 6.7 rebounds and 2.2 blocks per contest. Despite the improved numbers, Mills was named to the All-Conference Third Team on Tuesday.

Forwards aren't typically characterized as good shooters, but Mills may be the exception. The 6-foot-1 Mills easily leads the team in both field-goal percentage (53.9 percent) and free-throw percentage (82.1 percent).

Mills is among the leaders in a variety of categories within the conference, highlighted by her ranking in points (eighth), blocks (second), field-goal percentage (fourth) and free-throw percentage (fifth).

Mills has recorded double digits in scoring in all 29 games this season, including six 20-point efforts and five double-doubles. She continues to be a force in the middle, registering a single-season school record for blocks, with 66. The 128 blocks in her three seasons rank her fourth on the school's career list.

Nothing but a 'G' thing

Earlier in the season, senior Tamara Latham reached the 1,000-point plateau becoming just the 15th player in school history to accomplish the feat. Her 1,170 lifetime points rank her eighth on the UMass career-scoring list. She will finish her career in that spot, as she trails the seventh player on the list by over 200 points.

Latham is likely to have some company real soon. Mills and junior Pam Rosario rank 16th and 17th in career scoring at UMass, respectively, and both have a good chance to join Latham on the 1,000-point scoring list during the conference tournament. Mills needs just 11 points, while Rosario needs 21.

Both Mills and Rosario still have one year remaining to don the maroon and white, and health-permitting, can climb high up the chart in career scoring. With the Minutewomen losing Latham to graduation, Mills will likely have to shoulder even more of the scoring load next year, and a 500 (466 this year) point season is likely. If Mills is able to reach 1,500 career points, she will find herself in fourth place in UMass history.

Stats to keep an eye on

With games left in the season numbered, a few players have a chance to climb up the single-season record books. If Mills can score 22 points, she will climb from eighth to fourth for the most points scored in one season, and if she converts on just five field goals, she will be fourth for field goals made.

Freshman Kim Benton is currently tied for third with 50 3-pointers hit this season. Four more will place her second, while nine will give her the record. With two more steals, Latham will move into the top five for single-season thefts. If Latham plays 34 minutes she will also find herself in the top five in that category.

Eli Rosenwald can be reached at erosenwa@student.umass.edu

Sophomore Luke Bonner scored nine points, adding four rebounds and a block for the Minutemen on Senior Day.

RSOs:
Put Your Advertisement in the Daily Collegian!
RSOs receive a discounted rate for advertising. Advertise your group's events at low cost.

comedy CONNECTION HUKELAU
413-593-5222
705 Memorial Drive in Chicopee
www.hukelau.com
MARCH 17TH
From HBO's "Tourgasm" and NBC's "Last Comic Standing 2 & 3"
GARY GULMAN
MARCH 10TH JOHN VALBY
APRIL 7TH TOMMY DAVIDSON
APRIL 21ST ADELE GIVENS
MAY 26TH PABLO FRANCISCO

Tired of the Dorms?
IT'S NEVER TOO EARLY TO LOOK FOR AN APARTMENT WITH LINCOLN REAL ESTATE
Lincoln Real Estate
25 N. Pleasant St.
253-7879
www.amherstlincolnrealty.com
Now accepting applications for June 2006

If You've Got a Plan We've Got a Van!
POTTER'S AUTO & TRUCK RENTAL
Insurance Replacement Rates FREE PICK-UP
• Direct Billing to Insurance Company
• Locally Owned & Operated
• 7 & 15 Passenger Vans
• UMass Purchase Orders, MHEC Rates
Potter's Collision Repair
at North Amherst Motors
78 Sunderland Rd., North Amherst, MA
(413) 549-RENT (7368)
www.pottersauto.com
(One mile North of UMass - on bus route)
Collision Repair & Glass Replacement

Attention First-Year Students:
Have you completed MyStudentBody? It's easy, interesting ... and required for all first-year students. To avoid a registration hold, you must take and pass the course no later than Monday, March 12th. For instructions, go to the University Health Services website,
www.umass.edu/uhs
Center for Alcohol and other Drug Abuse Prevention

DailyCollegian.Com

Seven O's
Every Wednesday: ♦ KARAOKE ♦
Every Thursday: ♦ OPEN MIC ♦
Live Bands
Friday, March 2nd, 2007: "On The Rocks"
Saturday, March 3rd, 2007: Shut Up & Dance
♦ Student Band Wanted ♦
Need a place to play? Come to Seven O's!
Route 116, 330 Amherst Rd Sunderland, MA 01375 (413) 665-6788
3 PM to 1 AM M-F
1 PM to 1 AM Sat&Sun
Next to Cliffside Apts.

Free Delivery to UMass
Menu Online @ andiamo.cc

	3			8	4
9			2			7
4		2	9			6
	4		1
	5		6		7		9
					2		8
	8				4	1		3
3				7				2
		1	3			4

Find all of today's puzzle solutions online!
WWW.DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

ACROSS
1 Bronco prodder
5 Wound reminder
9 Put to shame
14 Johnnycake
15 Plus
16 "Fame" singer
17 Curving courses
18 Certain military officer
20 Eddyseist's act
22 Jacob's twin
23 Assign to a feedlot
24 Fraction of a joule
26 Part of a pelvis
27 Tyke
28 Knack
29 Stalemate
31 Landed
33 Houston or Rayburn
35 Faces the day
39 Drama dialogue
41 Cut back
43 Haircare tool
44 French brandy
46 AEC's replacement
48 Mrs. Peel of "The Avengers"
49 Tap problem
51 The Greatest
53 Ryan or Foster
54 Actress Novak
57 JFK notice
58 Nestlé Cup org.
60 Operatic sung
62 Rain-like blood
65 Antagonistic reactions
67 Incite anger
68 Tear open
69 Trifling
70 Ore deposit
71 Serengeti calls
72 Give guff to
73 Ginger cookie

DOWN
1 Health resorts
2 Paper tote
3 Doing a mailroom job
4 Go back to committee
5 Preservers of a sort
6 Of customers
7 On the Aegean
8 Stirred up
9 Homer's dad
10 Marrow container
11 Flooded
12 Biblical mount
13 Overly excited
19 ___ firma
21 After-sch. grp.
25 Characteristic clothes
27 Body powder
30 Finish line
32 Watch over
34 Calendar abbr.
36 Concluding remarks
37 Alice Ghostley on "Bewitched"
38 Uneven: Hiberbo
40 Poet Teasdale
42 Springing horses
45 Approximately
47 Contract provisions
50 Spectrum makers
52 Small pc. of land
54 Capital of Afghanistan
55 Shiraz resident
56 Computer classification
59 Reiner and Jung
61 Related (to)
63 Ostrichlike bird
64 Profound
66 CDs' ancestors

The Moan and Dove
when you get back from spring break, you'll probably be broke... so we are having our annual $3 pint week.
every draft is 3 bucks march 26 - april 1st
themoananddove.com
460 West St. • Rte. 116 Amherst, MA • 256-1710
3pm 'til 1am every day

QUOTE OF THE DAY

"Insomnia is my greatest inspiration."
-Jon Stewart

TWO DUDES By Aaron Warner
WE'RE LOOKING FOR A BOOK ON EARLY AMERICAN POETS.
LIBRARY INFORM
OH. THIS BOOK IS EARLY AMERICAN POETS.
NO, DUDE. WE'RE LOOKING FOR THE BOOK THAT WAS ON IT.
WE LOST A COMIC BOOK THAT WE LEFT ON TOP OF IT.

THE FAMILY MONSTER By Josh Shalek
How d'you like my money-makin' machine?
Isn't that illegal?
It makes money by buying stocks, then selling high.
Amazing
The hard part was finding a monkey who could travel ahead in time and tracking down the NASDAQ.

A College Girl Named Joe By Aaron Warner
UH... HI. I FOUND YOUR NUMBER IN THE PHONEBOOK AND, WELL, I'M PLANNING A BACHELORETTE PARTY FOR MY FRIEND AND I'VE NEVER HIRED A STRIPPER BEFORE.
HE WANTS TO KNOW HOW BIG OUR FURNITURE IS?!
MAYBE IT'S PART OF HIS ACT!
HE'S CHECKING TO SEE IF SATURDAY IS AVAILABLE.
ACO FURNITURE STRIPPING
HEY, LOU! YOU DOING ANYTHING SATURDAY?

Welcome To Falling Rock National Park By Josh Shalek
You see everything as a potential meal, don't you Can't help it. I'm a cat
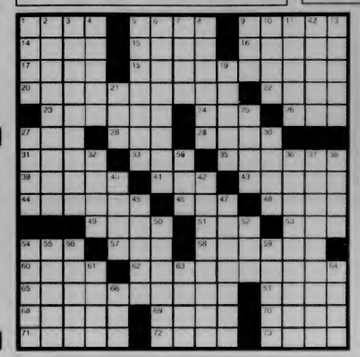
I'm surprised you haven't eaten Carver yet
I'm saving him for a day I don't feel like hunting
I hope you have a very dark sense of humor

Chicago Pizzaria
Free Delivery!
PIZZA - CALZONES - SUBS - WRAPS
SALADS - PASTA - DINNERS
RIBS - SEAFOOD - SLICES
PARTY SIZE PIZZA NOW AVAILABLE!
CALZONE SLICES... LIKE NO OTHER!
Now open for lunch!
HOURS
Sun-Wed: 11am-2am
Thurs-Sat: 11am-3am
Order For DELIVERY or PICK-UP
(413) 549-6073
150 Fearing Street
Next to Patterson Dorm
Amherst, MA 01002



Submit your comics!
collegiancomics@yahoo.com
Submit your classifieds!
(413) 545-3500

HOROSCOPES

aquarius Jan. 20-Feb. 18
You are like a clownfish. Sad as you may feel everyone expects you to be all smiles.

pisces Feb. 19-Mar. 20
If you come see a vegetarian eating yogurt, smack them and call them a traitor.

aries Mar. 21-Apr. 19
Flamingos invented Yoga. Scope out how they stand. So beautiful, so beautiful.

taurus Apr. 20-May 20
If you encounter confrontation, speak gibberish. This will avert potential disaster.

gemini May 21-Jun. 21
Overproduction leads to mediocrity. Keep it simple and you'll never lose your edge.

cancer Jun. 22-Jul. 22
You are destined to study herpetology and the reproductive organs of turtles.

leo Jul. 23-Aug. 22
This is your month. At least until that crummy little lamb shows up.

virgo Aug. 23-Sept. 22
Strive to be more like pizza. It is the perfect combination of magical flavors.

libra Sept. 23-Oct. 22
You are so indie. Always evolving.

scorpio Oct. 23-Nov. 21
Shave your legs to reduce your drag on society.

sagittarius Nov. 22-Dec. 21
Your hasty decision making will result in strong odor and a multitude of tears.

capricorn Dec. 22-Jan. 19
If you want to look crazy, play air guitar as you walk around campus.

MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN MARKETPLACE

ANNOUNCEMENTS

Global Express Tours Spring Break Montreal Party Weekends from $99 Complete bus, hotels, & clubs. Montrealexpress.net 781-979-9001

EMPLOYMENT

Brandywine Apts. Now Leasing, 1&2 bedroom apts. Leases begin Jun, July, Aug or Sep. First Come First Serve. Get Them while they last. www.brandywineapts.com stop by or call 549-0600

Center of town, 1,2,3 bedrooms hardwood floors. NOW SHOWING for JUNE and SEPTEMBER. NO FEES www.amherstlincolnrealty.com 253-7879

EMPLOYMENT

SUMMER ON CAPE COD!! The Wychmere Harbour Beach Club is conducting interviews foe summer employment on our CapeCod property March 8, 9, 10, & 22, 23, 24. On-Site Housing is Available. Visit our website at www.wychmereharbor.com for available positions and call (508) 432-1000x129 for details!

Retail Sales/ Mattresses-Energetic, communication skills required. Oppurtunity to grow with company. Flexible PT. Do not call – Stop by 328 College St. RT. 9 Amherst Discount Mattress

EMPLOYMENT

Camp Takajo, Naples Maine, Picturesque lakefront locations, exceptional facilities. Mid June thru Mid August. Counselor positions in tennis, swimming, land sports, water sports, tripping, outdoor skills, theatre arts, fine arts, music nature study. Call Camp Takajo at (866) 356-2267 Submit application online at www.takajo.com A rep will be on the Campus Center Concourse Mon. March 5th, 2007

Dell Campus Reps Needed Promote a top 30 company to gain real-world business & marketing experience! www.repnation.com/dell to apply

EMPLOYMENT

Winter/ Spring positions available. Earn up to $150 per day Exp not required. Undercover shoppers needed To Judge Retail and Dining Establishments. Call 800-722-4791

Rent us your ears! Listening Experiments $10/hr English must be your first language. Email: phonetics_lab@linguist.umass.edu voicemail: 545-6837

Bartending $300/ day potential. No experience necs. Training provided. 1-800-965-6520 ext.162

FOUND

Sneakers found in boyden lot next to tennis courts on wed. (2/22) To claim go to info desk in CC concourse

LOST

Northampton Cathedral ceiling, sky-lites, hardwood floors, 4-5 bdrms. 9/1 $1950. 413-730-6660

SERVICES

Pregnancy Testing. HIV Testing. Birth Control, and Emergency Contraception. STI Screening and Treatment. Affordable and confidential. Tapestry Health, 27 Pray Street, Amherst. 548-9992. www.tapestryhealth.com

SERVICES

Call Someone who really cares. Birthright of Amherst Area 549-1906, 1800-550-4900 24 hour hotline Free Pregnancy test 233 N. Pleasant St. Amherst www.birthright.org

TRAVEL

Global Express Tours Spring Break Montreal Party Weekends from $99 Complete bus, hotels, & clubs. Montrealexpress.net 781-979-9001

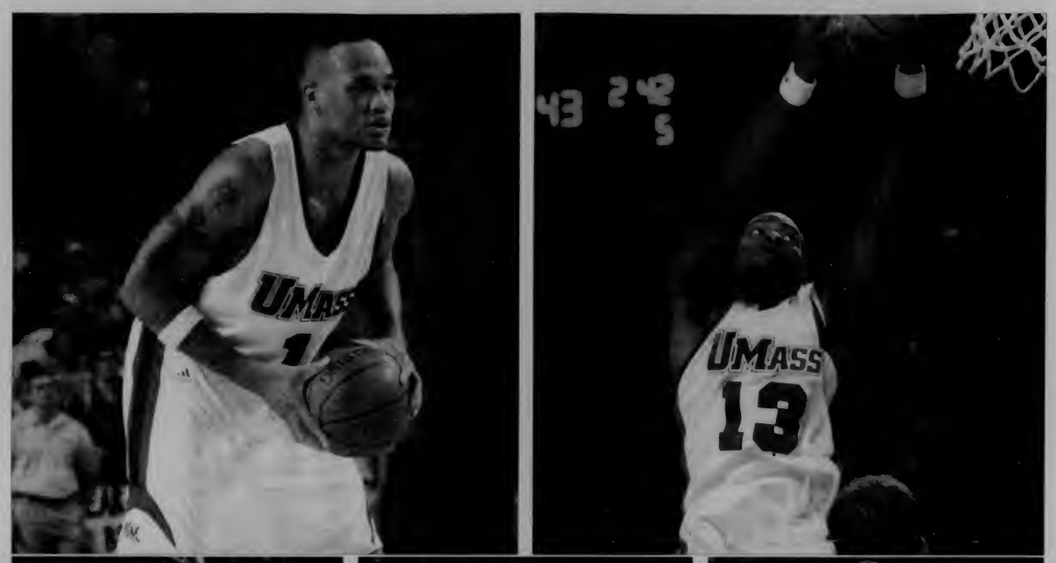
www.daily collegian .com

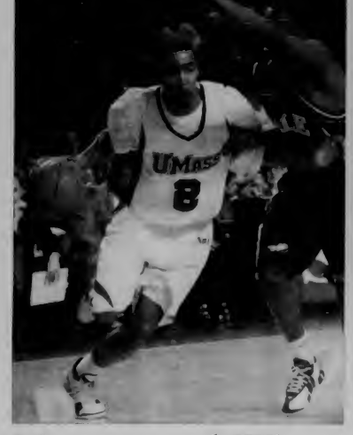
THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

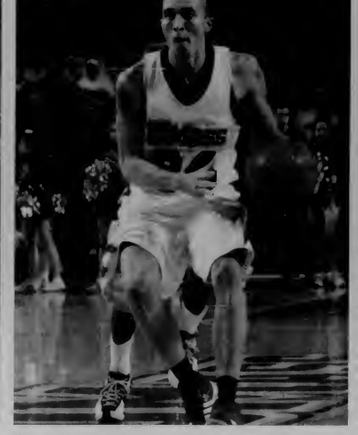
SPORTS THURSDAY

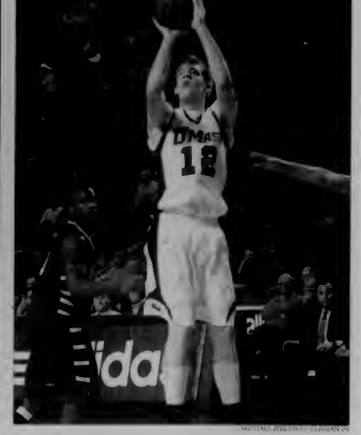
THURSDAY, MARCH 1, 2007 SPORTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Fond farewell to seniors









MICHAEL ZHELEZNY-COLLEGIAN (8)

Maroon and White dominate

By Danny Picard
Collegian Staff

The final home game of the season for the Massachusetts men's basketball team was over before Rashaun Freeman even finished singing the National Anthem, in what turned out to be the most memorable senior night in recent history for the Minutemen.

UMass	102
La Salle	63

The five UMass seniors combined for 43 of its 55 first-half points, en route to a 102-63 win over La Salle last night at the Mullins Center. It marked the Minutemen's first five-game winning streak of the season.

"I was very proud of our seniors tonight," UMass coach Travis Ford said. "I was very proud of the way they started the basketball game. It's not an easy thing to do. It's such an emotional beginning and so many things are going through your head.

"To be able to turn that off and turn on the scouting report and the game plan, it's a tough thing to do. And it just kind of snowballed from there. We got contributions from everybody, but I think our seniors played the best."

Stephane Lasme was one of those seniors and he became just the third player in NCAA history to have four triple-doubles in one season with a 17-point, 10-rebound and 10-block effort.

"I didn't know why everyone wanted me to go into the game," Lasme said upon hearing he was close to another triple-double. "The game was basically over, so I didn't expect to go back in, but coach Ford told me all I needed was a rebound and a block."

With that one rebound and one block, he joined Jason Kidd (1994 at California) and Michael Anderson (1986 at Vermont) as the only two other players to perform the feat.

"Steph is an amazing player,"

See M. BASKETBALL on page 10

Lasme's stats didn't need padding

Rob Greenfield

It happens every once in a while in sports. And it takes a little bite out of the integrity pie every single time.

It was Senior Night at the Mullins Center yesterday. A big night for Rashaun Freeman and Stephane Lasme. A lot of tears and smiles and memories.

The two big guys didn't disappoint. And neither did two other seniors, James Life and Brandon Thomas, who turned in heart-and-soul efforts in the UMass 102-63 romp over La Salle.

Lasme had a triple-double – 17 points, 10 rebounds and 10 blocks.

That's how it will go down in the official scorebook, but those statistics are false.

Doctoring of the record books is an unforgivable sin in the religious world of competitive sports. It damages the integrity of the game and cheapens the accomplishments of other great players.

Ricky Davis did it by throwing it off of his own basket to get his 10th rebound and his first triple-double. Brett Favre did it by sliding into Michael Strahan to give him the record-breaking sack.

And the official scorers did it last night with some hometown bias, aided by the Senior Night atmosphere and the temptation to give in to popular demand.

Lasme didn't get a 10th block. And he shouldn't have had his 10th rebound either.

Before the details, let's get something straight: Stephane Lasme is a tremendous athlete and a hard-working person who deserves every accolade and honor he has received and will receive in the future. He is a class act, a great captain and teammate who doesn't disrespect anyone with antics or showmanship.

What happened last night is not his fault.

See GREENFIELD on page 10

UMass hosts Yale in home opener

By Rob Greenfield
Collegian Staff

After a tough season-opening 8-6 loss to Hofstra last Saturday, the Massachusetts men's lacrosse team has to reboot and prepare for the Yale Bulldogs, who will visit Amherst Saturday for a 1 p.m. start at Garber Field.

This will be the second game of the season for both teams, but the Bulldogs opened with a win in their first bout against Holy Cross, a convincing 13-7 decision on the road against the Crusaders.

The Minutemen suffered the two-goal loss on Saturday and watched some game film on Sunday in Amherst before returning to practice on Monday to begin preparation for this weekend's game.

"Practice has been good," UMass coach Greg Cannella said. "Guys are working hard and obviously getting ourselves ready for Yale, what they do and what they may do. They've only played one game.

Yale, on the underdog this weekend against a UMass team that dropped from a No. 10 ranking to open the season to No. 18 currently. But the Bulldogs have some bite and will be a tough opponent for the Minutemen, who will have to deal with Yale's faceoff specialist Gregory Dubuff.

Dubuff won 16 of the 22 draws he took against Holy Cross last weekend and will be a thorn for the Minutemen.

See M. LACROSSE on page 9

This week Brett Garber leads the Minutemen the first home game of the season at the field bearing his father's name.

Garber gives UM special advantage

By Jon Pelland
Collegian Staff

For some members of the Massachusetts men's lacrosse team, playing at Richard F. Garber Field means a little something extra. For UMass coach Greg Cannella, it means he paces the same sidelines as the legendary coach. For Brett Garber, it means he gets to play his home games on the field bearing his grandfather's name.

"It's a special place for a lot of people," Cannella said. "It means a lot to me, playing for coach [Garber] and having an opportunity to sit in his seat and then have an opportunity to go out there and coach on the same sideline that he did, it's incredible.

"Like Brett Garber, he gets to play on his grandfather's field. He's expressed that to his teammates."

This Saturday is the home-opener for the Maroon and White. The Minutemen take on Yale at 1 p.m.

The eldest Garber patrolled the sidelines behind Boyden Gymnasium from 1954 until his son, and Brett's father, Ted, took over in 1991. Over that time Dick amassed quite an impressive résumé. Not only was he the first collegiate lacrosse coach to win 300 games, but he remains No. 2 on

See GARBER on page 9

SEASON FINALE FOR MINUTEMEN PAGE 12

NORTHAMPTON HAS BIG WEEKEND PAGE 6

THE MASSACHUSETTS

DAILY COLLEGIAN

NEW ENGLAND'S LARGEST COLLEGE DAILY EST 1890

RAIN : HI: 41 LO: 31 WWW.DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM FRIDAY, MARCH 2, 2007

Counting careless crossers

Stats students study UMass campus safety on crosswalks

By Kevin Foley
Collegian Staff

Visitors driving on the University of Massachusetts campus for the first time may find themselves swerving and stopping to avoid collision with pedestrians crossing the street.

After several pedestrians were struck last year, police are attempting to curb the number of collisions and two UMass students conducted a survey to bring the issue to the forefront.

Only 27 percent of pedestrians who use the crosswalk near the University of Massachusetts Southwest Residential Area on Massachusetts Avenue look for traffic before they cross, according to a study conducted by two UMass senior mathematics and statistics students.

The two students, Dan Ron and Amy Jackson, performed the study for the Statistics 501 class they were enrolled in last semester.

"We as a group decided that we almost run over people when we're driving," Ron said.

The Massachusetts Ave. crosswalk, which links the Southwest Residential Area to the central campus, was chosen because it is the busiest at UMass, according to Ron.

"One of us counted the total number of people walking by," said Ron. "The other one counted how many of them actually looked or made any effort to turn their head before they crossed."

Some UMass students were already aware of the problem from personal experience. "It's crazy how some people will just walk out into the street without looking," said senior Seth Quinn, who drives through the campus regularly.

See CROSSWALKS on page 4

Two UMass students, Dan Ron and Amy Jackson, performed a study for their Statistics 501 class of how many pedestrians looked before crossing the campus streets.

Dan Ron (above) and Amy Jackson's study found that only 27 percent of pedestrians who use the crosswalk near Southwest Residential Area on Massachusetts Avenue look for traffic before they cross.

Student arrested in aggravated assault

Homophobic slurs allegedly trigger conflict

By Eric Athas and Derrick Perkins
Collegian Staff

A University of Massachusetts student was arrested yesterday for assault and battery and allegedly made homophobic remarks to the victim, states a University press release.

Following a day-long investigation by patrol officers and detectives, police arrested Tony Brennan, 24, of 5 Dawes Ave, Winchester, Mass., on Sunset Avenue in Amherst.

Brennan has been charged with aggravated assault and battery, assault and battery to intimidate someone based on race, creed or sexual orientation with bodily injury involved, and civil right violations.

According to the University of Massachusetts Police Department, officers initially responded to MacKimmie residence hall at 12:06 a.m. Feb. 28 to aid the victim of a serious assault and battery. The early investigation determined that the victim, a 20-year-old UMass student, was assaulted by another male student making homophobic remarks in the Southwest residential area.

"The campus community and the UMass police take this type of incident seriously," said UMPD Deputy Police Chief Patrick Archbald in a statement. "We called in additional staff to investigate and address this case in a prompt fashion."

The victim, listed as a member of the 2005-06 UMass men's swim team, was later transported to Cooley Dickinson Hospital for treatment after suffering severe injury to his face, including a fractured eye socket and a concussion during the assault.

"I hate that things like this can happen on a college campus and I hope whoever is responsible is prosecuted to the fullest extent of the law," said Russ Yarworth, UMass men's swimming coach.

Brennan was held at the Hampshire County Jail for arraignment on Thursday in Hadley District Court.

"I don't really understand why he got attacked for being gay," said Evan Swisher, a member of the UMass men's swim team. "I don't think this matters, but he's not gay."

The roommate and friend of Brennan, who witnessed the alleged assault, claims the information provided to police was incorrect. He said Brennan was acting in self-defense and "never heard any homophobic remarks."

"Tony's a quiet guy, he's a great guy," said Brennan's friend, who asked to remain anonymous because of legal issues. "He's a caring person, he's going to protect whoever he's around, his friends mean a lot to him."

Brennan's friend said the incident occurred when he, Brennan and three girls were in a car on Sunset Ave. near Patterson dormitory. He said the alleged victim and a friend approached the car and exchanged words with Brennan.

During the conversation, he said Brennan exited the car and told the alleged victim and his friend to go home. Brennan's friend said a scuffle then took place.

"The kid pushed Tony and it looked like he was about to swing at Tony, and in defense, Tony swung back, hit the kid and they started fighting," said Brennan's friend, who noted the supposed fight lasted under 30 seconds. "The kid involved fell down. I get in between him and Tony at that point, told the kid to take his friend and get out of here."

Although Brennan's friend said he did not hear any homophobic remarks, Swisher said homophobia is something swimmers are faced with a lot.

"It's kind of ridiculous that this kind of homophobia and aggressive behavior is still prevalent and still exists at UMass, but there's still a lot of narrow-mindedness and it's disappointing," said Swisher. "[It is] something I'm real familiar with being from Bennington, Vt. A lot of narrow-minded thinking and people who don't know what they're talking about that think swimmers are gay because they shave their legs."

Swisher called the victim one of the friendliest people he knew and Yarworth praised him as "a great kid and a great student and not in my mind a troublemaker."

Collegian Staff writers Jon Melomi and Eden Univer contributed to this report.

Eric Athas can be reached at editor@dailycollegian.com. Derrick Perkins can be reached at dperkins@student.umass.edu.

UMass aims to add tenured faculty with Amherst 250 plan

By Cara Grannemann
Collegian Staff

Throughout the 2005 academic year, college donations have risen nationally by 9.4%, accumulating to around $28 billion, according to USA Today.

For the 2006 fiscal year, the University of Massachusetts received over $28 million of that.

Many of the people responsible for annual donations to the school are alumni, of which UMass has plenty.

